BOOK I.

From the Earlieſt Accounts of Britain, to its being firſt invaded by the Romans under Julius Cæſar.

CHAP. I.

Introductory remarks. Etymology of the name Britain. Its ſituation, form, extent, and natural advantages. The manner of its being firſt peopled, and its diviſion into Principalities and States, with the Appellative names given to the inhabitants of each reſpective diſtrict.

THE moſt ſecret ſatisfaction that can be enjoyed by mortal is, no doubt, the acquirement of knowledge, becauſe, when once poſſeſſed, it can never be obliterated but by the common defects incident to human nature. The tranſmitting and perpetuating events ſeems to have been the firſt, and moſt important effort of human genius, and has taken place, with conſiderable improvements, at different periods, and in different parts of the world, as the ages have become more refined and poliſhed.

The ingenuity of the human mind cannot be diſplayed in more ſtriking colours, or ſhine with greater luſtre, than in the formation of Hiſtory, which not only preſents us with the moſt ſingular and memorable events, but alſo points out to us the reſpective cauſes which have produced the overthrow of one nation, and the riſe and proſperity of another.

In the delightful ſtudy of Hiſtory a variety of objects preſent themſelves to our view: we become acquainted with the moſt elevated characters, ſuch as kings, heroes, legiſlators and philoſophers, many of whom have particularly diſtinguiſhed themſelves in their reſpective capacities, and have been the means of inſtructing, poliſhing and reforming mankind.

This has taken place in moſt parts of the world, but in none more materially than in the country about which we are now going to treat. Of all the diſtricts into which the world is divided, there cannot be any one whoſe Hiſtory claims more attention, (and particularly that of an Engliſhman) than Great Britain. In contemplating the annals of this country the faculties of the mind are opened and enlarged, a prodigious fund of important intelligence is procured, and that curioſity, which is naturally inherent in man, gratified to the utmoſt extent.

No Hiſtory whatever can exhibit more illuſtrious ſcenes and characters, or produce a richer fund of entertainment and inſtruction, than that of Britain, which furniſhes us with the moſt intereſting events and incidents relative to thoſe very people from whom we ourſelves are immediately deſcended. Here we behold the manner in which a once barbarous nation has been gradually poliſhed and brought to a perfect ſtate of refinement, notwithſtanding the great oppoſition it has met with from ſome of the moſt bold and enterpriſing invaders. No country whatever has undergone greater revolutions, nor can the History of any afford more ſatisfaction to the curious. It contains numerous occurrences of the moſt important nature, and furniſhes us with ſuch intereſting examples, that, upon ſerious reflection, the mind naturally glows with a laudable emulation to rival the practice of recorded virtue.

At the time the Roman empire was in its meridian ſtate, the iſland of Great Britain was ſcarce known; but, ſince that period, it has become famous throughout the world, and its inhabitants, from their natural courage and ingenuity, have explored thoſe parts, which, in all probability, would otherwiſe have been ſtill in embrio. By theſe means it has become one of the moſt powerful and opulent nations in Europe, and, from its extenſive commerce, and naval ſtrength, has been long the envy of other nations.

Having made theſe introductory remarks, we ſhall now proceed to the laborious taſk we are about to undertake, namely, to give an accurate, comprehenſive, impartial and faithful account of the origin, revolutions, progreſſive and preſent ſtate of Great Britain, in which we ſhall minutely preſerve every incident, that has occurred of a material nature, from its firſt being known, to the lateſt period of authentic intelligence.

To endeavour to trace minutely the origin of any country has ever been found a taſk of the moſt arduous nature, and to accompliſh it effectually a matter morally impoſſible. Such is the caſe with Great Britain, its origin, like that of other nations, being either loſt in fable, or buried in obſcurity.

Among other uncertainties, there is not any thing which appears to have puzzled the ſearchers into antiquity more than to account for the name of this iſland, which has received various terms from different nations, according to the particular genius of each reſpective language.

The firſt name it is ſuppoſed to have received was that of Bratanack, which it is ſaid was given it by the Phœnicians, who firſt traded to the weſtern coaſt of the iſland for tin, lead, and other articles. This aſſertion appears highly probable, the word Bratanack, in the Phœnician language, ſignifying the land of tin. It was afterwards called by the Greeks Albion, a term derived from the Greek word Alpos, which ſignifies white, in alluſion to the whiteneſs of the chalky cliffs with which the iſland is ſurrounded, and this is confirmed by the writings of the antient Britiſh bards themſelves, who call it Inis-Wen, which, in their language, ſignifies White Iſland. It was called by the Romans Bretanea, and afterwards Britain, which laſt epithet is ſuppoſed to have been derived from the Britiſh word Berith, ſignifying, in that language, blue, and which was peculiarly characteriſtic of the cuſtom of the then natives, who took a pride in ſtaining their bodies with a dye of that colour. The more modern term England is derived from an Anglo-Saxon province called Anglen, the inhabitants of which emigrating from their own country, gave that name to thoſe parts of which they became maſters by conqueſt, and in the courſe of time it was fixed as the ſtaple name of the ſouthern parts of the iſland.

But whatever may have given birth to the name, Britain, (the miſtreſs of wealth and commerce, the favourite reſidence of liberty and plenty, and the undoubted ſovereign of the ſea) is certainly one of the largeſt and moſt ſpontaneous iſlands in the univerſe. It is commodiouſly ſituated in the Atlantic Ocean, being bounded on the eaſt by the German Ocean; on the Weſt, by the Iriſh Sea, or St. George's Channel; on the north, by the Deucaledonian or Northern Ocean; and on the ſouth by the Britiſh Channel. It is of a triangular form, and extends in length, from north to ſouth, 540 miles: that is, according to aſtronomical calculation, reckoning ſixty miles to a degree; but in Engliſh ſtatute meaſure, its length is exactly 622 miles and four furlongs. Its breadth, which muſt be taken from the Land's-End in Cornwall to the South Foreland in Kent, is 285 miles, and its circumference, including the windings of the coaſt, 1830. Its longitude is from 9 deg. 45 min. to 17 deg. 15 min. and the latitude from 50 to 59 deg. north.

The iſland of Great-Britain, from the peculiarity of its ſituation, enjoys many advantages unknown to the inhabitants of other countries. The air, though moiſt, is far from being unhealthy; and the ſoil is ſo prolific as to produce all the neceſſaries and comforts of life. The ſummer is not ſcorching, nor the winter ſevere, the former being tempered with cooling breezes, and the latter ſoftened by the ſalt vapours that ariſe and ſpread themſelves from the ſurrounding ſeas. The ground is cloathed with an almoſt perpetual verdure, and the whole country diverſified with hills and dales, ſo as to exhibit to the view a variety of the moſt delightful and enchanting proſpects. It produces ſuch an abundance of corn as not only to ſupply the inhabitants for home conſumption, but alſo to allow the exportation of great quantities to foreign parts: and the paſturage is ſo fine and rich, that the cattle are eſteemed the largeſt and beſt in Europe. The various windings and indentions of the coaſt afford numberleſs harbours for the ſecurity of ſhipping, and the ſurrounding ſea teems with myriads of fiſh, which not only gratify the inhabitants as food, but turn to their advantage, by the traffic they make with them in foreign countries. In ſhort, from the natural fertility of the iſland, the ſurrounding ſeas, and interſecting ſtreams, Britain is plentifully ſupplied with every neceſſary article that nature can crave, and moſt of the delicacies that luxury can wiſh for; beſides which, from the great extent of her commerce, ſhe is no leſs acquainted with thoſe dainties which are particularly diſtinguiſhed in foreign climes. Her inhabitants likewiſe enjoy bleſſings to which thoſe of other countries are total ſtrangers: the ſyſtem of the conſtitution is ſo oppoſite to the leaſt conſtraint, that the meaneſt ſubject has an equal freedom in enjoying the fruits of his induſtry as the moſt exalted character in the abundance of his poſſeſſions; ſo that it may be juſtly ſaid

Here Liberty, delightful goddeſs, reigns,
Gladdens each heart, and gilds the fertile plains;
Here firmly ſeated may ſhe ever ſmile,
And ſhower her bleſſings on her favourite iſle,

When we conſider the great natural advantages attendant on this now famous iſland, it is not to be be wondered at that, in very early times, it ſhould have attracted the notice of a people who had long before been accuſtomed to commerce, and who were deſirous of increaſing the advantages ariſing therefrom by endeavouring to diſcover places before unknown. This was the caſe with the Phœnicians, Greeks and Romans, who extended their commerce and navigation as far as the iſland of Britain, with the inhabitants of which (who were even then numerous and powerful) they traded for ſome ages before the Chriſtian æra.

According to the moſt circumſtantial accounts it evidently appears that the Phœnicians were the firſt people who diſcovered this iſland, and that the diſcovery was to them productive of the moſt conſiderable advantages. They landed and formed an intercourſe with the inhabitants of the weſtern extremity of the iſland, from whence they exported tin and other commodities; and this traffic they conſidered of ſuch importance, that they erected ſeveral ſtrong forts or caſtles in that part now called Cornwall, for the preſervation of their traders, and the ſecurity of their new eſtabliſhed commerce. Nay, ſo jealous were they of this advantage that they concealed the voyage from all the reſt of the world; and we are told by Strabo, that one of their ſhips being followed by a Roman veſſel, fitted out to diſcover her deſtination, the Phœnician pilot, in order to fruſtrate their deſigns, ran his veſſel aſhore, and that when he returned, inſtead of being blamed, he was commended for his conduct, and the damage ſuſtained made good at the public expence.

With reſpect to the origin of the firſt inhabitants of this iſland, it cannot be traced with any degree of certainty, a vague and romantic tradition only remaining to lead us through the intricate mazes of fabulous times. Some writers, indeed, have endeavoured to trace the origin of the Britons from Samothes, one of the ſons of Japhet, and others from Brutus, the grandſon of Æneas; but both theſe accounts are evidently fictitious, and have been long ſince exploded. The moſt probable opinion is, that it was peopled at various periods, and from different parts of the continent; but it is impoſſible, at this diſtance of time, to determine the æra when the firſt ſettlement was made.

The earlieſt account that can be relied on as authentic is, that this iſland was firſt peopled by a party of the Celts, a tribe of the Gauls from the neighbouring continent, Britain being ſo near them that they could diſcern the coaſts from their own hills. This happened in the reign of Teutat, king of the Celts, about 1860 years before the birth of Chriſt. That prince having extended his conqueſts to the very extremities of Germany and Gaul, in order ſtill farther to increaſe the commerce of his dominions, ſent a colony of his ſubjects to Britain, who, landing on the ſouthern parts of the iſland, there took up their reſidence. This colony aſſiduouſly employed themſelves to their commercial intereſts, to which they were warmly excited by the example and encouragement of Teutat their prince, who, from his vigorous promotion of traffic, acquired the appellation of Mercur, which, in the language of the Celtæ, ſignifies a trading man.

The great ſucceſs of theſe firſt emigrants from Gaul ſoon induced others to follow their example; and thus, in proceſs of time, not only the ſea coaſts, but the interior parts of the iſland, became inhabited. Theſe latter emigrants formed themſelves into different ſocieties, and, having no concern with the commerce carried on by their brethren, became, in time, a diſtinct people. They devoted themſelves entirely to a paſtoral life, and wandered from one part of the iſland to another in ſearch of paſture for their flocks and herds. Happy in themſelves, and ignorant of the wants introduced by luxury, they were contented with the ſtation of ſhepherds, and lived wholly unconcerned with the wars and revolutions of other countries.

In this ſtate they continued for ſome time, when their Belgic neighbours, who had applied themſelves to commerce, and obtained from their ſouthern acquaintance faint notions of the refinements of life, being too numerous on the continent, and conſequently impoveriſhing each other, came in great numbers to Britain. Theſe ſpringing originally from the ſame ſtock, uſing the ſame language, and having the ſame manners and cuſtoms as the Celts, were hoſpitably received by the deſcendants of the firſt ſettlers, who ſuffered them to ſettle in Cornwall, Devonſhire, Kent and Suſſex. In conſequence of this they were ſoon incorporated together by intermarriages, and their progeny deemed themſelves but one people. Hence, in the courſe of time, they became populous and powerful, and the Phœnicians and Grecians carried on a commercial intercourſe with them long before they were known to the Romans.

The great ſucceſs of theſe iſlanders being made known to their brethren on the continent, prodigious numbers emigrated, and came over to Britain, in hopes of participating of thoſe advantages for which, even then, the iſland had become famous. In conſequence of this the firſt inhabitants became jealous, being fearful leſt the repeated encroachments of their countrymen ſhould deprive them of their paſtures, and that in time they might endeavour to poſſeſs themſelves of the whole country. Thus was the tranquillity of the old inhabitants greatly interrupted, and diſcord and faction took place inſtead of peace and plenty.

Theſe diſturbances being made known to Divitiacus, king of the Sueſſones, he came over with a large body of forces, collected from the Bibroci, Attrabates, and other Belgic nations, with which he reduced great part of Britain, and garriſoned ſeveral of the inland provinces with his troops. In conſequence of this, war and devaſtation took place, and the whole iſland was filled with blood and ſlaughter. Every tribe became a ſeperate government, and ſuch as were too ſmall to defend themſelves againſt the inroads of the enemy, joined with others, in order to ſecure their reſpective rights againſt the common invader. This had the intended effect; and the conſequence was that to ſecure themſelves in future, the iſland was ſoon after divided into principalities or kingdoms, each of which was governed by a chief choſen by the majority of the inhabitants in the reſpective diſtricts. Theſe kingdoms, or rather petty ſtates, were ſeventeen in number, the names of which, together with the different appel-appellations of the people who inhabited them, were as follow:

Inhabitants.	Principalities.

The chiefs of theſe different ſtates or principalities held a ſovereign power over all thoſe by whom they were reſpectively choſen to govern; but, on particular emergencies, delegates were ſent from each to a full aſſembly of the nation, in order to appoint ſome reſpectable individual to the office of generaliſſimo, or chief commander of the whole. But the authority of this officer was temporary and his power limited: he was only appointed in caſes of urgency, and when the whole nation thought themſelves in danger from any common enemy; and, during the time he held his office, was ameſnable to the cenſure of the general aſſembly by whom he was elected.

CHAP. II.

Of the firſt inhabitants of Britain, their general characters, perſons, manners, diſpoſitions, habitations, method of living, warlike inſtruments, commerce, &c.

THE antient Britons, or firſt inhabitants of this iſland, were particularly tenacious of their liberty, rudely generous, and roughly brave; and, according to Diodorus Siculus, poſſeſſed much greater integrity than even the Romans. They ſtrongly reſembled their neighbours the Gauls, except being leſs poliſhed, and more ferocious. In their perſons they were tall, well-proportioned, and robuſt. The men were ſtrong and active, and the women fair, well featured, and finely ſhaped. Both ſexes had either red or cheſnut-coloured hair, which flowed looſely over their ſhoulders; and the men conſtantly ſhaved their faces, except the upper lip, on which they ſuffered the hair to grow to a moſt enormous length. Their dreſs was compoſed of the ſkins of beaſts, and they ſtained their bodies with the juice of a weed called woad, rendering the colour more laſting by pricking the ſkin before the application of it. The juice of the weed gave them a ſky-coloured tinge, which being conſidered as a proper ground, was overſpread with a variety of other tints, independent of which they were ornamented with the repreſentation of flowers and animals, which they rudely painted on different parts of their bodies. This cuſtom was deſigned to anſwer two purpoſes, the firſt, to pleaſe thoſe whom they were deſirous of captivating, and the latter to intimidate thoſe whom they conſidered as their enemies.

Being naturally robuſt, and enured to all the inclemencies of the weather, to hardſhips and fatigue, they acquired a degree of fortitude and valour ſuperior to thoſe of more poliſhed countries. Strangers to ambition and luxury, their wealth conſiſted in their herds of cattle, which they drove from place to place for the convenience of paſture. Honeſt, ſincere and hoſpitable, they conſidered both the perſons and effects of ſtrangers inviolably ſacred, and thought it an indiſpenſible duty to afford them ſuch protection as laid in their power. They diſdained every ſpecies of deceit and artifice, and deteſted thoſe who were addicted to effeminacy or indolence. Their darling darling object was liberty, and they made not the leaſt heſitation to ſacrifice their lives in its defence.

With reſpect to their habitations, they conſiſted only of mean huts, ſome of which were formed of boughs of trees and reſembled arbours, while others were made of mud and clay, and generally covered with turf. Their towns conſiſted of a number of theſe huts irregularly placed at ſmall diſtances from each other. They were ſituated in the middle of woods, and, by way of fortification, they blocked up all the avenues with felled trees. They often changed the places of their abode, which, in general, was done for the better convenience of feeding their flocks and herds.

Their diet was ſimple, and they were frugal in the uſe of it: their food conſiſted chiefly of milk, apples, and the fleſh of ſuch animals as they killed in hunting: their common drink was water, but, upon extraordinary occaſions, they indulged themſelves with a kind of fermented liquor made of barley, honey, or apples. This was their mode of living, and to this, together with the hardineſs of their nature, may be aſcribed their great longevity; for, according to Plutarch, they only began to diſcover the effects of infirmity at the age of one hundred and twenty years. Their abſtemiouſneſs, however, was not the effect of natural temperance alone, but in ſome meaſure took its riſe from religious principles, as they were ſtrictly prohibited from eating fowl, hare, gooſe, or fiſh: the three former they brought up as domeſtic animals, but never attempted to take the latter, becauſe they imagined that the waters were the habitation of the gods, and that every thing contained in them was, of courſe, conſecrated to their uſe. On the arrival of the Belgæ they had introduced ſome knowledge of agriculture, ſo that in the courſe of time they had an additional and much more ſubſtantial kind of food, which was bread made of rye and barley, and which was afterwards commonly uſed in all parts of the iſland.

Previous to the invaſion of Divitiacus, the Britons were poorly provided with warlike weapons, either for annoyance or defence. The arms of the better ſort were, a broad ſword without a point, a ſhort dagger, a javelin and arrows: thoſe of the common people conſiſted of ſticks ſharpened at both ends, and long ſtaves edged with flint, or headed with copper, having at the lower extremity a braſs bell, with the noiſe of which they endeavoured to terrify the enemy. They had neither coats of male nor helmets, but defended themſelves with light round targets made of wood or twigs interwoven, covered with ſkins, and, by way of ornament, ſtudded with nails of braſs.

The moſt deſtructive implements they had was their war chariots, the form and uſe of which they obtained from the Phœnicians. They were decorated with rude carvings and paintings, had ſharp ſcythes fixed to the axle-tree, and were built in ſuch a manner, that they could be ſtopped and turned on the declivity of hills with aſtoniſhing dexterity. They were generally drawn by two horſes, which were ſmall, but very ſwift. Each contained the driver and a ſingle warrior, who darted his javelins at the enemy, and even drove among the thickeſt ranks, terrifying, trampling, and cutting them in pieces with the long ſcythes fixed to the axle-tree of the wheels. When they approached an enemy, they claſhed their arms together, made a diſmal ſound with their rude trumpets, gave a loud ſhout, and then continued their march, ſinging the actions of their renowned anceſtors. Thoſe who directed their chariots generally attacked the enemy's cavalry, and the warriors would frequently alight, and fight on foot, till they were either fatigued or overpowered, when they reſumed their ſeats; and they were ſo remarkably expert in the management of their chariots, that they could ſtop or turn them when on full ſpeed, and could leap out or in them as occaſion required. They charged with an impetuoſity hardly to be reſiſted; but if once repulſed by the enemy, confuſion immediately enſued, and it was with the utmoſt difficulty they could be rallied to renew the engagement. They always engaged in ſeparate bodies, drawn up at a conſiderable diſtance from each other, that they might have room to act, and ſuſtain thoſe who wanted ſuccour.

This martial diſpoſition was far from being confined to the male ſex. The women were naturally endowed with uncommon valour and perſeverance; they generally accompanied their huſbands to the field, and, by their preſence and heroic examples, animated them to acts which produced both conqueſt and glory.

With reſpect to commerce, the inhabitants of the ſea coaſt of Britain were accuſtomed to traffic even from the time of Teutat, but to enumerate the different articles in which their commerce conſiſted, is morally impoſſible. Their chief traffic was with the Phœnician merchants, who, after the diſcovery of the iſland, which, according to Sammes, happened before the Trojan war, exported annually great quantities of hides and tin, which they ſold to the Greeks and other eaſtern nations. After the Belgæ had introduced agriculture, the corn and wool of Britain were conſidered as valuable commodities, and were purchaſed with great avidity by the traders on the continent.

Commerce was chiefly carried on by barter, as they had not then any kind of coin: the articles they uſed as a ſubſtitute for that convenience conſiſted of iron and braſs rings, which being made to a certain weight paſſed among themſelves as current. The commodities they imported were gold, ſilver, ivory and pearl: theſe were at firſt conſidered as matters of curioſity, but, in a ſhort time, they turned them to advantage by converting them into ornaments, which were purchaſed and worn by their principal people. This commerce, in proceſs of time, was greatly increaſed: by their induſtry and ingenuity, they found the art of manufacturing them into chains, bits, bracelets, collars, wreaths, &c. which they brought to great perfection, and re-exported them to conſiderable advantage.

The art of ſhip-building was totally unknown to the ancient Britons. Their navy conſiſted of nothing more than a few open boats made of ſlight timber, interwoven with wicker, and covered with pitched hides. The tempeſtuous ſeas of Britain were not to be navigated with ſuch ſlight veſſels as theſe; and ſuch voyages as they made muſt have been very ſhort. It is moſt probable that the fartheſt voyage they undertook was to the coaſts of Gaul, and that they performed theſe only in the ſummer months, and when the weather was calm and ſerene. The art of navigation, as well as ſhip-building, was not known till after the arrival of the Romans in this iſland, which was about fifty-five years before the Chriſtian æra.

The antient Britons, like the principal part of the univerſe, at that time, were groſs idolaters, their worſhip being as rude as their manners were ſimple. But of this, as well as the nature of their civil policy, we ſhall treat at large in the enſuing chapter.

CHAP. III.

Of the civil policy of the antient Britons. Of the Druids, and the different claſſes into which they were divided. Their great power and importance. The nature of their religion and mode of worſhip. Their diſtinguiſhed veneration for the oak, and particularly its natural appendage called the miſſeltoe. Their religious and political tenets, &c.

THE antient Britons were, like the Gauls, divided into three claſſes, or orders, namely, the Druids, the Equites, and the Plebeians, the latter of whom had not any ſhare in the adminiſtration. The Equites were the nobles who commanded in war, and the ſupreme magiſtracy was veſted in the Druids, who, though generally conſidered as prieſts, acted in a civil as well as eccleſiaſtical capacity, in the former of which their influence was exceeding great, and in the latter abſolute and unlimitted. The reaſon of their being poſſeſſed of the ſecular as well as clerical authority was owing to a notion being prevalent among the people that none ought to ſubmit to puniſhment for any crime whatever, but by divine authority, which authority was delegated to, and lodged in, the prieſthood only. Hence the Druids had an uncontrouled power over the minds and perſons of the laity. They decided in all controverſies, whether the diſpute was in conſequence of miſdemeanors, capital crimes, inheritance or property. The ſentence pronounced was ſure to be executed; for if any perſon refuſed to obey it, he was interdicted from all religious rites, deprived of the benefit of the laws, rendered incapable of any office of truſt or honour, and held in univerſal abhorrence, as a monſter of ſacrilege and impiety.

The term Druid is derived from the Britiſh word dryw, which ſignifies oak, and from whence they were ſo called on account of the peculiar veneration they had for that towering monarch of the Britiſh plains. They diſtinguiſhed themſelves from the nobles and Plebeians by wearing their hair very ſhort, and their beards exceeding long. They carried a long ſtaff in their hand, and about their neck hung an ornament enchaſed in gold, which was called the Druids Egg. Their outſide garment reached to the feet, and in general was of different colours, but when employed in the diſcharge of religious ceremonies, they always wore a white ſurplice.

The Druids were divided into three orders, or claſſes, viz. Druids properly ſo called, Bards, and Eubates or Vates.

The firſt of theſe claſſes preſided over, and regulated all public affairs, as well civil as eccleſiaſtical: they were particularly appointed to perform the ſacrifices, and were employed in the more ſolemn rites and myſteries of religion.

The ſecond claſs, ſtiled Bards, were thoſe who compoſed the verſes which were ſung at their religious ceremonies: they alſo preſerved in memory the noble exploits of their heroes; ſo that they were at the ſame time both prieſts, hiſtorians and poets. They ſuperintended the education of perſons of rank, and were probationers for admittance into the firſt order.

The third claſs, or Eubates, devoted themſelves to the ſtudy of aſtronomy, augury, divination, magic, natural philoſophy and phyſic; ſo that they were ſkilled in every art that could excite the aſtoniſhment, and eſtabliſh the veneration of an ignorant and ſuperſtitious multitude.

Theſe three claſſes, or orders of Druids, acted in ſubordination to a chief, called the Arch-Druid, who was choſen out of their own body. This ſupremacy he enjoyed for life, and his perſon was deemed ſacred. He inſpected the conduct of the ſovereigns or princes of the reſpective ſtates, depoſed ſuch as he thought acted inconſiſtent with their characters, and appointed others in their ſtead. His office was not hereditary, for on the death of one, another was choſen in his ſtead by a majority of thoſe who were of the prieſtly order. If any diſturbance ever happened among the Druids, it was in conſequence of the death of their primate, when ſuch earneſt endeavours were uſed to get appointed to that honourable and powerful office, that the freedom of election was ſometimes interrupted by appeals to the ſword. In all other caſes they acted with great moderation and temperance, and thereby obtained the general reſpect and affection of the people.

The power and authority inveſted in the Druids was unlimited, but it muſt be obſerved, to their honour, that they always exerciſed it with a becoming dignity, incorruptible integrity, and uncommon fortitude. Strangers to every ſpecies of effeminate luxury, they were ignorant of its attendant vices: they never ſuffered private intereſt to take the pre-eminence of public welfare, nor endeavoured to ſupport the former at the expence of the latter. They were compoſed of the principal nobility of the kingdom, and conſequently by birth, as well as education, devoted to the ſervice of their country. When any civil diſcords took place, they interpoſed, and, by their prudent admonitions, buried all diſputes in oblivion.

Their

Their authority was ſufficient even to ſoothe the rage of exaſperated armies when on the very point of engaging. Fearleſs of the danger, and armed only by their ſacred character, they often ruſhed between them, diſarmed them of their rage, and effected an accommodation by the ſtrength of their remonſtrances, and the irreſiſtible power of their elocution.

As they engroſſed the learning of thoſe days, ſo they took every poſſible precaution to confine it within their own order. All their ceremonies and literary precepts were performed and delivered extempore, nor would they ſuffer any of their maxims or religious tenets to be committed to writing. They had two motives for this peculiar injunction, the firſt of which was, that the common ſort of people ſhould not become acquainted with their myſterious learning by means of any manuſcripts; and the latter, that, by continual exerciſe, the retentive faculties of their pupils might be ſtrengthened and invigorated.

At certain times in the year they held a kind of court in ſome conſecrated place for the purpoſe of adjuſting all diſputes between contending parties, as alſo for determining the fate of thoſe accuſed of having violated the laws of the nation; and at theſe times they likewiſe took the opportunity of not only making an harangue to their pupils, but likewiſe to the people in general on the ſubjects of religion, law and philoſophy.

They profeſſed, and propagated, the doctrine of the immortality of the ſoul, together with that of tranſmigration, the latter of which, it is generally ſuppoſed, they communicated to the Pythagoreans. They diſplayed, in the moſt pleaſing light, the rewards with which a life of virtue would be crowned in a future exiſtence; but at the ſame time pointed out the dreadful conſequences that would attend the wicked and abandoned. Their idea of the Deity was noble and ſublime: they believed his preſence filled the univerſe; that his power ſupported the pillars of heaven; and that his eye pervaded the inmoſt receſſes of the heart. That this was the grand principle of their religious notions appears evident from Tacitus, who ſays, "It was an "opinion univerſally eſtabliſhed in all the coun-"tries where the religion of the Druids prevailed, "that to ſuppoſe the preſence of the Deity to be "confined within any incloſed place, to repre-"ſent him in an human form, or by any mate-"rial image, was at once derogatory to his ho-"nour, and incompatible with his Divine at-"tributes."

But notwithſtanding they entertained ſuch juſt notions of the Supreme Being, yet, ſtrange as it may appear, their religious tenets in general teemed with the groſſeſt ſuperſtitions. They admitted an inferior kind of deities, and paid Divine honours to Jupiter, Mars, Apollo and Mercury, under the names of Taranus, Heſus, Belenes and Teutates. To theſe, after being invaded by the Romans, they added Minerva, Diana and Hercules, the latter of whom they diſtinguiſhed by the name of Ogmius, which, in the Britiſh language, ſignifies, the god of Eloquence.

Their external mode of worſhip was compoſed of prayers, thankſgivings, invocations, oblations and ſacrifices. At firſt their oblations conſiſted only of fine meal or flower ſprinkled with ſalt, or a cake compoſed of the like ingredients mixed with water; and their ſacrifices of beaſts and birds. This ſimplicity was preſerved till they formed an intercourſe with the Phœnicians from whom they adopted the horrid practice of offering up human victims, the manner and ceremonies attending which were of the moſt cruel nature. At firſt, malefactors only were the objects of this barbarous rite; but, in proceſs of time, innocent perſons alſo became the victims of their horrid ſuperſtition. They even improved on the cruelty of that nation from whom they had received ſo horrid a practice: they grew ſtrangers to the feelings of humanity, and carried their ſuperſtitious barbarity to the moſt unbounded lengths, forming wicker idols of ſuch a monſtrous ſize as to contain whole crouds of people, who were burnt at once, together with thoſe prodigious incloſures, to expiate the anger of their gods. This inhuman and deteſtable cuſtom was continued till the iſland was ſubdued by the Romans, when thoſe people, contrary to their uſual clemency, and political regard for conquered nations, totally extirpated it, together with almoſt every memorial of that ſuperſtition which had ſo long been preſerved by the Druids, previous to their arrival. After their departure, however, the Druids reſumed their former practices, which they continued till the reign of the emperor Nero, when Paulinus Suetonius reduced the iſland of Angleſea, which was the principal place of their retreat, and overwhelmed them with ſuch unexpected and ſudden deſtruction, that the knowledge and tradition which had been conveyed to them by their predeceſſors was almoſt annihilated.

The religious ceremonies of the Druids were performed in groves conſecrated to their reſpective idols. Theſe groves were compoſed of, ſurrounded by, and fenced in with, lofty oaks, that tree being the greateſt object of their eſteem and veneration. In moſt of their ceremonies they likewiſe took occaſion to uſe ſome parts of this tree. Their altars were covered with its branches, their victims adorned with the ſmaller boughs, and all concerned in the ſacrifices decorated with garlands made of its leaves. Nor was their veneration confined to the tree itſelf: the miſſeltoe, which nature has made to grow on, and embrace the ſturdy oak, they eſteemed as the choiceſt gift of heaven: and held the application of it to be univerſally efficacious in medicine. This myſterious arcanum they annually ſought for with great eagerneſs, found with tranſport, and gathered in the midſt of a great number of people, who flocked from all quarters at the ſtated times appointed for the ſolemnity, to welcome what they called the pledge and earneſt of future felicity. On this occaſion, the Archdruid, clad in a white robe, aſcended the tree, and, with a conſecrated golden knife or pruning-hook, cropped the miſſeltoe, and received it in his white robe, with the greateſt marks of ſatisfaction. With this precious acquiſition, he deſcended from the tree amidſt the joyful acclamations of the enraptured multitude, who deemed it the happy omen of a proſperous year. In acknowledgment of this happy event, the Archdruid made a ſacrifice of two bulls. during which ceremony he invoked the powers preſiding over the healing art to render the miſſeltoe efficacious, and that by its application all who were diſeaſed might be cured of their reſpective infirmities. The tree on which the miſſeltoe had been found was conſidered as particularly favoured by the Deity, and conſequently entitled to a more than common veneration. This ſuperſtitious notion greatly encreaſed, and at length ſuch was their unbounded regard for this tree, that they made it the immediate object of their adoration.

The maxims and tenets of the Druids, as well thoſe of a civil as religious nature, have been principally buried in oblivion by the all-devouring hand of time. But notwithſtanding this powerful invader, ſome few have been preſerved, and we are happy in having it in our power to lay them before our readers. We have extracted ſome of them from the moſt antient records on the ſubject, but the greater part from a moſt curious and valuable manuſcript now in the poſſeſſion of a Britiſh nobleman, and to whom, for his great condeſcenſion in permitting us to communicate to the public ſo diſtinguiſhed a piece of antiquity, we are in duty bound to return our moſt ſincere and grateful acknowledgements.

Theſe maxims, or tenets, may be divided into three claſſes, namely, religious, political and miſcellaneous. And firſt, their Religious Tenets.

1. There is but one ſupreme God, who is infinite and omnipotent.
2. Every thing upon the face of the earth derives its origin from above.
3. The ſoul is immortal, and every human being after death ſhall be brought to account for his conduct on earth, and puniſhed or rewarded in a future life according to his actions.
4. The world, if ever deſtroyed, will be either by fire or water.
5. There is another world, and thoſe who kill themſelves to accompany their friends thither, will live with them there.
6. The diſobedient muſt be excluded from ſacrifices.
7. Money lent in this world will be repaid in the next: that is, thoſe who have relieved the indigent here will be rewarded for it hereafter.
8. Letters given to dying perſons or thrown on their funeral piles, will be faithfully delivered to whom they are addreſſed in the other world.
9. Malefactors, priſoners of war, or, in caſe of neither, innocent perſons are to be ſlain upon the altar, or burnt alive, incloſed in a wicker Coloſſus, in honour, and to appeaſe the anger, of the gods.

Political Tenets.

1. All maſters of families are ſupreme lords of their own houſhold; they have abſolute dominion over their wives, their children, and their ſlaves.
2. Children are to be educated apart from their parents, and never to be admitted publickly into their company till they attain the age of fourteen years.
3. Upon extraordinary emergencies a man may be ſacrificed for the good of his country.
4. When the ſafety of the ſtate requires it, a man may be ſlain, in order to foretel future events, from the manner of which the body falls; from its motion after it has fallen; from the flowing of the blood; from the appearance of the wound, or from inſpecting the motions of the vital parts.
5. Thoſe who are excommunicated for their diſobedience or diſloyalty, ſhall be deprived of the benefit of the law, ſecluded from ſociety, and rendered incapable of any employment.

Miſcellaneous Tenets.

1. No inſtruction muſt be given to youth but in the ſacred groves.
2. All commerce with ſtrangers is prohibited.
3. The ſecrets of the ſciences muſt not be committed to writing, but fixed in the memory.
4. He merits death who comes laſt to the aſſembly of the ſtates.
5. Miſſeltoe muſt be gathered with reverence, if poſſible, on the ſixth day of the month, and cut with a golden bill or pruning hook.
6. The powder of miſſeltoe is a ſovereign remedy againſt all diſeaſes.

Though the Druids had not originally any public ſtructures, either becauſe they were ignorant of the art of building, or held it impious to worſhip the Deity in confined places made by the feeble hands of man; yet, in proceſs of time, they followed the practice of other nations, and raiſed temples and monuments in honour of the inferior deities they adored. Theſe temples conſiſted of rude ſtone pillars placed in a circular form, with a ſloping altar in the middle, and the top left entirely open*. At ſome diſtance from the temple was a kind of obeliſk, in different parts

* There are ſtill many remains of theſe ancient edifices to be ſeen in different parts of the iſland; but the moſt conſpicuous are thoſe called Stonehenge, near Ambreſbury in Wiltſhire, a deſcription of which will furniſh the reader with a proper idea of the nature of the whole. It conſiſts of the remains of two circular and two oval ranges of rough ſtones, having one common center. The outer circle is 108 feet in diameter, and, when perfect, conſiſted of thirty upright ſtones, ſeventeen of which are ſtill ſtanding, and ſeven more lying on the ground, ſome whole, and others broken. The upright ſtones are from eighteen to twenty feet high, from ſix to ſeven feet broad, and about three feet thick, placed about three feet from each other. They are joined at the top by impoſts, with tenons fitted to mortiſes for keeping them in a due poſition. The upright ſtones are tapered towards the top, which appears to have been done with a chiſſel, but the impoſts are plain, and without the leaſt kind of decoration. The inner circle is about eight feet from the outward one, and conſiſted originally of forty ſtones; of theſe there are about nineteen left, eight of which are fallen down, and the remaining eleven ſtanding. Between theſe two circles is a walk of about three hundred feet in circumference, and from which the temple being viewed, affords a moſt ſurprizing and wonderful effect on the ſpectator. The temple is incloſed by a trench near thirty feet broad, and diſtance about an hundred feet from the inner circle. There are three paſſages to it over this trench, one of which is much more conſiderable than the other two, and, no doubt, was the grand entrance to the body of the temple.

For ſome diſtance round this famous monument are great numbers of ſepulchres, or, as they are called, Barrows, which are covered with earth, and raiſed in the form of a bell.

They

parts of which were holes for the convenience of binding thoſe unhappy victims who were deſtined as ſacrifices.

Such were the maxims and tenets of the Druids, and ſuch the ſtate of the antient Britons at the time Julius Cæſar meditated the conqueſt of their country.

We have already obſerved that the Britons were a fierce, courageous and warlike people; but it muſt be remembered that they were very ill ſupplied with arms, had neither money or warlike ſtores, and, comparatively ſpeaking, were totally unacquainted with military diſcipline. Theſe were certainly great diſadvantages; but the moſt material evil that attended them was, a want of union, which aroſe from the number of ſtates or principalities governed by their own particular chieftains, who could not be always brought to act in conſort with the common enemy. Their country alſo was eaſy of acceſs, being open and unfortified; nor had they any place where they could conveniently rendezvous, or ſecure themſelves in a retreat, except their dreary foreſts, bogs, and mountains, which were ſituated in the northern parts of the iſland.

From theſe, and many other diſadvantageous circumſtances, they were expoſed to an invaſion from the moſt powerful nation on the earth, elated with former conqueſts, and headed by a commander, who had acquired more fame from his military atchievements than any general at that time known throughout the univerſe.

BOOK II.

From the firſt Arrival of the Romans in Britain, to their final Departure from the Iſland.

CHAP. I.

Julius Cæſar reſolves to invade Britain. His ſuppoſed reaſon for forming ſuch a reſolution. Embarks with his forces, and ſails to the coaſt of Britain. After ſome difficulty lands his troops, engages the Britons, defeats them, and obliges them to ſue for peace. Suſtains conſiderable loſs in his navy by a tempeſt. The Britons, in hopes of recovering their liberty, attack the ſeventh legion, but are repulſed by the unexpected arrival of Julius Cæſar. They gather together a conſiderable army, and proceed with great reſolution towards the entrenchments of the Romans. Cæſar advances againſt them, and a deſperate battle enſues, in which the Britons are defeated with great ſlaughter. In conſequence of this they again ſue for peace, which being granted, on certain conditions, Cæſar re-embarks his forces, and returns to Gaul.

THE ambitious hero, who aſpires after conqueſts, like the miſer who daily labours to encreaſe his riches, the more he endeavours to gratify his deſires, the farther he is off from accompliſhing his ends. But it muſt be obſerved, that the purſuits of theſe different characters have very different tendencies. The ambitious and generous man is deſirous of increaſing his poſſeſſions, that he may have the opportunity of liberally conferring favours on his friends in particular and the diſtreſſed in general; while the miſer, too frequently by the baſeſt of means, accumulates wealth, and then ſordidly conceals it.

The firſt of theſe characters is juſtly due to Julius Cæſar, who is univerſally acknowledged to have been at once the man, the hero, the politician, and the friend. His only failing was ambition, the purſuit of which he carried to the greateſt lengths, and the conſequences reſulting from which perpetuated his name with honour to ſucceeding generations.

At the time Julius Cæſar meditated the conqueſt of Britain, the Roman empire had arrived at its meridian of military glory. He had long been at war with the Gauls, who were ſo diſtinguiſhed for their martial courage and diſcipline, as to be a terror to all around them. Cæſar was determined, if poſſible, to diveſt them of this diſtinction; and, from his ſuperior courage, and military proweſs, at length obtained his ends, and made them totally ſubject to the Roman yoke.

Elated with this ſucceſs, and prompted by ambition, his darling paſſion, Cæſar reſolved to extend

They extend to a conſiderable diſtance from the temple, but are ſo placed as to be all in view of it. Many of theſe have been opened, and in them were found either human ſkeletons, or aſhes of burnt bones, together with different kinds of warlike inſtruments. From theſe ſepulchres being within ſight of the temple, we may conclude, that the antient Britons, like the Chriſtians of the preſent age, thought it moſt proper to bury their dead adjoining to thoſe places where they worſhipped the Supreme Being. Indeed, all worſhip indicates a ſtate of futurity, and they might reaſonably imagine that no place was ſo proper for depoſiting the relics of their departed friends, as the ſpot dedicated to the ſervice of that Being with whom they hoped to live for ever.

tend the glory of his arms beyond the boundaries of the ocean, and to join realms by conqueſt, which were ſeparated by nature. The iſland of Great Britain was at that time almoſt unknown to the Romans. They had, indeed, heard of ſuch a place, but could not form any idea of its ſituation; nor had they ever entertained the notion of undertaking a naval expedition to any country ſeperated by the continent from the ocean. This was a taſk reſerved for Cæſar, whoſe martial genius, and perſevering diſpoſition, prompted him to engage in enterprizes of the moſt hazardous nature, and ſuch as had never been thought of by his predeceſſors.

What were the motives that induced Cæſar to form the reſolution of invading Britain has been a matter of ſome diſpute among the learned. One reaſon aſſigned is, that he did it in order to puniſh the iſlanders for having ſent ſuccours to the Gauls while he was at war with that nation, as alſo for having given refuge to the Belgæ, who had excited a revolt. Admitting theſe circumſtances, we need not wonder that Cæſar ſhould form the reſolution of commencing hoſtilities againſt the Britons, it having been long an eſtabliſhed maxim with the Romans to conſider all auxiliaries as principals, and not to allow any one who aſſiſted their enemies to eſcape with impunity.

Beſides theſe, there are other reaſons aſſigned for Cæſar's invading Britain. Suetonius is of opinion, that he was induced to it from the hope of finding a great quantity of pearls, which were then in the higheſt eſteem, and which he imagined to be one of the natural productions of the country; though in this he was greatly miſtaken, they being only an article of traffic, and purchaſed by the Britons from the Phœnician merchants. Cicero inſinuates, that his ſtrongeſt motives were, to get poſſeſſion of the mines in Britain, which at that time were conſidered of ineſtimable value. We cannot, however, in juſtice to Cæſar, admit of either of theſe as reaſons for his forming the reſolution of invading Britain.

It is certain that avarice did not conſtitute any part of his character; and therefore it is moſt reaſonable to ſuppoſe that he was, on this occaſion, actuated by that ambition and thirſt for glory which appears to have been the characteriſtic of his diſpoſition, and to have, in a peculiar manner, diſtinguiſhed him from the reſt of mankind.

But whatever was the real motive that excited Cæſar to undertake this arduous taſk, it is certain that the precautions he took preparatory to the execution of this deſign, were of the moſt judicious nature, and diſcovered him to be at once the politician and the general. He firſt reſolved to make himſelf acquainted with the nature of the place he was about to conquer. To effect which he ſent for ſeveral of the merchants that frequented the coaſts, of whom he made enquiries relative to the extent of the iſland, the ſituation of its harbours, and what number of veſſels each would contain, the nature of its fortifications, and the genius, laws, cuſtoms, and military diſcipline of its inhabitants.

Not being able to obtain any ſatisfactory anſwer to theſe reſpective queſtions, and at the ſame time perſuaded that caution was abſolutely neceſſary in ſo critical an undertaking, Cæſar diſpatched C. Voluſenus, a tribune of his army, to reconnoitre the coaſts, ordering him, after he had gained all poſſible intelligence, to make the beſt of his way to the territory of the Morini, or Picardy, whither he would aſſemble his forces, both naval and military, and from whence he ſhould embark them for the intended expedition.

In the mean time the inhabitants of the maritime parts of Britain, being informed of Cæſar's deſign by the merchants who traded to the iſland, were greatly alarmed. They had heard of the fame of the Romans, and were fearful of engaging with ſo formidable a power. They therefore called a general aſſembly of the people, in order to deliberate on what meaſures were moſt neceſſary to be taken to avert the impending ſtorm. The reſult of this meeting was, that ambaſſadors ſhould be immediately diſpatched to Cæſar, offering ſubmiſſion to the Roman power, and promiſing to deliver up hoſtages for their future fidelity.

Cæſar received theſe ambaſſadors with the moſt apparent tokens of reſpect, and after exhorting them to continue ſtedfaſt in their allegiance, diſmiſſed them to their own country, accompanied by a Britiſh prince named Comius, whom, for his firm attachment to his intereſt, he had appointed king of the Atrebates. In this perſon Cæſar had placed the greateſt confidence, and being ſenſible that he was held in high eſteem by his countrymen, thought him the moſt likely perſon to bring them over to his intereſt. He therefore directed him to viſit the different ſtates, and exert his utmoſt efforts in perſuading them to ſolicit the protection of the Romans; and to promiſe them, that when himſelf ſhould arrive in Britain, which would be very ſpeedy, they ſhould be amply rewarded for their ſubmiſſion.

This ſcheme, however, proved abortive; for no ſooner did Comius land, and deliver his commiſſion than he was apprehended and loaded with chains. The nature of his commiſſion was, indeed, a kind of treaſon againſt that community of which he was a member, and therefore he was conſidered and treated as a traitor to his country.

This was not the only diſappointment Cæſar met with in his firſt efforts towards executing his deſign of invading Britain. Voluſenus, whom he had diſpatched to ſurvey the coaſts, returned in five days from his cruiſe, but without being able to give him any ſatisfactory information: he had, indeed, examined different parts from the ſea, but from the great numbers of people that appeared on the ſhore, in an hoſtile manner, he was fearful of attempting to land, and therefore returned without accompliſhing the ends for which he was ſent.

A. C. 55. But theſe diſappointments were not ſufficient to check the ardour of Cæſar. He had formed the reſolution of invading Britain, and was determined, at all events, to carry his deſign into execution. He accordingly embarked his infantry, conſiſting of two legions, on board eighty tranſports, and allotted eighteen ſhips for his cavalry, whom he ordered to follow with the utmoſt expedition. The reſt of his army he ordered to be cantoned among the Menapii and part of the Morini, under the command of two experienced officers; and left a third, with a ſufficient garriſon, to occupy the place and harbour during his abſence.

Having taken theſe neceſſary precautions, and embarked embarked his troops deſtined for the expedition, Cæſar ſet ſail from Morini, or Picardy, about one o'clock in the morning, on the 26th day of Auguſt, in the year of the world 3949, and fifty-five years before the Chriſtian æra.

About ten o'clock the next morning he arrived on the coaſt of Britain, at that part now called Dover, where he ſaw the rocks and cliffs covered with an infinite number of armed iſlanders, who, from the nature of the place, could oppoſe his landing with the greateſt advantage He, however, gave orders for the ſhips to caſt anchor, and lay out for ſome time in ſight of the Britons, expecting the arrival of that part of his fleet which he had ordered to follow with the cavalry. Theſe, however, not appearing according to his expectations, and finding it impoſſible to effect a deſcent on that part of the coaſt, he ordered the ſhips to weigh anchor, in order to find out a more plain and eaſy ſhore. They accordingly ſet ſail about four o'clock in the afternoon, and after proceeding about three leagues to the northward, came to a part which appeared much better calculated for effecting their deſigns than the former; and which, according to the opinion of the moſt authentic hiſtorians, was the place now called Deal.

The Britons, having cloſely watched his motions, and ſuſpecting his deſign, immediately diſpatched their cavalry and chariots to be in readineſs to diſpute his landing till they could be ſupported by the infantry, who were ordered to follow with all poſſible expedition. The ſight of ſo formidable an army ſtruck a terror in the Romans; and nothing but the genius and perſevering diſpoſition of Cæſar could have ſurmounted the difficulties that now oppoſed his enterprize. He was a ſtranger to the method of landing troops in the face of an enemy: he wanted boats, and, at the ſame time, his ſhips drew too much water to come cloſe to the ſhore. Theſe obſtacles being obſerved by the Britons, who were convinced of their deſign to effect a landing if poſſible, they determined to take proper advantage of it. Accordingly, without waiting for an attack, great numbers of the cavalry rode into the water, and engaged the enemy at a diſtance with the moſt undaunted reſolution. The Romans were loaded with heavy armour, and therefore could not move with that alertneſs to which they were accuſtomed on ſhore; while the Britons, having the free uſe of their limbs, and poſting themſelves in thoſe parts which they knew to be ſhallow, diſcharged their darts and javelins with great advantage. This unexpected oppoſition had the moſt alarming effect on the Romans: their former courage and intrepidity forſook them; and, according to Cæſar's own confeſſion, they ſhrunk from the attack.

The Roman general, perceiving the diſadvantage under which his ſoldiers laboured, gave directions for his gallies to be rowed near the ſhore, and attack the Britons with their ſlings, engines, darts and other miſſile weapons. This expedient, in ſome degree, ſucceeded; for the Britons being no leſs confounded at the ſtrange appearance of the gallies and the motion of the oars, than intimidated at the damage they ſuſtained from the ſtones and miſſile weapons thrown by the enemy, ſuddenly pauſed, and then retreated to a ſmall diſtance from the ſhore.

But notwithſtanding this advantage, the Romans were ſtill averſe to leaving their veſſels, which being obſerved by the ſtandard-bearer of the tenth legion, in order to animate them, he leaped overboard with the ſtandard in his hand, crying aloud, "Follow me, my fellow-ſoldiers, "unleſs you want to betray the eagle into the "hands of the enemy; for I am determined to "diſcharge the duty I owe my country." This ſpeech had the deſired effect: the ſenſe of honour now prevailed over the ſenſe of danger; and reproach effected what perſuaſion had attempted in vain. The whole legion inſtantly leaped out of the ſhip after their ſtandard-bearer, and their example being followed by the reſt of the army, they all moved in a body towards the ſhore. In conſequence of this, a very obſtinate battle enſued, which had liked to have proved fatal to the Romans, who finding it impoſſible to form in the water, could not avail themſelves of their diſcipline and military ſkill, while thoſe who gained the ſhore were ſurrounded and cut to pieces by the Britons.

The fortune of Cæſar was now on the point of deſerting him: he ſaw the danger, and hoping to avert it, commanded his gallies to be filled with ſoldiers, in order to row about, and ſuſtain thoſe who wanted ſuccour. This expedient had the deſired effect: the Romans were ſoon enabled to gain firm footing on the beach, where, forming in proper order, they proceeded to charge with their uſual confidence. They now profited by that heavy armour which had before encumbered them; they attacked the iſlanders with ſuch fury, that they ſoon gave way, and fled with the utmoſt precipitation to their woods and foreſts. Cæſar, however, did not chuſe to purſue them, owing, as he himſelf informs us, to his want of the cavalry, which were ſtill detained by the contrariety of winds.

As ſoon as the diſpirited Britons had collected themſelves together, and were a little recovered from the conſternation into which they had been thrown by their late defeat, they debated on what meaſures were moſt prudent to purſue in order to avert the calamities that threatened their country. Convinced of the ſuperiority of the Romans, and dreading the effects of farther oppoſition to an enemy now conſidered invincible, they reſolved to ſubmit to the conqueror. Accordingly they diſpatched an ambaſſador to Cæſar, in order to ſue for terms of peace; and, as the moſt effectual means of obtaining it, releaſed Comius, and joined him in the embaſſy, hoping that his mediation might ſoften the reſentment of the victorious Roman. In the meſſage ſent by theſe ambaſſadors to Cæſar they apologized for their conduct in having made Comius a priſoner, aſcribing it to the fury of the ungovernable multitude, and begging pardon for the offence; they likewiſe promiſed, in caſe he ſhould accept of their ſubmiſſion, to deliver up ſuch hoſtages as he ſhould require, and in future to pay a ſtrict obedience to his commands.

This offered ſubmiſſion was higly pleaſing to Cæſar, who, after reproaching them for violating a former treaty, granted them a peace on very eaſy terms, but demanded hoſtages of his own nomination, as a proper ſecurity for their future fidelity.

Theſe

These demands were readily agreed to by the Britons; and some of the hostages were immediately delivered, with assurances that the rest should be sent him with all convenient speed. In the mean time the Britons dismissed their army, and, in a general assembly of their princes, determined to recommend themselves and their country to the clemency and protection of Cæsar. But this great submission only arose from necessity, as they took the first opportunity that offered of revolting, and endeavouring to recover that liberty which they prized as the dearest and most valuable enjoyment of life.

At the time Cæsar was elated with the thoughts of having subdued the Britons, he received intelligence that the vessels which contained his cavalry, and had sailed from Gaul with a gentle breeze, were, on their approach near the British coast, overtaken by a dreadful tempest, and the whole dispersed. Some of them were driven back to the place from whence they came, and others to the western parts of England; from whence, as soon as the storm abated, they made the best of their way to the continent. This storm, which happened at the full moon, and in the middle of the night, did considerable damage to the fleet which lay in the Downs. Twelve of the principal vessels were dashed to pieces, and the rest so much injured by the loss of their anchors, cables, masts and rigging, as to be totally unfit for service.

This dreadful disaster spread universal horror and consternation among the Romans. They had lost their ships, and therefore were deprived of the means of returning to Gaul: their provisions began to grow scarce in the camp, they were in a strange country, and could not expect supplies from the islanders, whom they had reason to look upon as their most inveterate enemies. These were circumstances of the most alarming nature, and such as made even the intrepid Cæsar tremble for the consequence.

The British ambassadors, who were still in Cæsar's camp, saw with pleasure the calamity that had befallen the Romans. Fired with the most sanguine love of liberty, as well as inveterate detestation to slavery, they could by no means neglect so favourable an opportunity of attempting the recovery of their independence, and therefore held several meetings together to consult the proper means of effecting what they so earnestly desired. It was at length determined to quit the Roman camp with the utmost privacy, repair with all haste to their countrymen, and endeavour to cut off all supplies of provision from the enemy. This design was immediately carried into execution: they quitted the camp, collected together their disbanded troops with all possible expedition, and made every necessary preparation the situation of affairs would admit.

Though Cæsar had not received any intelligence of their design, yet, from the sudden disappearance of the ambassadors, and the delay of the hostages, he was strongly induced to suspect it; and therefore took every precaution to render the attempts of the Britons abortive. He ordered all the harvest of the neighbouring fields to be secured, and a magazine of corn to be collected within the fortifications of his camp. Considering likewise the importance of his fleet, he dispatched one of his gallies to Gaul in order to fetch the necessary materials for refitting those vessels which had been damaged in the late storm; and such was their assiduity, that in the space of ten days the whole fleet was rendered fit for service.

The Roman soldiers had gathered in the greater part of the harvest without disturbance, and the passive behaviour of the Britons seemed to convince them that their alarming apprehensions had no other foundation than their own fears. The most distant field of corn, however, was yet untouched, and the seventh legion was dispatched to reap it. But they had hardly begun, when they found themselves attacked by a numerous army of Britons, who had concealed themselves for the purpose in a neighbouring wood. The Romans perceived their danger, and would gladly have retreated, but that was rendered impossible by the enemy totally surrounding them. The Britons fell on them with the most inveterate fury, and the whole legion must inevitably have been cut to pieces, had it not been for the advanced guard of the Romans, who lay before the camp. These perceiving an extraordinary dust arising from that quarter, and judging the cause, immediately communicated the intelligence to Cæsar, who instantly flew to their assistance, and thereby prevented a general slaughter. On his arrival he found that the furious attack of the British chariots had prevented his men from forming: they had, however, thrown themselves into a compact body, hard pressed by the darts and javelins of the enemy, who had then quitted their chariots, and were charging them on foot with the utmost vigour. The presence of Cæsar, together with his reinforcement, animated the Romans and cooled the courage of the Britons, who chose to evade a general engagement in hopes of protracting the war, depriving the enemy of necessary provisions, and thereby obliging them to quit the island before the expiration of the winter. They therefore retreated into the woods, and Cæsar, after maintaining his ground a short time in the field, returned to his camp.

The Britons, convinced that the Romans were not invincible, and elated with their late success, now imprudently undertook what it was not in their power to perform. Animated with the hopes of repelling these invaders of their liberties and properties, they dispatched messengers to all parts of the island, representing the small number and dejected state of the Romans, and intimating the glorious opportunity they now had of enriching themselves with the spoils of their enemies, and delivering their country from the miseries of future invasions.

These remonstrances had the desired effect. The brave and hardy Britons assembled in prodigious numbers, and gallantly advanced to the very entrenchments of the enemy, whither they had no sooner arrived than they began the attack with all the fury of an enraged multitude. Cæsar, with great tranquillity, beheld the irregular manner in which they began the assault, and the disorder into which they were soon thrown. He drew out his legions before the principal gate of his camp, and charged the undisciplined Britons with such impetuosity that they were obliged to seek their safety by flight, and leave the field of battle to the conquerors.

The

The Britons, disheartened at this second defeat, and unwilling to make any farther efforts, once more applied for peace to the invader of their country. Cæsar was far from being averse to granting their request. Destitute of cavalry, he found it impossible to pursue his advantages by following the enemy into the inland parts of the island, which was the only method he could take of securing his conquest. Provisions began to grow scarce in his camp, the harvest was over, and his army, though victorious, had suffered greatly, and were averse to winter in an enemy's country, and in an island to them almost wholly unknown. In consequence of these considerations Cæsar readily admitted the ambassador, and signed another treaty of peace with the Britons, the principal condition of which was, that they should send him double the number of hostages he had before demanded.

But though the Britons had thus humbly solicited what, in fact, Cæsar, for his own safety, could not deny, yet the Roman general was convinced, in his own mind, they would no longer observe the peace than they were compelled to it from necessity. He was sensible that if he wintered in the island his army would be exposed to the most imminent danger, and therefore determined to quit it. Accordingly having embarked his legions, and ordered the hostages to be sent after him, he set sail from Britain on the 20th of September; and after a short and easy passage landed safely on the continent of Gaul.

Thus ended Cæsar's first expedition to Britain, which, though unattended with any other solid advantage than that of making him acquainted with the coast of the island, and the temper of the inhabitants, was extolled at Rome above all the victories he had obtained on the continent, and a triumph of twenty days was decreed by the senate on the occasion. This was certainly a very extravagant and ridiculous decree, considering the little progress he had made in his first descent; and the trifling victory he obtained; but at the same time it plainly indicates the high estimation in which those conquerors of the world held the valour of our hardy and resolute progenitors.

CHAP. II.

Cæsar makes a second descent on Britain, and lands without opposition. Marches against the Britons, whom he engages and defeats. His fleet sustains great damage by a storm. The Britons unite together, and appoint Cassivelaunus their leader. They for some time harrass the Romans, but are at length routed with great slaughter. Cæsar crosses the Thames, and penetrates into the territories of Cassivelaunus, whose capital he takes, and puts great numbers of the Britons to the sword. Cassivelaunus makes his escape, and, as the last resource, solicits four petty kings to form a junction, and attack the Roman camp. They comply with his request, but prove unsuccessful, and one of them is taken prisoner. On this Cassivelaunus sues for peace, which is readily granted by Cæsar, who, after imposing a yearly tribute on the Britons, and taking a great number of hostages, embarks his forces, and returns to the continent.

NO sooner had Cæsar quitted the island after his first expedition, than the Britons determined to renounce the treaty they had made with him previous to his departure; and two only out of all their states sent over their hostages according to the articles of convention. This afforded Cæsar a very fair pretence for re-commencing hostilities, to which, without doubt, he was prompted by the desire of completing his design of subjecting the Britons to the Roman yoke. As soon, therefore, as he had settled his army in their winter quarters, he issued a general order for repairing those vessels that were damaged, and building others of various constructions, for the greater convenience of transporting their legions and cavalry, as well as of floating in shallow water, that they might be landed with equal care and safety.

These orders were executed during the course of the winter; and in the beginning of the spring warlike preparations were made in the ports of Gaul with the greatest vigour and dispatch: military stores were collected in the harbours of Spain, and every measure that could be thought of taken for riveting the chains of slavery on the arms of the Britons.

The orders and directions of Cæsar being fully compleated, he saw his fleet increased with six hundred new transports and twenty-eight gallies, which, with the remains of the old squadron, he considered as abundantly sufficient for his intended enterprize. This numerous fleet rendezvoused in the port of Itium (now called Calais) on account of its being nearest to the British shore. Here Cæsar embarked his forces, which consisted of five legions of foot, and ten thousand horse, leaving Labienus at Itium with three legions and two thousand horse, in order to be a check upon the Gauls, and provide corn for the British expedition.

A. C. 54. All things being ready, Cæsar left the port of Itium about sun-set, in the beginning of the month of August, fifty-four years before the birth of Christ. They sailed the whole night with a gentle southerly wind, and by noon the next day the whole fleet arrived at that part of the British coast, where they had made their former descent.

The appearance of so numerous a fleet upon the coast greatly alarmed the Britons, who imagining Cæsar's force to be more formidable than it really was, thought it advisable to depart from their first design of opposing his landing, and draw off their forces to the more covered part of the country; so that the shore being clear Cæsar landed without any opposition.

As soon as the landing was compleated, and the ground marked out for the camp, Cæsar provided himſelf with guides, and leaving ten cohorts and three hundred horſe under the command of Q. Atrius, to guard the ſhips that lay at anchor in the Downs, he began his march in queſt of the Britons. After advancing about twelve miles towards the north, he diſcovered the Britiſh army advantageouſly poſted upon an eminence, with the river Stour in their front, and a thick wood in their rear. As the Romans advanced, the Britons prepared to diſpute their paſſage over the river, and at firſt oppoſed them with their chariots; but the Roman horſe charging them with great vigour, they retreated into the wood, in the midſt of which was a kind of fortification raiſed with timber. Here the Britons for ſome time withſtood all the efforts of the Romans, till at length the ſeventh legion took it by ſtorm, killed great numbers of the Britons, and obliged the reſt to ſave themſelves by a precipitate flight.

Elated with this ſucceſs, early the next morning Cæſar ſent detachments of cavalry and infantry in purſuit of the fugitives. But before they were out of ſight he received a meſſage from Q. Atrius, informing him, that during the preceding night a dreadful ſtorm had thrown ſeveral of his ſhips on ſhore upon the beach, deſtroyed their rigging, and done great damage to the whole fleet. In conſequence of this information Cæſar countermanded the march of his troops, and immediately repaired to the ſea-coaſt, where he was an eye-witneſs of the ravage which had been done by the ſtorm. On a proper examination he found that no leſs than forty of his principal veſſels were entirely loſt, and many of the reſt ſo much damaged as to be unfit for the ſea, till they had undergone a thorough repair.

The preſervation of the navy now engaged the whole attention of Cæſar, and, for the preſent, obliterated all thoughts of farther conqueſt. He ordered all the carpenters of the army to ſet about repairing the ſhips that were damaged, and diſpatched a meſſenger to Labienus at Itium, deſiring that all his workmen there might be inſtantly employed in building a number of new veſſels, and that they ſhould be ſent to him with all expedition. So indefatigable were his people in repairing the damaged ſhips, that in the ſpace of ten days the whole that remained were fit for ſervice; and in order to prevent the like misfortune in future, Cæſar ordered them to be drawn on ſhore, and fortified with the ſame trench and rampart that ſurrounded his camp.

While Cæſar was thus employed in refitting and ſecuring his navy, the Britons were taking every meaſure they could project to fruſtrate any future deſigns of reducing them to ſubjection. The former feuds and animoſities which had ſubſiſted between the princes of the reſpective ſtates were now laid aſide, and they united their whole ſtrength for the mutual defence of what they held moſt ſacred, namely, that glorious freedom they had enjoyed unmoleſted, till annoyed by Roman ambition.

Having gathered together a very numerous and formidable army, they convened a general aſſembly of the ſtates, in order to deliberate on a proper perſon who ſhould be inveſted with the chief command. Several perſons were propoſed, but at length they made choice of Caſſivelaunus, a prince who had acquired great reputation for his military proweſs, and whoſe territories (comprehending Hertfordſhire, Bedfordſhire and Bucks) were divided from the maritime ſtates by the river Thames.

Caſſivelaunus having taken upon him the ſovereign command of the Britiſh forces, immediately proceeded on his march, and took poſſeſſion of the ſame poſt in the wood from whence they had been before diſlodged; whither they had not been long before Cæſar arrived with the main body of his army, and encamped at a ſmall diſtance from the ſpot he had left when he received information of the deſtruction of his fleet by the late ſtorm.

Experience had convinced Caſſivelaunus that his forces were far from being an equal match for the Romans in the open field: he therefore took the wiſe precaution of avoiding a general engagement, and for ſome time continued to harraſs the enemy with flying parties, and cutting off their proviſions. The effects of theſe prudent meaſures were ſoon felt by Cæſar: his forces were continually attacked, with amazing impetu ty, by ſmall parties, who iſſued ſuddenly from .eir coverts, and as ſuddenly retreated. In moſt of theſe ſkirmiſhes the Britons were worſted, but at length they got the advantage, for the Romans following them too far into the thicket, were attacked on every ſide, and obliged to retreat wi very conſiderable loſs.

Theſe diſadvantages greatly affected the min of Cæſar. He ſaw his troops perpetually harraſſed by flying parties of the enemy, and dreaded the conſequence of being diſtreſſed for want of proviſions. He therefore determined to fortify his camp, and endeavour to bring the Britons to a general engagement. But while he was making the neceſſary preparations, Caſſivelaunus, who had cloſely watched all his motions, perceiving the deſign, determined to fruſtrate it, by attacking his army before the ramparts were finiſhed. Accordingly, while the Romans were engaged in their works, he made a ſudden and reſolute ſally from the woods, and falling with great fury on the advanced guard, put them to the rout, and a great ſlaughter enſued. Cæſar ſaw their diſtreſs, and immediately diſpatched a reinforcement to their aſſiſtance; but they were ſo diſmayed at the amazing reſolution of the Britons, that they loſt their uſual vigour, and thereby gave them an opportunity of breaking through their ranks, and ſecuring their retreat to the thickets from whence they had ſallied. In this action ſeveral Roman officers were ſlain, among whom was Quintus Laberius Durus, a tribune; and from Cæſar's manner of relating ſome peculiar circumſtances, it is evident that the Britons gained very ſingular advantages. His words are theſe: "This engagement (ſays he) happening in view of the whole army, every one perceived that the legionary ſoldiers were not a fit match for ſuch an enemy, becauſe the weight of their arms would not permit them to purſue, nor durſt they go far from their colours; neither could the cavalry encounter them, becauſe the Britons often pretended to make a retreat, and having drawn them from the legions would forſake their chariots, and fight on foot to great advantage; and when they were mounted, they were equally fatal to our horſe, horſe, whether we purſued or fled. Another diſadvantage was, that the enemy never fought in a cloſe battalion, but in ſmall parties at a great diſtance from one another, each of them having their particular part allotted, from whence they received ſupplies, and the weary were relieved by the freſh."

On the day after this obſtinate action the Romans perceived a remarkable abatement in the vigour of the Britons. They ſhewed themſelves, indeed, at a diſtance upon the hills, but without manifeſting their former eagerneſs and alacrity in provoking the enemy to battle. This change of conduct appeared very myſterious to Cæſar, who, about noon, detached three legions of foot, ſupported by all his horſe, on a foraging party, under the command of C. Trebonius. This formidable detachment was, however, ſoon attacked by the Britons, who fell with great fury on the horſe, and even penetrated to the enſigns and legions; but the Romans had learned from experience to ſupport their horſe with their infantry, and the Britons, being attacked by a compact body, were utterly routed.

This defeat was deſtructive to the Britiſh army: the auxiliaries who had joined them from different parts of the iſland were ſo diſpirited that they took the firſt opportunity of returning to their reſpective diſtricts; nor did the Britons ever after, as an united body, engage the Romans in a pitched battle.

The brave Caſſivelaunus was greatly alarmed at this defeat of the Britons. He perceived the gathering ſtorm, and took every poſſible precaution to break its force. He marched with his diminiſhed army to Coway near the Oatlands, and croſſing the river Thames, there reſolved to make a ſtand againſt the conqueror of the world.

The politic Cæſar being informed of the diſperſion of the auxiliaries, and the retreat of Caſſivelaunus, reſolved to purſue him, and accordingly advanced with his army to the banks of the river Thames, with an intention of paſſing it where fordable. On his arrival at the place, he found that Caſſivelaunus, being informed of his deſign, had taken every prudent precaution in his power to render it abortive. He had lined the oppoſite bank with a large body of troops, fortified it with palliſadoes, and driven into the bed of the river a great number of ſtakes, which were ſharpened at the top, and concealed under the ſurface of the water.

But the Romans were not to be intimidated by dangers, nor interrupted by difficulties. At the inſtigation of their intrepid and reſolute commander they plunged into the river with great fortitude, and proceeded with ſuch celerity, even when up to their chins in water, that the enemy, being ſtruck with conſternation, could not ſuſtain the firſt ſhock, but, abandoning their works, conſulted their ſafety in a precipitate retreat.

The brave Caſſivelaunus now found it was in vain to make any farther attempts in oppoſing the Roman power in regular engagements; but at the ſame time he determined to conduct himſelf with ſpirit blended with caution. He therefore diſbanded his troops, reſerving only about four thouſand charioteers. With theſe he marched towards the capital of his territories; in the way to which he cut off ſeveral ſtraggling parties that were ſent to forage, watched the march of the main body, gave them frequent alarms, and ordered his people to drive the cattle from the fields through which he knew the Romans muſt paſs, that they might find it impoſſible to ſubſiſt on the caſual ravages of his country.

The conduct of Caſſivelaunus at this time was more alarming to Cæſar, than all the attacks he had hitherto received from the army of the Britons. He was exceeding cautious how he advanced, keeping his men together as much as poſſible; nor could he obtain any other ſubſiſtence for them but what aroſe from the plunder of a few trifling villages, moſt of which he reduced to aſhes.

While Cæſar was thus in ſlow purſuit of Caſſivelaunus, an incident occurred which facilitated the deſign of the former, and totally deſtroyed all the prudent meaſures taken by the latter. He received an embaſſy from the Trinobantes, a powerful people inhabiting Middleſex and Eſſex, who promiſed to yield him obedience, on condition that he would ſend their own prince Mandubratius to aſſume the regal authority among them, and protect him from the malice of Caſſivelaunus, who had killed his father Imanuentius *. Cæſar accepted their offer, complied with their requeſt, and having received forty hoſtages, and a conſiderable quantity of proviſion for his army, reſtored the young prince to his ſubjects, and promiſed them his future protection.

The puſillanimous conduct of the Trinobantes was followed by ſeveral other ſtates of the Belgic Britons, the firſt of whom were the Ceni Magni, or inhabitants of Surry. Theſe, perceiving that the Trinobantes were freed from the calamities of war, and lived in tranquillity under the protection of Cæſar, reſolved immediately to follow their example. They accordingly ſent ambaſſadors to the Roman general with offers of ſubmiſſion, which being accepted, a peace was concluded, and the Ceni Magni immediately ſent proviſions for the relief of the Roman army.

In the mean time Caſſivelaunus, being deſerted by his allies, and underſtanding by what means the Roman army was ſupplied with proviſions, gave up all hopes of engaging the Conqueror with any advantage: and therefore, as the only ſecurity for himſelf, he retreated with his reduced forces to the capital of his territories, which is ſaid to have been Verulam, now called St. Albans, in Hertfordſhire.

Cæſar being informed of the retreat of Caſſivelaunus, immediately purſued him with his forces, forces, marking his rout with blood and devaſtation. Every village was laid in aſhes, and the whole country appeared, as it were, like a ſmoking deſert. On his arrival at the place he found it ſituated in the center of a wood, the avenues to which were ſtrongly fortified by ditches, ramparts of earth, and felled trees. Theſe fortifications, though formed in the rudeſt manner, appeared formidable to the Romans. They had before experienced the difficulty of ſtorming ramparts defended by troops driven to deſpair. Cæſar ſaw the danger, and therefore ordered the fortifications to be attacked at two different places at the ſame time. This ſtratagem ſucceeded to his wiſhes: the brave Caſſivelaunus, for want of proper aſſiſtance, could only defend one place at a time, which he did, indeed, with ſuch ſucceſs, that the Romans were repulſed. But he could not divide his attention, and therefore, at length, thought it moſt prudent to retreat. In conſequence of this the Romans forced the rampart, and poſſeſſed themſelves of the place, upon which the Britons immediately betook themſelves to flight, but being purſued, many were killed, and great numbers taken priſoners. This was an advantageous conqueſt to Cæſar, who was now plentifully ſupplied with every kind of proviſion, the Britiſh general having adapted his capital as a magazine for thoſe articles.

* At the time the different ſtates aſſembled in order to make choice of a proper perſon as chief commander of the army, a warm conteſt took place between the partizans of Imanuentius, king of the Trinobantes, and thoſe of Caſſivelaunus, which was carried to ſuch lengths that an engagement enſued, each party being headed by their reſpective favourites. In this engagement, Caſſivelaunus proved victorious, and his antagoniſt Imanuentius was ſlain, which put an end to the controverſy, and Caſſivelaunus was choſen general without farther oppoſition. Mandubratius, the ſon of Imanuentius, would have ſuffered the like fate with his father, had he not fled and craved the protection of Cæſar, who now, at the requeſt of his ſubjects, reſtored him to the royal dignity.

Caſſivelaunus was now reduced to the utmoſt ſtate of diſtreſs: deſerted by his friends, defeated by his enemies, his capital taken, and his territories laid waſte, he knew not what ſteps to take, or by what means he could extricate himſelf from the labyrinth into which he was involved. Nothing but his own greatneſs of ſoul could have ſupported him under this dilemma. He ſtill retained the noble ſpirit of his anceſtors, by preferring liberty in diſtreſs to ſlavery in affluence; and though unable any longer to ſupport the cauſe of his country, he planned an expedition, which, had it ſucceeded, would have greatly diſtreſſed, if not abſolutely ruined, the invaders of his country.

Cæſar, as we have before obſerved, left his navy within the entrenchments of his camp on the ſhore, and he was now with the main body of his army upwards of ninety miles diſtant. Caſſivelaunus now thought a favourable opportunity offered for deſtroying the whole fleet of the Romans. He therefore, as general of the confederates, ſent expreſſes to Cingetorix, Cornelius, Taximagulus, Segonex, (princes whoſe territories lay in Kent, Wilts, and Hampſhire, and who yet remained faithful) requeſting them to aſſemble all their forces with the utmoſt expedition and privacy, and ſtorm the naval entrenchments of the enemy, while Cæſar was at too great a diſtance to afford them any relief.

This, no doubt, was a well-concerted plan, but the accompliſhment of it was attended with more difficulty than Caſſivelaunus had imagined. The fortifications thrown up by Cæſar were more than ſufficient to render every attempt of the Britons abortive. The four princes, however, readily complied with the requeſt of their chief, but the enterprize did not ſucceed according to their expectations. They aſſaulted the Roman camp with great reſolution, but the enemy making a vigorous ſally they were ſoon repulſed, great numbers killed, and Cingetorix, the commander in chief, taken priſoner.

This overthrow made a deep impreſſion on the mind of Caſſivelaunus, who was now convinced that all farther oppoſition would be in vain. He therefore reſolved to put a concluſion to a diſadvantageous war by making his peace with the conqueror, which he eaſily obtained through the mediation of Comius, and Cæſar's great deſire of returning to the continent. The conditions of the treaty between Cæſar and Caſſivelaunus, and, through him, with the Britons in general, were, that they ſhould pay an annual tribute to the Roman ſtate, deliver a certain number of hoſtages by way of ſecurity, and (as a private clauſe) that Caſſivelaunus ſhould reſign the ſovereignty of Britain to Mandubratius, prince of the Trinobantes.

Peace being thus concluded, Cæſar marched back with his hoſtages, and a great number of priſoners, to the ſea-ſide, and made immediate preparations for his departure. His ſhips were launched and refitted with the greateſt expedition, and his army, together with the priſoners and hoſtages, being put on board at two different embarkations, he ſet ſail for Gaul, whither he arrived a few days before the autumnal equinox *.

Thus ended Cæſar's ſecond expedition into Britain, on a candid examination of which it will appear to have been rather ſplendid than effectual. It is true he penetrated much farther into the iſland than in his firſt expedition, and formed alliances with ſeveral of the petty princes; but he retained not a foot of ground, nor did he procure any ſolid advantage to his country. As he left no garriſon, and made no ſettlement in Britain, it is probable the nations never paid the tribute ſtipulated in the pacification with Caſſivelaunus; or at leaſt it may be ſuppoſed to have been rejected by all the inhabitants, except the Belgic colonies, whoſe chief dependence being on trade, they durſt not refuſe paying the impoſition, leſt their merchandiſe ſhould be ſeized by the Romans; ſo that it ſeems to have been rather a duty on commodities, than a general tribute, with which the natives could not be ſaddled by any treaty with Caſſivelaunus, whoſe ſovereignty many ſtates no longer acknowledged. All the honour, therefore, that juſtly belongs to Cæſar is, that he carried the Roman arms beyond the boundaries of the ocean, and defeated the inhabitants of an iſland that was before unknown to his countrymen.

* After ſtaying a ſhort time at Gaul, Cæſar returned to Rome, where he offered a croſlet of Britiſh pearls at the ſhrine of Venus Genetrix, from whom he was ſaid to be deſcended; and to fix a laſting remembrance of his expeditions into Britain, he employed his priſoners in adjuſting the tapeſtry ſcenes of the theatre, on which the victories he gained over the Britons were repreſented; while others of a more robuſt conſtitution were employed in carrying the ſedans of the ſenators and principal nobility.

CHAP.

CHAP. III.

Auguſtus Cæſar reſolves to make an expedition into Britain, but is prevented from carrying his deſign into execution. The Britons cultivate a peaceable correſpondence with the Romans. Cunobeline becomes the moſt powerful prince in Britain, and coins money for paying the duties levied by the Romans. He is greatly diſturbed by his eldeſt ſon, who endeavours to raiſe a rebellion againſt him, and prevails on the emperor Caligula to make another deſcent on the iſland. Caligula engages to undertake the conqueſt of Britain, and for that purpoſe embarks with a great body of forces; but returns without even making an attempt to accompliſh his deſign. The emperor Claudius is ſtimulated to invade Britain at the inſtigation of a Britiſh prince named Beric, and for that purpoſe orders A. Plautius to embark with a conſiderable body of forces from Gaul. A mutiny takes place among the Roman ſoldiers, which, for ſome time, retards the execution of the deſign; but at length the troops are embarked, and land on the coaſt of Kent. Plautius purſues the Britons, paſſes the Thames, and defeats Caractacus and his brother Togodumnus in ſeveral ſucceſſive battles, in one of which the latter is ſlain. The emperor Claudius arrives in Britain with a conſiderable reinforcement. Takes Camelodunum, the capital of the Trinobantes, and reduces many petty ſtates to his obedience. Diſpirited by conqueſt, great numbers of the Britons go to Claudius, and offer ſubmiſſion to the Roman power. Claudius treats them with great moderation, and, leaving Plautius with his army, returns to Rome, where he is received with univerſal acclamations by his ſubjects. After the departure of Claudius, Veſpaſian ſignalizes himſelf in the conqueſt of ſeveral Britiſh nations, and on his return to Rome is honoured with a triumph. Plautius is recalled from Britain, and P. Oſtorius Scapula appointed Proprætor in his ſtead.

HOW far the Britons fulfilled their engagements with Cæſar after his ſecond departure from the iſland we are not informed; nor, indeed, are there any remarkable events upon record relative to the ſtate of Britain for ſome years after. The death of Cæſar produced univerſal diſtraction throughout the Roman empire, and the affairs of Britain were forgotten amidſt the general anarchy and confuſion that ſubſiſted, for ſome time, in the then capital of the world. The Britons, during this confuſion, lived in great tranquillity, without feeling the rod of arbitrary power, or the oppreſſive impoſitions of avaricious proconſuls. They enjoyed an uninterrupted eaſe, and were either too ignorant, or too negligent, to tranſmit to poſterity the tranſactions of their country. All, therefore, that can be collected is, that after the departure of the Romans Caſſivelaunus (ſtill retaining the ſovereignty in his own hands, contrary to the treaty made with Cæſar) ſeverely chaſtiſed the Trinobantes for having joined the invaders of his country; and that, at his death, he left the government to his nephew Tinuantius, who was ſucceeded by his ſon Cunobeline, a prince of the moſt diſtinguiſhed talents.

A. D. 1. The inteſtine commotions, which had diſtracted the Roman ſtate, ceaſing in the reign of Auguſtus, the immediate ſucceſſor of Cæſar, that emperor, in the ſixth year of his imperial dignity, formed the reſolution of making an expedition into Britain, in order to improve the conqueſts which had been made by his predeceſſor. He accordingly advanced into Gaul to carry his deſign into execution; but was diverted from his purpoſe by a revolt in Panonia, one of the provinces ſubject to the Roman empire. As ſoon, however, as the tranquillity of that province was reſtored he again marched into Gaul for the purpoſe of invading Britain; but the chiefs of the iſland being informed of his intent, found means to divert the ſtorm, by ſending a ſolemn embaſſy to ſue for peace, at the ſame time promiſing ſtrictly to fulfil the treaty they had made with Julius Cæſar previous to his departure from the iſland. Auguſtus, conſidering the great expence that would attend ſuch an enterprize, and being fearful that ſome diſagreeable commotions might take place during his abſence, received the Britiſh ambaſſadors with great courteſy, a peace was immediately concluded, and Auguſtus returned with his forces to Rome.

In conſequence of theſe pacific meaſures the Britons maintained a friendly correſpondence with the Romans during the reign of Auguſtus, paying only a trifling duty on merchandize exported to the continent. Several of the Britiſh princes reſided at Rome, and many of the noblemen ſent their ſons thither for their education.

A. D. 8. The Britons preſerved this friendly intercourſe with the Romans during the whole reign of Tiberius, the immediate ſucceſſor of Auguſtus. Indeed this emperor was bound in honour and gratitude to ſhew the kindeſt treatment to the Britons; for, when a detachment of Roman troops under the command of Germanicus, in their return from the victory they had gained over Arminius on the banks of the Weſer, were ſhipwrecked on the coaſt of Britain, the reguli, or chiefs, not only relieved the diſtreſſed Romans with the utmoſt hoſpitality, but likewiſe ſent them back in ſafety to their general.

Cunobeline, who ſucceeded in lineal right to the government of Britain, lived in good correſpondence with the Romans, and punctually paid the tribute in pieces of coin ſtruck for the purpoſe, and inſcribed with the word Taſcia. This prince was properly the chief of the Caſſivelauni, but he extended his dominion over the Dobuni, inhabiting Glouceſterſhire and Oxfordſhire. He alſo reduced the Trinobantes and other provinces, and acquired ſuch acceſſion of territory as rendered him the moſt powerful prince in the iſland.

During the reigns of Auguſtus and Tiberius Cunobeline enjoyed a continued ſeries of proſperity. From his wife and gentle adminiſtration he was beloved by his ſubjects, and eſteemed by foreigners; but unfortunately the cloſe of his reign was ſullied with a misfortune that diſturbed his own peace and the tranquillity of his country. His eldeſt ſon Adminius, who was of a cruel and tyrannical temper, endeavoured to raiſe an unnatural rebellion againſt him, the conſequence of which was that the people were greatly diſtreſſed, and laid their complaints at the foot of his throne. Cunobeline expoſtulated with his ſon on the baſeneſs of his conduct: but all the arguments he could uſe to prevail on him to deſiſt were of no effect. For ſome time he knew not what meaſures to take: he was embarraſſed by parental fondneſs on the one hand, and a love of juſtice on the other; but at length the latter prevailed, and Adminius was baniſhed.

Exaſperated at a ſentence which he conſidered as cruel, and determined, if poſſible, to revenge the diſgrace, Adminius immediately repaired to Rome, in order to put himſelf under the protection of Caligula, who then ſwayed the imperial ſcepter. He repreſented to the emperor the cruel treatment he had received from his father, and pointed out to him the great eaſe with which he might reduce the Britons to a ſtate of ſubjection. He told him they were a weak and divided people, averſe to union, and unable to defend their country againſt the attack of a formidable enemy, and if he would but make the attempt there was not the leaſt doubt but it would be crowned with ſucceſs.

A. D. 36. Caligula, who was vain and impetuous, though cowardly and irreſolute, received with apparent complacency the application of Adminius, and aſſembling an army of 200,000 men advanced in perſon to the northern coaſt of Gaul, in order to invade the Britiſh iſland. Pleaſed with the idea of making ſo important a conqueſt without danger or fatigue (as he had been induced to expect from the repreſentation of Adminius) he embarked his troops with the utmoſt expedition; but before the ſhips were ready to ſail he was informed, to his great ſurprize, that the Britons, apprized of his intentions, were under arms on the oppoſite ſhore, and determined to ſpill the laſt drop of their blood in defence of their country. This information ſtruck a forcible damp on the ſpirits of the puſillanimous Caligula: but his vanity was equal to his cowardice: he was deſirous of receiving the honours of a triumph, without treading the thorny path of conqueſt, and of wearing the wreath of victory, without facing an enemy. He embarked, attended by his principal officers, on board a galley, ſailed within a league of the Britiſh coaſt, took a view of the Britons, whoſe formidable appearance he did not at all like, and then haſtened back with as much oſtentation as if he had atchieved ſome great action. As ſoon as he landed he ordered his army to be drawn up in battle array, and after making a curious harangue to the ſoldiers, gave directions that they ſhould diſperſe themſelves, and fill their helmets with ſhells from the ſea ſhore. Theſe orders being obeyed, and a prodigious quantity of ſhells collected, Caligula commanded that they ſhould be carefully packed up, and, to compleat the farce, ſent them with the moſt pompous parade to Rome, as the ſpoils of the Britiſh ocean, demanding, at the ſame time, that the ſenate would decree him a triumph for the important ſervices he had done the empire. Strange as this requeſt may appear, the venal ſenate readily complied, and put themſelves to an immenſe expence to render the emperor magnificently contemptible in the face of the whole world. To perpetuate this ridiculous expedition, or rather to tranſmit his own folly to poſterity, he erected a tower on the Belgic coaſt, oppoſite to Norfolk, and called it Turris Ardens, in alluſion to the deſign of its being a light houſe for ſhips at ſea. This ſtructure was afterwards repaired by Charlemagne, and ſtill continues a noble monument of Roman antiquity.

The puſillanimous and frantic behaviour of Caligula greatly leſſened the Roman power in the eyes of the Britons, who not ſuſpecting any farther attempt would be made to diveſt them of their liberty, neglected to continue in that defenſive ſtate they had hitherto done. The long intercourſe they had now carried on with the Romans greatly abated their natural averſion to thoſe people. They cultivated their arts and imitated their manners, both of which might have been ſerviceable, had they not imported their luxuries. The conſequence of this was, that they ſunk into indolence and eaſe; their natural love of liberty and independence was ſoftened by effeminacy, and that union which forms the only bond of ſecurity, in times of diſtreſs was diſſolved. They did not enjoy that tranquillity which they might have derived from the abſence of the Romans; on the contrary, it afforded leiſure and opportunity to the different ſtates and chieftains to renew their former bickerings, and enabled the more powerful potentates to ſubdue the petty ſovereignties that lay contiguous to their dominions.

The Britons remained unſubdued by the Romans till the reign of the emperor Claudius, when they rather fell victims to their inteſtine broils than to the power of that empire. Jealouſy did what their enemies ſwords could not effect; and while ſome ſtates had the virtue to oppoſe the Romans, others joined them, and were ſolicitous for the deſtruction of their country.

Cunobeline, who did not long outlive Caligula, was ſucceeded on the Britiſh throne by his two ſons Togodumnus and Caractacus, two princes univerſally reſpected for their mental abilities, natural courage, and military proweſs. In the beginning of their reign they ſhook off the Roman power, by refuſing to pay the uſual tribute, the reaſon of which was, that the Romans had declined delivering up ſeveral traitors who had fled thither for refuge. One of theſe miſcreants, named Beric, a chieftain among the Dobuni of Dorſetſhire, was the moſt inveterate enemy to his country, and from whoſe exhortations and importunities the emperor Claudius was ſtimulated to make an attempt for the reduction of Britain. He painted to him the ſtate of the iſland in ſuch colours as preſented a flattering proſpect of glory and power, and which, he ſaid, might be acquired with little difficulty, and almoſt without danger.

While the traitor Beric was thus ſoliciting the deſtruction of his country, ambaſſadors arrived from the Britiſh court to demand the fugitives, and particularly the perfidious Beric. But this demand demand was peremptorily refuſed, and the ambaſſadors treated with great indignity, which ſo enraged the Britons that they even refuſed to pay the impoſts and duties laid on the commodities exported to Gaul. They prohibited all future intercourſe with the Romans, and took every precaution in their power to defend the liberty and independence of their country.

The late ridiculous expedition of Caligula had given the Britons an high opinion of their own power. They imagined the Romans were really afraid to croſs the ocean, and imputed that miſcarriage to fear, which was occaſioned by the timidity of the commander. At the ſame time they knew that Claudius was as indolent and cowardly as Caligula; but they did not reflect, that prudent counſellors might ſupply the want of abilities in the monarch, and able generals his deficiency of military proweſs.

The conduct of the Britons, in refuſing to pay the uſual tribute, gave Claudius a plauſible pretence for commencing hoſtilities. He accordingly gave the command of his army in Gaul to Aulius Plautius, a citizen of great reputation, and famous for his military abilities, with orders to tranſport a conſiderable army into Britain, enjoining him, at the ſame time, not to finiſh the conqueſt himſelf, but ſend him timely information, that he might reap the fruits of victory in perſon. He was deſirous of enjoying the honours of a triumph, without experiencing the fatigues of a campaign.

In obedience to the imperial orders, Plautius marched at the head of a conſiderable body of forces to the ſea ſhore, where a proper number of veſſels were provided for tranſporting them into Britain. Plautius had already acquired the moſt diſtinguiſhed reputation, both as a man and a warrior, notwithſtanding which the troops had no ſooner arrived at the ſpot from whence they were to embark, than a general mutiny prevailed, and they abſolutely refuſed being concerned in the intended expedition. They declared themſelves willing to follow their general to any part of the continent, but would not paſs the boundaries of the ocean, to enter a part which they called the new world.

Plautius, aſtoniſhed at the behaviour of the legions, uſed all the arguments he was maſter of to convince them of the abſurdity of their conduct; but all his remonſtrances proving ineffectual, he ſuſpended the embarkation, and immediately diſpatched a meſſenger to Claudius with an account of the general mutiny among his men. On the receipt of this intelligence the emperor ſent Narciſſus, a creature of his own, bred up in all the idle effeminacy of a court, to prevail on the ſoldiers to obey the orders of Plautius. This miniſter, though armed with the authority of the emperor, was deſtitute of power: he aſcended the roſtrum in order to harangue the troops; but his endeavours on this head proved totally ineffectual. The ſoldiers, exaſperated at ſeeing the place which had hitherto been filled with intrepid generals, who had ſhared in common with the dangers and fatigues of war, profaned by a minion, ſet up an univerſal cry, in which the voice of Narciſſus was totally loſt: they would not ſuffer a perſon whom they knew to be deſtitute of merit, and a ſtranger to virtuous principles, to interpoſe in the cauſe of a Roman army. The uproar increaſed; the banners of mutiny were diſplayed, and the imperial orders no longer regarded. Plautius perceived the gathering ſtorm, and trembled for the conſequences: but generoſity prevailed, when power had exerted its force in vain. The ſoldiers revered the virtue of Plautius as much as they deſpiſed the effeminacy of Narciſſus, and after ſhewing their contempt for the latter, expreſſed their reſpect and ſubmiſſion to the former, by promiſing to obey his commands, and to follow him wherever he ſhould direct.

A. D. 46. Plautius took advantage of this favourable diſpoſition among his troops, and embarked his whole force at different ports, that the failure of one embarkation might not prevent the ſucceſs of the enterpriſe. They were, however, all driven back by contrary winds, and much diſheartened; but the appearance of an aurora borealis recalled their ſpirits, for the Romans, imagining this meteor to be an happy omen, again ſet ſail, and, after a ſhort paſſage, landed on the Kentiſh coaſt without oppoſition.

The Britons were far from being ſtrangers to the intended deſcent of the Romans, and had made the neceſſary preparations for preventing their landing; but being informed of the mutiny that had taken place in the Roman army, they took it for granted that their deſigns were fruſtrated, and concluded the danger was over. In conſequence of this they thought it unneceſſary to guard the coaſt when no enemy was expected, and broke up their camp but a ſhort time before the Roman legions appeared. It was now too late to regain the advantage they had loſt; and inſtead of joining in a general body, and attacking the enemy before they were ready to receive them, they retired into the inland parts of the country, and divided their forces into ſmall parties, under different chieftains. The two principal bodies were commanded by Togodumnus and Caractacus, both celebrated for their military abilities, their intrepidity and their virtue. But jealouſies prevailed among the petty princes of Britain: they envied the talents they could not equal, and ſacrificed the liberties of their country to the ſpirit of malignity.

Plautius, having prepared his army for marching, advanced by the ſame rout which Cæſar had formerly taken, till he reached the Thames, which he paſſed at Wallingford, and entered the territories of the Danbuni, then under the command of Togodumnus, as the Caſſivelauni were under that of Caractacus. Plautius firſt met with the army under Caractacus, whom he immediately attacked, defeated, and put to the rout; after which he turned his victorious arms againſt Togodumnus, and met with equal ſucceſs, great numberr of the Britons being ſlain, and the reſt obliged to ſave themſelves by a precipitate flight.

But though theſe misfortunes greatly weakened the power of the Britons, yet they did not depreſs their ſpirits. They repaired from all parts to the ſtandard of Caractacus, who, after joining his brother, encamped on the banks of the Thames, in the country of the Regni.

In the mean time Plautius, having left proper garriſons

garriſons in thoſe parts he had already reduced, determined to purſue his conqueſts, and accordingly marched along the banks of the Thames, till he came oppoſite to the ſpot where the Britons were encamped. The ſtream here was too deep, and the current too rapid, to be forded even by cavalry, a circumſtance which lulled the Britons into a fatal ſecurity; and though they ſaw the enemy they made no preparations for defence. But they ſoon found they were far from being ſo ſafe as they had imagined. Plautius had in his army a conſiderable body of German auxiliaries, who had long been accuſtomed to ſwim acroſs the moſt rapid rivers in their armour. Theſe he ordered to plunge into the ſtream, which they accordingly did with ſuch intrepidity, that the Britons were aſtoniſhed, and retired ſome diſtance from their camp in the utmoſt confuſion. The Germans no ſooner gained the oppoſite ſhore, than, according to the order of their general, they aimed their arrows and darts at the horſes of the Britons, and by the ſlaughter of thoſe animals rendered the chariots totally uſeleſs. But as the Germans were not able of themſelves to encounter the whole Britiſh army, a body of the Roman infantry, animated by the example of the auxiliaries, followed them under the command of Flavius Veſpaſian and his brother Sabinus. As ſoon as theſe had reached the oppoſite ſhore, they immediately joined the Germans, and forming themſelves into ranks, marched againſt the Britons, who had fled for ſecurity to the neighbouring woods. Here a ſlight ſkirmiſh enſued, in which the Britons were obliged to retreat, but as night was coming on, the Romans did not think it prudent to purſue the advantage.

Far from being diſpirited by this check the Britons next day charged the Romans with ſuch intrepidity, that victory continued for a long time doubtful. They broke through the Roman ranks, and with all the fury of men exaſperated to madneſs, thinned the ſquadrons of the enemy. Veſpaſian himſelf was ſo circumſtanced, that he muſt either have loſt his life or his liberty, had he not been reſcued by the activity and courage of his ſon. At the ſame time C. Sidius Geta, another general officer, who was thought to have been taken priſoner, found means to diſengage himſelf and his party from the enemy, and improving the opportunity of the tumultuous ſecurity into which the proſpect of victory had thrown the Britons, charged them afreſh with the utmoſt impetuoſity. This diverſion giving the Romans time to recover themſelves, they at length wreſted the victory from the hands of the Britons, great numbers of whom were killed, and the reſt compelled to ſave themſelves by a precipitate flight. Geta was conſidered as the principal cauſe of the victory, and a triumph was afterwards decreed him by the ſenate on that account, though he had never paſſed the conſular dignity.

After this unſucceſsful effort, Caractacus and his brother retreated with their armies along the banks of the Thames, and being well acquainted with that river paſſed the ſtream near Greenwich, (the loweſt place where it was then fordable) and encamped in the marſhes on the other ſide of the river. Plautius followed the Britons at ſome diſtance, and coming to the banks of the Thames, oppoſite to where the Britons were encamped, his German troops ſwam over as before, while Plautius, with his legions, paſſed the ſtream by means of a bridge erected at ſome diſtance above the ford. As ſoon as they had all gained the oppoſite ſide of the water they immediately formed themſelves into ranks, and marched with great reſolution to attack the Britons. A deſperate battle enſued, which laſted ſome time, but was at length determined in favour of the Romans, Togodumnus being ſlain, and the Britiſh army routed with grear ſlaughter.

But notwithſtanding this overthrow the Britiſh ſpirit was not yet conquered. The gallant Caractacus rallied the ſcattered remains of his army, and, croſſing the river, encamped oppoſite to the army of Plautius. The Roman general now evidently declined an engagement, which the Britons imputed to fear: but in this they were greatly miſtaken, for the inactivity of Plautius did not ariſe either from timidity or caution. He had already obtained ſeveral ſucceſſive victories, and thought it was now high time to give the emperor notice of his proceedings, according to the inſtructions he had received, that he might have the honour of putting an end to the war in perſon. Plautius accordingly diſpatched letters to the emperor, informing him of his ſucceſs, and requeſting his preſence as ſoon as poſſible, that he might be perſonally crowned with the laurel of conqueſt.

A. D. 48. No ſooner did Claudius receive the ſucceſsful intelligence from his general in Britain, than he immediately transferred the civil government to Vitellus, and embarked with a conſiderable body of forces at Oſtium for Marſeilles, about the latter end of July. From Marſeilles he proceeded by land to Boulogne, where he took ſhiping for Britain, and landed ſafe at Sandwich, from whence he marched at the head of his legions to the camp of Plautius.

The junction of the emperor's forces with thoſe of Plautius formed a more powerful army than had ever been ſeen in the iſland. The Britons perceived the ſtrength of the enemy, and prudently avoided a general engagement. But the deſire of retaliating the injuries they had received from the enemies of their country animated them to hover round the Roman camp, by which means they cut off many of their ſtraggling parties.

Claudius, having now aſſumed the chief command, croſſed the river with his troops in the face of the Britons, who bravely diſputed their paſſage. On their arrival on the oppoſite ſhore, a general engagement enſued, which for ſome time was attended with great ſlaughter on both ſides; but at length the Roman diſcipline prevailed, the attacks of the Britons were effectually repelled, and their whole army put to flight.

After this conqueſt Claudius advanced into the country of the Trinobantes, and made himſelf maſter of Camelodunum (now Malden in Eſſex) the capital of the late Cunobeline. This ſucceſs, together with the late defeat, quite diſpirited the Britons, who now thought more of endeavouring to make peace than retrieving their affairs, and determined to court the confidence inſtead of oppoſing the progreſs of the conqueror. They accordingly in general threw down their arms, and deputies from the different ſtates flocked daily to the Roman camp to make their ſubmiſſion miſſion to Claudius. The antient inhabitants, indeed, could not be perſuaded to part ſo eaſily with their liberty: the brave Caractacus ſtill kept the field at the head of the Caſſivelauni, hoping that the Romans would retire on the approach of winter.

Claudius now gave orders for ſettling a military colony at Camelodunum, which was accordingly done, and that part of the iſland reduced to a Roman province. The ſettling of colonies was found the beſt method of ſubduing thoſe countries in which the Romans had gained footing by their arms, as it diſſeminated their arts, their language and their manners, among the people. It is, therefore, at this period that we ought properly to date the reduction of the Britons by the Romans, as the previous expeditions rather tended to diſturb than ſubjugate the country.

Having diſarmed thoſe that ſubmitted, and reduced many petty ſtates to his obedience by force of arms, Claudius was ſeveral times proclaimed Imperator by the ſoldiers; and the vanquiſhed were ſo touched with his generoſity in leaving them to enjoy their poſſeſſions, that they not only erected temples to his honour, but even ranked him among their deities.

Thus ſatiated with glory and ſucceſs, Claudius, after a ſtay of ſixteen days in Britain, left Plautius to finiſh the campaign, and returned to Rome, where he was received amidſt the univerſal acclamations of the people. The conqueſt of any part of Britain was thought of ſuch importance, that no honours, in the power of Rome to beſtow, were conſidered as too great for the conqueror. Accordingly, triumphal arches were erected upon his entering Boulogne in his way to Rome, and on his arrival at the capital a ſplendid triumph was immediately decreed by the ſenate. A naval crown was fixed upon the imperial palace, as an emblem of his having eſcaped the dangers of the ocean, and his dominion over the ſeas of Britain. Claudius himſelf expreſſed the higheſt gratitude to the noble Romans who had aſſiſted him perſonally in this expedition, for he beſtowed upon thoſe who were ſenators, but without conſular dignity, triumphal ornaments; and the ſenate, to crown all his honour, decreed to himſelf and his family the ſurname of Britannicus, a circumſtance that clearly demonſtrates the importance of ſuch an acceſſion to the Roman dominions.

After the departure of Claudius from Britain, Plautius, who was left in the character of Proprætor, or governor of the iſland, proceeded in the conqueſts of thoſe ſtates that ſtill refuſed to ſubmit; and while he was carrying on his operations againſt the inland, warlike and original iſlanders, who lived among woods and mountains, Flavius Veſpaſian, the ſecond officer in command, was employed in reducing the maratime places occupied by the colonies of the Belgæ, who had diſperſed themſelves on the whole coaſt, from the promontory of Kent, to the Land's End in Cornwall.

Veſpaſian was as ſucceſsful in his enterprizes as might have been expected from the valour and military abilities of ſo experienced a general. In his ſeveral excurſions he fought and defeated the remote Britons in no leſs than thirty battles; took twenty towns, ſubdued the Iſle of Wight, and even added the Orkney Iſlands to the imperial territories. The greateſt difficulty he met with was, in reducing the inhabitants of Wilts, Dorſet, and Somerſetſhire, where inacceſſible hills, and prodigious moraſſes, afforded them abundant opportunities of ſurprizing any commander leſs cautious than Veſpaſian. But theſe difficulties he ſurmounted, and reduced them to ſuch a ſtate of ſubjection, and ſo won them over by his moderate government, that they even furniſhed him with ſoldiers to aſſiſt him in ſubduing the more northern inhabitants. After having ſettled the country his arms had reduced, Veſpaſian returned to Rome, and, for his diſtinguiſhed ſervices, obtained a triumph, a conſulſhip and other honours.

Plautius, the Proprætor, was far from being ſo ſucceſsful as Veſpaſian; nor could it, indeed, be expected, as he had much great difficulties to encounter. He was oppoſed by the antient Britons under Caractacus, a prince endowed with the moſt undaunted courage, and the moſt invincible fortitude. He had a natural talent for war, and had acquired, by long experience, ſuch a degree of military knowledge, as could not have been expected in one of his country. He was patient under misfortunes; cool, penetrating, and fruitful of expedients. He never undertook any action, without ſecuring ſome advantage, and was generally ready for a ſecond engagement the day after he had ſuffered a defeat. Finding it impoſſible to withſtand the arms and military diſcipline of the Romans in battle, he reſolved to hazard nothing but ſkirmiſhes, and theſe only when he had a manifeſt advantage of ground, or a great ſuperiority in number: thus he ſtill hovered about the ſkirts of the Roman army, which he occaſionally haraſſed with great ſucceſs; and his parties, when overmatched, retreated to mountains, fens and faſtneſſes unknown and inacceſſible to the enemy.

But notwithſtanding the management of Caractacus, and the difficulties he otherwiſe met with, Plautius, by his vigilance, activity and conduct, found means to ſubdue the inhabitants of the counties of Glouceſter, Oxford, Middleſex and Eſſex: he alſo reduced Hertfordſhire, and carried his arms into the lower parts of the counties of Bedford and Northampton; in all which places he governed the inhabitants with ſuch wiſe and moderate regulations, that they quietly ſubmitted to their fate, and did not make any attempt to regain their liberty. Having obtained theſe ſucceſſes, Plautius was honourably recalled from Britain, and returned to Rome, where he was received by the emperor in perſon, and honoured with an inferior triumph; after which P. Oſtorius Scapula was appointed to ſucceed him as Proprætor, or governor of Britain.

CHAP. IV.

Oſtorius Scapula, on his arrival in Britain, finds the ſtate of affairs in great confuſion. He marches againſt the Britons, and defeats them. Erects a chain of forts along the banks of the Avon and Severn, and ſtrengthens the fortifications of Camelodunum. Engages and defeats the Iceni, and quells a commotion among the Brigantes. Marches againſt Caractacus, defeats him with great ſlaughter, and takes his family priſoners. Caractacus flies for refuge to Cartiſmandua, queen of the Brigantes, by whom he is betrayed, and ſent captive to Rome. His addreſs to the emperor Claudius, and the conſequences ariſing therefrom. Oſtorius is defeated by the Britons, in conſequence of which he dies with anxiety of mind, and is ſucceeded, as governor of Britain, by Aulus Didius. Cartiſmandua, queen of the Brigantes, proves baſe and perfidious to her huſband Venutius, whom ſhe abandons, and marries the general of her army. Suetonius Paulinus takes the command in Britain, conquers the iſland of Angleſea, and exterminates the Druids. He is called from thence by a general revolt of the Britons, occaſioned by the ill treatment of Boadicea queen of the Iceni. The Britons, entering into a confederacy, form a very conſiderable army, and, headed by Boadicea, march againſt the Romans, with a full reſolution of revenging the inſults offered to the Britiſh princeſs. Boadicea makes an animated ſpeech to her ſoldiers on the occaſion. The Britons engage with Suetonius, but are defeated with great loſs; and Boadicea, giving up all hopes, puts a period to her own exiſtence. Suetonius, after this victory, commits great ravages in the country of the Britons: but, by means of Claſſicanus, the procurator, he is recalled, and Petronius Turpilianus appointed prætor in his ſtead.

A. D. 50. AS an interval of no leſs than two years elapſed between the return of Plautius to Rome, and the arrival of P. Oſtorius Scapula, his ſucceſſor, in Britain, the Britons had, during that period, taken the opportunity of attempting the recovery of their liberty; ſo that the new governor found the affairs of the iſland in great confuſion, and in a very different ſtate to what he had expected. As he did not land till the latter end of October the Britons imagined he would not attempt to attack them till the enſuing ſpring. But in this they were greatly miſtaken; for Oſtorius, ſenſible of the danger of any delay, determined to begin his operations immediately. He accordingly took the field, defeated ſeveral parties who ventured to oppoſe him, and purſued his advantage in ſo effectual a manner, that they were incapable of rallying or uniting. He diſarmed all the Britons whom he ſuſpected wherever he went, and, to reſtrain and confine them within proper bounds, erected a chain of forts on the banks of the rivers Avon and Severn. He likewiſe added conſiderable fortifications to the Roman colony at Camelodunum, or Malden; and London being ſettled much about the ſame time, the country between the Thames and the ſea was reduced into a province, and diſtinguiſhed by the name of Britannia Prima.

The precautions taken by Oſtorius to ſecure the obedience of the vanquiſhed Britons gave great offence to the Iceni, a powerful people inhabiting the counties of Suffolk, Norfolk and Cambridge. They had hitherto lived in amity with the Romans, but on the arrival of Oſtorius, they determined to oppoſe him, and to ſhake off that reſtraint which he meant univerſally to lay on the inhabitants of the iſland. They accordingly engaged in a confederacy with ſome of the neighbouring ſtates, and joing their forces took poſſeſſion of an advantageous poſt, which they encompaſſed with a rampart of earth, leaving only one avenue, which they paved with ſharp flint to prevent the approach of the Roman cavalry. But nothing could abate the ardour of Oſtorius. He led on his infantry to the camp, and attacked them with the utmoſt vigour. The Britons made a noble defence, and more than once repelled the aſſaults of the Romans. But their reſiſtance was in vain; the intrepidity of Oſtorius was not to be conquered: the Romans became maſters of the camp, and obtained a compleat victory.

Having thus ſubdued the Iceni, and their confederates, Oſtorius took proper meaſures for ſecuring the province from any future incurſions of thoſe nations. He added ſeveral ſtrong forts to thoſe he had already erected on the banks of the Severn, in order to ſecure the Roman conqueſts in that part of the iſland; he made Cogidunus, king of the Dobuni, who poſſeſſed the counties of Glouceſter and Oxford, a citizen of Rome, and even inveſted him with authority over ſome other Belgic colonies. This politic expedient ſucceeded to his wiſh, for it fomented diſſentions among the Britons, and attached a powerful prince to the intereſt of the Romans.

Oſtorius, encouraged by the ſucceſs he had already met with, advanced into the country of the Cangi, or Shropſhire, which he plundered, and penetrated almoſt as far as the ſea-coaſt of Denbighſhire. His deſign was to have reduced the whole country to ſubjection; but he was diverted from his purpoſe by a revolt of the Brigantes, a people of Yorkſhire, whither he immediately repaired, and having quelled the commotion in its infancy, cauſed the ringleaders to be executed, in order to prevent future inſurrections.

A. D. 51. But the moſt vigorous meaſures could not ſuppreſs the innate valour of the Britons. Liberty was ſtill their darling object; and they preferred death to the chains of ſlavery. The Brigantes, tho' they had experienced the power and ſeverity of the Roman general, were not to be eaſily ſubdued; they determined ſtill to oppoſe the Roman power with all their might, and, if poſſible, to ſhake off the ſhackles of ſlavery. They accord-accordingly formed a conſpiracy with the Silures, a powerful nation, inhabiting Herefordſhire and great part of South Wales. The famous Caractacus was at the head of theſe troops; and knowing himſelf to be inferior to the Romans in force, he endeavoured to ſupply that diſadvantage by a cautious conduct, and a proper diſpoſition of his poſts. He transferred the ſeat of war into the country of the Ordovices, or North Wales, as he knew the craggy rocks and high mountains in that part of the country would prove natural fortifications, and enable him to annoy the enemy with great advantage to himſelf. He formed his camp on the ſummit of a lofty mountain, the foot of which was waſhed by a deep and rapid river; and, to increaſe the natural ſtrength of the place, he fortified the bank of the river with ramparts of ſtones faced with ſharp-edged flints, and ſurrounded the whole by a body of his choiceſt troops.

The Roman general was far from being a ſtranger to the oſtenſible proceedings of the Britons under Caractacus, and, notwithſtanding the great power and abilities of their commander, was determined to reduce them to ſubjection. He led his legionary troops, compoſed of Roman veterans, againſt them; and, ſenſible of the danger of attacking forces fired with an enthuſiaſtic love of liberty, and led by a general, whom he knew to be prudent, intrepid and vigilant, he omitted no precaution that might ſecure his army from the irregular attacks of the enemy.

On the approach of the Romans, Caractacus drew up his army according to the different clans, and placed at the head of each their native chief. He then rode from rank to rank, exhorting them to exert their utmoſt courage and reſolution, and to act like men on ſo important an occaſion. He told them the hour was approaching that muſt either reſtore them freedom and independence, or reduce them to the moſt abject ſtate of ſlavery. At the ſame time he recounted to them the courage and intrepidity of their anceſtors, and by whoſe valour they had been ſo repeatedly delivered from the tyranny and oppreſſion of their enemies.

Theſe remonſtrances from the mouth of the Britiſh general had the deſired effect: the whole army anſwered by a general ſhout of applauſe, and declared their reſolution of either preſerving their liberties, or periſhing in the glorious attempt.

The Roman general, hearing the acclamations of the Britons, was alarmed for the event, and ſeemed averſe to begin the attack. The interpoſing river, the rampart faced with flints, the hanging crags, and the high embattled ranks of the enemy, preſented a gloomy ſcene: but the aſſailants were Romans; difficulty only encreaſed their courage, and glory rendered them impatient for action.

Oſtorius perceived the eagerneſs of his troops, but would not ſuffer them to engage, till he had carefully ſurveyed every paſs where an attack ſeemed practicable; having done which he led them to the charge. The river was eaſily paſſed, but the great difficulty lay in forcing the ramparts, which were defended by the Britons with the moſt unſhaken firmneſs. In attempting this many of the Romans fell; but at length, by dint of reſolution, they prevailed; the ramparts, which were compoſed of looſe ſtones, were thrown down, their legions poured in upon the Britons, and a general engagement enſued. The balance of victory was, for ſome time, equally poiſed, and fortune ſeemed undetermined on whom to beſtow the palm of conqueſt. At length the Roman veterans removed the dreadful uncertainty. Covered with armour, the ſwords of the Britons made little impreſſion, while death attended every blow ſtruck by a Roman arm. Finding the conteſt unequal, Caractacus retreated to his camp on the ſummit of the mountain, the aſcent to which was very long and ſteep. But the ardour of the Romans was ſuperior to every difficulty: they gained the ſummit, and attacked the camp of Caractacus. The conteſt was dreadful; the Britons fought for liberty, the Romans for glory. Urged on by deſpair, the Britons aſſaulted the ranks of the enemy with a fury bordering on madneſs, and the camp preſented a moſt horrid ſcene of blood and devaſtation. At length the legionary diſcipline prevailed, and the ſtandard of Britiſh liberty fell to the ground. The Britons were totally routed, and what added to their misfortunes was, that the daughters, and brothers of Caractacus, together with many other perſons of birth and fortune, fell into the hands of the conqueror.

Caractacus himſelf, indeed, eſcaped, but it was only to add a poignancy to his misfortunes by feeling the additional weight of treachery in diſtreſs. Diſtracted at the irreparable loſs he had ſuſtained, he unguardedly flew for ſafety to Cartiſmandua, queen of the Brigantes. This princeſs was not only well affected to the Romans, but bore an inveterate hatred to Caractacus, on account of his having taken part with her huſband Venutius, with whom ſhe had been long at variance. Happy, therefore, to have the object of her malice in her power, and to be able at once to oblige the Romans, and gratify her own revenge, ſhe baſely loaded Caractacus with chains, and in that ignominious manner delivered him into the hands of the conqueror.

The name of Caractacus had long been terrible to the Romans. He had, for nine years, bravely ſupported that formidable confederacy begun by Caſſivelaunus, and was deemed the moſt experienced of the Britiſh commanders. It is, therefore, not to be wondered at that his defeat ſhould be conſidered at Rome in the moſt important light, and that the news of his captivity ſhould be received with the moſt uncommon acclamations. It was the univerſal wiſh of the people in that city to ſee a general who had rendered himſelf ſo conſpicuous as to check the flight of the imperial eagles, and whoſe military talents were at once declared and admired. Accordingly Caractacus and his whole family were ſent to Rome, in order to be expoſed as public ſpectacles to the populace.

On the day appointed for gratifying the general curioſity, the emperor and empreſs were prepared to receive the unhappy captives in great ſtate, each being ſeated on a magnificent throne, adorned with the moſt ſuperb military trophies. The grandees ſurrounded the monarch, the imperial guards were drawn up in order, and the whole inhabitants of the city crouded to be ſpectators of ſo unuſual a ſight. The proceſſion began gan with the vaſſals and dependants of Caractacus, and an exhibition of the military ſpoils and trophies taken in the wars with the Britons. Next followed the brother of Caractacus, with his wife and daughters, whoſe tears ſufficiently ſhewed that their ſpirits were equally depreſſed with their fortunes. But the behaviour of Caractacus was very different: he marched on with a ſteady countenance and noble deportment; his ſoul ſoared above his then condition, and he looked down with contempt on the malice of his enemies. On his approach to the imperial tribunal, he fixed his eyes on the emperor, and cooly addreſſed him in the following words:

"If my moderation had been adequate to my "birth and fortune, I had entered this capital not "as a captive, but a friend. Nor wouldſt thou, "O Cæſar, have diſdained to rank, in the num-"ber of thy friends, a prince like me, deſcended "from illuſtrious progenitors, and veſted with "the ſupreme authority over many warlike na-"tions. Though my preſent condition reflects "diſhonour upon me, it adds luſtre to your glory. "I was maſter of men and arms, of horſes and "chariots of war, of riches and power. Can "you wonder that I fought to preſerve them, and "that I loſt them with regret? Though you are "ambitious of univerſal empire, yet it does not "follow that all men ought tamely to ſubmit to "your dominion. Had the hand of perfidy "ſooner betrayed me, I ſhould have been leſs diſ-"tinguiſhed by misfortunes, and you by glory. "Had I fallen in battle, both my name and for-"tune had been conſigned to oblivion. Puniſh "me with death, and I ſhall ſoon be forgotten; "permit me to live, and thy clemency ſhall be "immortalized."

This ſpirited ſpeech, added to the majeſtic air of the noble captive, greatly affected the whole audience; but none more than the emperor himſelf, who immediately ordered the chains to be taken off from Caractacus and all his family; and the empreſs, who was more than an equal aſſociate in the empire, received the captive Britons with the greateſt marks of kindneſs and compaſſion, and at the ſame time confirmed to them the enjoyment of their liberty.

The defeat of Caractacus procured Oſtorius a triumph; but it proved the termination of his ſucceſs. The Britons, fired with reſentment at the ignominious treatment of their leader, were rouſed to vengeance. They had acquired, by dear bought experience, ſome knowledge of the Roman diſcipline, and carried on the war with more prudence and better ſucceſs than formerly; while the Romans, fluſhed with victory, grew indolent and careleſs. They fell upon the legionary cohorts left to complete the chain of forts on the Severn, and would have cut them to pieces, had not a reinforcement fortunately arrived from the neighbouring forts and villages; though this did not happen before the prefect, with eight centurions, and a great many ſoldiers, were ſlain. Nor did the revenge of the Britons ſtop here; they attacked a foraging party, and routed them, together with ſome ſquadrons ſent to their ſupport.

The Britons, highly animated with theſe ſucceſſes, continued to purſue their advantages, when Oſtorius ſent out his cohorts to ſtop their progreſs; but they ſtill continuing to bear down all before them, he was at length obliged to bring up the whole force of his legions. Nor did even this ſuperiority daunt the Britiſh courage: they maintained the battle till night put an end to the conteſt, and then retired with very little loſs.

The Romans were no longer conſidered as invincible. The ſtandard of liberty was again diſplayed, and the Britons flattered themſelves with being able to retaliate the injuries they had received from the invaders of their country.

Theſe actions were followed by innumerable ſkirmiſhes fought with various ſucceſs, in all of which the Silures particularly diſtinguiſhed themſelves as enemies to the Romans. A raſh word had, it ſeems, dropped from the mouth of Oſtorius, which had raiſed in their minds the moſt implacable reſentment. He ſaid that the Britons would never be quiet till the Silures were either exterminated, or tranſported to another country. In conſequence of this the Silures attacked the ſtraggling parties of the Romans wherever they met them; in wood-lands or fens, as chance or choice, temerity or precaution, reſentment or avarice directed; ſometimes with and ſometimes without the orders of their reſpective leaders. The Romans, indeed, had been guilty of ſome exceſſes, equally repugnant to the ſentiments of humanity and the laws of a well regulated policy. This conduct gave the Britons advantages which they could not otherwiſe have obtained. Two cohorts of auxiliaries, ſent out by rapacious officers, not taking the neceſſary precautions that men in their circumſtances, not blinded by avarice, would have obſerved, were ſuddenly attacked by the Britons, and cut to pieces while they were ravaging the country. The ſpoils taken from theſe two cohorts were, by the victorious Britons, diſtributed among the inhabitants of the neighbouring ſtates; and this generous conduct produced the deſired effect, by paving the way for a general revolt.

A. D. 55. Oſtorius, fearing that the ſplendor of his triumph would be ſullied by theſe ſubſequent misfortunes, fell a martyr to the anxiety of his mind, and died through grief for not being able glorioufly to terminate a war ſo proſperouſly begun. This event gave new ſpirits to the Britons, and they determined to hazard a general battle with their enemies. Manlius Valens, a Roman tribune, took the command of the imperial troops till the arrival of Aulus Didius, who was appointed by the emperor to ſucceed Oſtorius. The two armies coming to an engagement the Romans were defeated, and the Britons ſo fluſhed with ſucceſs, that they penetrated into the Roman provinces, included under the name of Britannia Prima, while the legionary troops were greatly diſpirited, and their auxiliaries thrown into the utmoſt conſternation.

On the arrival of Didius in Britain he found the ſtate of affairs in a much worſe condition than he expected, and perceived abundant cauſe to reprehend the conduct of Manlius. The Britons had gained conſiderable advantages, and were in the high road for recovering their liberty, and extirpating the invaders of their country; but this glorious opportunity was loſt through their own inteſtine broils, and diſcord gave what their enemies could not have taken from them.

Cartiſmandua

Cartiſmandua, the perfidious queen of the Brigantes, and who had betrayed the brave Caractacus into the hands of the Romans, now proved baſe to her huſband Venutius, whom ſhe abandoned, and took Vellocatus, the general of her forces, as the partner of her bed and throne. As ſhe governed a ſtate independent of Venutius, ſhe was not inſenſible that this ſtep muſt involve her in a war with her huſband; but, prompted by luſt, and depending on the aſſiſtance of the Romans, ſhe ſacrificed her intereſt, and the peace of her country, to a depraved inclination, and her character to the gratification of a lawleſs paſſion. She was not, indeed, miſtaken in her expectations of being ſupported by the Romans; but her opinion of their power was fallacious. Thinking her allies invincible, ſhe ſet no bounds to her paſſion: ſhe openly married her minion, and even carried her reſentment ſo far againſt Venutius, as to cauſe his brother and kinſman to be put to death.

Exaſperated at theſe ſhocking injuries, Venutius repaired to the Silures, to whom he repreſented, in the moſt forcible manner, the deteſtable conduct of Cartiſmandua, and expatiated on the irreparable injury ſhe had done her countrymen, by baſely betraying their intrepid leader. Venutius did not plead in vain. Rouſed by the ignominious treatment of their beloved general, they expreſſed their reſentment with a fury nearly allied to madneſs, and bound themſelves, by the moſt ſolemn acts of their religion, either to take ample vengeance on the infamous betrayer of their country, or periſh in the attempt.

As ſoon as Cartiſmandua was informed of the proceedings of Venutius, ſhe immediately flew to the Romans for ſuccour, by whom ſhe was received with great kindneſs and reſpect, and her requeſt readily granted. But the Roman power was now greatly weakened: diſcipline had given place to licentiouſneſs, and effeminacy had enervated the ſtrength of the conquerors of the world. The Britons, headed by Venutius, advanced with confidence and intrepidity, and the Romans marched out to meet them. A dreadful battle enſued, and the palm of victory was for ſome time doubtful; but at length the Britons gained the advantage, and it was with the utmoſt difficulty that the Romans could ſave Cartiſmandua from falling into the hands of her enraged huſband, while Venutius made himſelf maſter of the greater part of their territories.

This ſucceſs ſo raiſed the ſpirits of the Britons, that they made frequent attacks upon the Romans, and in general obtained conſiderable advantage. The proprætor Didius, who was very old and infirm when he firſt arrived in Britain, could not lead his army in perſon againſt them: he entruſted the command to generals much inferior to him in merit, and the conſequences reflected a ſtain upon the honour of the Romans. Didius ſaw with grief this ſudden reverſe of fortune, and fell a victim to the complicated attacks of diſeaſe and vexation.

A. D. 58. About this time the emperor Claudius paid the debt of nature, and was ſucceeded in the imperial dignity by Nero, his adopted ſon. This prince had no ambition for military honours, and would probably have declined all farther attempts to ſubjugate Britain, could he have done it with ſafety to himſelf. But the Romans conſidered Britain as one of the faireſt jewels in the imperial diadem, and Nero thought it prudent to tread in the ſteps of Claudius, whoſe memory he highly revered.

The proprætor Didius was ſucceeded in the government of Britain by Veranius, who boaſted much, but did nothing, as death overtook him before he could carry any of his projects into execution.

Veranius was ſucceeded by the celebrated Suetonius Paulinus, one of the greateſt generals of his time, and from whoſe military talents the Romans entertained the moſt flattering expectations. Indeed, a leader of courage and abilities had never been more wanting, as the Britons, elated by their ſucceſs, and exaſperated at the injuries they had received, threatened the Romans with deſtruction.

Soon after Suetonius arrived in Britain, he formed the reſolution of reducing the iſland of Angleſea (called by the Romans Mona) the chief ſeat of the Britiſh Druids, and the common retreat for fugitives who were enemies to Rome. Hence it became not only populous, but formidable, on which account Suetonius though it a place abſolutely neceſſary to ſubdue.

At this time Suetonius was encamped with the principal part of his army in North Wales; and as the Iſle of Angleſea was ſeperated from the land only by a narrow channel, he cauſed flat-bottomed boats to be conſtructed for carrying over his legions, but ordered his horſe to ford the ſtream. Suetonius perceived the inhabitants were drawn up at ſome diſtance from the ſhore, and therefore landed his troops with very little oppoſition. But the Britons ſoon advanced with the utmoſt fury to meet the Romans, who were ſtruck with a ſuperſtitious terror at a ſcene which now preſented itſelf to their view. In the rear of the Britiſh army were a prodigious multitude of women running about with their hair diſhevelled, and torches in their hands, making the moſt diſmal lamentations: while the Druids lifted up their hands to heaven, and made the air reſound with the moſt dreadful imprecations. This unuſual ſight, and the hideous yellings with which it was accompanied, ſtruck the Roman troops with ſurprize and horror; and during their conſternation, a flight of arrows from the enemy did great execution. At length, animated by their general, and abaſhed at being thrown into confuſion by women and prieſts, the Romans impetuouſly attacked the Britons ſword in hand, killed great numbers, put the reſt to flight, and made themſelves maſters of the iſland. After the defeat, Suetonius found a great number of fires in the conſecrated groves, and being informed that they were intended for the ſacrifice of the Roman priſoners who ſhould be taken in the battle (for the Druids had aſſured the people of victory) he was ſo exaſperated at the deſigned cruelty of thoſe prieſts, that he ordered all the Druids that could be ſeized to be thrown into the fires they had prepared, that they might ſuffer the death they had intended for others. He then overturned their altars, demoliſhed their magical woods, deſtroyed their myſterious groves, and put an effectual ſtop to Druidiſm. The ſmall remnant of the Druids finding themſelves deprived of their ceremonies and habitations, and moreover expoſed to continual dangers from the averſion of the Romans, retired to Ireland and the Hebrides, which are ſuppoſed to have been the original ſeats of their worſhip, and Suetonius began to build forts for the preſervation of the iſland he had conquered.

A. D. 61. But while Suetonius was thus employed in the remoter parts of the kingdom, he was called to the interior provinces by an event of the utmoſt importance, and which threatened the total deſtruction of the Roman power in Britain. The vices of Nero were riſen to the moſt ſhameful height, inſomuch that the ſtate of Britain was entirely changed. A new mode of government was introduced, and an imperial exchequer eſtabliſhed in the iſland. Catus Decianus, a man of the moſt deteſtable character, was ſent to reſide in Britain as procurator, or ſuperintendant of the finances. Claudius had wiſely remitted the confiſcation of the eſtates belonging to the Britons, who had rebelled againſt him; but Catus eſtabliſhed a court of reſumption, by which he pretended to adjudge thoſe eſtates to the imperial treaſury. The oppreſſed Britons in vain preſented remonſtrances againſt ſuch unlawful practices; the procurator, at once a monſter of avarice and injuſtice, inſtead of granting them redreſs, treated them with inſolence; their misfortunes were increaſed, and their miſeries made a ſubject of ridicule. Theſe acts of wanton tyranny raiſed a general ſpirit of reſentment among the Britons, and the whole nation was ripe for a revolt, when an incident happened which kindled the latent ſparks of vengeance into a dangerous flame of open rebellion.

The Iceni, whoſe country bordered on the colony of Camelodunum, had, ever ſince their laſt defeat, lived under the protection of the Romans, but were governed by a prince of their own, whoſe name was Praſatagus. The friendſhip in which he lived with the Romans gave him great opportunities of enriching his family, though he never uſed any means to increaſe his wealth by illegal meaſures. He had no ſon, and only two daughters, whom, at his death, he left under the care of their mother Boadicea, a woman who poſſeſſed a ſpirit ſuperior either to birth or fortune. In order to ſecure a protection for his children, Praſatagus conſtituted Nero, the Roman emperor, coheir with his two daughters in all his wealth and poſſeſſions, imagining that gratitude would induce the Romans to become the friendly guardians of his family. But in this he was greatly deceived, for the generous legacy, inſtead of exciting gratitude, proved an incentive to rapacity. Catus Decianus, the inhuman procurator, ſeized upon the whole, and the dominions of Praſatagus became a prey to the licentiouſneſs of the Roman centurions.

Boadicea, the wife of Praſatagus, rouſed by the injuſtice done to herſelf and family, remonſtrated warmly againſt theſe iniquitous proceedings, and loudly exclaimed againſt the injury done to her daughters by depriving them of their inheritance; but inſtead of meeting with any redreſs, ſhe was treated in a manner that reflected diſgrace upon humanity. Catus Decianus, the inhuman procurator, regardleſs of the dignity of her ſtation, the rules of decency, and the reſpect due to the female ſex, ordered her to be publickly ſcourged, and ſuffered the common ſoldiers to violate the chaſtity of her daughters.

Theſe ſhocking barbarities, together with the many cruel and flagrant acts of injuſtice practiſed by Catus Decianus, the procurator, ſtirred up a general ſpirit of reſentment in the breaſts of the Britons, and an inſurrection immediately took place throughout the iſland. The Iceni, as being the moſt deeply intereſted, were the firſt who declared themſelves openly; and their example was immediately followed by their neighbours the Trinobantes. The next who joined the malecontents was Venutius, huſband to the baſe and perfidious Cartiſmandua. The partiſans of that vile woman, forgetting their particular quarrels, and former amity with the Romans, united with their countrymen on this occaſion, and even all the ſubjected ſtates engaged in the confederacy; ſo that the Britiſh army conſiſted of a much greater number of fighting men than had ever been brought into the field on any former emergency.

This powerful army was headed by Boadicea, who painted the injuries received by herſelf and her daughters in the moſt lively colours; the conſequence of which was, that the Britons, fired with a deſire of pouring deſtruction on the heads of their cruel oppreſſors, bound themſelves, in the moſt ſolemn manner, to revenge the injuries of their country, or periſh in the attempt.

The Britons began their operations by an attack upon the Roman colony at Camelodunum, which was taken by ſtorm, the garriſon put to the ſword, and the whole place plundered and burnt. They likewiſe deſtroyed the temple of Claudius, and, continuing their ravages, ſpread devaſtation over the whole country ſubject to the Romans. Petilius Cerealis, who commanded the ninth legion, marched to the aſſiſtance of his countrymen, and was met by the Britons. A dreadful conflict enſued, in which all the foot of the legion were cut to pieces, and Cerealis would have been taken priſoner, had he not fled on horſeback to the Roman camp.

During theſe tranſactions Catus Decianus, the infamous procurator, conſcious that his own rapacity and injuſtice had given occaſion to the inſurrection, and his negligence ſuffered it to grow formidable, fled to Gaul, and by that means eluded at once the vengeance of the Britons, and the hatred of his own people.

As ſoon as Suetonius was informed of the general inſurrection of the Britons, and the ravages they had committed, he immediately left Angleſea, and marched his army with the utmoſt expedition to London, which was then famous both for its wealth and commerce. But finding this place not ſtrong enough to reſiſt the attack of the enemy with the ſmall body of forces he had brought thither, he retired to a conſiderable diſtance on the Surry ſide of the Thames, taking with him ſuch of the inhabitants as preferred the preſervation of their lives to that of their wealth.

Boadicea, being informed that the Roman general had reached London, marched thither with her army, but finding it abandoned by the enemy, ſhe wreaked her vengeance on the inhabitants, putting every Roman to the ſword, and then reduced the place to aſhes. She had before deſtroyed ſtroyed the city of Verulam, and put all the inhabitants to death; and the whole number who fell ſacrifices to her reſentment are ſaid to have been not leſs than ſeventy thouſand.

The Roman general, having collected, by the aſſiſtance of the Belgic Britons, who ſtill retained their allegiance to the Romans, a freſh recruit of ten thouſand men, advanced with indefatigable expedition, in order to retaliate on the Britons their late ravages and maſſacres. Senſible of the enterprizing ſpirit of Boadicea, at the head of a formidable army, he prudently poſted his forces in ſuch order as might beſt enable them to ſuſtain the impetuoſity of the firſt attack, without breaking their ranks. With this view he placed his legionary troops in the center, the light army on each ſide, and the cavalry on the wings, having in his rear a large wood, and an extenſive plain in his front, ſo that he was freed from all apprehenſion of ambuſcade, as well as ſecure of a retreat, if overpowered by the enemy.

In this ſituation did Suetonius wait the approach of the Britons; nor was it long before they appeared to his view. Elated by their late ſucceſs, and hoping to exterminate at once the whole power of the Romans, they haſtened to the attack; and thinking themſelves ſure of victory, took their wives and children with them, that they might be ſpectators of the ſlaughter, and aſſiſt in the plunder.

At the head of the Britiſh army appeared Boadicea, drawn in a chariot with her two daughters. She paſſed between the ranks of her army, and in order to encourage the timorous, and animate the brave, addreſſed them in a ſpeech to the following effect:

"I am not come hither, ſaid ſhe, from any "pre-eminence of royal birth, but from a ſenſe "of endangered liberty, which ought to be "cheriſhed in the breaſt of every individual, from "the higheſt to the loweſt. Indeed, the ſtripes "I have received, and the violated honors of "my daughters, were there no other motive, "would be abundantly ſufficient, as a private "perſon, to animate me to revenge; but there "is a greater call than my own injuries; the call "of my country. The Roman luſt is unbounded; it knows no diſtinction; the old as well as "the young are raviſhed: but Divine vengeance "never ſleeps on ſuch occaſions; it always treads "upon the heels of crimes like theſe. The only "legion that have dared to meet your arms in the "open field have been cut to pieces; while the "others meanly concealed themſelves from danger within the camp, or ſaved themſelves from "the avenging ſword of juſtice by a precipitate "flight. The very ſhouts of the Britons, without their weapons, are ſufficient to ſtrike the "Roman army with terror. Conſider the cauſes "of the war, and you will not heſitate a ſingle "moment in reſolving to conquer or periſh. "Though a woman, this is my fixed purpoſe: "you that are men may, by refuſing the alternative, live and be ſlaves."

This ſpeech was received with univerſal applauſe by the Britiſh army, who teſtified their ſatisfaction by the loudeſt ſhouts and acclamations. Nor was the Roman general behind hand in endeavouring to animate his troops to face ſo formidable and reſolute an enemy. As the moſt powerful motive to excite their valour, he told them that though the enemy were ſuperior in number they were headed by a weak, daring and ambitious woman, and ſet before them the glory that would reſult from quelling ſuch lawleſs inſurrections, as were attended with every circumſtance of the moſt horrid cruelty. By theſe repreſentations he raiſed ſuch a ſpirit of emulation in his little army, that, with an univerſal plaudit, they declared themſelves ready for an immediate attack.

The engagement was begun by the Britons with a furious diſcharge of darts, which were no ſooner ſpent than the Romans ſallied forth, and charged them in the open plain with the utmoſt impetuoſity. The Britons fought with great obſtinacy and perſeverance, though without order or diſtinction; but at length they were obliged to yield to the diſcipline and valour of their enemies, who routed them with great ſlaughter. Their loſs amounted to 80,000 killed in the battle and in the purſuit, beſides an infinite number of captives doomed to perpetual ſlavery. The Romans had not above 400 killed, and as many wounded; but it is to be conſidered, that the carnage of the Britons was more general by their having ſurrounded the field by a chain of carriages, which, after the defeat, impeded their flight, and ſo fatally retarded their retreat, that many were ſacrificed to the reſentment of the Romans, who might have otherwiſe made their eſcape.

Notwithſtanding the ill ſucceſs of this attempt, the Britons were ſo far from being diſheartened that they prepared themſelves for another attack; but they were diverted from this reſolution by the ſudden death of Boadicea, who, finding her hopes fruſtrated, and diſappointed of her revenge, put a period to her own exiſtence by poiſon. This calamity diſconcerted all their meaſures, and after having performed her funeral obſequies, the main body of the Britons immediately diſperſed, and retired with all haſte to their reſpective diſtricts.

The Roman general took every advantage of his ſucceſs, and uſed the moſt cruel means to prevent the Britons from re-aſſembling their forces. He deſtroyed the countries of thoſe who had appeared as enemies with fire and ſword, and drove away the cattle from the Britons wherever he went. Unfortunately for themſelves, they had no corn; for Boadicea had perſuaded them, that it was unneceſſary to ſave any, as the Roman granaries would ſoon be in their poſſeſſion. Thus improvidently confident of ſucceſs, they had neglected the duties of agriculture, and by their own remiſſneſs, the horrors of famine ſucceeded thoſe of war.

But notwithſtanding theſe complicated circumſtances of diſtreſs, great numbers of the Britons determined not to lay down their arms; but kept wandering about the country in ſmall parties, reſolved rather to periſh by famine than make the leaſt offer of ſubmiſſion to the Romans. Julius Claſſicanus, who ſucceeded Catus in the proprætorſhip, amazed at ſuch an hardy reſolution in a people ſo diſtreſſed, was led to impute it to the ſeverity of Suetonius Paulinus; and therefore wrote to Rome, informing the emperor that unleſs that officer was recalled, the war could not be brought to a termination.

On the receipt of this information, the emperor immediately diſpatched his freedman Polycletus to Britain, in order to take cognizance of the affair, and enquire into the truth of what Classicanus had asserted. The report of Polycletus was greatly in favour of Suetonius, notwithstanding which, as that general had rendered himself particularly obnoxious to the Britons, on account of his destroying the Druids, it was deemed politically prudent to recall him, and Petronius Turpilianus was appointed to succeed him as prætor of Britain.

CHAP. V.

Petronius Turpilianus treats the Britons with great moderation, and after governing them for three years, returns with honour to Rome. He is succeeded by Trebellius Maximus, under whom the legions mutiny, and oblige him to desert the island. The emperor Nero dies, and during the short reigns of Galba and Otho, his successors, the Britons continue undisturbed. Vitellius, being established on the imperial throne, appoints Vectius Bolanus prætor of Britain. He continues in the government during the reign of Vitellius, but on the accession of Vespasian he is recalled, and Petilius Cerealis appointed prætor in his stead. The Britons, under Venutius, make several attacks upon the Roman territories, but are defeated by Cerealis, who reduces the whole country of the Brigantes. Cerealis is succeeded by Julius Frontinus, who subdues the Silures. He is recalled, and Julius Agricola appointed prætor in his stead. He reduces the Ordovices, and completes the conquest of Anglesea, which had been begun by Suetonius. By his wise administration he procures the good will and affection of the Britons, who follow the manners and maxims of the Romans. He advances into Scotland, and fortifies the isthmus between the Forth and Clyde. Marches against the Caledonians, and defeats them. Has a second engagement with them, and obtains a complete victory. Reduces the Horesti and the inhabitants of the Orkney Islands, after which he sails round the whole coast of Britain. He is recalled, and put to death by the emperor Domitian.

A. D. 62. PETRONIUS Turpilianus, the successor of Suetonius, arrived in Britain at the beginning of the year sixty-two, and by the mildness of his administration accomplished what the military severities of his predecessor could not effect. Instead of harrassing the Britons, and keeping alive their resentment by new injuries, he suffered them to enjoy unmolested repose. By this prudent conduct their rage abated, their losses were forgotten, and many of the revolted states returned to their obedience. Peace once more extended her olive branch over the desolated country, and plentiful harvests crowned the fields that had been laid waste by the sword of war.

After Turpilianus had resided three years in Britain he returned to Rome, where he was received with the most universal applause. Triumphant honors were decreed him by the senate; and the Romans were convinced, from experience, that moderation and lenity were more effectual in subduing the Britons, than persecution and tyranny.

A. D. 65. Turpilianus was succeeded in the government of Britain by Trebellius Maximus, who, pursuing the same plan of conduct with his predecessor, the Britons were gradually reconciled to the laws and customs of the Romans. But the tranquil state of Britain not furnishing the Roman legions with those advantages they had expected, they became mutinous, and being encouraged by Roscius Celius, a professed enemy to Tribellius, the prætor was obliged to quit the island, and fly for protection to Vitellius, who then commanded the Roman army in Germany.

A. D. 68. About this time the world was delivered of that monster of nature, Nero, who, tired of life, put an end to his own existence. During the short reigns of the two succeeding emperors, Galba and Otho, the Britons continued in a perfect state of tranquillity. There was not any governor during this period, the Roman troops in Britain being commanded by their several tribunes, among whom Roscius Celius assumed the chief authority.

A. D. 69. On the accession of Vitellius to the imperial throne, Vectius Bolanus was sent to take the command of the Roman troops in Britain. This governor, being naturally of a quiet and easy disposition, suffered the Britons to live in peace and tranquillity, and at the same time retained the good will of his soldiers. He continued to govern during the reign of Vitellius, but on the accession of Vespasian to the imperial dignity, he was recalled, and Petilius Cerealis appointed in his stead.

Between the departure of Vectius Bolanus and the arrival of Petilius Cerealis, the injured Venutius, who was still at the head of the Brigantes, thinking this a favourable opportunity of revenging himself on the Romans for having espoused the party of his wife Cartismandua, persuaded them to revolt, and being joined by other nations, he made several attacks upon the Roman territories. In these attempts he might have proved successful, had it not been for the unexpected arrival of the new governor. Cerealis was at once an experienced and enterprizing general, and had particularly distinguished himself for his military abilities on the continent. No sooner, therefore, did he hear of the proceedings of Venutius, than he immediately marched against him, and, attacking the Britons, defeated them in several battles; nor would he rest till he had reduced the whole country of the Brigantes, which being the most potent of the British nation, rendered his name a terror to the rest.

A. D. 74. After Cerealis had continued governor of Britain about the space of four years he was recalled, and Julius Frontinus appointed

prætor

proprætor in his ſtead. This commander was perfectly ſkilled in the art of war, notwithſtanding which it might have been expected that he would have made a diſadvantageous figure, in coming after ſuch an illuſtrious general as Cerealis; but he ſupported the dignity of the empire with equal capacity, and acquired an equal portion of honour, in ſubduing the Silures, who inhabited the foreſt of Deane, and the counties of Hereford and Monmouth.

A. D. 78. Towards the latter end of Veſpaſian's reign Frontinus was recalled, and his place ſupplied by the celebrated Julius Agricola, who had ſerved in Britain under Suetonius and Cerealis; and particularly diſtinguiſhed himſelf, on various occaſions, for his great valour and military abilities.

Soon after the departure of Frontinus from Britain, the Ordovices, or inhabitants of North Wales, revolted, and ſurprizing a body of Roman cavalry quartered upon their frontiers, cut them to pieces. In conſequence of this Agricola, who had juſt arrived, immediately aſſembled his army, and marched with the utmoſt expedition to ſuppreſs an inſurrection that portended the moſt dangerous conſequences. As ſoon as the Ordovices were informed of his approach, they fled to their rocks and mountains for ſafety; but theſe were of no effectual uſe againſt a commander of ſuch conſummate abilities: he routed them from plains, drove them from precipices, and purſued them through places before deemed inacceſſible. Finding, therefore, that neither the obſtructions raiſed by art, or perſonal courage, could avail againſt the ſuperior ſkill of the Roman commander, the Ordovices ſubmitted themſelves to his clemency, and peace was once more reſtored in that part of the iſland.

A. D. 79. Having ſubjugated the country of the Ordovices, Agricola, early in the following ſpring, determined to compleat the conqueſt of Angleſea, which had been begun by Suetonius, but who was ſuddenly recalled before he could compleat his deſign. After carefully ſurveying the ſtreight which ſeparates Angleſea from the coaſt of Wales, he diſcovered a ford, and commanding his cavalry to ſwim acroſs, they immediately obeyed his orders, and landed on the other ſide without the leaſt oppoſition. Intimidated at the ſight of the Romans, the inhabitants flew for ſafety to their woods and mountains; but reflecting that it would be in vain to oppoſe ſo powerful a commander, they came out of their hiding places, and ſued for peace, which was readily granted, and Agricola immediately took poſſeſſion of the iſland.

After this ſucceſsful expedition, Agricola returned to the northern provinces of the iſland, where he employed the winter in endeavouring to conciliate the affections of the Britons. Prudent by the errors of his predeceſſors, he made it his chief ſtudy to avoid the rocks on which they had ſeverally ſplit. He was moderate without relaxing in the diſtribution of juſtice, liberal without profuſion, and though affable to all, his dignity was never loſt to any. He was particularly careful to reform the diſcipline of his army, and to reſtrain the licentiouſneſs of his troops, that no freſh cauſe of diſpute might ariſe from their inſolence and oppreſſion. He was ſevere, but not cruel. He puniſhed crimes with rigour, but often pardoned faults. The common ſoldiers became modeſt and agreeable, the officers generous and humane. He was an inveterate enemy to every ſpecies of corruption. No rigour was practiſed in collecting the tribute, no iniquitous impoſitions were ſuffered. He coveted not reſpect when it owed its origin to fear; but cheriſhed obedience when it flowed from the heart. The Britons were happy under his government; and rather revered him as a parent, than feared him as a tyrant. They cheriſhed a real attachment for his perſon, and imitated his conduct. From his wiſdom and lenity he was equally reſpected both by Britons and Romans, and became the favourite object of all parties: ſo that on the demiſe of the emperor Veſpaſian, which happened about this period, his ſon Titus, who ſucceeded him, confirmed Agricola in the government of Britain.

A. D. 80. Early in the enſuing ſpring Agricola proceeded to ſubjugate the remaining unſubdued provinces, by the political mode of extending the ſword with one hand, and the olive branch with the other, at once menacing the refractory Britons with all the horrors of war, and courting them to partake of the bleſſings of peace. This prudent meaſure had the deſired effect; the alluring arguments he uſed to invite them to ſubmiſſion proved efficacious, and he ſoon prevailed on ſeveral capital cities to receive Roman garriſons; ſo that partly by perſuaſion, and partly by his military abilities, he ſucceeded wherever he went, and at length finiſhed the conqueſt of what is now called England.

The following winter Agricola employed himſelf in making farther improvements on the civil regulations of the Britons, and took every meaſure he could project not only to reconcile them to the laws and power of the Roman empire, but likewiſe to the Roman cuſtoms, manners and arts. To effect this, he erected courts of judicature and other public buildings, and by encouraging induſtry, and diſcountenancing ſloth, excited a generous rivalry in the exertion of every faculty that diſtinguiſhes rational and intelligent beings. He erected public academies for the inſtruction and education of the ſons of perſons of power and property in the liberal arts, by which means many of the Britiſh youth diſplayed an extraordinary genius for the ſciences, and thoſe who before deſpiſed the Roman tongue, and the ornamental branch of oratory, now ſtrove to excel in reading the beſt authors with propriety and elegance. In ſhort, by preferring the riſing genius of the Britons to the confirmed abilities of the Romans, he prompted the former to ſuch vigorous efforts in equalling the latter, that at length the Roman language, habit, cuſtoms and manners univerſally prevailed; ſo that it may be juſtly ſaid to the honour of this great commander, that he introduced into the iſland an entire reformation in policy and literature, which are the greateſt ornaments of every nation throughout the univerſe.

A. D. 81. The following ſpring, which was the third year of his adminiſtration, Agricola having ſettled every thing to his ſatisfaction in South Britain, reſolved to enter upon new diſcoveries, and to explore the nothern parts of the iſland. In conſequence of this determination he penetrated as far as the frith of the river Tay in Scotland, conquering all the countries as he went, and building forts to ſecure his conqueſts. Theſe forts were ſo advantageouſly ſituated, and ſo faithfully maintained, that not even one of them was ever taken, abandoned or betrayed. They were well ſupplied with proviſions, and garriſoned with brave and intrepid ſoldiers, who, by occaſional ſallies, kept the enemy in continual alarms.

A. D. 82. The fourth year of Agricola's government was principally ſpent in improving the conqueſts he had obtained the preceding ſummer. He led his army a conſiderable diſtance to the northward of the forts he had erected, and ſubdued ſeveral of the ſmaller tribes. Having done this he erected a chain of forts acroſs the iſthmus between the Clyde and the Forth, in order to prevent the incurſions of the Caledonians, a people then unſubdued, and governed by a prince of great courage and experience. By theſe forts all communication between the Britons and Caledonians was cut off, by which Agricola was enabled to purſue, with more attention, his favourite ſcheme of making the Britons fond of the arts and manners of the Romans.

A. D. 83. Agricola, being deſirous of extending his conqueſts, and exploring regions yet undiſcovered, ſet out for that purpoſe early in the enſuing ſpring. He penetrated beyond the Frith, and embarking his army on board a fleet equipped for the purpoſe, ſailed along the weſtern coaſts of Scotland, took a view of divers iſlands diſperſed in the Atlantic and Caledonian ſeas, landed in ſeveral places, and, in different engagements, defeated the clans who took up arms in defence of their country. In this expedition he took a ſurvey of Ireland, projected a plan for invading it, and afterwards tranſmitted to Rome a computation of the number of forces that might effect its conqueſt; nay, he even proceeded ſo far as to quarter his troops in that part of Britain which is oppoſite to the Iriſh coaſt. But he was prevented from carrying his deſign into execution by the envy and jealouſy of Domitian, who had then, on the death of Titus, ſucceeded to the imperial dignity.

The proceedings of Agricola greatly alarmed the Caledonians, who immediately raiſed a very powerful army in order to oppoſe the invader of their country. The Roman general, being informed of their intentions, ordered his fleet to ſail along the coaſt, while he himſelf marched forward at the head of his army, in order to engage them.

The Caledonians were headed by Galgacus, a prince admired for his military abilities, and, having ſerved under the Romans, was no ſtranger to their method of making war. His troops were greatly ſuperior in number to thoſe of Agricola, in conſequence of which, when the latter arrived, he divided his army into three ſeparate bodies, that he might not be ſurrounded by their numbers, or circumvented by their ſuperior knowledge of the country.

Galgacus, finding his deſign of ſurrounding the Roman army fruſtrated, immediately formed his forces into one body, and ſurprizing in the night the ninth legion, which lay at a diſtance from the army, attacked them with the utmoſt impetuoſity. Intelligence of this being made known to Agricola, he immediately diſpatched a reinforcement of light armed troops to their aſſiſtance, the appearance of whom intimidated the enemy, and animated with freſh vigour the deſpairing legion, who were on the very point of being cut to pieces. The Caledonians would have willingly retired, but as they were ſoon ſurrounded by the Romans, they found themſelves obliged to maintain the battle, which was fought for ſome time with equal obſtinacy on both ſides. At length the palm of victory was wreſted from the Caledonians, great numbers were killed, and the reſt fled for ſhelter to the adjacent woods and mountains, whither the Romans did not think it prudent to purſue them.

Though the Caledonians were defeated, they were far from being diſpirited: they imputed their overthrow rather to unforeſeen accidents than to the valour of the Romans, and reſolved once more to try the event of another battle. For this purpoſe they ſent all their wives and children into their fortified towns, and aſſembled an army ſuperior to that which they had firſt brought into the field. But before they were ready to march againſt the enemy, the ſeaſon was too far advanced, and Galgacus put them into winter quarters to be ready againſt the enſuing campaign.

A. D. 84. Agricola was not to be intimidated by any meaſures that could be purſued by Galgacus. Early in the ſpring he renewed his military operations, by ſending his fleet before him, with orders to land occaſionally in different places, and ſpread the alarm along the coaſt of Scotland; while he himſelf marched at the head of his army to the Grampian hills, on which he found the Caledonians poſted, to the number of 30,000, commanded by their prince Galgacus.

As ſoon as the Caledonian leader was apprized of the approach of the Roman army, he prepared himſelf for battle; and in order to impreſs the minds of his troops with ſpirit and intrepidity, he addreſſed them as follows: "When I conſider the cauſe of this war, and the preſent criſis, I have reaſon to preſume that the future happineſs and freedom of the whole iſland will date their births from this day; for we are the moſt valiant of the Britons, ſeated in the remoteſt regions beyond the ken of thoſe nations who are enſlaved by the enemy, ſo that your eyes are yet unpolluted, and free from the contagion of foreign tyranny; and this ſecret receſs, unknown to fame, has hitherto preſerved us in all the bleſſings of liberty—Beyond us is no nation, nothing but waves and rocks, and on that ſide, nothing but the bondage and ſlavery which is to be expected from the Romans, a people inſatiable in their luſts, and unbounded in their ambition. Thoſe robbers of the world, and ravagers of the univerſe, now the exhauſted continent can no more furniſh their rapines, endeavour to riſle the wide ſeas and ocean. When they meet with opulent enemies, their cruelty proceeds from avarice; when with the poor it riſes from ambition. The eaſt and weſt, extenſive as they are, cannot ſatiate their voracious minds. They, and they alone, with equal greedineſs, graſp at the riches and poverty of all nations: devaſtations, murders and extirpations paſs with them under the falſe names of empire and government; and they boaſt of eſtabliſhing peace in thoſe provinces they have rendered deſolate. Our goods are their tribute; our corn their proviſion, and our bodies their tools for all kinds of drudgery. Other ſlaves, whom nature and fortune have deſtined to ſervitude, are nouriſhed by their maſters; but the Britons alone purchaſe their own bondage, and maintain and ſupport their oppreſſors. Was the courage of our enemies in war equal to their debaucheries in peace, we might juſtly dread their arms, but their glory is all owing to our diſſentions. Our union will diſperſe their forces that are gathered out of many nations, ſo that one miſcarriage of theirs will diſſolve their whole power. In fine, there you ſee tribute and ſlavery; here, death or liberty. Therefore let us conſider the glory of our anceſtors, and the fate of our poſterity.

This ſpeech had the deſired effect: the Caledonians were animated to a degree of enthuſiaſm, and with one voice vowed to be revenged on their enemies, or periſh in the attempt. Nor did Agricola forget to animate his troops with all the energetic power of Roman eloquence.

The Caledonian army was diſpoſed in the moſt proper manner for ſtriking the enemy with terror, by a pompous diſplay of their numbers. The firſt line of the infantry was drawn up at the foot of the Grampian mountain, and the reſt on the aſcent behind, while the cavalry, with the chariots of war in the front of their line, ſkirted the plain beneath. The Romans were drawn up in two lines, one behind the other: the firſt conſiſted of eight thouſand auxiliary foot and three thouſand horſe; and the ſecond was made up of the Roman legions.

As ſoon as the ſignal was given for engaging, both armies began the conteſt with amazing intrepidity. The battle was fierce and obſtinate, and, for ſome time, greatly in favour of the Caledonians. The Roman general, perceiving the danger, quitted his horſe, and, at the head of his legions, cloſed upon the enemy, and engaged them ſword in hand. This attack determined the iſſue of the conteſt. The javelins of the Caledonians, on which they chiefly depended, and which they darted with the greateſt dexterity, were rendered uſeleſs, and their ſwords were too unweildy to be uſed with advantage. Unable to ſtand the ſhock of the legionary forces, they gave way; and the Romans, after penetrating the firſt line, ſoon put the whole army into diſorder. The Caledonian horſe broke in upon the foot; and though the charioteers drew up among the latter, they were unable to make head againſt the enemy, the ranks being too thick, and the ground too uneven, for them to do much execution. Galgacus uſed his utmoſt efforts to rally his forces, and lead them once more againſt the enemy; but finding it impoſſible to accompliſh his wiſhes, and the day being nearly cloſed, he retired, with the ſcattered remains of his army, into the woods and mountains, whither Agricola did not think proper to follow him. This was a fatal battle to the Caledonians, no leſs than ten thouſand being ſlain on the field, while the loſs of the Romans did not exceed three hundred and fifty. The diſtreſs of the unhappy fugitives is not to be deſcribed. Driven to deſpair, many of the chieftains maſſacred their own children, that they might not be expoſed to the miſeries of want, or violated and enſlaved by the inſulting Romans. The multitude, in the firſt tranſport of their phrenzy, ſet fire to their habitations, and then concealed themſelves in ſolitary cliffs and caves, and in thoſe unſocial receſſes bewailed their accumulated misfortunes.

The ſeaſon being far advanced, the victorious Agricola marched back with his army to the ſhire of Angus, inhabited by a people called the Horeſti, who immediately ſubmitted to his government, and delivered hoſtages for their good behaviour. From hence he embarked his forces on board the fleet, and ſailing to the northward, landed on the Orkney Iſlands, the inhabitants of which quietly ſubmitted. He then ordered the commander of his fleet to ſail round the whole coaſt of Britain, which was accordingly effected, and at length arriving at the port of Sandwich, he then diſembarked his troops, and led them into winter quarters.

The great atchievements of Agricola, inſtead of procuring him reſpect and eſteem from his royal maſter, not only brought him into diſgrace, but even proved fatal to him. The infamous Domitian, who then filled the imperial throne, grew jealous of the reputation of his general, and ordered him to be recalled. This he did under pretence of promoting him to the government of Syria, but, in reality, that a final period might be put to his victories. In obedience to Domitian's orders, Agricola returned to Rome, where triumphal honours, and a ſtatue crowned with laurel, were decreed him by the ſenate. But he ſoon fell a victim to the ſuſpicious fears of the cowardly Domitian, who, (according to all hiſtorians) found means to take him off by poiſon.—Thus fell the renowned and accompliſhed Julius Agricola, the celebrated governor of Britain. He introduced the Roman arts, their language, and their luxuries into this iſland; and ſpread deſolation and ſlaughter through an extenſive country, becauſe the inhabitants refuſed to part with their liberties, and tamely ſubmit to the Roman yoke of ſlavery. He waded through a ſea of blood to crop the laurels of victory, and fell a ſacrifice to that ambition which led him on to conqueſt. As a general, a governor, and a civil magiſtrate, he deſerves the higheſt honours. His talents were great, his judgment ſound, and his memory retentive: he was fruitful in reſources, and intrepid in danger; a friend to merit, and an implacable enemy to extortion. But he ſtained his laurels with the blood of a people who never injured him, and againſt whom he had no other complaint than their being tenacious of ther liberties, and true friends to their country.

CHAP. VI.

The Caledonians demoliſh the forts raiſed by Agricola on the iſthmus between the friths of Clyde and Forth. Julius Severus is ſent to repel them, but before he can make the attempt is recalled to quell a rebellion in Syria. The emperor Adrian arrives in Britain, and builds a wall from Solway Frith to the river Tyne. Lollius Urbicus takes the command in Britain, and erects a ſtrong wall between the Friths of Dunbriton and Edinburgh. The Caledonians renew their incurſions, but are repulſed by Ulpius Marcellus. A mutiny takes place among the Roman ſoldiers, which is quelled by Helvius Pertinax, who is ſucceeded in the government of Britain by Claudius Albinus. The Roman empire is greatly diſtracted on account of different competitors for the imperial dignity. Septimus Severus at length obtains it, and ſends Virius Lupus as proprætor to Britain. Lupus makes a peace with the Caledonians, who afterwards revolt, and invade the Roman territories. Severus arrives in Britain with a powerful army in order to chaſtiſe them. They ſend ambaſſadors to him to ſue for peace, which he refuſes to grant. He marches into their country, but meets with many difficulties, and loſes many of his troops. He, however, penetrates into the moſt northern extremity of the iſland, and then makes a peace with the Caledonians. Strengthens Adrian's wall and erects ſeveral forts, after which he retires to York, and leaves the command of his army to his ſon Caracalla. The Caledonians revolt, upon which Severus reſolves to take a ſevere revenge, but his deſigns are fruſtrated by the intervention of his death. His two ſons Caracalla and Geta make peace with the Scots, and then repair with their father's remains to Rome, where Caracalla cauſes his brother to be aſſaſſinated. Diocleſian and Maximian become joint emperors of Rome. The Franks and Saxons infeſt the coaſts of Britain and Gaul, upon which Carauſius, a perſon of mean extraction, but famed for his naval experience, is ſent to repel them. He proves ſucceſsful, obtains great riches, and forms an alliance with the Britons. The emperor Maximian, jealous of his power, ſends a perſon from Rome to diſpatch him, but the deſign miſcarries, and Carauſius lays claim to the imperial throne. He makes himſelf maſter of Boulogne, and then ſails to Britain, where he is proclaimed emperor by the Roman army. Marches againſt the Caledonians, whom he defeats in ſeveral engagements, and then makes peace with them. Is baſely aſſaſſinated by Alectus, one of his principal officers, who had always profeſſed himſelf his moſt intimate friend.

AFTER the departure of Agricola from Britain, nothing material occurred till the firſt year of the reign of the emperor Adrian, when the Caledonians, having gathered together their forces which had been diſperſed on the mountains, attacked the Romans with ſome ſucceſs, demoliſhed ſeveral of the forts which Agricola had built on the iſthmus between the Forth and Clyde, and then returned to their mountains laden with booty.

Intelligence of this irruption being made known to the emperor, he immediately diſpatched Julius Severus, a commander of great reputation, to Britain, in order to check the Caledonians, and drive them back into their own country. He accordingly arrived, and made the neceſſary preparations for obeying the imperial mandate; but before he could lead his forces againſt the enemy, he was recalled. A rebellion had broke out in Syria, and Severus, on account of his great military abilities, was thought the only general capable of reducing the inſurgents, and reſtoring peace to that fertile province.

The departure of Severus gave great encouragement to the Caledonians, who, taking advantage of his abſence, continued to make farther inroads into the Roman territories with ſucceſs. Lucius Antoninus, the commander of the Roman forces in Britain, marched againſt the inſurgents, and a ſmart battle enſued; but the Caledonians proved victorious, and Lucius narrowly eſcaped with his life.

A. D. 117. As ſoon as the emperor was informed of this defeat, he thought it high time to ſend an able general to head the Roman army, and accordingly diſpatched Priſcus Luſcinius into Britain for that purpoſe. But not being ſatisfied with this, he ſoon after followed himſelf, thinking his own preſence might ſtrike a greater terror into the enemy.

Adrian, having landed ſafely in Britain, proceeded as far as York, determined to chaſtiſe the Caledonians for their late inſults. But ſome old officers, who had ſerved under Agricola, gave him ſo dreadful an account of Scotland, and painted the difficulties that would attend the march of an army through bogs and foreſts in ſuch ſtriking colours, that the emperor thought proper to lay aſide his intended expedition.

When the Caledonians firſt heard of the arrival of Adrian in Britain, they immediately retired to their faſtneſſes in the mountainous parts of their country, thinking it imprudent to face the Roman army headed by the emperor himſelf. As Adrian, therefore, found it would be imprudent to attempt purſuing them, he reſolved, if poſſible, to prevent them from making any further incurſions into the Roman provinces. He accordingly continued his march from York to the forts which had been erected by Agricola on the iſthmus between the Clyde and Forth. Thinking theſe fortifications too remote from the main body of the Roman forces, he ordered them to be abandoned, and inſtead thereof erected a wall, or rather rampart of earth above eighty miles in length, extending from Solway Frith to the north of the river river Tyne. In different parts of this rampart, at proper diſtances, he placed garriſons, and took every other neceſſary precaution for preventing any future inroads of the enemy.

After thus providing for the ſecurity of the Roman provinces, and the ſafety of his people, Adrian next applied himſelf to the removal of ſeveral abuſes that had crept into the government after the departure of Agricola, having done which he left Britain, and returned to Rome, where he was highly honoured by the ſenate, who conferred on him the title of Reſtorer of Britain.

A. D. 134. In conſequence of the precautions taken by Adrian for the ſecurity of the Roman provinces in Britain, together with the terror which his name ſtruck on the northern inſurgents of the iſland, they deſiſted from all farther hoſtilities during his reign; but no ſooner were they informed of his death, than, without knowing the abilities of his ſucceſſor, they demoliſhed his rampart in ſeveral parts, and renewed their ravages in the Roman provinces. Intelligence of this being ſent to Rome, the new emperor Antoninus Pius immediately diſpatched Lollius Urbicus to Britain, in order to chaſtiſe the Caledonians, and put a ſtop to their farther depredations. Urbicus ſoon drove them back into their own country, and, to prevent their making any future incurſions, he erected a ſtrong wall beyond that built by Adrian, extending from the frith of Dunbriton to that of Edinburgh. He likewiſe eſtabliſhed a ſtrong camp near it, in which he kept a body of forces to defend the wall, and defeat the attempts of the Caledonians. This wiſe conduct of Urbicus procured Antoninus the title of Britannicus, though he had never even ſeen the iſland.

A. D. 162. During the remaining part of the reign of Antoninus Pius no farther commotions took place among the Caledonians, and the ſouthern inhabitants continued to enjoy the bleſſings of peace. But on the death of Antoninus, the Caledonians, thinking it a favourable opportunity, began to prepare themſelves for making farther ravages, and for that purpoſe had gathered together a very conſiderable army. Theſe proceedings being made known to Marcus Aurelius, who ſucceeded to the imperial throne, he immediately ſent over Calpurnius Agricola as prætor, in order to reſtore the tranquillity of Britain. This governor's endeavours were attended with the deſired ſucceſs; and he left the inhabitants of the iſland perfectly reconciled to the Roman government.

From this period nothing worthy of notice occurred in Britain till the death of Aurelius, when the face of affairs were greatly altered, and a general commotion took place in the northern parts of the iſland.

A. D. 180. Aurelius was ſucceeded on the imperial throne by his ſon Commodus, a youth who was famous only for his vices. His indolence and timidity rendered him contemptible, and his criminal exceſſes made him an object of deteſtation. He employed only perſons like himſelf in his government, or ſuch as purchaſed their places with their wealth. Hence the chief poſts were occupied either by thoſe who were inſtrumental to his pleaſures, or had purchaſed them at an enormous expence, and therefore fleeced thoſe who were under them to reimburſe themſelves. Hence murmurs and diſcontents aroſe among the people, and mutiny and diſorder among the ſoldiers.

The Caledonians, being informed of the ſtate of affairs at Rome, thought this a very proper opportunity for once more attacking the territories of the enemy. They accordingly made a breach in the wall which had been built by Lollius Urbicus (though generally called that of Antoninus) and falling on the Roman garriſon in one of the principal forts, cut them entirely to pieces. The troops in the contiguous ſtations were ſo alarmed at this that they immediately abandoned them, and the invaders, being ſuffered to purſue their inroads without reſiſtance, filled the whole country with terror and devaſtation.

A. D. 183. As ſoon as Commodus was informed of the ravages and ſucceſs of the Caledonians, he immediately diſpatched Ulpius Marcellus, a general of great reputation, to take the command in Britain, and chaſtiſe the inſolence of the northern invaders. On his arrival he found the Roman diſcipline ſunk into a ſtate of ſloth and licentiouſneſs: the hardy veterans were become effeminate, and much fonder of the couch of indolence, than the honours which reſult from a vigorous campaign. Ulpius ſaw the neceſſity of reſtoring the antient diſcipline before he led his forces againſt the enemy; and accordingly applying himſelf to the taſk with great aſſiduity, his endeavours were ſoon crowned with ſucceſs. This difficulty being removed, Ulpius led his forces againſt the Caledonians, whom he defeated in ſeveral engagements with prodigious ſlaughter, and at length drove them back into their own country; where, from his prudent management, they were obliged to continue quiet during the remainder of the reign of Commodus.

But the glory of this expedition had nearly coſt Marcellus his life: the emperor became at once jealous and envious of his popularity. Poſſeſſing no virtues himſelf, he could not bear them in others, as they ſeemed tacit reflections on his own vices. His envy, therefore, prompted him to form the reſolution of putting Marcellus to death, but being perſuaded that ſuch a ſtep would prove prejudicial to himſelf, he at length conſented only to deprive him of his government.

A. D. 186. Some time after the recall of Marcellus from Britain, a mutiny broke out among the Roman troops, who openly renounced their allegiance to Commodus. To quell this dangerous commotion the emperor imprudently ſent his favourite Perennis to Britain, who, inſtead of appeaſing, purſued the very method moſt likely to increaſe the general diſcontent. He removed the veteran officers, placed his own creatures in their ſtead, and treated the whole army with the moſt unexampled ſeverity. Theſe proceedings diverted the reſentment of the troops from the emperor to himſelf, and induced them unanimouſly to accuſe him of high treaſon. Commodus believed, or pretended to believe, the allegation, and, happy to find the ſtorm turned another way, delivered his favourite up to the diſcretion of the enraged ſoldiery, who immediately ſacrificed him to their revenge by putting him to an ignominous death.

A. D. 187. But the fall of this miniſter was not ſufficient to appeaſe the diſcontent of the army in Britain: the grievances they complained of ſtill remained, and they even conſulted about chuſing a new emperor. In order to quell theſe diſturbances, and bring the ſoldiers back to their duty, Helvius Pertinax was ſent into Britain. He was a man poſſeſſed of very great talents, but the buſineſs he had to do was of a very difficult nature, and he found the attempt almoſt impracticable. On his firſt arrival the Roman troops, tired of being governed by ſuch a wretch as Commodus, offered him the ſovereignty; but he rejected their offer with diſdain, and proceeding with too great ſeverity againſt the mutineers, they were ſo highly exaſperated, that one of the legions openly revolted, a tumult enſued, and many were killed. But notwithſtanding this, Pertinax afterwards ſurmounted every difficulty, brought the army to ſubmiſſion, and reſtored tranquillity to the province. His ſeverity towards the mutineers, however, raiſed ſuch an unconquerable hatred among the ſoldiery, that he was ſome time after recalled at his own requeſt, and Claudius Albinus, a general of great courage and military abilities, appointed proprætor in his ſtead.

A. D. 193. After the appointment of Claudius Albinus to the government of Britain, the Roman empire was, for ſome time, in a diſtracted ſtate from internal commotions. On the death of Commodus (who was poiſoned by his concubine Martia) different pretenders to the imperial throne ſtarted up, and every part of the empire became a dreadful ſcene of blood and ſlaughter. Violence and oppreſſion uſurped the ſeat of juſtice, and anarchy erected her throne in the then capital of the world. The affairs of Britain were diſregarded in this general confuſion, and the Roman forces in the iſland became debilitated by luxury. The hardy veterans ſlumbered on the couch of indolence, and the deſire of acquiring glory loſt its force.

A. D. 197. Among the different competitors for the imperial dignity was Septimus Severus, who was at length choſen emperor by the general voice of the people at Rome. But notwithſtanding this he was fearful of the power of Claudius Albinus, proprætor of Britain, who, by his wiſe adminiſtration, was univerſally beloved by the whole inhabitants of the iſland. In order, therefore, to remove ſo great an obſtacle, Severus ſent Heraclitus to ſucceed him in the government; but Albinus knowing himſelf to be ſecure in the affections of the army, abſolutely refuſed to reſign his command. In conſequence of this Severus determined to take him off by poiſon, and accordingly diſpatched aſſaſſins into Britain to put the horrid deed into execution. But Albinus, being apprized of the ſcheme, cauſed the aſſaſſins to be ſeized, and, by torture, drew from them an ample confeſſion of the whole affair.

Albinus was now declared emperor by the Roman army in Britain, in conſequence of which he aſſumed the title of Cæſar, and immediately declared war againſt Severus, fully reſolved, if poſſible, to puniſh him for his treachery. Having embarked his forces he paſſed over to the continent of Gaul, and advanced as far as Lyons, where he was met by Severus at the head of a Roman army, whoſe minds he had, by falſe relations, highly exaſperated againſt Albinus. The battle was begun with great fury, and continued a long time with doubtful ſucceſs; the Britiſh troops charged with ſuch impetuoſity that Severus had like to have been worſted, but his general Lætus, coming up with a freſh body of men, changed the fortune of the day, and Albinus, ſeeing his legions routed, and the battle irretrievably loſt, fell upon his own ſword, and periſhed.

By this deciſive battle Severus became ſole maſter of the Roman empire, in conſequence of which he immediately diſpatched Virius Lupus into Britain with the title of proprætor, in order to oppoſe any attempts that might be made by the Caledonians on the Roman territories, which were then in a weak condition, on account of the number of troops carried to the continent by Albinus. To ſtrengthen his power, and to make himſelf more ſecure on the imperial throne, Severus, while he remained at Gaul, divided the Roman territories in Britain into two parts or provinces, namely, the northern and the ſouthern, the former of which he conferred on Lupus, and the latter on Heraclitus.

Lupus, on his arrival in Britain, found the Caledonians a very powerful people; they had been joined by the Meatæ, who inhabited the diſtrict between the walls of Antoninus and Adrian, and had made ſeveral incurſions into the Roman provinces. Lupus, not thinking his forces ſufficiently numerous to engage this confederate army, reſolved not to hazard a battle; and in order to procure a peace with the Caledonians he made them a preſent of a ſum of money, under pretence of redeeming ſome Roman captives then in their cuſtody.

The articles of the treaty being ſigned, all commotions ſubſiſted for ſeveral years, till at length the North Britons, tired of a ſtate of inactivity, or availing themſelves of the ſupineneſs and luxury which ſuch a ſtate had brought upon the Roman army, again invaded their territories, thereby breaking the treaty they had made with Lupus. Alarmed at theſe proceedings, the two proprætors joined their forces, and marching againſt them, made ſeveral unſucceſsful efforts to drive them back to their own country; in conſequence of which they immediately wrote to the emperor, informing him of the abſolute neceſſity there was either of his perſonal preſence, or a very formidable reinforcement, to quell the inſurgents, and ſecure the tranquillity of the province.

A. D. 207. Though Severus was far advanced in life, and at the ſame time greatly afflicted with the gout, yet he reſolved to go to Britain in perſon, conſidering that iſland as one of the moſt important provinces belonging to the Roman empire. He accordingly raiſed a very powerful army, and proceeded to Gaul, from whence he embarked for Britain, taking with him his two ſons Caracalla and Geta.

The arrival of Severus, who had long been diſtinguiſhed for his military talents, and the powerful army he brought over with him, greatly alarmed the Caledonians. They were fearful of the conſequences of his reſentment, and determined, if poſſible, to divert the ſtorm which was gathering gathering round them. They therefore ſent ambaſſadors to him to ſue for peace; but Severus, being determined to humble them by conqueſt, detained the ambaſſadors on various pretences till he had made the neceſſary preparations for his expedition, and then diſmiſſed them with an equivocal anſwer. At the ſame time, that he might not meet with any obſtruction from the ſouthern inhabitants of the iſland, he left his ſon Geta with a body of forces in thoſe parts, but took with him his eldeſt ſon Caracalla, that he might ſhare in the dangers and fatigues of the campaign.

A. D. 203. The enterprizing Severus, though aged and diſeaſed, now marched at the head of his army into the country of the enemy. His troops, indeed, were too numerous for him to fear any oppoſition from the Caledonians; but he met with difficulties he did not expect. The country abounded with mountains, woods and marſhes, ſo that his forces underwent the moſt exceſſive fatigue without even ſeeing the face of the enemy. In their march they were obliged to cut down woods, level hills, make cauſeways acroſs the plains, and lay bridges over rivers, in which laborious work they met with great danger as well as fatigue, inſomuch that they are ſaid to have loſt 15,000 men in the arduous undertaking.

But notwithſtanding theſe almoſt inſuperable barriers, the intrepid Severus determined to march through all Caledonia, or North Britain, and having advanced almoſt to the extremity of the iſland, the inhabitants, terrified at his conſummate valour and matchleſs perſeverance in toil, made their ſubmiſſion, and obtained a peace on condition of laying down their arms.

Severus, however, well knowing that the Caledonians would obſerve the conditions of the treaty no longer than they were compelled to it by force, ſet about forming a ſtronger barrier between them and the Roman province. Accordingly, he ordered Adrian's wall to be faced with ſtone, forts to be erected at proper diſtances, and the whole to be finiſhed in the moſt firm and ſubſtantial manner. Having taken theſe precautions, he retired to York, leaving the command of the army to his ſon Caracalla. On his arrival at that city he aſſumed the title of Britannicus Maximus, and had a medal ſtruck on the occaſion with this inſcription: FUNDATOR PACIS, that is, The Founder of Peace.

A. D. 209. Caracalla, with whom Severus had left the command of the army, was a prince of the moſt profligate diſpoſition, and had been more than once engaged in conſpiracies againſt his father's life. While his father was at York, he made the moſt arbitrary uſe of his authority, and exaſperated the ferocious North Britons to break the peace they had ſo lately concluded. He ſuffered his ſoldiers to make incurſions beyond the wall, and to treat the inhabitants with the greateſt inſolence and cruelty. Incenſed at theſe repeated acts of tyranny, and deſirous of recovering their former independence, the Caledonians had again recourſe to arms, and ſeverely retaliated on every Roman ſoldier, who ventured beyond the wall, the miſeries their countrymen had ſuffered from the cruel Caracalla.

As ſoon as Severus heard of this revolt (not knowing the cauſe from whence it originated) he was incenſed to ſuch a pitch of indignation againſt the North Britons, that, infirm and diſeaſed as he was, he immediately left York, with a full reſolution of ſeverely wreaking his vengeance on the revolters. On his arrival at the camp he harangued the ſoldiers on the inconſtancy and perfidy of the Caledonians, whom, in a verſe of Homer, he exhorted them to extirpate, without paying any diſtinction either to age or ſex.

Severus having, by this harangue, inflamed the minds of his ſoldiers againſt the Caledonians, inveſted Caracalla with the command of the expedition, and being exceeding weak with his infirmities, immediately returned to York. He did not, however, live to ſee his cruel orders carrid into execution: his diſtemper daily increaſed, and he ſoon after fell a victim to its power in the 67th year of his age, after having preſided in Britain for the ſpace of three years.

As ſoon as Caracalla heard of his father's death, inſtead of proſecuting the war againſt the Caledonians, in obedience to the orders of Severus, he immediately renewed the peace with them and their confederates; and having received hoſtages for the performance of articles, he retired, with his forces, into the ſouthern parts of the iſland.

Severus had bequeathed the empire jointly to his two ſons, and the ſoldiers paid an entire ſubmiſſion to his will, by readily taking the oath of fidelity to both. But the manners of the Britons were not ſufficiently poliſhed to render their country a pleaſing retreat to perſons long acquainted with the luxuries of Rome, and Caracalla, with his brother, jointly reſolved to leave the iſland. Accordingly, taking with them their father's aſhes, they repaired to the capital of the empire, and depoſited the remains of Severus in the tomb of Adrian.

A. D. 211. Caracalla's great ambition was to reign alone, and he had concerted many ſchemes for obtaining his wiſhes long before he left the iſland. On his arrival at Rome, he determined, at all events, to be ſole monarch of the empire, but as the ſenate knew it was conjunctively left between him and his brother, he was ſenſible he could not obtain the throne by any legal meaſures. He therefore, actuated by the moſt furious ambition, reſolved to gratify his deſires at the expence of his brother's life, and accordingly, having hired perſons for the purpoſe, cauſed him to be aſſaſſinated.

From the departure of Caracalla to the reign of Diocleſian, we can trace but few, and thoſe very imperfect accounts, of the ſtate of this iſland. The few facts that are collected derive their authenticity from coins and inſcriptions that have been found in different parts of England. From theſe it appears that in the reign of Gordian III. Mæciculus Faſcus commanded in Britain, when he repaired the barracks and arſenals which had fallen to decay: that two years after this event, Cneius Lucilianus the proprætor built a bath, with an exchange or portico; and that Nonius Philippus was governor of the iſland in the year that preceded the death of the emperor Gordian.

A. D. 242. During the reign of Gallienus, who ſucceeded Gordian, we learn, that there was a general revolt of the Roman troops, and that no leſs than thirty tyrants ſprang up from the corruption of his government. Six of theſe, namely, namely, Lollianus, Victorianus, Posthumus, the elder and younger Tetricus, with Morius, seem to have declared for themselves in this island; at least the number of their coins found in the neighbourhood of Colchester greatly encourage this conjecture; and Porphyry the philosopher, who lived in those times, calls Britain a soil fruitful in tyrants.

A. D. 284. At the time Diocleſian acceded to the imperial dignity the Roman empire was in the utmoſt ſtate of confuſion, in conſequence of which he admitted Maximian, his adopted ſon, as a partner on the throne. Diocleſian himſelf had acquired the higheſt reputation as a ſoldier, and had acquitted himſelf with great political ſagacity in the civil parts of government. Indeed, he might ſingly have ſupported the weight of government with honour to himſelf, and advantage to his country; but from the then confuſed ſtate of the empire, he manifeſted the greateſt prudence in procuring the aſſiſtance of Maximian, who, though not poſſeſſed of equal accompliſhments with himſelf, had both courage and activity, which were then of greater uſe to the public than virtues more delicately illuſtrious.

A. D. 286. The anarchy and confuſion which now prevailed is not to be deſcribed. The continent was filled with rebels, and the ſeas covered with pirates. The coaſts of Britain and Gaul were infeſted with the fleets of the Franks and Saxons, who landed in various parts, and committed the moſt horrid depredations. Theſe diſorders called for an immediate remedy; and one Carauſius, a perſon of mean extraction, but famous for his courage and experience at ſea, was appointed to the command of the Roman fleet, in order to put a ſtop to the ravages of the pirates. His ſtation was near Boulogne, a port well ſituated for making him acquainted with the coaſts, harbours and the inhabitants of Britain. He punctually executed his commiſſion with reſpect to putting a ſtop to the depredations of the Franks and Saxons, but he converted the conſequences of his ſucceſs to his own advantage. He took a great number of prizes from the invaders, but neither made reſtitution to thoſe who had been plundered, nor remitted any part of the booty to the imperial treaſury; nay, it was obſerved, that he never attacked the pirates till after they had plundered the coaſts, and then intercepted them when they were laden with the ſpoils of the country.

As riches and power generally extend the operations of an enterprizing man, ſo was it with Carauſius. He found himſelf the indiſputable ſovereign of the ſea, and determined, if poſſible, to wreſt the imperial ſcepter from the hands of the conjunctive emperors. He therefore redoubled his attention to increaſe his navy, enlarged his riches from the ſpoils of the pirates, and, the better to further his deſign, formed a ſtrict alliance with the Britons.

The emperors Diocleſian and Maximian, alarmed at the power, and exaſperated at the conduct of Carauſius, diſpatched a perſon from Rome with a commiſſion to aſſaſſinate him. But the attempt miſcarried, the aſſaſſin was diſcovered, and Carauſius, in conſequence thereof, determined to publiſh his claim to the imperial ſceptre. This reſolution was highly approved of by the officers of his fleet, who unanimouſly declared that they would ſupport him to the laſt extremity.

Encouraged by theſe aſſurances, Carauſius made his firſt attempt on Boulogne, which he took by aſſault, and fortified the place as an occaſional retreat. But his chief hope and confidence were placed in Britain. The ſituation, as an iſland, rendered it impregnable to all but a maritime force, and his navy was ſuperior to any fleet the Romans could bring againſt him. Accordingly, he had no ſooner finiſhed the fortifications of Boulogne than he immediately ſailed with his whole fleet to the Britiſh coaſt, where he had no ſooner landed than he was proclaimed emperor, not only by the whole navy, but likewiſe the Britons, and all the Roman troops then quartered in the iſland.

In conſequence of this favourable reception Carauſius became poſſeſſed of the whole Roman province as far as the wall of Antoninus, which he immediately ordered to be repaired and enlarged. His next conſideration was to ſtrengthen his navy, to effect which he entered into a treaty of alliance with the Franks and Saxons, whereby it was agreed, that in caſe he ſhould be attacked by the Romans, they ſhould immediately ſend a powerful fleet to his aſſiſtance. He likewiſe enliſted a great number of their troops, whom he ſent to garriſon Boulogne, which he furniſhed with every kind of article neceſſary to endure a ſiege.

A. D. 287. While Carauſius was thus employed, the Scots and Picts, imagining that the Britons were unable to defend their country without the aſſiſtance of the Romans, began to make incurſions into the Engliſh territories. Intimation of this being given to Carauſius, he immediately marched againſt the invaders, defeated them in ſeveral engagements, and drove them back into their country with conſiderable loſs. Having thus ſignalized his courage, and convinced the Caledonians that he was at once a powerful and vigilant enemy, he made peace with them on very advantageous terms, hoping thereby to unite the whole power of the iſland, and render abortive any attempt that might be made againſt him by the imperial armies of Rome.

The prudent meaſures taken by Carauſius rendered him exceeding formidable, and he became at once the object of hatred and reſentment in the eyes of the two emperors. They would, indeed, have willingly eclipſed his power, but the affairs of the empire were ſo very tottering and precarious, that neither Diocleſian or Maximian were able to deſtroy the acquiſitions he had made or prevent him from taking ſuch ſteps as might contribute to the ſtrength he had already acquired. Some faint preparations of reſiſtance were, indeed, made by Maximian, and Carauſius was proclaimed a pirate and a traitor to his country; but neceſſity ſoon compelled them to lay aſide all hoſtile intentions, and to ſign a treaty of peace, by which the two emperors conſented that Carauſius ſhould enjoy one third of the imperial dignity.

This conceſſion not only rendered Carauſius nominal emperor at Rome, but real monarch in Britain; and it muſt be acknowledged, if he acquired his power by indirect means, he employ-

it to laudable purpoſes. The Britons were no longer ſubject to the Roman power; they paid obedience only to their own ſovereign, and the laws of their country. Juſtice and equity were diſperſed with an even hand; the commerce of the kingdom was encouraged; and the Britiſh ſeas were cleared of pirates.

A. D. 289. The two emperors Diocleſian and Maximian, deſpairing of ever being able to reduce Carauſius, reſigned the government into the hands of their two ſons-in-law Maximinian Galerus and Conſtantius Chloris. Theſe two princes, being of a courageous and enterprizing diſpoſition, reſolved not only to diveſt Carauſius of being a ſharer in the imperial dignity, but likewiſe to eclipſe his power as governor of Britain. They accordingly applied themſelves to raiſing forces by ſea and land, the former of which was conſigned to Conſtantius, and the latter to Maximinian.

While Conſtantius was employed in fitting out his fleet, which he collected from the magazines on the Rhine, Maximinian, having raiſed a conſiderable army, marched to Boulogne, where Carauſius was then in perſon. On his arrival he immediately laid ſiege to the place; but as the ſea was open before it, Carauſius defended himſelf with very little difficulty, and thereby convinced his enemies that while he had this advantage, their beſieging the place would be to no purpoſe. To remove this obſtacle, Conſtantius, having arrived with his fleet determined to block up the port, which he effected by raiſing a bank of ſtone; ſo that Carauſius had no other reſource to prevent falling a ſacrifice, than by forcibly cutting his way through the Roman camp. This, by taking the advantage of a dark night, he effected at the head of a few ſoldiers, and embarking on board a ſmall veſſel, landed ſafely in Britain, where he had both a numerous fleet, and a powerful army.

In the mean time Maximinian made himſelf maſter of Boulogne, while his confederate Conſtantius, not having a ſufficient fleet to purſue Carauſius, collected ſhips from every part of his dominions, and ſtationed ſtrong ſquadrons on the coaſts of Britain, Spain and Gaul, to prevent the allies from joining the fleet of the intrepid Carauſius. Having taken this precaution he ſailed with the reſt of his fleet to meet the Franks, whom he ſo totally defeated, and purſued his victory ſo cloſely, that ſcarce a ſingle veſſel eſcaped. He then proceeded againſt the Cauci and Friſians, two other nations in alliance with Carauſius, whom he likewiſe ſubdued, and tranſplanted into remote countries.

A. D. 293. Carauſius was no ſtranger to the proceedings of Conſtantius. He knew his deſign, and took the moſt prudent meaſures he could to render it abortive. He collected his fleet, and ſtationed troops in every part of the iſland where the Romans could hope to land their forces: and, as a farther ſecurity he kept ſmall veſſels continually cruizing on the coaſt of Gaul, in order to give him the moſt early intelligence of the appearance of the enemy. But while he was thus preparing for the ſafety of his kingdom, he was baſely aſſaſſinated by Alectus, one of his principal officers, and one who had always profeſſed himſelf his moſt attached friend. Thus fell the courageous and enterprizing Carauſius, who, from the few particulars that are recorded of his life, appears to have been as ſucceſsful as he was ambitious, as bold as he was powerful, and as fit to command, as he was ready to execute. To him we owe the firſt dawnings of our naval power; from his conduct we were firſt apprized of our natural ſtrength as an iſland, and from his example we have learned to ſet all the powers of the continent at defiance.

CHAP. VII.

Alectus aſſumes the government of Britain. Engages the Romans, but is defeated and ſlain. Conſtantius gains the affections of the Britons, who conſider him as the deliverer of their country. He dies at York, and is ſucceeded by his ſon Conſtantine, ſurnamed the Great, who divides the iſland into four governments. He dies, and leaves the empire to his three ſons. Conſtans his ſecond ſon comes over to Britain, in order to repel the incurſions of the Scots and Picts. He is deteſted by his ſubjects, and at length put to death by Magnentius, who uſurps the imperial dignity. He goes over to the continent, and engages Conſtantius, but is defeated, and puts an end to his own life. The Britons are greatly oppreſſed by one Paulus, a notary, who is burnt alive by order of Julian the ſucceſſor of Conſtantius. The Scots and Picts renew their incurſions, and commit the moſt horrid ravages, in conſequence of which the emperor Valentinian ſends Theodoſius into Britain, who ſoon routs them, and reſtores peace to the iſland. On the death of Valentinian his ſon Gratian accedes to the imperial dignity, but being ſenſible of his own defects, takes Magnus Theodoſius as an aſſociate in the government. Maximus, the proprætor of Britain, attempts to obtain the imperial throne, and marches againſt Gratian, whoſe troops deſerting him, he flies to Lyons, and is there aſſaſſinated. Maximus then engages Theodoſius, but is defeated, taken priſoner, and put to death. Theodoſius ſends Chryſanthus into Britain, to put a ſtop to the ravages of the Caledonians, which he effects, and reſtores peace to the iſland. Great commotions take place in the Roman empire, in conſequence of which the Britons are deſerted, and again diſtreſſed by the inroads of the Caledonians. They apply to the emperor for aſſiſtance, which is granted, but at length the legions are recalled, and the Romans totally abandon the iſland.

THE treacherous Alectus, after having baſely aſſaſſinated Carauſius, took the government of Britain into his own hands; but he did not long enjoy the fruits of his villainy. Being at once ambitious and cruel, he was deteſted by the Britons, who paid him obedience only from fear, fear, and were ready to join the Romans whenever they ſhould appear to diſpute his uſurped authority. Alectus was not inſenſible of the danger, but he wanted capacity to avoid it. He increaſed his navy, indeed, but not for the defence of his country. He employed his maritime forces rather as a pirate than a prince, and inſtead of protecting, deſtroyed the trade of his ſubjects, by cutting off all intercourſe between Britain and the continent.

As ſoon as Conſtantius heard of the proceedings of the uſurper Alectus, and the injuries ſuſtained by his ſubjects in conſequence thereof, he redoubled his efforts to collect a fleet ſufficiently powerful to engage him. This he effected in a very ſhort time, and embarking his forces at Gaul, ſet ſail from the coaſt of Britain.

Alectus, having received intelligence that the Roman fleet had left the harbour of Gaul, immediately ſtood off to ſea in order to intercept them; but Conſtantius eluded all his vigilance by means of a thick fog, which concealed both fleets from the ſight of each other; and the Romans ſafely reached the coaſt of Suſſex, where they landed without oppoſition.

As Conſtantius knew it would be impoſſible to defend his fleet from the attacks of the enemy, after his forces were landed, he prudently ſet his ſhips on fire. This was conſidered by the Britons as a moſt magnanimous act: they were ſatisfied in their minds that Conſtantius was determined to conquer or periſh, and therefore flocked from all quarters to his ſtandard, imploring his protection againſt the tyrant of their country.

The naval power of Alectus was far ſuperior to that of Conſtantius, but he wanted prudence to make a proper uſe of that advantage. He abandoned the only acquiſitions that rendered him formidable, and madly determined to meet the Roman army on the land. He accordingly diſembarked his forces, which were principally compoſed of Franks and foreigners, who were ſtrangers to military diſcipline, and held in the greateſt deteſtation by the Britons. Theſe he led againſt the Roman veterans, and raſhly engaged that part of the army under the command of Aſclepiodotus, captain of the guards of Conſtantius. From the great ſuperiority of a well-diſciplined force to a band of lawleſs robbers, the conteſt was of ſhort duration; the troops of Alectus were ſoon routed, and the tyrant, giving up all as loſt, ruſhed into the thickeſt part of the Roman army, and was cut to pieces, while a terrible ſlaughter was made among his foreign mercenaries.

A party of the Franks who had eſcaped the general ſlaughter, marched directly to London, plundered the city, and fell down the river in veſſels loaded with the ſpoils they had taken. They were, however, met in their paſſage by a diviſion of the Roman fleet which had been ſeparated from the reſt by the late fog, and an engagement immediately took place, when the Franks being totally defeated, the booty they had taken was recovered, and the greater part of them put to the ſword.

In the mean time Conſtantius was received with open arms by the Britons, who being delivered from the tyranny of Alectus, flattered themſelves with enjoying peace and tranquillity. Nor were they, indeed, miſtaken. Conſtantius ſoon gave them ſufficient proofs of his great clemency, juſtice and diſcretion, and how deſirous he was to render them an happy people. He publiſhed a general pardon to all who had been concerned in the late revolt, and ordered reſtitution to be made to thoſe who had ſuffered on the occaſion. He diſpenſed juſtice with impartiality, and permitted the free exerciſe of the Chriſtian religion, which had, ſome time before, been planted in the iſland. He cleared the ſeas of pirates, reſtored commerce, ſubdued ſome northern nations, who had declared themſelves independent during the late troubles, and recovered the whole province of Britain, after it had been ten years diſmembered from the empire. Theſe judicious proceedings rendered Conſtantius dear to the Britons: they conſidered him as the deliverer of their country, and forgot that they were again ſubjected to the power of the Romans.

At this time the city of London was decorated with many elegant ſtructures, and was become conſiderable for its extent, its beauty, and its riches: it was the center of commerce, and the reſidence of many wealthy merchants. Conſtantius was pleaſed with theſe improvements, and thinking the iſland worthy his particular notice, he took up his reſidence in the metropolis, where he directed his attention towards cultivating the riſing merit of a people who conſidered him as their father.*

A. D. 306. The wiſe and equitable adminiſtration of Conſtantius was productive of peace and tranquillity to his ſubjects; and accordingly Britain enjoyed uninterrupted repoſe till his death, which happened at York in the 17th year of his reign. His ſon Conſtantine (afterwards ſurnamed the Great) no ſooner heard of his indiſpoſition, than he left Rome, and arrived at York juſt time enough to perform the laſt offices of his father, who appointed him his ſucceſſor on the imperial throne; a nomination ſo agreeable to the army, that they immediately declared him emperor.

The firſt ſtep taken by Conſtantine, after his acceſſion to the imperial dignity, was, to march againſt the Scots and Picts, who (as their uſual cuſtom was when they thought the imperial dignity uſurped or unſettled by vacancies, factions or foreign diſputes) had made ſeveral inroads into

* It is generally ſuppoſed that what principally induced Conſtantius to fix his reſidence in Britain was, the great attachment he had for the celebrated Helena, the mother of Conſtantine the Great, who ſucceeded him in the empire. According to ſome authors, this lady was a native of Colcheſter, while others affirm ſhe was the daughter of Collus, king of the Cumbrian Britons, who inhabited the countries between the two walls built by Severus and Antoninus. But whatever may have been her family or country, ſhe was certainly a Briton, and a woman poſſeſſed of the moſt diſtinguiſhed accompliſhments. She had long captivated the heart of Conſtantius, with whom ſhe was united in marriage, though he had, for reaſons of ſtate, been obliged to repudiate her, on his taking to wife the daughter of Maximian, to whom he owed his elevation. But notwithſtanding this Helena ſtill engroſſed his affection, and there is no doubt but it was ſolely on her account, that he took up his reſidence in Britain. She was a woman of ſo amiable a diſpoſition as to be univerſally beloved and admired. The many noble works ſhe carried on at her own expence ſufficiently diſplayed her public ſpirit; and her liberality, which at once attracted the love and veneration of the Britons, was unexampled.

into the Roman provinces. Theſe he ſoon ſubdued, and drove into their own country, leaving proper garriſons in the forts of the walls of Severus and Antoninus, to prevent any further attempts they might be inclined to make of a like nature.

A. D. 311. Having ſettled the commotions in the north, Conſtantine returned to the metropolis, and immediately raiſed a very conſiderable army of Britons. Theſe he joined with his Roman forces, and embarking the whole, proceeded to Gaul, where he conquered the Franks, who had rendered themſelves ſo powerful as to communicate their name to that country. From Gaul he marched with his army into Italy, in order to oppoſe Maxentius, who had aſſumed the imperial dignity, and was actually in poſſeſſion of Rome. Conſtantine's army was compoſed of 90,000 foot and 8000 horſe, all excellent troops, and himſelf the beſt general of his time. The greater part of his army was formed of Britons, moſt of whom had been ſome time converts to the Chriſtian religion, which Conſtantine himſelf privately profeſſed, though, for political reaſons, he did not think proper, as yet, to make publickly known.

Confident of ſucceſs, the uſurper Maxentius marched with his forces againſt Conſtantine, and a deſperate battle enſued. It was preſerved, for ſome time, with great obſtinacy on both ſides, till at length victory declared in favour of Conſtantine: the troops of Maxentius were routed, great numbers killed, among whom was their leader, and the reſt put to flight.

Conſtantine now being in poſſeſſion of the empire without a rival, publickly embraced the Chriſtian religion, which, in all probability, he was prompted to do from the diſtinguiſhed ardour of his Britiſh troops, the greater part of whom he knew to be of that perſuaſion. He then directed his attention towards preſerving peace throughout his dominions, which, from the meaſures he took ariſing from his natural humane and benevolent diſpoſition, was eaſily effected, and he obtained the univerſal good-will and affection of his ſubjects. Inſtead of ſullying, by examples of ſeverity, the glory of the victory obtained over Maxentius, he, with a magnanimity peculiar to himſelf, pardoned all who had fought againſt him, and reſtored the forfeited eſtates of his moſt rancorous enemies. He recalled thoſe who had been exiled by Maxentius, re-eſtabliſhed the ſenate in its antient ſplendour and authority, and made ſuch wiſe and effectual regulations to ſecure the peace and tranquillity of Rome, that, on the inſcriptions dedicated to his honour, he was ſtiled the Deliverer of the city, the founder of peace, the reſtorer of the republic, and univerſally ſaluted by the name of Conſtantine the Great.

A. D. 315. Having adjuſted all matters on the continent to the univerſal ſatisfaction of his ſubjects, Conſtantine returned to Britain, where he made ſeveral alterations in the government that were productive of general utility. As he had publickly profeſſed the Chriſtian faith, he now adorned his profeſſion of an inflexible adherence to Chriſtian principles, evincing throughout his whole conduct a degree of piety unmixed with enthuſiaſm, juſtice free from auſterity, and charity uninfluenced by oſtentation.

Under ſuch a prince, the bleſſings of liberty, plenty, union and tranquillity were diffuſed among his ſubjects. Neither diſturbances nor inſurrections took place during the whole courſe of his reign. This, no doubt, was owing to the prudent alterations he made in the government of the iſland, which he divided into four diſtricts, viz. Britannia Prima, including the country between the Thames and the ſea. Britannia Secunda, comprehending that part which lay weſt of the Severn to the Iriſh ſea; Flavia Cæſarienſis, conſiſting of Cornwall, Somerſetſhire, and part of Wilts and Glouceſter; and Maxima Cæſarienſis, which included the northern counties of England, with Nottinghamſhire, Derbyſhire, Staffordſhire, and Lincolnſhire. In conſequence of this diviſion, the military government of the iſland was inveſted in four perſons, named Prefects, who were appointed by the emperor, and whoſe buſineſs was to preſerve peace in the reſpective diſtricts to which they were allotted.

A. D. 337. After a long and proſperous reign of thirty-one years, the emperor Conſtantine paid the debt of nature on the 22d of May, 337. As he had lived univerſally beloved and reſpected, ſo he died univerſally lamented by his ſubjects, who had ſoon juſt reaſon to deplore the loſs of ſo diſtinguiſhed and amiable a ſovereign.

Conſtantine was, indeed, from his natural diſpoſition, formed for empire. His genius was piercing, his memory retentive, his learning uncommon, and his liberality unbounded. Being affable, polite, equitable and humane, he won the hearts of all his ſubjects, who revered him as a father, and loved him as a friend. No perſon ever retired diſſatisfied from his preſence; nor did any ever implore his aſſiſtance in vain. Inflexibly impartial in the adminiſtration of juſtice, and deeply affected with every ſpecies of diſtreſs in others, he often repaid from his own coffers the loſs which the needy had juſtly ſuſtained by his ſentence. His ſoul was a ſtranger to cruelty. The laurels of conqueſt were never ſtained with the blood of the vanquiſhed; but, on the contrary, he ſhewed the greateſt lenity and indulgence to his moſt inveterate enemies. To be unfortunate was a ſufficient recommendation to his protection, and the ſufferer was always ſure of finding relief. He openly declared himſelf a Chriſtian, and by that means gave a powerful blow to Pagan ſuperſtition. In ſhort, his life was the beſt comment on the tenets he profeſſed; and all his actions were directed by the pure and refined morality of the Goſpel.

Such is the character of Conſtantine the Great, who, on his death, left the empire to his three ſons. France, Spain and Britain he aſſigned to Conſtantine the eldeſt; but he did not live long to enjoy it. About three years after his acceſſion he was ſlain in a battle at Aquileia, in attempting to invade the territories of his brother Conſtans, in conſequence of which the victor became poſſeſſed of his brother's inheritance.

A. D. 343. Conſtans, ſome time after acquiring the poſſeſſions of his elder brother Conſtantine, came over into Britain, in order to repel the Scots and Picts, who, on the death of the late emperor, had made incurſions into the Roman territories. This buſineſs he ſoon effected, but the reputation he acquired from ſo doing was ſoon forfeited by his inattention to the welfare of his ſubjects. He was deſtitute of all the great qualities which rendered his father amiable. He employed employed his time principally in hunting and rural diverſions, leaving the cares of government to perſons unworthy of the truſt, and who abuſed his confidence. By theſe means he incurred the contempt and deteſtation of his ſubjects, who, no longer able to bear with the oppreſſion under which they had laboured, entered into open rebellion againſt him. In this they were encouraged by one Magnentius, a Gaul of Britiſh extraction, who being of an ambitious and enterprizing diſpoſition, ſoon found means to take away the life of Conſtans, and then publickly laid claim to the imperial dignity.

A. D. 350 Conſtantius was now the only ſurviving ſon of the Great Conſtantine, and conſequently, by right, ſole monarch of the Roman empire. But the vices of his brother had alienated the affections of the Britons, who unanimouſly declared for Magnentius; and had that uſurper been contented with the government of the iſland, he might, in all probability, have ſupported his power againſt any attempts of his enemies. But he graſped at empire itſelf. He was ambitious of poſſeſſing the imperial throne, and raſhly paſſed over to the continent at the head of an army. He fought two battles with Conſtantius, and was unfortunate in both. At length, being driven to deſpair, and having only the wretched alternative of falling into the hands of the conqueror, or periſhing by his own hand, he choſe the latter, and put a period to his exiſtence at Lyons in France.

A. D. 354. On the death of Magnentius, the whole province of Britain acknowledged the authority of Conſtantius; but he made a very baſe and impolitic uſe of his good fortune. He was implacable in his hatred againſt the Britons for their defection in favour of Magnentius, and determined to puniſh them with the utmoſt ſeverity. He accordingly erected a court of confiſcation, and ſent over one Paulus, a Spaniſh notary, to act the part of inquiſitor-general. His buſineſs was to diſcover and proſecute the abettors of Magnentius, in order to confiſcate their eſtates to the imperial exchequer. Nurſed in the lap of extortion, and proof againſt every tender feeling, he executed his commiſſion in a manner peculiar to himſelf. Not contented with depriving them of their property, he committed the moſt violent outrages upon their perſons, condemning them to mines, fetters, impriſonment, tortures, ſlavery and death. The barbarity of this inhuman monſter rendered him an object of horror to the Britons: Martin, the vicar, or deputy of the province, ſaw his proceedings with grief, and the ſufferings of an injured people excited his compaſſion to intercede in their behalf. He therefore not only expoſtulated with him upon his flagrant injuſtice and cruelty, but even threatened to leave the iſland, and make a report of his conduct to the imperial court. Exaſperated at the threats of Martin, and terrified at the conſequences of having his conduct publickly examined, he ſuborned witneſſes to accuſe Martin of crimes againſt the ſtate. The deputy ſaw his danger, and determined not to ſuffer the intended diſgrace. When, therefore, called before the court, he looked ſternly at Paulus, drew his ſword, and made a thruſt at the tyrant's heart; but miſſing his blow, he turned the point of the weapon againſt himſelf, and ſheathed it in his own bowels. The baſe and cruel Paulus availing himſelf of this circumſtance, immediately haſtened to the governor's houſe, beſprinkled with the blood of Martin, as a feigned teſtimony of his having plotted againſt his life; and on this ſpecious pretence he exerciſed the moſt horrid cruelties on the friends and relations of that gallant and benevolent Roman. But at length this infamous wretch was juſtly puniſhed according to his crimes, being burnt alive in the reign of Julian, the adopted ſucceſſor of Conſtantius.

A. D. 362. During the remainder of the reign of Conſtantius, as alſo that of his ſucceſſor Julian, nothing material happened in Britain. Some few incurſions, indeed, were made by the Caledonians, but they were always repelled before they could make any conſiderable progreſs; and their attempts were not ſufficient to diſturb the general tranquillity of the iſland.

A. D. 363. On the acceſſion of Valentinian to the imperial dignity, the affairs of Britain were in a very critical ſituation. The Franks and Saxons committed the moſt dreadful ravages along the coaſts, while the Scots and Picts, having broke through the walls of partition, laid the inland parts of the country waſte. Fullofaudes, the then general of the Roman army in Britain, marched againſt the invaders, but unhappily falling into an ambuſcade, he was ſlain, and the greater part of his troops cut to pieces.

As ſoon as Valentinian was informed of this diſaſter, he immediately diſpatched Severus, one of his principal officers of ſtate, to ſuppreſs the invaders; but his endeavours proving ineffectual, he was recalled, and Jovinus appointed in his ſtead. This commander, on his arrival in Britain, found, from the great ſtrength of the inſurgents, and their diſperſion through the different parts of the iſland, that it was out of his power to repel them. He therefore diſpatched an officer to the continent, informing the emperor of the true ſtate of the iſland, and that if a large reinforcement of troops was not immediately ſent, the Roman power in Britain would be entirely loſt.

A. D. 364. In conſequence of this information, Valentinian immediately diſpatched Theodoſius, an officer of great abilities, and father to the firſt emperor of that name, at the head of a choice body of troops, to chaſtiſe the ferocious barbarians, and, if poſſible, reſtore tranquillity to the iſland.

Soon after the arrival of Theodoſius in Britain, the face of affairs was entirely changed. He marched with his veteran troops againſt the invaders, defeated them in different parts of the country, recovered the ſpoils they had taken, and generouſly returned them to the diſtreſſed owners, diſtributing only a portion among his troops as a reward for their courage and fidelity.

From theſe acts of juſtice Theodoſius obtained the general reſpect of the Britons, who followed his ſtandard with alacrity, and nobly aſſiſted him in repelling the barbarians. He purſued his advantages with ſucceſs, and, by degrees, drove the Caledonians into their own country.

A. D. 366. But Theodoſius well knew that he had yet effected only a temporary relief; the Caledonians were repelled, but not rendered incapable capable of making any future attempts. He therefore formed the country, between the walls of Adrian and Antoninus, into a ſeparate province, and gave it the name of Valentia, in honour of the then reigning emperor. He repaired both the walls, added new works, and placed ſtrong garriſons at proper diſtances, that a ſufficient force might always be in readineſs to render abortive any attempt that might be made in future by the reſtleſs Caledonians. Having thus far perfected his commiſſion, he left the north, and made a triumphal entry into London, where he was honoured with the appellations of Deliverer and Protector of the people.

The northern invaders being quieted, Theodoſius next reſolved to take proper meaſures for extirminating the Franks and Saxons, who continued to commit the moſt horrid ravages on different parts of the coaſt. He accordingly fitted out a very ſtrong fleet, and having embarked his forces ſailed in queſt of them. In this enterprize he likewiſe proved ſucceſsful: he took a great number of their veſſels, and deſtroyed others, ſo that in a ſhort time theſe piratical invaders were totally routed, and the inhabitants of the ſea coaſt were again reſtored to their uſual tranquillity.

A. D. 370. Having thus provided for the general welfare of Britain, and ſettled every thing in ſuch a manner as to give entire ſatisfaction to the inhabitants, Theodoſius returned to Rome, where he was received by the emperor with the moſt public demonſtrations of friendſhip and affection; and the ſenate decreed him a ſtatue, which they ordered to be placed among thoſe of their moſt celebrated heroes.

Soon after the departure of Theodoſius, one Maximus, an officer of great merit, and of noble deſcent, and who had ſerved under Theodoſius, was advanced to the chief command in Britain. He was a man naturally well diſpoſed, and, by forming his conduct after the manner of his illuſtrious predeceſſor, acquired the eſteem not only of his own countrymen, but alſo of the Britons, ſo that for ſome time a profound peace reigned throughout the iſland.

A. D. 375. On the death of Valentinian the face of affairs was greatly changed in Britain, diſcord and rapine ſupplying the place of peace and tranquillity. Gratian, who ſucceeded his father Valentinian on the imperial throne, was a youth in every reſpect incapable of holding the reins of government, being wholly addicted to pleaſures, and directed by favourites choſen from the loweſt claſs of the people. He was, however, thoroughly ſenſible of his defects, and therefore made choice of Flavius Magnus Theodoſius, ſon of the great general of that name, to be his aſſociate in the government.

As ſoon as Maximus, the governor of Britain, heard of the promotion of Theodoſius to the imperial dignity, he was greatly incenſed againſt Gratian, and vowed to ſeek immediate revenge. Himſelf and Theodoſius had both ſerved under the celebrated conqueror of the Caledonians; but Maximus being the older officer was ſuperior in command. His ambition, therefore, would not ſuffer him to ſerve under a perſon whom he conſidered as greatly inferior to him. He complained loudly of the injuſtice that had been done him, and found means to prevail on the ſoldiers (who were averſe to Gratian's government) to take part with him in his deſign of endeavouring to obtain the imperial dignity. The Britons, who were greatly prejudiced in his favour, followed the example of the Roman forces, and declared themſelves his friends, in conſequence of which he was proclaimed emperor by the general voice of the people.

A. D. 382. Elated with this dawning of ſucceſs, Maximus collected all his forces, conſiſting of Romans, and the flower of the Britiſh youth, and paſſed over into Gaul, where the legions quartered in that country, and the neighbouring parts of Germany, joined his ſtandard. He took up his reſidence at Tiers, and was acknowledged emperor by moſt of the provinces on this ſide the Alps.

A. D. 383. The emperor Gratian, having collected together a very powerful army, marched at the head of them againſt Maximus, with a full reſolution of effectually deſtroying his claim to the imperial throne. The two armies accordingly met, and were both drawn up in order of battle; but before the ſignal was given for commencing the action, the greater part of Gratian's forces revolted, and went over to Maximus. This was a fatal ſtroke to Gratian, who, knowing it impoſſible to collect a ſecond army, fled to Lyons, where he was aſſaſſinated by Andragathius, a perſon of great power, and who had ever been his moſt inveterate enemy.

The overthrow of Gratian confirmed the power of Maximus, who, in all probability, might have enjoyed his good fortune and acquiſitions, had not his ambition rendered him preſumptuous, and prompted him to aſpire at the conqueſt of the brave Theodoſius, who inherited the virtues and valour of his father. Intoxicated with ſucceſs, he grew inſolent beyond degree, inſomuch that from inſult he proceeded to menaces. But Theodoſius was not to be intimidated: he advanced againſt him at the head of an army of veterans uſed to conqueſt under his ſtandard, routed him in two ſucceſſive engagements, took him priſoner at Aquileia, put him to death, and thereby defeated all his arrogant projects.

A. D. 385. During theſe ſtruggles for empire on the continent, the Britons, being robbed of their forces, and deprived of the fleets which uſed to guard their coaſts, were expoſed to invaſions of foreign nations. A conſiderable body of the Iriſh landed near Dunbritton, and committed the moſt horrid ravages; while the Scots and Picts broke through the partition walls, and made depredations in various parts of the adjacent country.

As ſoon as Theodoſius was informed of the deplorable ſtate of the Britons, he immediately ſent over Ghryſanthus (a valiant and experienced general) at the head of a powerful army, to repel the inſurgents. The intrepidity and judicious conduct of this commander ſoon wrought the wiſhed-for effect, and the face of affairs in Britain was totally changed. The northern invaders were driven back to their own country, the fleets of pirates, which had, for ſome time, infeſted the coaſts, were defeated, and the haraſſed Britons once more enjoyed the bleſſings of peace.

A. D. 393. During the reign of Theodoſius the Britons were ſecured from any invaſions by foreign enemies, and poſſeſſed an uninterrupted ſtate of tranquillity; but, on the death of that prince, they were again expoſed to the depredations of the reſtleſs and turbulent Caledonians. Theodoſius left the empire to his two ſons Arcadius and Honorius, the eaſtern part being allotted to the former, and the weſtern to the latter. But as Honorius was only twelve years of age, the government, during his minority, was inveſted in the hands of one Stilicho, a man who had particularly diſtinguiſhed himſelf for his great abilities ae well in the cabinet as the field.

A. D. 396. About this period one Neil-Naogaillac, the chief of the Iriſh monarchs, landed in England, and ravaged the counties of Eſſex, Kent, and other places on the ſea coaſt oppoſite to Gaul; while the Caledonians were carrying on their depredations in the northern parts of the iſland.

In this diſtreſſed ſituation the Britons applied to the imperial court for aſſiſtance; in conſequence of which Stilicho immediately ſent over Victorius at the head of a legion, who effectually repulſed the invaders, and ſoon after obliged them to quit the country.

A. D. 403. During the reſidence of Victorius in Britain the inhabitants enjoyed a profound tranquillity, but he being recalled with his legion to make head againſt Alaric the Goth, who threatened to attack even the capital of the Roman empire, the iſland was left without defence, and again expoſed to the ravages of foreign nations.

The Caledonians took particular advantage of this event, and marching towards the ſouthern provinces committed the moſt horrid depredations. In conſequence of this the Britons applied, in the moſt humble manner, for aſſiſtance; but they received no other favour from the emperor than a letter, in which he told them it was impoſſible for him to ſend them any troops, and therefore exhorted them to take up arms in their own defence, and repel, with their own force, the lawleſs invaders of their country.

A. D. 408. Driven to deſpair by the formidable power of the Caledonians, and the refuſal of aſſiſtance from the continent, the Britons for ſome time knew not in what manner to act, but at length they reſolved to diſclaim all connection with Rome, and to form themſelves into an independent ſtate. They accordingly ſeveral times elected a king, and as often hurled him from the throne. The names of theſe monarchs are inſignificant, their actions as ſovereigns immaterial and uncertain: they were elected, for ſome time adored, and then deſtroyed. Affairs were now become deſperate, and the Romans who reſided in Britain, being perſuaded that all reſiſtance againſt the Caledonians would be in vain, buried their treaſures and fled for ſafety to the continent.

A. D. 423. In this diſtracted ſtate did the Britons remain during the reign of Honorius, but on the acceſſion of Valentinian III. to the imperial dignity, the face of affairs was changed. The Caledonians had committed the moſt horrid ravages, and ſpread deſolation through the whole country, in conſequence of which the Britons once more applied to Rome for aſſiſtance. They repreſented their country as on the brink of deſtruction, and implored the emperor not to ſuffer the barbarity of foreigners to extinguiſh the glory of a province ſo long eminent under the Roman government. Valentinian, commiſerating their diſtreſs, immediately diſpatched a legion to their relief; and ſo ſucceſsful were they, that they defeated the Caledonians in ſeveral engagements, and in a ſhort time compelled them to retire to their own country. Having done this, they repaired the partition walls, and put the northern frontiers once more into a poſture of defence. Tranquillity was again reſtored, and peace prevailed throughout the iſland.

A. D. 445. While the Roman troops continued in Britain, the Caledonians remained quiet in their own country; but no ſooner were they withdrawn than thoſe reſtleſs invaders renewed their ravages: the frontier provinces were again filled with blood and ſlaughter; the fields were laid waſte, and every ſpecies of cruelty, that a ferocious enemy could invent, was practiſed on the wretched inhabitants.

Driven to deſpair, and unable to repair the attacks of the Caledonians, the Britons again applied, in the moſt humble manner, to the emperor for protection. Valentinian readily complied with their requeſt, and immediately diſpatched a legion under the command of Gallio, an able and experienced general. Succeſs again attended the Roman ſtandards; the Caledonians were driven back to their own country, and peace was once more reſtored to the iſland.

A. D. 447. But the tranquillity of the Britons, which had been obtained by Gallio, was of ſhort duration. The diſtracted ſtate of affairs on the continent prevented the emperor from being able to ſpare any of his forces, and Gallio, with his legion, was recalled from Britain. The Roman commander was anxious for the welfare of the Britons, and therefore, previous to his departure, gave them ſuch inſtructions as he thought moſt expedient for ſecuring them againſt future depredations from their northern neighbours. He adviſed them to repair and ſtrengthen the wall of Severus, and to build forts along the coaſts againſt the ſudden attacks of pirates. He told them, in very plain terms, that the affairs of the empire would not permit the Romans to give them any farther aſſiſtance, and therefore exhorted them to practiſe the art of war, to become expert and regular in military diſcipline, and to unite themſelves firmly in one body for their general good. He pointed out to them the natural advantages they poſſeſſed from their ſituation; and, in ſhort, gave them every inſtruction he thought neceſſary for the promotion of their welfare and future ſecurity.

Having performed theſe friendly offices, Gallio embarked his forces, took leave of the Britons in the moſt affectionate manner, and paſſed over to the continent. And thus was Britain evacuated, and totally abandoned by the Romans, A. D. 447, about 500 years after its being firſt invaded by them under the conduct of Julius Cæſar, and about 363 after the full conqueſt of it by Agricola, in the reign of the emperor Domitian.

With reſpect to the general ſtate of Britain during the time it was ſubject to the Romans, the only authentic particulars we have are the following, which were publiſhed about the year 410, in a book called the Notitia, containing an account of the the principal events and revolutions of the Roman empire.

The iſland of Britain, which was conſidered as one of the dioceſes belonging to the diſtrict of the Præfectus Prætoria of Gaul, was under the juriſdiction of a governor or vicar, who, according to the number of provinces into which the iſland was divided, had five officers under his command, two of whom were conſulars, and three preſidents. Subordinate to theſe were others of inferior rank, who were appointed to aſſiſt them in the adminiſtration of the civil government of the nation.

The military government was under the ſuperintendance of three principal officers, the firſt of whom had the command of the troops and garriſons in the interior parts of the iſland, and the two latter of the eaſtern and northern coaſts. The whole number of forces under their command amounted to 1700 cavalry, and 19,200 infantry. Theſe were diſperſed in different parts of the iſland, ſome in garriſons on the ſea coaſts, and ſome on the northern frontiers, while others were encamped in Cambridgeſhire, and other interior counties of the kingdom.

In order to facilitate the more expeditious conjunction of theſe troops on any particular emergency, as well as to render the intercourſe of the people more eaſy and agreeable, the ſoldiers, during the times of peace, were employed in making public highways, which are to be ſeen in different parts of the kingdom *. Theſe roads, or public highways, were called by the Romans, the conſular, prætorian, regal and military ways; and afterwards by the Saxons, ſtradas, or ſtreets. The moſt remarkable of theſe were four in number, diſtinguiſhed by the names of Via Vitelingiana, or Watling-Street; Via Icenorum, or Ikenfield-Street; Ermine-Street, and Foſs-way. Two of theſe extended the whole length of the kingdom, and the other two the breadth from ſea to ſea. On theſe grand ways, at proper diſtances, were ſtationary houſes for the convenience of changing horſes, as alſo a great number of inns for the accommodation of travellers. The Romans likewiſe erected many handſome cities in different parts of the kingdom, as alſo a great number of caſtles, forts, towers, walls, &c.

At what exact period of time the Chriſtian religion was firſt introduced into Britain cannot be fully authenticated, but that it was eſtabliſhed during the time the Romans were maſters of the iſland is inconteſtible †. This is evident from the tranſactions that took place in the reign of Dioclesian, when the Britiſh Chriſtians were included in the perſecutions ſet on foot by that emperor. Many of theſe ſuffered martyrdom, the principal and firſt of whom was St. Alban, who was beheaded at Verulam (now St. Alban's in Hertfordſhire) on the 22d of June, A. D. 287, and a magnificent church was erected to his memory about the time of Conſtantine the Great. This edifice, however, was deſtroyed in the Saxon wars, but rebuilt by Offa king of Mercia, and a monaſtry erected adjoining to it, ſome remains of which are ſtill to be ſeen, and the church is a venerable Gothic ſtructure.

But the perſecution under Dioclesian did not prevent the progreſs of Chriſtianity in Britain: for we find that in 314 three Britiſh biſhops attended the council of Arles in France: the like number attended the council of Nice in 325; and in 359 three others attended the council of Arminium. From hence we can juſtly affirm that chriſtianity was very early planted in this iſland, and that the chriſtian church in Britain was originally (as it now is) independent of the church of Rome.

* Among the many monuments of Roman antiquity ſtill ſubſiſting in England, the moſt remarkable are the remains of Adrian's vallum, and the wall of Severus, ſituated principally in the counties of Cumberland and Northumberland. Theſe two run parallel to each other from the Solway Frith beyond Burgh on the Sands near Carliſle, to the neighbourhood of Newcaſtle upon Tyne, which is a diſtance of ſixty-eight miles. Adrian's vallum is a rampart of earth with a large ditch to the northward, and another rampart to the ſouthward, which ſeems to have ſerved as a military way. The wall of Severus was of ſtone, and much more extenſive than that of Adrian's. There are ſome remains of the latter ſtill to be ſeen in ſeveral parts, but the moſt conſpicuous are thoſe of the former. They are ſtill called by the Welch Gaul Sever, and by the Scots Grinſdyke, which, in either of theſe languages, literally ſignifies the Wall of Severus. The remains of this famous wall may be traced from Stanwick near Carliſle weſtward as far as Foulneſs, and eaſtward through many meadows for eight miles; but in ſeveral places the wall has been broken down, ſo that there are only the remains of the exploratory towers, and the deep ditches on each ſide. From thence it extends eaſtward over an hill, where it is almoſt entire, and many of the towers are yet ſtanding. After running about three miles farther it croſſes the river Irthing on the borders of Northumberland: it then runs for ſome miles through an open common, in the courſe of which it is in many places from five to eight feet high. From hence it paſſes over Irthington Moor, where it croſſes a ſmall river called the Tippal, and is continued over ſeveral ridges of very ſteep rocks to the length of about nine miles, where it is from ſix to twenty-four feet high from the precipices. Continuing ſtill eaſtward, it paſſes Bankhead, a ſmall village, where it is almoſt entire; and near this place are the remains of a Roman camp ſtrongly fortified, and ſurrounded by a deep trench. From hence to Scavenſhale, about ten miles farther to the eaſt, it is not above three feet high, owing to the many inroads of the Scots and Picts, who always endeavoured to level ſuch parts as lay in their way. It terminates near the mouth of the river Tyne, but in many places no remains of it are to be ſeen. The ditch is about thirty feet broad, and notwithſtanding all the ravages of time, is in moſt places upwards of five feet deep.

† It is the opinion of ſome antient writers, that the doctrine of Chriſt was firſt preached in Britain by the apoſtle Paul. Clemens, in his famous epiſtle to the Corinthians, expreſsly tells us that, being a preacher both to the eaſt and weſt, he taught righteouſneſs to the world, and went to the utmoſt bounds of the weſt; and Theodoret and others inform us, that he preached not only in Spain, but went to other nations, and brought the Goſpel into the iſles of the ſea, by which it is conjectured, the iſland of Britain is included. And, in ſome farther obſervations on this head it appears, that they reckon the Gauls and Britons among the people whom the apoſtles, and particularly Paul, perſuaded to embrace the doctrine of Chriſt.

BOOK III.

From the final Departure of the Romans from Britain, to the total Diſſolution of the Saxon Heptarchy.

CHAP. I.

The Caledonians make great incurſions into the Britiſh territories, and commit the moſt horrid cruelties. The Britons apply to the Romans for aſſiſtance, but are refuſed. At the inſtigation of Vortigern, their prince, or leader, they invite over the Saxons to aſſiſt them againſt the Caledonians. Hengiſt and Horſa, the two leaders of the Saxons, have an interview with Vortigern in the Iſle of Thanet. The Saxons join the Britons, and drive the Caledonians into their own country. Hengiſt and Horſa invite over great numbers of their countrymen, and thereby conſiderably augment their army. The Saxons form an alliance with the Scots and Picts, and proceed to open hoſtilities againſt the Britons. Vortigern, the Britiſh leader, is depoſed, and his ſon Vortimer appointed in his ſtead. The Britons fight ſeveral battles with the Saxons, in one of which Horſa is ſlain. Hengiſt encreaſes his army from the continent, takes upon him the title of king of Kent, marches againſt the Britons, and commits the moſt horrid cruelties. The Saxons make themſelves maſters of that part of Britain now called England, which they divide into ſeven kingdoms, the whole diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of the Saxon Heptarchy. The names of theſe kingdoms, with the counties each contained.

A. D. 447. NO ſooner were the Caledonians informed that the Romans had finally relinquiſhed Britain, than they conſidered the kingdom as their own, and reſolved to make themſelves maſters of it with all expedition. They accordingly began their hoſtilities by attacking the wall of Severus, in doing which they met with very little oppoſition. Deprived of the animating example of the warlike Romans, and the military ſkill of experienced commanders, the few troops who were appointed to defend it ſuffered their ſpirits to ſink within them, and in the hour of exigence gave that time to deſpondency which ſhould have been employed in their defence. A breach was made, the Caledonians entered, the Britons fled, and a dreadful ſlaughter enſued. Thoſe who eſcaped the ſword made the beſt of their way ſouthward, while the Picts and Scots followed, and ſpread deſolation around as they went, marking their paths with blood, and leaving every where behind them veſtiges of the moſt dreadful devaſtations.

The wretched Britons now diſpatched ambaſſadors to the emperor Valentinian for aſſiſtance. With them they ſent a letter written in the moſt abject ſtrain, and inſcribed, "The groans of the people." Nor were the contents of the letter leſs abject than the inſcription: "The barbarians (ſaid they) drive us towards the ſea, the ſea throws us back upon the barbarians, and we have only the wretched alternative left us, of periſhing either by the ſword or the waves." But their requeſt was in vain: Valentinian himſelf was ſo cloſely preſſed by the Goths and Vandals, that no forces could be ſpared to aſſiſt the diſtreſſed iſlanders: the ravages on the continent were at leaſt equal to thoſe committed in Britain.

The refuſal of all aſſiſtance from Rome threw the Britons into an abſolute ſtate of deſpair: inſtead of attempting to take any meaſures for repelling the invaders of their country, they fled for ſhelter to their woods and mountains, neglected the cultivation of their lands, and, for ſome time, fought a livelihood from hunting.

A. D. 448. The retired ſituation of the Britons, and the total neglect of agriculture, produced a calamity more prejudicial than the ravages made by the cruel Caledonians. A dreadful famine took place, during which prodigious numbers of the Britons periſhed for want of food. The ferocious Caledonians ſeverely felt the conſequences of their inhuman depredations. They found it impoſſible to ſubſiſt in a country themſelves had laid waſte; and therefore retired to their mountains with the ſpoils they had taken from their puſillanimous neighbours.

As ſoon as the Britons found that the Caledonians had retired to their own country, they immediately left their woods and mountains, and returned to their former occupations. They applied themſelves, with great diligence, to the cultivation of the land, till at length famine fled before induſtry, and agriculture ſoon repleniſhed the exhauſted granaries. Bleſſed with the bounties of returning plenty, and cheared by the ſmiles of long loſt freedom, the Britons had now the faireſt opportunity of becoming at once an happy and formidable people; but, emerging from the moſt abject ſtate of miſery, they were not capable of bearing proſperity either with diſcretion or advantage. The public good was ſacrificed to private gratifications, and the intemperance of individuals proved eſſentially injurious to the ſtate. In proportion as they loſt their fears, they grew fond of pleaſures, and becoming the ſlaves of luxury, were incapacitated from every every noble exertion. Their vices were proportioned to their diſſipation, till (ſays Gildas) "evil "was called good, and good evil. To be lewd "was thought honourable; to be virtuous, diſ-"graceful. Being blind themſelves, they be-"came haters of the light, and the meaſures of "their actions were what was moſt pleaſing to "their inclinations. All things were tranſacted "directly contrary to the public welfare and "ſafety, not only of the laity, but alſo the "clergy; and thoſe who ſhould have been ex-"amples of virtue often proved the ringleaders "of vice."

While the Britons continued in this diſſipated ſtate they choſe ſeveral kings of their own; but the power inveſted in them excited the envy of others, and proved fatal to themſelves. Among theſe monarchs was Vortigern, who obtained the ſovereign authority by murdering his predeceſſor, and tho' contaminated with every vice, governed, for ſome time, the degenerated Britons.

A. D. 449. The interior parts of the iſland had been greatly thinned by the ſword and famine; but now another calamity took place, which, for ſome time, threatened a total depopulation of the country. This was a dreadful plague, which raged ſo furiouſly, and ſwept away ſuch prodigious numbers, that, in many parts, the living were ſcarce ſufficient to bury the dead.

No ſooner had this dreadful calamity ſubſided, than the Scots and Picts, judging of the weakneſs of the nation from the reports they had received of the ravages occaſioned by the diſorder, immediately made an irruption into South Britain, and penetrated as far as Stamford in Lincolnſhire.

Alarmed at theſe proceedings, the debaſed and puſillanimous Vortigern, inſtead of animating his ſubjects to defend themſelves, formed a ſcheme for inviting over a foreign army to protect his people. Accordingly, a council was called, the propoſition approved of, and a deputation ordered to be ſent to treat with the Saxons for their protection and aſſiſtance.

At this time the Saxons * were a very formidable people, and inhabited the ſea coaſt from the mouth of the Rhine to Jutland. Their diſtinguiſhing characteriſtic was valour and the love of liberty. Their chiefs who led them to battle, and preſided in their councils, were far from enjoying a deſpotic power; they were ſubject to the regulations of the ſtate, and to the general voice of the people, who always went armed to the council, in order to declare their ſentiments. Their attachment to their leaders was remarkable: when any of them fell in battle, they thought themſelves obliged to revenge their deaths, and never to ſurvive a defeat. They were almoſt ſtrangers to agriculture: they had no lands they could properly call their own, a new diviſion being made every year, leſt the love of property ſhould leſſen their military ardour, which they conſidered as the true ſupport of the ſtate. Such were the Saxons, whom the Britons invited into their country, to defend them againſt the ravages of the Scots and Picts; but who ſoon convinced them that, inſtead of their having ſolicited a friendly alliance, they had taken ſome pains to procure a moſt implacable enemy.

It is little to be wondered at that the ſolicitation of the Britons ſhould be readily agreed to by the Saxons, a people long inured to the camp, who had lived by rapine, and whoſe country, at the time, was overſtocked with inhabitants. Hengiſt and Horſa, their two principal leaders, and who had particularly diſtinguiſhed themſelves for their military proweſs, received the Britiſh deputies with great reſpect, and entered into a treaty with them for complying with the requeſt of their maſter. Theſe two commanders were brothers, and no ſtrangers to Britain, having often viſited the coaſts of the iſland in their piratical excurſions. They knew it to be a fertile country, and the climate inviting; and therefore had no great difficulty in perſuading their countrymen to engage in an enterprize which foreboded the moſt diſtinguiſhed advantages.

A. D. 450. The two Saxon chiefs having collected an army of 1600 choſen men, embarked them on board three veſſels, and ſailing with a fair wind arrived ſafe in the Iſle of Thanet in Kent, which was aſſigned them for their place of reſidence by Vortigern, and was conſequently the firſt piece of land they ever poſſeſſed in Britain.

As ſoon as Vortigern underſtood that the Saxons were arrived, he immediately repaired with his nobles to the Iſle of Thanet in order to compliment them on the occaſion. Hengiſt and Horſa approached the Britiſh monarch in the attitude of ferocious warriors, having in their hands their ſhort broad ſwords, which they uſed with ſo much dexterity and effect; and their troops followed them in the ſame poſture, in order to convince the Britons that they had not applied to a people incapable of affording them that aſſiſtance they had requeſted.

A treaty was now entered into between Vortigern and the Saxon chiefs, in which it was ſtipulated that the latter ſhould defend the Britons from the incurſions of their enemies, for which, beſides the portion of land aſſigned them, they were to be bountifully fed, and liberally rewarded.

The articles of the treaty being ſigned, Vortigern joined his forces with thoſe of the Saxons, and immediately marched againſt the northern invaders of his country. The Caledonians were ſoon convinced that victory was not confined to the Roman ſtandards: in ſeveral repeated engagements the Caledonians were defeated with great ſlaughter, owing to the diſtinguiſhed intrepidity of the Saxons, and were at length obliged to fly to the frontiers of their own country, leaving the prey they had taken to fall into the hands of the conquerors.

This eaſy victory gave the Saxons a very mean opinion of the power of the Britons, who were unable to repel the attacks of ſo undiſciplined a foe: they perceived their own ſuperiority, and determined to improve it to their advantage. Their different expeditions againſt the Scots had given given them the opportunity of ſeeing various parts of the country, which, from its beauty, verdure and fertility, they beheld with an eye of deſire; and obſerving, at the ſame time, that the Britons were enervated by luxury, and ſunk in vice, their ambition was awakened to the ambitious idea of ruling thoſe they came to defend, and enſlaving a people they had been employed to protect.

* The Saxons derived their name from the Gothic word Seax; a word which implies a ſhort, crooked, or hooked ſword, which they wore as their principal weapon, and for the dexterous uſe of which they were particularly celebrated.

To effect this purpoſe, Hengiſt (the moſt artful of the two Saxon leaders) prevailed on the weak and undiſcerning Vortigern to make a more general invitation of his countrymen, telling him, that as the Saxons were particularly ſkilled in huſbandry, the ſoil of the country would be conſiderably improved, and the Britons would be initiated in that ſuperior kind of agriculture to which they had hitherto been ſtrangers. This argument had the deſired effect; a ſecond invitation was ſent to Saxony, and a fleet of ſeventeen ſail brought over a prodigious number of Saxons, Jutes and Angles. With theſe came Rowena, the daughter of Hengiſt, a lady of incomparable beauty, and who was afterwards eſſentially ſerviceable in facilitating the deſigns of her countrymen.

A ſhort time after the arrival of Rowena, Hengiſt invited Vortigern to a ſumptuous entertainment, at which he took care that his daughter ſhould not only be preſent, but that ſhe ſhould particularly diſtinguiſh herſelf by waiting on the king. This anſwered the deſigns of Hengiſt: for no ſooner did Vortigern behold the luſtre of Rowena's charms, than he became the ſlave of their attractions, and, though he had already got a conſort, demanded her in marriage. The artful Hengiſt pretended to decline ſo great an honour, on account of the inferiority of his daughter; but this only encreaſed the deſires of Vortigern, who appeared willing to ſacrifice every thing to the gratification of his paſſions. Hengiſt determined to take advantage of the then diſpoſition of the king, and therefore propoſed the following conditions: that the whole county of Kent ſhould be ceded to him; and that Vortigern ſhould divorce his queen, and make Rowena his ſole conſort. The infatuated Vortigern readily conſented to this propoſal: Kent was immediately given up to Hengiſt, and the Britiſh princeſs was cruelly divorced, though ſhe had borne her huſband many children.

The charms of Rowena ſo wrought upon Vortigern that he gave himſelf up entirely to her company; and ſhe obtained ſuch an aſcendancy over him that her will was law. This was eaſily perceived by Hengiſt, who determined to take advantage of it, and to ſtrike his ultimate ſtroke of policy. He accordingly deſired his daughter to propoſe to Vortigern that another body of his countrymen ſhould be ſent for, who, by inhabiting the northern parts of the iſland, would be a conſtant check upon any attempts that might be made in future by the Caledonians. Vortigern, without giving himſelf the leaſt trouble to think of the conſequences, readily conſented to this propoſal. Accordingly, a third embarkation took place; forty ſail of ſhips ſoon appeared on the Britiſh coaſts, and the northern parts of the iſland began (as the ſouthern had for ſome time done) to ſwarm with ſtrangers from the continent.

A. D. 451. From the great increaſe of the Saxons the army of Hengiſt was conſiderably augmented, the number of troops added to his army amounting to upwards of 5000 effective men. The Britons beheld this with the utmoſt anxiety of mind; and the very people in whom they had placed their confidence now became their terror. They had been witneſſes of their valour againſt their northern enemies, and dreaded the conſequences that would inevitably enſue ſhould they turn their ſwords againſt them.

It was not long before the Britons were made ſenſible that their apprehenſions were too juſtly founded. Hengiſt and Horſa, having ſucceeded to their wiſhes, now thought proper to throw off the maſk, and publicly avow their intentions. They accordingly began by demanding a larger ſum of money, and a greater quantity of proviſions, than what they were entitled to by the original ſtipulations, that thoſe of their countrymen, who laſt came over, might be as well provided for as thoſe who firſt landed. This requeſt was unanimouſly refuſed by the Britons, who remonſtrated with the Saxons on the unreaſonableneſs of their demand, as their number had ſo greatly increaſed, ſince their firſt arrival in the iſland. The refuſal was what the Saxons expected, and, in fact, wiſhed for, as it gave them the ſhadow of a pretence to commit hoſtilities, by pretending to pay themſelves, and take by force what, they affirmed, was unjuſtly with-held from them. They accordingly, without any farther heſitation, entered into an alliance with the Scots and Picts, ravaged the adjacent country, and laid waſte, with fire and ſword, the territories of a people who had called them to their defence.

A. D. 455. The deluded Britons now perceived the folly of the ſtep they had taken, and were deſirous of retrieving it. Filled with indignation at the perfidy of the Saxons, and exaſperated at the vices of Vortigern, they hurled the guilty potentate from his throne, and placed the ſceptre in the hands of Vortimer his ſon. Under the banners of that active prince they fought many battles with various ſucceſs, though the advantage was generally on the ſide of the Saxons. In one remarkable action, however, fought at Eglesford (now Ailsford) victory declared for the Britons, and Horſa, one of the Saxon generals, fell in the conflict.

A. D. 457. From the different engagements with the Britons, the Saxon army was greatly reduced, in conſequence of which Hengiſt (who was now the ſole commander of his countrymen) ſent over to Germany for a freſh ſupply of troops. On the arrival of theſe Hengiſt took upon himſelf the title of king of Kent, and marching at the head of his army marked his route with blood and devaſtation. Neither age or ſex were ſpared: the prieſts were burnt upon the altars, and the prince and the peaſant ſhared the ſame fate. The ſtructures dedicated to religion were levelled in the duſt; and the whole country through which they paſſed exhibited the moſt dreadful ſpectacle of horror and deſolation.

A. D. 465. The Britiſh monarch beheld the deſtruction of his country with the moſt poignant grief, and exerted his utmoſt endeavours to put a ſtop to the barbarous ravages of the Saxons. But before he could accompliſh this deſirable end, death put a final period to his labours, and the Britons were left without a leader. As the fate of their country was now at ſtake no time was to be loſt in appointing one to ſupply the place of their late commander; and accordingly Ambroſius, a Briton of Roman deſcent, was choſen to the regal dignity by the unanimous voice of the people. A more proper perſon could not, indeed, have been choſen to hold the reins of government at this dangerous criſis. He was humane, prudent and intrepid: his conduct and valour were equally eminent; he was not to be intimidated by the power of the enemy, nor provoked to raſh meaſures by their cruelty. He endeavoured all in his power to unite his countrymen in their reſiſtance againſt the Saxons: nor were his labours wholly without ſucceſs; the military ſpirit of the Britons, who had been long ſunk into a fatal lethargy, was revived, and their ſtruggles for maintaining their liberty ſeemed to promiſe a favourable iſſue.

The Saxon leader perceived the great alteration in the conduct of the Britons, and was alarmed for the conſequences. Inſtead of extending his ravages, he found it difficult to keep poſſeſſion of his kingdom of Kent. Aſſiſted by the famous Arthur *, (whoſe exploits have given riſe to many fables) Ambroſius defeated ſeveral detachments of the Saxons, and, from his diſtinguiſhed ſucceſs, greatly alarmed the camp of the enemy. In conſequence of this Hengiſt ſent for another tribe of his countrymen under the command of his brother Octa; but inſtead of joing the Saxons in Kent, he ordered him to land and ſettle in Northumberland, in order to divide the forces and attention of Ambroſius; while himſelf continued with his army in the ſouthern parts of the iſland.

A. D. 468. While Hengiſt lay inactive, Ambroſius was aſſiduous in ſettling the affairs of his kingdom, and taking ſuch meaſures as might enable him to withſtand any future attempts of the enemy. He ſummoned a general aſſembly of the heads of the people at York, where orders were given for reſtoring the ſtate of the churches, which had been almoſt wholly deſtroyed by the Saxons; he likewiſe made many regulations for the benefit and welfare of his ſubjects, who were ſo well ſatisfied with his conduct, that they teſtified their approbation by ſolemnly crowning him king at Stonehenge in Wiltſhire, then the moſt ſacred and eſteemed place in the Britiſh dominions.

A. D. 477. During theſe tranſactions freſh forces were continually arriving from the northern parts of Germany, under different leaders. Among theſe the Angles made a conſpicuous figure, both with regard to number and military abilities. They were of a different nation from the Saxons; but being of the ſame religion, ſpeaking the ſame language, and coming upon the ſame errand, they joined the forces of Hengiſt, and, with them, acted in conſort againſt the forces of Ambroſius.

A. D. 478. In the beginning of this year one Ella, a Saxon chief, attended by his three ſons, Cymer Wlecing and Ciſſa, landed, at the head of his forces, on the coaſt of Suſſex. He was, however, bravely oppoſed by the Britons, and obliged to wait for freſh ſuccours before he could make any ſettlement in the country. Theſe being arrived, he committed the moſt horrid depredations, putting to death every perſon that fell in his way without diſtinction of age or ſex. Thoſe who eſcaped the ſlaughter fled, and took refuge in the foreſts, leaving their poſſeſſions to the conqueror, who ſoon after extended his dominion over all Suſſex and a great part of Surry, taking upon him the title of king of the South Saxons.

A. D. 495. The next diſtinguiſhed chief among the Saxons that arrived in England was Cerdic, who, accompanied by his ſon Kenrick, landed on the weſtern coaſt with a conſiderable army, about ſeventeen years after Ella had founded the kingdom of Suſſex. The forces of Cerdic were much ſuperior to thoſe of Ella, notwithſtanding which he met with much greater difficulties. The Britons, taught by paſt experience, were continually on their guard, and ſo well prepared to receive the enemy, that they gave Cerdic battle on the very day of his landing; and though vanquiſhed, the continued, for ſome time, to defend their poſſeſſions and liberties againſt the invaders of their country. At length the army of Cerdic being conſiderably reinforced, he conquered all oppoſition, and laid the foundation of the kingdom of Weſſex.

A. D. 527. While the Saxons were buſily employed in extending their conqueſts in the ſouth, a conſiderable body of them, headed by ſeveral leaders, landed on the eaſtern coaſt of Britain. After fighting many battles, of which hiſtory has preſerved no particular account, they eſtabliſhed three new kingdoms in the iſland, diſtinguiſhed by the names of Eaſt Anglia, Mercia, and Eaſt Saxony, or Eſſex. Uffa, a leader of the Angles, aſſumed the title of king of the firſt, Crida of the ſecond, and Erkedwin of the third.

Some time after Hengiſt had prevailed on the weak and deluded Vortigern to admit of a ſecond embarkation of his countrymen, great numbers of them ſettled in different parts of Northumberland; but not having a proper leader, they were for ſome time unable to ſubdue the inhabitants. At length, from the great conqueſts made by other chiefs, an enterprizing leader, named Ida, was induced to try his fortune in that part of the iſland. He accordingly embarked from the continent with a conſiderable army, and, joining his countrymen, marched againſt the Britons, whom he drove, with great ſlaughter, from their poſſeſſions, and having totally ſubdued the inhabitants of the counties of Northumberland and Durham, took upon himſelf the title of king of Bernicia.

While Ida was employed in reducing the northern parts of the kingdom, another Saxon prince, named Ella, ſubdued Lancaſhire and the greater part of Yorkſhire, which he formed into a kingdom,

* This hero, we are told, was born at Tindagium, or Tindangell, in Cornwall, but, like ſome other great men in the early part of the hiſtory of this iſland, his origin is ſo obſcure as not to be traced with any certainty. Some writers make him the ſon of Utherpendragon brother to Ambroſius; while others ſay, he was the ſon of Nazon Leod, who was either one of the kings of Wales, or a general of the Britons; but others, and indeed with greater probability, make him the ſon of Gurlois, and add, that he was king of Cornwall.

dom, under the title of Deiri. These two kingdoms were afterwards united by a marriage between the grandson of Ida, and the daughter of Ella, under the title of the king of Northumberland.

Thus was that part of Britain called England totally subjugated by the Saxons, who divided the whole into seven distinct kingdoms, each under the direction of a particular monarch. A division mentioned by all writers under the name of the Saxon Heptarchy.

The names of the different kingdoms, by whom founded, and the counties each contained, will be seen at one view in the following table:

With respect to the particular circumstances that took place in the course of this war between the Saxons and Britons, little is recorded, and that so incoherent as not to deserve notice. All that can be relied on as authentic is, that the renowned British prince Arthur signalized himself for his military exploits under Ambrosius: that on the demise of that prince he succeeded to the command of the Britons, and headed them in various battles with the Saxons, and with various success; till at last his own nephew, having violated his bed and usurped his authority, Arthur raised a powerful army to chastise his treacherous conduct, as did the other to ward off the resentment of his justly incensed uncle; and that both parties being highly enraged, they challenged each other to single combat, in which Mordred the nephew was slain on the spot, but not till he had mortally wounded his uncle Arthur, who, after lingering a few days, expired at Glastonbury in the year 542, after having ruled in Britain 76 years.

CHAP. II.

Containing an account of the respective monarchs that succeeded each other on the different thrones that formed the Saxon Heptarchy, with a circumstantial detail of the various transactions and revolutions that took place in each kingdom, from their first establishment to their final dissolution by Egbert, the first sole monarch of England.

HAVING, in the preceding chapter, premised as much as can be deemed authentic relative to the arrival of the Saxons in this island, and the state of the war by which the Heptarchy, or government of the Anglo-Saxons, considered as forming one body and one state, was established, we shall now proceed to give a succinct account of the succession of the kings, and the revolution of each particular kingdom, of which the Saxon Heptarchy was composed. In doing this we shall place them in order according to the different periods they were established, beginning with

The Kingdom of KENT.

A. D. 455. THE kingdom of Kent, which was by far the most formidable of all those that constituted the Heptarchy, was founded by Hengist, the great leader of the Saxons, in the year 455, about five years after his first arrival in Britain. During his life the kingdom of Kent claimed an ascendancy, in point of strength and power, over the rest; but after his death it greatly declined, owing to the inattention and supineness of his three immediate successors, namely, Eske, Octa and Ymrick.

The indolence of the Kentish princes was particularly ticularly obſerved by Ceaulin king of Weſſex, a man of an ambitious and aſpiring diſpoſition, who having unjuſtly ſeized the ſceptre of Suſſex, reſolved to attempt the reduction of Kent, and, if poſſible, make himſelf maſter of the whole heptarchy.

A. D. 593. At this time, Ethelbert, the great grandſon of Hengiſt, filled the Kentiſh throne. He had long beheld with grief the declining ſtate of the kingdom, and reſolved to uſe his utmoſt efforts in order to reſtore it to its primitive luſtre. Poſſeſſed of all the intrepidity of Hengiſt, and being at the ſame time a ſtrict obſerver of juſtice, he was univerſally beloved, not only by his own ſubjects, but alſo thoſe of the confederate kingdoms, and the different princes paid him the moſt diſtinguiſhed reſpect.

Ethelbert was no ſtranger to the ambitious deſigns of Ceaulin, which he determined, if poſſible, to render abortive. To effect this, he ſummoned the other princes of the different kingdoms to a general council, when he informed them that Ceaulin had acted inconſiſtently with the true and original ſtate of the heptarchy, by ſeizing the territories conſtitutionally appertaining to the South Saxons, and that if ſome efficacious meaſures were not immediately taken, he might, in time, make himſelf maſter of the whole iſland. The other Saxon princes ſaw this repreſentation in its proper light, and, in conſequence thereof, not only furniſhed him with troops, but likewiſe appointed him to the chief command againſt the king of the Weſt Saxons, whom they now conſidered as their common enemy.

Ceaulin clearly ſaw the ſtorm that was gathering around him, and exerted his whole force to defend himſelf againſt its fury. Having gathered together his troops, he marched with great reſolution againſt Ethelbert, when a deſperate battle enſued, which was ſupported, for ſome time, with equal ſpirit on both ſides. At length victory declared in favour of Ethelbert, the forces of Ceaulin were routed with great ſlaughter, and though himſelf was not ſlain in the battle, yet he ſoon after paid the debt of nature.

Thus deprived of their leader, and having loſt the greater part of their army, the Weſt Saxons were in no condition to make any farther attempts in oppoſing the combined army: they therefore threw down their arms, and ſubmitted to Ethelbert, who reſtored the kingdom to the lawful heir, and, from his great military proweſs, as well as ſingular talents in the cabinet, became afterwards the chief of the Saxon ſovereigns.

A. D. 596. But the moſt remarkable incident that diſtinguiſhed the reign of Ethelbert was, the introduction of Chriſtianity among the Saxons. The Britons had long enjoyed the light of the goſpel, but whether or not they made any attempt to convert them is uncertain: indeed, the Saxons, except thoſe who inhabited the kingdom of Kent, had been ſo continually engaged in the hurry and tumult of war, that they had no leiſure to examine into the truths of Chriſtianity; at the ſame time it could hardly be ſuppoſed they would liſten to the reaſonings of the Britons, who were at once both their ſlaves and their enemies.

Theſe difficulties, however, were at length happily removed by the marriage of Ethelbert with Bertha, the daughter of Caribert king of France. This princeſs was a Chriſtian, and therefore it was ſtipulated, by the articles of marriage, that ſhe ſhould be permitted to enjoy the free exerciſe of her own religion. In conſequence of this ſhe was attended by one Luidard, a prelate venerable at once for his great piety and learning. He officiated in the church of St. Martin, which had been built in the time of the Romans, near the walls of Canterbury, and, by his frequent diſcourſes with the nobility, and others belonging to the court, converted many to the Chriſtian faith. The excellent genius and underſtanding of the queen greatly contributed to his ſucceſs; and at the ſame time her exemplary life and uncommon learning, made a ſtriking impreſſion on the king, who, in conſequence thereof, conceived a very favourable idea of the principles of the Chriſtian religion.

Theſe favourable circumſtances being made known to Pope Gregory the Great, who then filled the papal chair, he began to entertain the pleaſing hopes of being able to deſtroy the ſuperſtitious worſhip of the Saxons in Britain, and, inſtead thereof, to eſtabliſh the glorious tenets of the goſpel. To accompliſh this noble deſign, he ſent Auguſtin, or Auſtin, a Roman monk, with ſeveral others of his fraternity, to preach the goſpel in Britain. Theſe miſſionaries accordingly ſet out on their embaſſy, but on their arrival at Provence in France, they were ſo intimidated from the accounts they received of the ferocious manners of the Saxons, and their ſuperſtitious attachment to the religion of their anceſtors, that they ſent their ſuperior back to the pope, in order to obtain leave to relinquiſh their deſign, and return to Rome.

Gregory was inflexible in his deſign, and therefore ſent peremptory orders for them to proceed; but at the ſame time, in order to remove all diſagreeable apprehenſions, he wrote a letter to the king of France, beſeeching him to take the fathers under his protection, and furniſh them with every neceſſary for promoting the ſucceſs of the undertaking. He likewiſe wrote a letter to Brunehaute, queen of Burgundy, requeſting, in the moſt preſſing manner, her aſſiſtance on this intereſting occaſion. This ſolicitation was far from being made in vain. Brunehaute exerted all her power to render the attempt ſucceſsful, and not only ſupplied the miſſionaries with interpreters who could ſpeak the Saxon language, but likewiſe ſent letters to the moſt conſiderable people at the Britiſh court, recommending Auguſtine and his followers to their protection.

A. D. 597. Thus furniſhed with every thing neceſſary for his miniſtry, Auguſtine, accompanied by his aſſiſtants, embarked for Britain, and, after a ſhort paſſage, ſafely landed in the iſle of Thanet. Auguſtine immediately diſpatched one of his interpreters to the Kentiſh court, informing Ethelbert of the intention of his coming, and requeſting his permiſſion to preach publickly the doctrine of the goſpel. This meſſage was reſpectfully received by Ethelbert, but at the ſame time he did not think proper to grant Auguſtine an immediate audience. He, however, ordered him to continue in the iſle of Thanet, and gave directions for his being properly ſupplied with all the neceſſary articles of life.

A few days after this, Ethelbert, accompanied by his queen and the greater part of the nobility, repaired to the iſle of Thanet, in order to hear Auguſtine expound the doctrine of the goſpel. Apprehenſive, however, that ſpells or enchantments might be uſed againſt him by prieſts, who brought an unknown worſhip from a diſtant country, the king took the precaution of receiving the miſſionaries in the open air, where he imagined the force of their magic (ſhould they attempt to practiſe any) would be rendered abortive.

Ethelbert and his queen being ſeated under a tree, the monks advanced to audience with a ſlow and ſolemn pace, chanting their litanies with all the marks of unaffected devotion. Auſtin then expounded the doctrines of the Chriſtian religion, and, to ſtrike an impreſſion on the mind of Ethelbert, to whom he particularly addreſſed himſelf, promiſed him eternal joys above, and a kingdom in heaven without end, if he would be perſuaded to receive the ſalutary tenets of the goſpel. "Your words and promiſes (replied Ethelbert) "are fair; but as they are new and uncertain, I "cannot entirely yield to them, and relinquiſh "the principles, which I and my anceſtors have "ſo long maintained. You are welcome, how-"ever, to remain here in peace, and as you have "undertaken ſo long a journey ſolely, as appears, "for what you believe to be for our advantage, I "will permit you to deliver your doctrines to my "ſubjects." At the ſame time he ordered Auſtin and his companions to be provided with all neceſſaries, and allotted Canterbury, the capital of his dominions, as the place of their reſidence.

Encouraged by this favourable reception, Auſtin and his companions proceeded, with redoubled zeal, to preach the goſpel to the Kentiſh Saxons, and added ſtrength to their doctrine by the remarkable auſterities of their lives. The Saxons were perſuaded that the followers of a religion which mortified every paſſion, muſt act from conviction, and that the tenets they profeſſed muſt be founded on a baſis more than human. They therefore liſtened with great attention to the new doctrine, and many of them were brought over to the Chriſtian faith. Ethelbert himſelf, convinced of the truth of the goſpel, no longer heſitated to profeſs his tenets, but publicly acknowledged his converſion, by ſuffering himſelf to be baptized, in the preſence of his courtiers, who, from his example, became proſelytes to the Chriſtian religion.

In conſequence of this ſucceſs, the liberties of the miſſionaries were enlarged, and Chriſtianity preached in every part of the iſland. Chriſtchurch in Canterbury, which had been built in the time of the Romans, was made a cathedral, and Auguſtine appointed archbiſhop; the churches which had fallen to decay were repaired; the heathen temples were conſecrated and ſet apart for divine worſhip, and a ſeminary of learning was opened in Canterbury, the capital of Ethelbert's dominions.

The propagation of Chriſtianity in Britain was (as is general the caſe where there is a ſimilarity of ſentiments in religion) productive of civil connections. The Anglo-Saxons opened an intercourſe with the nations on the continent, and, from them, conceived an idea of more cultivated manners. They ſaw the many advantages that reſulted from a polite and generous behaviour: from connections founded on virtue; from reciprocal acts of kindneſs and benevolence; and wiſhed to imitate the practice.

A. D. 598. After Ethelbert had become a convert to the Chriſtian faith, he uſed his utmoſt efforts, in conjunction with Bertha his queen, to propagate the tenets of the goſpel throughout his dominions. In this he ſucceeded to his wiſhes, having done which he directed his attention towards the civil government of his people. He made many wiſe regulations for their future welfare, and enacted a body of laws which he cauſed to be written and publiſhed, that none might plead ignorance of the contents.

The remaining part of the reign of Ethelbert is marked with no tranſaction of importance, except the death of the virtuous Bertha. No diſturbance happened: his people were happy, and he, after a proſperous reign of forty-eight years, paid the debt of nature, univerſally beloved and lamented by his ſubjects.

A. D. 616. On the death of Ethelbert, the Kentiſh throne was filled by his ſon Eadbald, a prince of a very wicked and profligate diſpoſition. Blinded by an inceſtuous paſſion for his mother-in-law (a French princeſs whom his father had married after the death of the amiable Bertha) he abandoned his religion that he might indulge his criminal exceſſes without reſtraint. In conſequence of this ſtep many of the nobility followed his example, and the tenets of the goſpel were in danger of falling a ſacrifice to heathen ſuperſtition.

The abandoned life of Eadbald, and the conſequences that aroſe therefrom, greatly affected Laurentius, who ſucceeded Auſtin in the ſee of Canterbury. This prelate, fearleſs of danger when religion called for his aſſiſtance, laboured, with the utmoſt aſſiduity, to make Eadbald ſenſible of the enormity of his vices; and at length happily ſucceeded. Convinced by the arguments of Laurentius, he renounced the Pagan religion, divorced his inceſtuous conſort, and became a remarkable penitent for the crimes he had committed. He demoliſhed the idolatrous temples, and eſtabliſhed the Chriſtian religion throughout his kingdom. He extended his care for the intereſt of the goſpel even beyond the limits of his territories; and greatly contributed, by the force of his arguments, as well as by his exemplary piety, to the converſion of Edwin king of Northumberland.

In this manner did Eadbald ſpend his time for the ſpace of twenty-four years, when he paid the debt of nature, leaving behind him the character of an excellent and pious prince. Before his death he obtained the conſent of his ſubjects to ſettle the ſucceſſion of the throne on his youngeſt ſon Ercombert, but with this reſtriction, that the heirs of Ermenfrid, his elder brother, ſhould ſucceed to the crown at his deceaſe.

A. D. 640. Ercombert readily agreed to the conditions, and as readily forgot them when ſettled on the throne. But, excepting this breach of promiſes, he might be called a good prince, and a zealous profeſſor of chriſtianity, for, during the ſhort time he poſſeſſed the ſovereignty he contributed to the eſtabliſhment of Chriſtianity, by deſtroying every temple and idol throughout his his dominions. He reigned twenty-four years, and, at his death, left two ſons, namely, Egbert and Lotharius.

A. D. 664. Egbert having obtaind the ſovereignty reſolved to preſerve it by means the moſt deteſtable, namely, by taking off his nephews, whom he well knew were the true heirs to the throne. He accordingly prevailed on one Thunner, a creature of his own, to murder the royal youths. This execrable monſter performed the inhuman office, and threw the bodies into a river, where they were afterwards found floating on the water, and being taken up were interred in the abbey of Ramſay.

But the deaths of theſe two young princes was not ſufficient to remove the jealouſy of Egbert: their ſiſter Domneva was ſtill alive, and married to the king of Mercia. He therefore prevailed on her to renounce her claim to the crown, in conſideration of ſome lands being ceded to her in the Iſle of Thanet, where ſhe built a monaſtery, and preſided herſelf as prioreſs.

The remaining part of Egbert's reign was mild, peaceable and virtuous. He applied himſelf to the duties of religion, in order to atone for the atrocious crime he had committed, and at length died in the ninth year of his reign, leaving two ſons, namely, Edric and Widred.

A. D. 673. On the death of Egbert his brother Lotharius, under pretence of his nephews being too young to govern, ſeized on the ſovereignty. This dignity he enjoyed without moleſtation during a period of ten years, when he aſſociated with him his ſon Richard as a partner in the kingdom.

This proceeding ſo incenſed his nephew Edric, that he immediately withdrew from court, fully reſolved, if poſſible, to obtain his right of the ſovereignty by force of arms. To effect this he applied to Adelivalch, king of the South Saxons, who generouſly aſſiſted him with a conſiderable body of forces. At the head of theſe Edric marched into Kent, and a general battle enſued, in which the troops of Lotharius were defeated, and himſelf, being mortally wounded with an arrow, died ſoon after.

A. D. 685. On the death of Lotharius, his ſon Richard, inſtead of making any attempt to poſſeſs himſelf of the crown, fled into Germany, leaving Edric ſole maſter of the Kentiſh dominions. But this dignity he only enjoyed one year, and even this ſhort interval of time was filled with tumults and commotions, occaſioned by the party of the late king, and the diſputes which took place relative to the ſucceſſion.

During theſe commotions Ceadwalla, king of Weſſex, invaded Kent, and plundered a conſiderable part of the country without oppoſition, till all the inhabitants, provoked by their loſſes, took up arms in their own defence, and defeated their enemies. Mollo, the brother of Ceadwalla, being obliged to retire for ſafety into a houſe, with twelve of his followers, defended himſelf, for ſome time, with great bravery, but at length the Kentiſh men ſet fire to the building, in conſequence of which both he and his gallant companions periſhed in the flames. His brother was ſo exaſperated at this cruel action, that he entered Kent at the head of a powerful army, and, fired with reſentment, laid waſte the greater part of the whole country.

In the midſt of theſe diſtractions Edric died; nor was there any prince of the Hengiſt family who had ſpirit ſufficient to aſſume the reins of government, ſo that an inter-regnum, or rather anarchy enſued, which continued about ſix years.

A. D. 693. At length Widred, the youngeſt ſon of Egbert, aſcended the throne, and, in order to appeaſe the commotions that ſubſiſted among the nobility, aſſociated with him one Swabert (a very popular man and a particular favourite of the people) in the government. But Swabert did not long enjoy his power: he ſurvived his elevation only four years, and then left Widred in ſole poſſeſſion of the throne.

Widred, being now freed from the commotions which had ſo long diſtracted the kingdom, governed his people with remarkable prudence and equanimity. He was a great benefactor to the church, which, together with his juſtice, candour and humanity, gained him the univerſal affection of his ſubjects.

On the death of Widred his eldeſt ſon Edbert ſucceeded to the ſovereignty. He inherited the underſtanding and humanity of his father, and by theſe means enjoyed a peaceable reign for the ſpace of thirty-two years, when he died, leaving the crown to his brother Edelbert.

A. D. 725. Edelbert, on his acceſſion to the throne, admitted his ſon Ardulph as a partner with him in the government, but ſurviving him, he bequeathed the ſceptre to his brother Aldric.

A. D. 760. Aldric was the laſt prince lineally deſcended from Hengiſt, the firſt founder of the monarchy. After his death (which happened in 794) the kingdom was rent with factions for eleven years, during which time the crown became the ſport of fortune. Towns were laid in aſhes, and the fields manured with the blood of their owners. Nor were theſe troubles terminated till Egbert (in the year 805) united in his perſon the ſeven crowns of the Saxon Heptarchy, after Kent had continued a diſtinct and ſeparate kingdom during an interval of 350 years.

The Kingdom of SUSSEX, or the SOUTH SAXONS.

A. D. 477. THIS kingdom was the moſt inconſiderable of all thoſe which formed the Saxon Heptarchy, and the hiſtory of it is exceeding imperfect. It contained only the two counties of Suſſex and Surry, a very conſiderable part of which was covered with woods and foreſts. At the ſame time it was very thinly inhabited, and therefore incapable of making any effectual reſiſtance againſt the attempts of an enterprizing enemy.

The kingdom of Suſſex was founded by Ella, a perſon of great military merit, who landed in Britain, tain, at the head of a conſiderable body of forces, to ſtrengthen the intereſt of Hengiſt. He maintained his ground ſome time againſt the Britons, whom he at length totally routed; and having poſſeſſed himſelf of a throne was, on the death of Hengiſt, choſen by the Saxons to ſucceed him as head of the confederacy.

A. D. 514. On the death of Ella the throne of Suſſex fell to his ſon Ciſſa, who, contented with the quiet poſſeſſion of a power, the foundation of which was obtained by ſlaughter, choſe to pay a yearly proportion of money, and furniſh a certain number of troops, to Cerdic king of Weſſex, who, on the death of Ella, was placed at the head of the Saxon Heptarchy. By theſe means Ciſſa prevented the flames of war from ſpreading into his own country, and Cerdic was farther enabled to repel and ſubdue the Britons.

Though Ciſſa was far from poſſeſſing the abilities of his father in a military line, yet he was equally well calculated to hold the reins of government. He dedicated his time to acts of the moſt commendable nature, and inceſſantly laboured to promote the happineſs and tranquillity of his ſubjects. He built the city of Chicheſter, and made it the capital of his dominions. His age and the length of his reign were extended beyond the common limits of mankind. He paid the debt of nature in the 117th year of his age, ſeventy-ſix of which he governed his kingdom with general ſatisfaction, and died univerſally lamented.

A. D. 590. Ciſſa dying without iſſue, Ceaulin, king of the Weſt-Saxons, ſeized his dominions, in conſequence of which a confederacy was formed againſt him, and he was vanquiſhed and diſpoſſeſſed by his nephew Ceolric, who retained Suſſex as part of his conqueſts.

After this event the kingdom of Suſſex was ſubject to ſeveral revolutions; but at length it was totally ſubdued and united to that of the Weſt-Saxons, after it had remained a ſeparate kingdom 277 years, from its firſt eſtabliſhment by Ella.

The Kingdom of WESSEX, or the West-Saxons.

AS the kingdom of Suſſex was one of the moſt inconſiderable, ſo was that of Weſſex one of the moſt important of the heptarchy, and the Saxons met with greater oppoſition in their endeavours to poſſeſs themſelves of this than any other part of the country. It received its name from being ſituated to the weſt of the other Saxon ſettlements in Kent and Suſſex, and extended from the river Thames to the Britiſh channel. Its principal cities were Wincheſter the capital, Southampton, Portſmouth, Saliſbury, Dorcheſter, Sherborne and Exeter.

A. D. 521. The founder of this monarchy was Cerdic, one of the greateſt generals among the Saxons. He and his ſon Kenric fought many battles againſt the natives with various ſucceſs, nor was Cerdic able to eſtabliſh his kingdom till after the deaths of Ambroſius and Arthur, who, for ſeveral years, ſupported the falling liberties of their country. With them all reſiſtance terminated, and Cerdic ſat down in peace on the throne he had founded in the blood of an innocent people. He enjoyed the ſovereignty for the ſpace of twenty-three years, when he died, and left it to his ſon Kenrick, who had come over with him from Germany, and been very inſtrumental in defeating the Britons, and procuring the eſtabliſhment of the kingdom.

A. D. 544. Kenrick preſerved the ſovereignty only four years, when he died, and was ſucceeded by his eldeſt ſon Ceaulin. This prince inherited the military abilities and ferocious paſſions of his grandfather, but was a ſtranger to his milder virtues. He carried on a continued war againſt the Britons, and added great part of the counties of Devon and Somerſet to his other dominions. Hurried away by the tide of ſucceſs, he invaded the other Saxon ſtates in the neighbourhood of his his own territories, and became at length ſo terrible to all that a general confederacy was formed againſt him. Ethelbert king of Kent was made general of the allied forces, and the army of Ceaulin was totally defeated. This misfortune rendered him contemptible in the eyes of his ſubjects, who, from the cruelty of his diſpoſition, only obeyed him through fear: they therefore now publicly ſhewed their abhorrence of his conduct, and expelling him from the throne, he died in exile and miſery.

A. D. 594. After the expulſion of Ceaulin, the victorious Ethelbert placed his nephew Ceolric on the throne of Weſſex. This prince had joined the confederacy formed againſt his uncle, and was entirely devoted to his benefactor. He reigned only ſeven years, during which nothing material occurred worthy of hiſtorical notice.

A. D. 601. On the death of Ceolric the crown of Weſſex fell to his nephew Ceolwolph, a prince of great military abilities, and poſſeſſed of talents equally well calculated for the cabinet as the field. He ſupported the dignity of his kingdom, and acquired great reputation by his prudent conduct and deliberate government; but his whole reign was one continued ſcene of action. He had many enemies to contend with, the moſt formidable of whom was Redwald, king of Eaſt-Anglia, at that time the head of the Saxon confederacy. The conteſt between them was violent and bloody, but at length victory declared in favour of Ceolwolph. He did not, however, long enjoy the honours he had acquired, being ſuddenly taken off while he was engaged in reducing the South-Saxons, after having ſat on the throne ten years.

A. D. 611. Ceolwolph dying without iſſue was ſucceeded by his nephew Kinegils, or Cinegils, who, in the third year of his reign, admitted his brother Quincelm as partner with him in the government. For the ſpace of two years after this conjunction the kingdom enjoyed a profound tranquillity; but at the expiration of that time the Britons began to make inroads into the territories of Weſſex. In conſequence of this the two brothers marched at the head of their forces againſt the enemy, whom they attacked near Bindon in Dorſetſhire, and a deſperate battle enſued, ſued in which the Britons were routed with great ſlaughter *.

By this defeat the Britons were diſabled from making any farther attempts againſt the Saxons for ſome time, and a general tranquillity prevailed throughout the kingdom. But at length the great qualities of the conjunctive monarchs procured them another enemy in the perſon of Penda, king of Mercia, who attempting to take from them the town of Cirenceſter, a battle enſued, which continued with aſtoniſhing reſolution till night put an end to the conteſt. The next morning preſented to their eyes a moſt diſmal ſcene of ſlaughter, and cooler thoughts ſuggeſted, that a renewal of the engagement would end in the deſtruction of both armies. In conſequence of this each party relaxed, a reconciliation was formed, and peace happily concluded.

A. D. 634. The next material tranſaction that took place was, the eſtabliſhment of Chriſtianity in Weſſex; for though the goſpel had been planted in the kingdom of Kent, yet the Weſt Saxons were ſtill immerſed in all the errors of Pagan ſuperſtition. The torch of truth had not yet been lighted up in this part of the iſland; but the darkneſs of bigotry and error was now to be diſpelled, and the true religion eſtabliſhed in its ſtead. One Berinus, an Italian eccleſiaſtic, after being conſecrated by the pope, was ſent into Britain, in order to aſſiſt in converting the Saxons to chriſtianity. He preached for ſome time in different parts of Weſſex, and was at length heard by Kinegils himſelf, who ſtruck with his arguments, and convinced of the truth of the goſpel, ſuffered himſelf to be publickly baptized. The king's example was followed by numbers of his ſubjects; in conſequence of which churches were erected for the worſhip of the true God; the heathen temples were in many places deſtroyed, and Berinus was inveſted with the epiſcopal title of Biſhop of York. Quincelm, however, did not follow the example of his brother till ſome time after, when, being ſeized with a violent fever, he embraced the faith, ſoon after which he paid the debt of nature. Kinegils ſurvived his brother about eight years, and then did univerſally beloved and lamented by his ſubjects.

A. D. 643. On the death of Kinegils the throne of Weſſex was filled by his ſon Kenwalch, or Kenwal. This prince was far from inheriting any of the virtues of his father. He was unſtable, puſillanimous, and luxurious, and therefore incapable of guiding the reins of government with ſteadineſs and reſolution. Having embraced the doctrine of the goſpel, he married a ſiſter of Penda, king of Mercia, whom he ſoon after divorced, and renounced the Chriſtian religion, without giving the leaſt reaſon for his conduct.

Penda, exaſperated at this inſult offered his ſiſter, entered the dominions of Kenwal, at the head of a very powerful army, before he was prepared to act on the defenſive. In conſequence of this Kenwal was obliged to fly for protection to Annas king of the Eaſt-Angles, with whom he remained three years in exile, during which Penda kept poſſeſſion of the throne of Weſſex. But the ſchool of adverſity, together with the admonitions of Annas wrought effectually on the mind of Kenwal, who again profeſſed himſelf a Chriſtian, was baptized, and, by the aſſiſtance of Annas, replaced on the throne of his anceſtors.

A. D. 652. Kenwal had not long reſumed his ſeat of power, when he was diſturbed by a rebellion which broke out in his kingdom, and once more threatened him with exile. In conſequence of theſe diſturbances he raiſed a conſiderable body of forces and marched at the head of them againſt the inſurgents. The latter were too precipitate in their meaſures, and raſhly engaged the royal army before they could be joined by their adherents from different parts of the kingdom. The battle was fought at Bradford in Wiltſhire, and laſted with great obſtinacy on both ſides for ſome time, till at length the army of Kenwal prevailed, prodigious numbers of the inſurgents were ſlain, and the reſt obliged to ſave themſelves by a prcipitate flight.

A. D. 658. But though the rebellion was quelled, yet peace was far from being reſtored to Weſſex. The Britons, who had long waited for an opportunity of retaliating on the Saxons the many injuries they had received, thought this a proper period for attempting the accompliſhment of their wiſhes. They accordingly invaded the dominions of Kenwal, and in their route, committed the moſt horrid outrages, levelling all before them with fire and ſword. Kenwal advanced at the head of his army towards the enemy, and a dreadful battle enſued at a place called Pine, in Shropſhire. At their firſt meeting the Britons fell on the Saxons with ſuch fury, that they were obliged to give way; but at length recovering themſelves they renewed the attack with ſuch intrepid reſolution as baffled all farther attempts of the Britons, who were totally defeated, and great numbers put to the ſword.

A. D. 661. This victory, which delivered Kenwal from any farther apprehenſions from the Britons, excited the jealouſy of Wulphur, king of Mercia, who entered Weſſex at the head of a conſiderable body of forces. Kenwal marched againſt him, and the two armies met at Ponteſbury in Shropſhire, where a deſperate battle enſued, but the event of the battle is uncertain, ſome hiſtorians giving it in favour of Kenwal, while others aſſert that Wulphur obtained a compleat victory. But however this may have been, it produced a peace between the contending powers, and tranquillity was once more reſtored to Weſſex.

After this Kenwal ſpent the remainder of his days in peace, dedicating his attention to the welware and good goverment of his ſubjects. Among other acts for the promotion of the Chriſtian religion he built the cathedral church of St. Peter at

* Henry of Huntingdon, and other hiſtorians of thoſe times, tell us, that when the two armies were drawn up in order of battle, the ſplendor of the maſſy axes of the Saxons, together with the length of their ſpears, and the compact order of their ranks, ſtruck the Britons with a panic, which the Saxons improving, obtained a compleat victory. They farther tell us, that no leſs than 2062 of the Britons were left dead on the field of battle.

at Wincheſter, which ſoon after became the ſee of a biſhop. But he did not long enjoy this interval of tranquillity, death putting a period at once to his labours and his life.

A. D. 672. Kenwall dying without iſſue, the crown of Weſſex was left in the hands of his wife Saxeburga. She was a princeſs of great talents and undaunted courage, and, during the ſhort time of her reign, held the ſceptre with honour to herſelf, and advantage to her country. She governed only twelve months, when ſhe paid the debt of nature univerſally lamented by her ſubjects.

A. D. 673. On the death of Saxeburga the throne of Weſſex was filled by Eſcwin, a man of diſtinguiſhed abilities, and deſcended from one of the collateral branches of the family of Cerdic. The firſt two years of his reign he enjoyed the crown in peace; but the reſtleſs ambition of the Saxon princes would not ſuffer any potentate to enjoy a long ſeries of tranquillity. Wulphur king of Mercia invaded his dominions, and a dreadful battle enſued at Bedwin in Wiltſhire. The conteſt was long and doubtful, and a terrible ſlaughter was made on both ſides: at length Wulphur obtained the advantage, but it was ſo trifling that he was in no condition to continue in the country of the enemy. Two years after this battle Eſcwin died, and left the throne of Weſſex to Kentwin, a ſon of the late Kinegils.

A. D. 677. Kentwin was no ſooner eſtabliſhed on the throne than he waged war againſt the Britons, whom he defeated, and drove from their country; in conſequence of which Cadwallader their king went over to Bretagne, in order to procure aſſiſtance againſt ſo powerful an enemy.

While Kentwin was employed in his wars with the Britons his nephew Ceadwalla, a prince of great expectations, and who had acquired a large ſhare of popularity, laid claim to the crown, which being made known to Kentwin he immediately repaired to his capital and obliged Ceadwalla to leave the kingdom. In conſequence of this Ceadwalla retired to the foreſt of Andreſwald in Suſſex, where he was joined by ſuch a number of people from every quarter, that he ſoon became exceeding formidable. Alarmed at his increaſing power, Adelwalch, king of Suſſex, aſſembled a body of forces to drive him out of his dominions; but this attempt proved unſucceſsful, his army being defeated and himſelf ſlain.

Fluſhed with this victory, Ceadwalla attempted to make himſelf maſter of Suſſex; but he met with ſuch oppoſition from the inhabitants, headed by Berthun and Anthun, two popular noblemen, that he was obliged to retire, after loſing a conſiderable number of his forces.

A. D. 686. A ſhort time after this Kentwin died, and Ceadwalla was placed on the throne of Weſſex. In conſequence of this acquiſition of power he immediately returned into Suſſex, defeated Berthun, and laid the whole country waſte with fire and ſword. He then plundered the kingdom of Kent, and afterwards inveſted the Iſle of Wight, where he committed the moſt horrid cruelties on the wretched inhabitants. It is, however, to be obſerved, for the honour of Chriſtianity, that Ceadwalla was then a Pagan. He had, indeed, been very liberal to the church, having devoted a tenth part of his ſpoils to donations, which, according to the ignorance of that age, was conſidered by the clergy as a ſufficient atonement for his crimes; but, as William of Malmſbury juſtly obſerves, "Whoever offers a victim from the ſubſtance of the poor, ſacrifices the ſon in the eyes of the father."

Ceadwalla being at length impreſſed with a due ſenſe of the enormity of his paſt conduct, reſolved to make a ſerious atonement by profeſſing the doctrines of Chriſtianity. He accordingly repaired to Rome, where he was publicly baptized by Sergius II. who then filled the papal chair. But he did not long ſurvive the ceremony, for he died a few days after, and was interred in the church of St. Peter. He was poſſeſſed of great abilities, but few virtues; of much ſeeming religion, but very little real piety.

A. D. 688. On the death of Ceadwalla the throne of Weſſex was filled by his nephew Ina, one of the moſt illuſtrious monarchs mentioned in the Saxon Heptarchy. He was at once a general and a ſcholar, and formed to ſhine either in the council or the field. His abilities were ſo conſpicuous, and his virtues ſo great, that he had not ſet a year upon the throne before he was elected chief of the Saxon confederacy; and this æra he diſtinguiſhed by digeſting a body of laws for the good government of his ſubjects, which were ſo well concerted as to lay a foundation for thoſe enacted in the following century by Alfred the Great. He likewiſe convoked a general aſſembly of the clergy, at which meeting many wiſe and judicious regulations were made for the better government of the church.

The firſt military expedition undertaken by Ina was againſt the inhabitants of Kent, in order to revenge the death of his kinſman Mollo. But Withred, who then filled the Kentiſh throne, not chuſing to contend with him by force of arms, purchaſed an accommodation by the payment of a very conſiderable fine.

A. D. 710. Ina, being thus ſatisfied with the Kentiſh monarch, returned to his own dominions, and ſoon after made war with the Britons who inhabited the eaſtern part of the country. In this enterprize he proved ſucceſsful, and ſubdued the greater part of their territories; but he treated the vanquiſhed with a degree of humanity before unknown among Saxon conquerors. He allowed them to retain the poſſeſſion of their lands, encouraged marriages and alliances between them and his own ſubjects, and gave them the privilege of being governed by the ſame laws.

A. 715. In the beginning of this year Ina declared war againſt Ceolred king of Mercia; and the two armies meeting at Woodenberg in Wilts, a battle enſued, which was fought with great obſtinacy on both ſides, till at length victory declared in favour of Ina, and ſuch of the Mercians who eſcaped the ſword were obliged to ſave themſelves by a precipitate flight.

After defeating the Mercians, Ina marched his army againſt the South Saxons, who had revolted from their obedience and depoſed their king. Theſe he ſoon ſubdued, and having reſtored tranquillity to the kingdom, returned in triumph to his own dominions.

A. D. 725. Ina, having governed thirty-ſeven years in a continued ſtate of activity, now reſolved to dedicate the remainder of his life entirely to the exerciſes of devotion. As a prelude to the carrying his deſign into execution, he undertook a journey to Rome, in order to hold a conference with Gregory II. the then pontiff. During his reſidence in that city he erected a college for the reception of Engliſh eccleſiaſtics, to eſtabliſh which he impoſed a tax upon his ſubjects, afterwards called Peter's-pence. This tax was, for many years, converted to the purpoſes intended by Ina; but at length it was claimed as a debt by the popes, and conſidered as a legal part of their revenues.

The founding of this ſeminary was the laſt public act of Ina's reign. He had, from his judicious conduct, attained to the very pinnacle of renown, and was not only revered and loved by his own ſubjects, but was eſteemed and dreaded by the neighbouring kingdoms. But on his return from the continent he fell into a malady incident to thoſe times of darkneſs and ignorance, being affected with ſuch a wild enthuſiaſtic conſcientiouſneſs as to form the reſolution of ſacrificing his regal ſtate to the dull retirement of a monkiſh cloiſter. He accordingly reſigned his ſceptre, went to Rome, and aſſumed the habit of a monk; and in this ſtate of obſcurity finiſhed a life, the former part of which entitled him to the admiration of cotemporaries, and the reſpect of poſterity. His wife ſoon followed his example, aſſumed the monaſtic habit, and ended her days in ſullen retirement from ſociety, to which, in her elevated ſtation, ſhe might have been both uſeful and ornamental.

A. D, 727. On the abdication of Ina the crown of Weſſex was placed on the head of his kinſman Ethelhard, who found a powerful competitor in the perſon of Oſwald, a nephew of the late king Ceadwalla. Oſwald, being ſupported by great numbers of the principal people of the kingdom, raiſed a very conſiderable army, and determined to claim his right by force of arms. In conſequence of this Ethelhard, who was a ſtranger to fear, marched his troops againſt him, when a deſperate battle enſued, the iſſue of which was, that the forces of Oſwald were totally routed, and himſelf driven into exile, where he ſoon after died, leaving the conqueror to enjoy his crown unrivalled.

A. D. 740. Ethelhard, having reigned thirteen years without any diſturbance either from foreign or domeſtic enemies, paid the debt of nature, and not having any iſſue, the crown devolved on Cuthred his brother, or, as ſome hiſtorians ſay, his nephew.

The whole of this prince's reign was one continued ſcene of tumult and diſorder. His ſon was ſlain in a mutiny which happened ſoon after his acceſſion to the throne; and this misfortune was followed by a rebellion, which was raiſed in the weſtern parts of his kingdom. The inſurgents were headed by Edelhun, one of their chief nobility, and celebrated for his military abilities and intrepid courage. This brave and experienced commander met Cuthred in the field with a body of forces far unequal in number to thoſe brought by that prince; but, animated by the example, and conducted by the prudence of Edelhun, they attacked the troops of Cuthred with ſuch fury, that victory was on the point of declaring in their favour, when unfortunately their intrepid leader was dangerouſly wounded. Confuſion was now conſpicuous in the rebel army, which being obſerved by Cuthred, he took advantage of it, and drove them from the field with great ſlaughter. Edelhun was taken priſoner; but the manner in which he had ſuſtained himſelf with ſuch a ſmall body of men recommended him ſo ſtrongly to the favour of Cuthred, that he not only granted him a pardon, but likewiſe made him general of his own forces.

Cuthred was ſoon convinced of the propriety of his conduct with reſpect to Edelhun. The Weſt Saxons, headed by this able commander, were invincible, and wherever they turned their arms they conquered. The flames of rebellion were ſoon ſuppreſſed, and the nobles, intimidated by the power of the army, buried their animoſities in the grave of circumſpection. But it was in vain to expect tranquillity while the iſland was divided into ſo many petty kingdoms, without any barrier to prevent the incurſions of the borderers. Ethelbald, king of Mercia, entered the territories of Cuthred, and committed all the exceſſes that might be expected from ſo ferocious a leader, who had already ravaged the kingdoms of Kent, Eſſex, and Eaſt-Anglia. But his victorious forces could not intimidate Edelhun: he led the army of Cuthred againſt the enemy, and, after an obſtinate engagement obtained a compleat victory, and Ethelbald was obliged to ſave himſelf by a precipitate flight.

After this victory Cuthred ſent Edelhun at the head of his forces againſt the Britons of Cornwall, whom he conquered, and part of their country was united to the dominions of Weſſex. In the midſt of theſe ſucceſſes Cuthred paid the debt of nature, after having held the ſceptre for the ſpace of fourteen years.

A. D. 754. On the death of Cuthred the crown of Weſſex fell to his nephew Sigebert, who might have reigned in peace had he but liſtened to the voice of reaſon. But he would not be directed by thoſe whom age and experience had taught wiſdom. Proud of the merit of his anceſtors without poſſeſſing any himſelf, and cruel without provocation, he treated his nobles with inſolence, and his people with inhumanity. In ſhort, he was deſtitute of every virtue, and attached to almoſt every vice.

Such a prince could not fail of incurring the hatred of a people accuſtomed to the ſweets of liberty. They accordingly flew to arms, and being headed by Kinewulf, a prince of the royal blood, compelled him to abandon a throne he wanted courage to defend. But ſo far were they from treating his perſon with any violence, that he was even allowed a large diſtrict in Hampſhire for his ſubſiſtence, where he might have ended his days in peace, had his reverſe of fortune taught him to govern his head-ſtrong paſſions; but that was a virtue to which Sigebert was a ſtranger. During his exile one Cumbrian (at that time governor of a large diſtrict in Hampſhire) who had been his warmeſt friend, expoſtulated with him on the impropriety of his conduct, and endeavoured to reclaim him from thoſe vices which had deprived him of his crown. But the cruel Sigebert conſidering this wholeſome advice as a flagrant act of diſreſpect, was ſo incenſed that he cauſed his friend and benefactor to be put to death.

This inhuman action rendered Sigebert odious in the eyes of thoſe who had hitherto been his adherents; and Kinewulf, who had been choſen to the ſovereignty in his ſtead, thought himſelf obliged, from the duty he owed his people, to deprive ſo deteſtable a monſter of the means of gratifying his cruel diſpoſition. He therefore diſpoſſed him of his territory, and obliged him o fly for ſhelter to the foreſt of Andreſwald, where he had not been long before he met that fate he ſo juſtly merited, being put to death by the ignoble hand of a ſwine-herd.

A. D. 755. Kinewulf, being now fully eſtabliſhed on the throne of Weſſex, turned his arms againſt the Britons in Cornwall. He had a natural propenſity to war, and his undertakings were generally ſucceſsful; but at length he was routed by Offa, king of Mercia, who took from him all his dominions north of the Thames.

This reverſe of fortune encouraged Kyneherd, the brother of Sigebert, to attempt the recovery of the crown, which had been uſurped by Kinewulf; but not having ſufficient power to execute it by force of arms, he determined, if poſſible, to accompliſh his ends by ſtratagem. He did not wait long before an opportunity offered for effecting his deſign. Being informed that Kinewulf often paid private viſits to a lady at Merton in Surry, he ſelected a party of his adherents, and went to the houſe, which they forcibly entered, and found means to penetrate to the door of the apartment where the king was before his attendants were alarmed. On their entering the room Kinewulf, ſeeing the danger, ran haſtily to his arms, and, for ſome time, defended himſelf with great reſolution; but being at length overpowered by numbers, he fell covered with wounds.

But though Kyneherd had thus far obtained his ends, they were far from turning out to his advantage. The people reſpected Kinewulf as the perſon they had choſen to rule over them, and who had freed them from the rod of tyranny. As ſoon, therefore, as they heard of his aſſaſſination, great numbers of the nobility and others, headed by one Oſric, a popular man, and diſtinguiſhed friend of the deceaſed, advanced in a body to the houſe, with a reſolution of revenging the death of their ſovereign. On their arrival they found the conſpirators had barricadoed the houſe; in order to defend themſelves to the laſt extremity. Kyneherd, perceiving the danger he was in, appeared on the battlements, and endeavoured to divert them from their deſign, by remonſtrating with them on the legality of his claim to the crown, and promiſing that he would confirm their liberties, and increaſe their honours. But the noblemen anſwered, that the ties of blood were feeble compared with thoſe of duty; that their maſter had been baſely ſlain, and they were come to revenge his murder. Accordingly the gates were immediately forced open, and Kyneherd, with his adherents, after an obſtinate reſiſtance, were all put to the ſword.

A. D. 784. The murder of Kinewulf being thus revenged, and his funeral obſequies performed at Wincheſter, his ſon Brithric was placed on the throne of Weſſex. This prince, being of a meek, pacific diſpoſition, employed himſelf in the cultivation of the arts of peace, preferring the character of a good politician to that of a diſtinguiſhed warrior. But notwithſtanding the natural evenneſs of his temper, he could not avoid entertaining ſome jealous ſuſpicion of Egbert, a prince of the blood, who was highly eſteemed by the people for his many amiable qualities, and who, in point of birth, had a prior right to the throne.

It was not long before Egbert perceived in what light he was held by Brithric, and therefore thought it unſafe to remain any longer in his territories. In conſequence of this he privately withdrew to France, where he was kindly received by Charlemagne, who then ſwayed the ſcepter of that kingdom. At this court he remained twelve years, during which he cloſely applied himſelf to the ſtudy of military diſcipline, and acquired thoſe accompliſhments which afterwards enabled him to make ſuch a ſhining figure on the throne; ſo that the misfortunes of his youth were of the utmoſt advantage to himſelf and his country.

A. D. 787. A ſhort time after Egbert left the Britiſh court, Brithric married Eadburga, the daughter of Offa, king of Mercia, a woman equally infamous for her cruelty and incontinence. Having great influence over her huſband, ſhe often incited him to deſtroy ſuch of the nobility as were obnoxious to her; and when this expedient failed, ſhe made no ſcruple of putting the cruel deſign in execution with her own hand.

A. D. 797. The horrid diſpoſition of Eadburga proved fatal to Brithric, who, by her means, loſt his life at a time when he little ſuſpected the leaſt danger. A young nobleman, a particular favourite of Brithric, having incurred her diſpleaſure, ſhe determined to avenge the affront; but nothing leſs than the life of the offender would ſatisfy her vengeance. Accordingly, one evening as the nobleman and Brithric were drinking together (as they frequently did) the baſe and treacherous Eadburga mixed poiſon in a cup of wine, and gave it to the victim of her revenge. Unfortunately for the king he likewiſe drank ſome of the wine, and in a ſhort time after they both expired.

This horrid act rendered Eadburga ſo obnoxious to the people, that they compelled her to quit the kingdom. She accordingly retired to an obſcure part of France, where, after a ſeries of misfortunes, ſhe ended her days in miſery and exile.

After the Weſt-Saxons had paid their laſt duties to the remains of their deceaſed monarch, they ſent an honourable embaſſy to Egbert (then with Charlemagne at Rome) inviting him immediately to come over, and take poſſeſſion of the throne of his anceſtors. Egbert readily complied with their requeſt, and was accompanied by the monarch who had ſo honourably entertained him during his exile. On his arrival in England he was placed on the throne of Weſſex, amidſt the acclamations of a people who had long loved and honoured him for his virtues.

Egbert, ſoon after his acceſſion to the throne, put a final period to the Saxon Heptarchy; but the manner in which he effected this, and the various occurrences that took place during the time he reigned ſole monarch of England, will be hereafter related.

THE

The Kingdom of ESSEX, or the EAST-SAXONS.

THIS kingdom was founded by Erkenwin, who began his reign in the year 527; but we have no particulars recorded of him, except that he was poſſeſſed of the ſovereignty ſixty years, at the expiration of which he died, and left the crown to his ſon Sledda.

A. D. 587. Sledda, being a prince of a very pacific diſpoſition, lived in profound peace ten years, when he paid the debt of nature, and was ſucceeded on the throne by his ſon Sebert.

A. D. 597. Sebert, at the time of his acceſſion to the throne, was a pagan; but he ſoon after embraced the doctrine of the goſpel at the inſtigation of his uncle Ethelbert king of Kent, who, being deſirous of rendering others partakers of the ſame happineſs he had received from the preaching of Auſtin, ſent Melitus into Eſſex, in order to plant chriſtianity in that kingdom. The intentions of Ethelbert were fully anſwered, and, from the doctrine preached by Melitus, his nephew Sebert became a convert to the Chriſtian religion.

The firſt inſtance Sebert gave of his attachment to the new doctrine was, by joining with his uncle in erecting the cathedral church of St. Paul, which was built on the foundation of an heathen temple dedicated to Diana by the Romans. London was ſoon after made a biſhop's ſee, and given to Melitus as a mark of approbation of his conduct.

From the great increaſe of the proſelytes to Chriſtianity that took place after the opening of the cathedral of St. Paul, the two princes were encouraged to rebuild the church of St. Peter at Weſtminſter, which had been demoliſhed by the Saxons. That ſtructure was erected in the time of Conſtantine the Great on the foundations of a temple built by the Romans, and dedicated to Apollo. The founding theſe two churches gave a fatal blow to the idolatry of the Saxons, and many of their temples were deſtroyed in different parts of the kingdom.

Sebert, after a reign of ſeventeen years, which he devoted to acts of piety and virtue, paid the debt of nature, and according to moſt hiſtorians, was interred in the abbey at Weſtminſter which he had contributed to erect.

A. D. 614. On the death of Sebert, the kingdom of Eſſex devolved on his three ſons, Soxred, Siward, and Sigebert, who began their reigns with renouncing the Chriſtian faith, and expelling Melitus, the firſt biſhop of London, for no other reaſon but becauſe he remonſtrated with them on their infidelity and immorality. Theſe three brothers being of an impetuous diſpoſition, engaged in a war with Kinegils and Quincelm, kings of Kent, by whom they were defeated, and afterwards fell a ſacrifice to their temerity.

A. 623. Sigebert the Little, ſon of Siward, one of the triumvirate, now aſcended the throne of Eſſex; but whatever his actions were, they are conſigned to oblivion, nor even is it known how long he reigned. He was ſucceeded by Sigebert the Good, nephew to the pious king Sebert. This prince reſtored the Chriſtian religion throughout his dominions, after it had been almoſt extinguiſhed by the three brothers who preceded him in the government of that part of the heptarchy. He was greatly aſſiſted in this buſineſs by one Cadda, to whom he was ſo ſtrongly attached, that he afterwards conſecrated him biſhop of the Eaſt-Saxons. But this attachment proved fatal to him: that prelate had excommunicated two noblemen for their profligate behaviour, and the king refuſing to remove Cadda, they entered into a plot, and procured his death by aſſaſſination.

The reigns of the other kings of Eſſex are totally barren of any incidents worth recording in hiſtory. Suffice it, therefore, to ſay, that after an interval of 219 years, from the acceſſion of the firſt monarch to the death of the laſt, the kingdom of Eſſex was reduced by Egbert, who ſoon after put an end to the Saxon Heptarchy.

The Kingdom of NORTHUMBERLAND.

THIS kingdom, which was one of the moſt conſiderable of the Heptarchy, received its name from being ſituated on the north ſide of the Humber. It was for ſome years equally divided into two provinces by the names of Bernicia and Deira. The former of theſe, which conſiſted of the country ſituated to the north of the wall of Severus, was founded by Ida in the year 547; and the latter, containing the ſouthern part of the kingdom, by Ella, about one hundred years after the firſt ſettlement of the Saxons in Britain.

Ida, the founder of Bernicia, was a brave and generous prince, equally great in council and the field. As a general he was intrepid and prudent; as a governor, equitable and humane. He fought many battles with the Britons with great ſucceſs, but was at length ſlain by Owen, prince of the Cumbrians.

Hiſtory is exceeding ſilent with reſpect to the firſt five deſcendants of Ida: their names, indeed, are mentioned, and that is all, not the leaſt account being given of their virtues, their vices, their government or their wars.

A. D. 586. The firſt of Ina's deſcendants that diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a ſovereign was Ethelfrid, a brave and active prince, but arbitrary and cruel in his diſpoſition. Some time after his acceſſion he married Acca, the only daughter of Ella, and on the death of that prince ſeized on the kingdom of Deira, which he united to his own

The firſt military exploit performed by Ethel-

frid was againſt the Scots, who, having formed a confederacy with the Britons, invaded the kingdom of Northumberland, and ſpread terror and devaſtation wherever they went. Ethelfrid, having raiſed a conſiderable body of forces, marched againſt the invaders, and a deſperate battle enſued, which was long, bloody, and, for ſome time doubtful. But at length the Saxons prevailed, and the Scots were totally routed.

A. D. 613. After this victory, Ethelfrid marched, at the head of his forces, into the country of the Britons, a great part of which he laid waſte with fire and ſword. He proſecuted his route as far as the environs of Cheſter, with a reſolution of making himſelf maſter of that city. On his approach the Britons, who were exaſperated at the cruelties he had exerciſed on their countrymen, took the field, and advanced to meet the invaders of their country. They were accompanied by a body of twelve hundred and fifty monks from the monaſtery of Bangor, who attended in order, by their preſence and exhortations, to animate the ſoldiers to uſe their utmoſt efforts in oppoſing the enemy. The appearance of ſo conſiderable a body of men unarmed attracted the particular notice of Ethelfrid, who, aſking the reaſon of it was told, that they were prieſts, who had come out to pray for the deſtruction of his army. "Then (ſaid he) they are as much our enemies, as thoſe who intend to fight againſt us." In order to ſatisfy his revenge he immediately diſpatched a party of his troops againſt the defenceleſs monks, and ſo great was the ſlaughter, that only fifty out of the whole eſcaped with their lives. This event ſo aſtoniſhed the Britons, that they were unable to exert themſelves againſt the enemy, who falling on them with great reſolution, ſoon obtained a compleat victory, prodigious numbers of the Britons being ſlain, and the reſt obliged to ſave themſelves by a precipitate flight. In conſequence of this Ethelfrid made himſelf maſter of Cheſter, and then marching to Bangor, wreaked his vengeance on the remaining monks, by firſt obliging them to fly, and then deſtroying their monaſtery, which he did ſo effectually as to level it with the foundation.

A. D. 616. After having thus ſubdued the Scots and Britons, Ethelfrid returned with his forces to his own dominions. But notwithſtanding the ſucceſs of war, he lived in great diſquietude on account of young Edwin, whom he had unjuſtly diſpoſſeſſed of the crown of Deira. This young prince was now arrived at the ſtate of manhood, and, by his conduct, evinced that he was poſſeſſed of thoſe virtues which always render a king great, and his people happy. Ethelfrid was too good a judge of mankind not to perceive theſe growing qualities: he ſaw their dawn, and dreaded their effects; what in others would have been amiable was criminal in Edwin. But the young prince, conſcious that the right of ſucceſſion was conſidered by an uſurper as an unpardonable crime, avoided the deſtruction that awaited him by a precipitate flight.

Edwin, for ſome time, led the life of an exile, wandering from one kingdom to another, and being in continual danger from the deſigns of Ethelfrid. At length he fortunately applied to the court of Eaſt-Anglia, where he was hoſpitably received by Redwald, king of that province.

Ethelfrid, hearing that Edwin had obtained protection at the Eaſt-Anglian court, was greatly alarmed, and immediately diſpatched an ambaſſador to Redwald, offering him a large ſum of money to deliver up the refugee, and threatening, in caſe of refuſal, to declare war againſt his dominions. Allured by the bribe, and intimidated by the menace of ſo formidable a prince, Redwald was at firſt inclined to comply with the demand; but the voice of honour, the dictates of his own conſcience, and the perſuaſions of his queen, at length prevailed, and he reſolved to protect the young prince at the hazard of his own crown.

Redwald well knew the implacable and cruel diſpoſition of Ethelfrid, and therefore wiſely determined to take ſuch meaſures as might prevent its effects. He accordingly collected a very powerful army, and marched directly into the territories of Northumberland. His troops were divided into three bodies, the firſt of which was led by his ſon Reyner, the ſecond he headed himſelf, and the third was commanded by Edwin. Reyner received orders to advance in order to ſecure a paſs; but the impetuoſity of his courage carried him too far to be properly ſupported in caſe of an attack. Ethelfrid, who was already in the field, meeting this diviſion totally defeated them, and ſlew prince Reyner with his own hand.

Enraged almoſt to a ſtate of madneſs at the death of his ſon, Redwald advanced with the remaining part of his army againſt the Northumbrians. A dreadful battle enſued, and victory was for ſome time doubtful, till at length the Northumbrian army, unable to withſtand the ſhock any longer gave way, and betook themſelves to flight. Ethelfrid tried all he could to rally his ſcattered forces, but finding his endeavours ineffectual, he ruſhed furiouſly into the thickeſt of the enemy's ſquadrons, where, after performing prodigies of valour, he fell, covered with wounds.

The victorious Redwald met with no farther oppoſition; for the ſons of Ethelfrid no ſooner heard of their father's defeat and death, than they immediately fled for refuge to Scotland, and the inhabitants of Northumberland readily ſubmitted. But far from taking the advantage of a conqueror, Redwald contented himſelf with the glory of the expedition he had undertaken, and chearfully placed Edwin on the throne of Northumberland.

A. D. 625. Edwin had formerly married a ſiſter of the Mercian king; but ſhe being dead he eſpouſed Ethelburga, daughter of Eadbald, king of Kent. This princeſs being a Chriſtian, and Edwin a Pagan, it was ſtipulated in the marriage articles, that ſhe ſhould enjoy the free exerciſe of her own religion, and be permitted to retain in her ſervice Paulinus, a Chriſtian biſhop, and ſuch other attendants as ſhould be thought neceſſary for performing the offices of Chriſtianity.

As ſoon as the nuptials were celebrated, Edwin and Ethelburga, accompanied by Paulinus, took up their reſidence at York, the capital of the kingdom, where Ethelburga took every opportunity tunity ſhe could to endeavour to perſuade the king to embrace the Chriſtian faith. Struck with the amiable virtues of Ethelburga, and charmed with her humane and tender diſpoſition, Edwin liſtened, with great attention, to her exhortations; and was at length ſo wrought upon that he declared himſelf a convert to Chriſtianity, and was publickly baptized at York, in a church dedicated to St. Peter. The ceremony was performed by Paulinus, whom he afterwards appointed biſhop of that ſee. The king's example was followed by great numbers of his ſubjects, inſomuch that, according to moſt hiſtorians, no leſs than twelve thouſand perſons were, on the ſame day, baptized in the Chriſtian faith.

A. D. 627. The converſion of Edwin to Chriſtianity conſiderably increaſed his power, which the neighbouring princes could not behold without envy, more eſpecially Penda, king of Mercia, who, joining his forces with thoſe of Ceadwalla, king of the Britons, invaded Northumberland. They had advanced as far as Hatfield foreſt in Yorkſhire, and committed the moſt dreadful outrages, before Edwin was informed of their having entered his dominions. Penetrated with the diſtreſs of his people, and enraged at the perfidy of the enemy, he marched at the head of an inferior number of troops to give them battle, in order to terminate, as ſoon as poſſible, the miſeries of his ſubjects. The conteſt was dreadful, and for ſome time fortune ſeemed inclinable to beſtow on Edwin the palm of victory. But at length an event took place which determined the fate of the day. Offrid, the eldeſt ſon of Edwin, was ſhot with an arrow, and fell dead at his father's feet. This circumſtance threw Edwin into a mere ſtate of madneſs: he loſt his uſual ſteadineſs and preſence of mind; and running with a regardleſs impetuoſity, into the thickeſt part of the enemy's troops, was cut to pieces. This diſaſter ſo intimidated the Northumbrians, that they were thrown into the utmoſt confuſion; in conſequence of which great numbers were put to the ſword, and the reſt obliged to ſave themſelves by a precipitate flight. The devaſtation that followed in Northumberland cannot be deſcribed: neither age nor ſex were ſpared; the old and the young fell the undiſtinguiſhed victims of an unrelenting foe. Ethelburga and Paulinus fled into Kent, where they were received by the king with every token of the moſt affectionate reſpect; the former having certain lands allotted for her ſubſiſtence, and thelatter being appointed to the ſee of Rocheſter.

A. D. 633. The Northumbrians, aggrieved by the repeated cruelties of the tyrannic Penda, reſolved to make a vigorous effort towards the recovery of their former independence, preferring a glorious death to a life of the moſt ignoble and vile ſubjection. To promote this deſign, they placed Oſric, a relation of Edwin, on the throne of Deira, and Anfrid, ſon of Ethelfrid, on that of Bernicia. But theſe two princes did not long ſurvive their elevation; for Oſric, having raſhly beſieged Ceadwalla at York, the Britiſh king made a furious ſally, routed the beſiegers with great ſlaughter, and, with his own hand, ſlew the young but enterprizing prince. The victor immediately ſeized the kingdom of Northumberland, where he exerciſed the greateſt cruelty during the ſpace of a year, at the expiration of which Anfrid, going very indiſcreetly, with only ten ſoldiers. to treat with him, was ſeized by his orders, and inſtantly put to death.

A. D. 634. The Northumbrians now groaned under the moſt dire calamities, the victorious Ceadwalla laying waſte the greater part of their country with fire and ſword. This dreadful ſcene of horror and devaſtation continued for ſome time, till at length Oſwald, the ſecond ſon of Ethelfrid, who had long been an exile in Scotland, reſolved either to put a ſtop to the cruelty of ſo inhuman a tyrant, or periſh in the generous attempt. Accordingly, having collected a body of men, he marched againſt Ceadwalla, who was then at the head of an army conſidered as irreſiſtible. Oſwald, who directed all his ſteps with caution, took poſſeſſion of an advantageous poſt at a place called Halidown, a little to the north of the wall of Severus. Here he waited the approach of Ceadwalla, who, fluſhed with ſucceſs, no ſooner beheld Oſwald's forces, than he conſidered them as victims deſtined to ſlaughter, and rather looked upon them as a prey than an enemy. After taking a cool and deliberate view of the intrenchments of the enemy, he gave orders for a general aſſault. The attack was furious, but not ſucceſsful; and Ceadwalla, leading his forces to make a ſecond aſſault, was pierced through the heart with an arrow, and fell dead on the ground. In conſequence of this fatal ſtroke, a general confuſion took place among the army of the Britons, which being obſerved by Oſwald, he immediately iſſued from his intrenchment at the head of his forces, and fell on them with ſuch impetuoſity that the greater part were killed, and the reſt fled with great precipitation into their own country.

Having thus defeated the army, and ſlain the tyrant who had ſo unmercifully ravaged his country, Oſwald took quiet poſſeſſion of the united kingdom of Northumberland. His firſt care was, to re-eſtabliſh civil polity, and reſtore religious worſhip. His education rendered him the wiſeſt prince of the age, while his great virtues not only obtained him the univerſal affection of his ſubjects, but likewiſe gained him ſuch credit among the Saxon princes, that he was choſen chief of their political confederacy.

A. D. 642. Peace and good order being thus reſtored to the Northumbrians, they enjoyed a ſtate of happineſs for ſome time, till at length they were interrupted by Penda, king of Mercia, who entered Northumberland at the head of a conſiderable body of forces, and committed the moſt horrid outrages wherever he went. Oſwald gathered together what forces he could, and haſtened with all expedition againſt the invader of his country. The two armies met at a place called Maſerfelt, where a dreadful battle enſued. But the troops of Oſwald were too few to contend in the open field with the Mercian forces long uſed to conqueſt: the Northumbrians were totally routed, and Oſwald himſelf was found among the ſlain. After this Penda ravaged various parts of the country, committing the moſt horrid acts of inhumanity on the wretched inhabitants. At length, however, his progreſs was ſtopped at Banbury-Caſtle, which bid defiance to his power; and being ſatiated with blood and ſlaughter, he marched at the head of his forces into his own dominions.

A. D. 643. On the death of Oſwald, the throne of Northumberland fell to his ſon Oſwy, whoſe whole reign was one continued ſcene of war and tumult. He held the ſovereignty for the ſpace of twenty-ſeven years, and then dying left the crown to his ſon Egfrid.

A. D. 670. The firſt military expedition in which Egfrid engaged himſelf was againſt the Picts, who, having raiſed a prodigious army among the northern nations, entered his territories, and committed violent outrages in different parts of the kingdom. Egfrid loſt no time in endeavouring to repel their force, and though his army was greatly inferior in numbers to that of the enemy, he attacked them with ſuch ſucceſs that they were totally defeated, and the greater part of them put to the ſword.

A. D. 684. Egfrid now turned his arms againſt the Scots, in violation of a treaty concluded with Eugenius their king, and waſted great part of their country with fire and ſword. But at length Eugenius, having brought over the Picts to his alliance, attacked him ſo furiouſly, that his army was totally routed, and himſelf narrowly eſcaped with his life.

A. D. 685. Incenſed at the revolt of the Picts, Egfrid marched the next year with a powerful army into their country, in order to chaſtiſe them for their treachery. But this expedition proved fatal to him; for the Picts, knowing themſelves incapable of meeting him in the open field, made a feigned retreat towards their mountains, and by this ſtratagem drew Egfrid into an ambuſcade, whereby himſelf and the greater part of his army were cut to pieces.

From this period few tranſactions happened in Northumberland worthy of notice, except the depoſition and murder of its princes. The people were treated with cruelty, and ſuperſtitious bigotry uſurped the place of genuine religion.

The Kingdom of EAST-ANGLIA.

THIS kingdom was founded by the Angles, a people from Jutland, who landed at different times in independent bodies on the eaſtern coaſt of the iſland. They were ſtrongly oppoſed by the Britons, with whom they fought many battles; nor were they able to eſtabliſh themſelves till forty years after their firſt arrival in Britain.

A. D. 571. The firſt perſon that aſſumed the title of king of Eaſt Anglia, and who, therefore, may be properly termed the founder of the kingdom, was Uffa. This prince enjoyed the ſovereignty about ſeven years, and then dying left the ſcepter to his ſon Titel, who reigned twenty-one years. But hiſtory is ſilent with reſpect to the actions of both theſe princes; ſo that we may ſuppoſe they reigned in a profound ſtate of eaſe and tranquillity.

A. D. 599. On the death of Titel, the throne of Eaſt-Anglia fell to his ſon Redwald, a prince whoſe great merits rendered him ſo conſpicuous, that he was placed at the head of the heptarchy, which poſt he held with the moſt diſtinguiſhed reputation. After a glorious reign of twenty-five years, he paid the debt of nature, as univerſally lamented as he had been beloved by his ſubjects.

A. D. 624. Redwald was ſucceeded by his ſon Eorpwald, a prince, who ſo far degenerated from the virtues of his father, that he rendered himſelf odious to his ſubjects by every meanneſs that could diſgrace royalty. Such was his puſillanimity and inactiveneſs, that he left the weighty affairs of government to Edwin king of Northumberland, to whom he even offered his crown; but this Edwin generouſly declined, the dictates of honour and juſtice (in conſideration of the great benefits he had received from Redwald his father) preponderating in the boſom of that virtuous monarch.

Eorpwald, towards the cloſe of his reign, embraced the Chriſtian religion, which ſo incenſed Richbert, a principal officer of the army, that he aſſaſſinated him with own hand.

On the death of Eorpwald, the aſſaſſin Richbert conducted the affairs of ſtate for the ſpace of three years, without aſſuming the title of king; during which time the thickeſt clouds of Pagan darkneſs overſpread the kingdom of the Eaſt Angles.

A. D. 633. Tired with the uſurpation of Richbert, the Saxons recalled Sigebert (a ſon of the late Redwald) from France, where he had been ſome years in a ſtate of exile, and placed him on the throne of his anceſtors. This prince, during his reſidence abroad, had embraced chriſtianity, and improved himſelf in every branch of uſeful learning. As ſoon, therefore, as he was ſettled on the throne he applied himſelf, with great diligence, to the propagation of the goſpel among his ſubjects, in which laudable work he was aſſiſted by one Felix, a Burgundian prieſt, and the ſucceſs they met with anſwered their utmoſt expectations. After this Sigebert reſigned his crown to his ſon Egric, and retired to the monaſtery of St. Edmundſbury, which he had founded himſelf, preferring the habit of a monk to the robes of royalty.

A. D. 644. Egric had not been long on the throne before his dominions were invaded by that reſtleſs tyrant Penda, king of Mercia. In conſequence of this the Eaſt-Angles, knowing the power of Penda, and being diffident of the courage and abilities of Egric, had recourſe to Sigebert, intreating him to quit the cloiſter, and take upon him the command of their forces. After many repeated ſolicitations, their importunity prevailed, and Sigebert left the convent; but, retaining his ſuperſtition, he abſolutely refuſed to carry any other weapon than a wand. The fatal effect of this frantic behaviour ſoon appeared; for the Eaſt Anglian army was totally routed, and both Sigebert and his ſon ſlain in the field of battle.

On the death of Sigebert the crown devolved on Annas, a nephew of the famous Redwald, who was one of the moſt illuſtrious princes that ever filled the Eaſt-Anglian throne. He received the young king of Weſſex, whom the turbulent Penda had driven from the throne, converted him to chriſtianity, and re-eſtabliſhed him in his kingdom. This conduct exaſperating the furious Penda, he threatened to ravage his country with fire fire and ſword. Annas, however, was not to be intimidated by threats: he made the neceſſary preparations for receiving the ambitious Saxon; but was prevented from carrying his deſign into execution by death, which ſuddenly took him off after a reign of ten years.

The reigns of the ſucceeding kings of the Eaſt Angles contain no particulars worthy the recital of an hiſtorian, except that of Ethelbert, their laſt prince, who acceded to the throne in the year 792. This young prince was naturally of a very amiable diſpoſition, and poſſeſſed all the virtues neceſſary to diſtinguiſh royalty. The goodneſs of his heart, and the humility of his mind, together with the regard he ſhewed for religion, and the ſtrict adminiſtration of juſtice, rendered him the delight of his people, who wanted nothing but an heir to ſucceed him on the throne at his deceaſe. To effect this, they requeſted him to form an alliance with a princeſs properly qualified as a partner for him on the throne. Ethelbert made no oppoſition to this requeſt, and a treaty of marriage was concluded between him and Althrida, daughter to Offa king of Mercia, a princeſs equally remarkable for her piety and mental accompliſhments. Every thing being ready, Ethelbert, with a ſplendid retinue, repaired to the court of Mercia, in order to conſummate his nuptials. But Offa had other views. Ambition had more charms than virtue. He was determined to annex the kingdom of Eaſt-Anglia to his own, though at the price of every thing that ſhould be held dear by man. He violated the ſacred rights of hoſpitality and honour, by cauſing the innocent and unſuſpecting Ethelbert to be cruelly aſſaſſinated; after which he forcibly ſeized his kingdom, and united it to his own dominions, in which ſtate it remained till the final diſſolution of the heptarchy by Egbert.

The Kingdom of MERCIA.

THIS was by far the largeſt and moſt conſiderable kingdom of the whole heptarchy. It was founded by Crida in the year 584, who dying after a reign of ten years, the kingdom was ſeized by Ethelbert, king of Kent. This prince kept poſſeſſion of it three years, when finding that his uſurpation produced murmurs that were likely to terminate in his own ruin, he reſigned the throne to Whibba the ſon of Crida, who, after a reign of nineteen years, left it to his ſon Penda.

A. D. 616. Ethelbert, who ſtill reigned in Kent, knowing the reſtleſs ambition and turbulent temper of Penda, and fearing the conſequences, again ſeized the crown of Mercia, which he retained for the ſpace of one year, when he reſigned it in favour of Ceorl, nephew to the late king. This prince, who could be conſidered in no other light than that of an uſurper, reigned eight years, and dying without iſſue, the crown devolved on Penda, the lawful heir, who, at the time, was in the fiftieth year of his age.

A. D. 625. Penda ſat on the throne for the ſpace of thirty years, during which time he was engaged in continual hoſtilities againſt the neighbouring ſtates, and by his injuſtice and violence became at once equally odious to his own ſubjects and to ſtrangers. The flame of ambition, which generally grows languid with age, glowed with full vigour in Penda. He planned conqueſts, when others were tottering on the brink of the grave, and in the eightieth year of his age marched at the head of his army into Northumberland, with a reſolution of making himſelf maſter of that country. But victory now forſook his ſtandards, and he fell a ſacrifice to his ambition, being ſlain in battle by Oſwy, king of Northumberland, and the greater part of his army cut to pieces.

A. D. 655. Penda was ſucceeded on the throne of Mercia by his ſon Peada; but he did not long enjoy the regal dignity, being cut off by poiſon after a reign of only two years.

On the death of Peada, the ambitious Oſwy took poſſeſſion of the whole kingdom of Mercia, which he enjoyed without interruption for three years, when the Mercians took up arms, and being headed by three popular noblemen drove Oſwy out of the kingdom; after which they placed Wulphur, the ſecond ſon of Peada, on the throne of Mercia.

A. D. 660. Wulphur, during the whole of his reign, was employed in committing hoſtilities upon his neighbours, and moſt of his enterprizes were attended with ſucceſs; but he fell in battle at Bedwin in Wiltſhire, by the ſword of Eſcwin king of Weſſex.

A. D. 675. On the death of Wulphur the crown of Mercia deſcended to his ſon Kenred, who being an infant, the government was placed in the hands of Ethelred, brother to the late king. This prince in 676 made war upon the king of Kent with ſucceſs, but in 679 was defeated by the Northumbrians. After this he remained in a ſtate of tranquillity for twenty-five years, when, reſigning his kingdom to his nephew Kinred, he retired to a monaſtery, and there ſpent the remainder of his days.

A. D. 704. Kenred, after holding the ſcepter five years, followed the example of his predeceſſor, leaving the crown to his uncle Ceolrid. This prince maintained a bloody and undeciſive war with the Weſt-Saxons, and after a reign of twelve years, loſt his life by poiſon.

A. D. 716. Ceolrid was ſucceeded by Ethelbald, brother to Penda, whoſe whole life was ſpent in committing hoſtilities on his neighbours. He was of a moſt unſocial and cruel diſpoſition, and ſo deteſted by his ſubjects, that they at length found means to have him aſſaſſinated, after having held the ſcepter thirty-nine years.

A. D. 755. On the death of Ethelbald, one Beornred, a very popular and enterprizing man, took poſſeſſion of the throne; but the Mercian nobility, incenſed at his inſolence, took up arms, and exerted their power ſo effectually, that they drove him out of the kingdom, and veſted Offa, nephew to the late king, with the royal ſcepter.

A. D. 757. The firſt military expedition of Offa, after being ſeated on the throne, was againſt of Northumberland fell to his ſon Oſwy, whoſe whole reign was one continued ſcene of war and tumult. He held the ſovereignty for the ſpace of twenty-ſeven years, and then dying left the crown to his ſon Egfrid.

A. D. 670. The firſt military expedition in which Egfrid engaged himſelf was againſt the Picts, who, having raiſed a prodigious army among the northern nations, entered his territories, and committed violent outrages in different parts of the kingdom. Egfrid loſt no time in endeavouring to repel their force, and though his army was greatly inferior in numbers to that of the enemy, he attacked them with ſuch ſucceſs that they were totally defeated, and the greater part of them put to the ſword.

A. D. 684. Egfrid now turned his arms againſt the Scots, in violation of a treaty concluded with Eugenius their king, and waſted great part of their country with fire and ſword. But at length Eugenius, having brought over the Picts to his alliance, attacked him ſo furiouſly, that his army was totally routed, and himſelf narrowly eſcaped with his life.

A. D. 685. Incenſed at the revolt of the Picts, Egfrid marched the next year with a powerful army into their country, in order to chaſtiſe them for their treachery. But this expedition proved fatal to him; for the Picts, knowing themſelves incapable of meeting him in the open field, made a feigned retreat towards their mountains, and by this ſtratagem drew Egfrid into an ambuſcade, whereby himſelf and the greater part of his army were cut to pieces.

From this period few tranſactions happened in Northumberland worthy of notice, except the depoſition and murder of its princes. The people were treated with cruelty, and ſuperſtitious bigotry uſurped the place of genuine religion,

The Kingdom of EAST-ANGLIA.

THIS kingdom was founded by the Angles, a people from Jutland, who landed at different times in independent bodies on the eaſtern coaſt of the iſland. They were ſtrongly oppoſed by the Britons, with whom they fought many battles; nor were they able to eſtabliſh themſelves till forty years after their firſt arrival in Britain.

A. D. 571. The firſt perſon that aſſumed the title of king of Eaſt Anglia, and who, therefore, may be properly termed the founder of the kingdom, was Uffa. This prince enjoyed the ſovereignty about ſeven years, and then dying left the ſcepter to his ſon Titel, who reigned twenty-one years. But hiſtory is ſilent with reſpect to the actions of both theſe princes; ſo that we may ſuppoſe they reigned in a profound ſtate of eaſe and tranquillity.

A. D. 599. On the death of Titel, the throne of Eaſt-Anglia fell to his ſon Redwald, a prince whoſe great merits rendered him ſo conſpicuous, that he was placed at the head of the heptarchy, which poſt he held with the moſt diſtinguiſhed reputation. After a glorious reign of twenty-five years, he paid the debt of nature, as univerſally lamented as he had been beloved by his ſubjects.

A. D. 624. Redwald was ſucceeded by his ſon Eorpwald, a prince, who ſo far degenerated from the virtues of his father, that he rendered himſelf odious to his ſubjects by every meanneſs that could diſgrace royalty. Such was his puſillanimity and inactiveneſs, that he left the weighty affairs of government to Edwin king of Northumberland, to whom he even offered his crown; but this Edwin generouſly declined, the dictates of honour and juſtice (in conſideration of the great benefits he had received from Redwald his father) preponderating in the boſom of that virtuous monarch.

Eorpwald, towards the cloſe of his reign, embraced the Chriſtian religion, which ſo incenſed Richbert, a principal officer of the army, that he aſſaſſinated him with own hand.

On the death of Eorpwald, the aſſaſſin Richbert conducted the affairs of ſtate for the ſpace of three years, without aſſuming the title of king; during which time the thickeſt clouds of Pagan darkneſs overſpread the kingdom of the Eaſt Angles.

A. D. 633. Tired with the uſurpation of Richbert, the Saxons recalled Sigebert (a ſon of the late Redwald) from France, where he had been ſome years in a ſtate of exile, and placed him on the throne of his anceſtors. This prince, during his reſidence abroad, had embraced chriſtianity, and improved himſelf in every branch of uſeful learning. As ſoon, therefore, as he was ſettled on the throne he applied himſelf, with great diligence, to the propagation of the goſpel among his ſubjects, in which laudable work he was aſſiſted by one Felix, a Burgundian prieſt, and the ſucceſs they met with anſwered their utmoſt expectations. After this Sigebert reſigned his crown to his ſon Egric, and retired to the monaſtery of St. Edmundſbury, which he had founded himſelf, preferring the habit of a monk to the robes of royalty.

A. D. 644. Egric had not been long on the throne before his dominions were invaded by that reſtleſs tyrant Penda, king of Mercia. In conſequence of this the Eaſt-Angles, knowing the power of Penda, and being diffident of the courage and abilities of Egric, had recourſe to Sigebert, intreating him to quit the cloiſter, and take upon him the command of their forces. After many repeated ſolicitations, their importunity prevailed, and Sigebert left the convent; but, retaining his ſuperſtition, he abſolutely refuſed to carry any other weapon than a wand. The fatal effect of this frantic behaviour ſoon appeared; for the Eaſt Anglian army was totally routed, and both Sigebert and his ſon ſlain in the field of battle.

On the death of Sigebert the crown devolved on Annas, a nephew of the famous Redwald, who was one of the moſt illuſtrious princes that ever filled the Eaſt-Anglian throne. A. D. 757. The firſt military expedition of Offa, after being ſeated on the throne, was againſt the inhabitants of Kent, whom he defeated in a pitched battle, ſlew their king with his own hand, and made himſelf maſter of their country. Elated with this ſucceſs, he marched with his forces to the northward, and invaded Northumberland, which at that time was diſtracted with wars and inteſtine commotions. In conſequence of this he met with little oppoſition from the inhabitants, and accordingly returned loaded with ſpoils.

The military proweſs of Offa, and the ſucceſs that had attended his arms, ſtruck a general terror in the other Saxon princes; but the only one that made any attempt to ſtop his progreſs was Kinewulf king of the Weſt-Saxons, who raiſed a powerful army, and marched againſt the conqueror. A deſperate battle enſued at a place called Beſſington in Oxfordſhire, but victory declared in favour of Offa, and Kinewulf, though a brave and experienced commander, was obliged to purchaſe a peace at the expence of all his territories to the northward of the Thames.

A. D. 776. The commotions in the different Saxons ſtates, occaſioned by the ambitious proceedings of Offa, were particularly attended to by the Britons, who, deſirous of taking any advantages made ſudden inroads into their territories, which being unexpected, proved ſucceſsful. They at length penetrated into the frontier provinces of Mercia, upon which Offa marched againſt them, and a deſperate battle enſued, when the Britons were defeated with great ſlaughter, and thoſe who eſcaped the ſword fled with precipitation into their own country. To prevent their incurſions in future Offa threw up a ſtrong entrenchment, which began near the mouth of the river Dee in Flintſhire, and, running along the mountains, terminated at the influx of the Wye into the Severn near Briſtol. This was the moſt arduous work executed during the heptarchy, a part of which ſtill remains, and is known by the name of Offa's Dyke.

The great ſucceſs of Offa's arms raiſed his reputation to the higheſt ſummit. His court was now reſorted to by all the neighbouring princes, who attended either to pay him homage, or conciliate his favours, Offa received them with the greateſt reſpect, and even intereſted himſelf in adjuſting their domeſtic differences, ſo that they might ſit eaſy and firm on their reſpective thrones. But all theſe good actions were ſtained by the treacherous murder of Ethelbert king of Eaſt-Anglia, the particulars of which have been already related in the hiſtory of that kingdom.

A. D. 792. Impreſſed with a deep ſenſe of the horrid crime he had committed, as well as deſirous of re-eſtabliſhing his reputation among his people, Offa enriched the cathedral of Hereford, gave the tenth of all his goods to the church, and undertook a pilgrimage to Rome, where he received abſolution from the pope. In return for this favour, he eſtabliſhed in his dominions an annual tax to the pontiff called Peter's-pence, becauſe it amounted to a penny each houſe. This tax was levied by the pope's agents for upwards of ſeven hundred years, till it was at length aboliſhed, together with the papal ſupremacy, in the reign of Henry VIII.

Soon after Offa returned from the continent, he erected the famous monaſtery of St. Alban's, where he reſided for the ſpace of two years, and then paid the debt of nature, leaving the crown of Mercia to his ſon Egfrid.

A. D. 794. Egfrid began his reign with ſome popular acts, and the people flattered themſelves with being very happy under his government; but their expectations were ſoon rendered abortive by his death, which happened about five months after his acceſſion to the throne.

On the death of Egfrid the crown devolved on Kenulf, a prince deſcended in a collateral branch from Penda, and poſſeſſed of the ferocity and ambition of that family. Soon after his acceſſion he waged war againſt Kent, and taking Egbert the king priſoner, in the fury of his zeal, ordered his hands to be cut off, and his eyes put out, after which he took him to Mercia, leaving his brother Cuthred in poſſeſſion of the crown of that kingdom.

Theſe are the only particulars we have recorded of this prince, who, after holding the ſcepter twenty-four years, died, leaving a ſon named Kenelm, and two daughters, Quendrida and Burgamida.

A. D. 819. Kenelm acceded to the throne of Mercia on the death of his father, but being a minor he was placed under the care of his ſiſter Quendrida, who, inſtead of performing the duty ſhe owed her father, baſely cauſed him to be murdered, and then uſurped the ſeat of ſovereignty. She did not, however, long enjoy the fruits of her perfidy, being ſupplanted by her uncle Ceolwulph, who, two years after, was dethroned by a popular nobleman named Beornulf. This uſurper held the reigns of ſovereignty only two years, when he was defeated and ſlain by the king of the Eaſt-Angles. Ludican, his ſucceſſor, underwent the ſame fate; and Wiglaf, who ſucceeded him, found every thing in ſuch confuſion that he was unable to withſtand the fortune of Egbert, who united all the Saxon kingdoms into one great monarchy, affixing to the whole the common name of ENGLAND.

CHAP. I.

EGBERT.

Egbert is placed on the throne of Weſſex. Marches againſt the Britons. His dominions invaded by Bernulf, king of Mercia, whom he engages and totally defeats. Reduces the ſeveral kingdoms of the Heptarchy and becomes ſole monarch of England. Is ſolemnly crowned at Wincheſter. A conſiderable body of Danes land in England. Egbert engages them, and is defeated; but the Danes, ſuſtaining great loſs, retreat to their ſhips, and quit the iſland. The Britons invite over the Danes to join them againſt Egbert. They accordingly land, and the conjunctive armies marching againſt Egbert, a battle enſues, in which the latter proves victorious. Egbert fits out a fleet of ſhips to ſtop the incurſions of the Danes, but ſoon after dies, leaving the crown to his ſon Ethelwolf.

IT has been already obſerved, towards the cloſe of the hiſtory of Weſſex, that on the death of Brithric, a deputation was ſent to Egbert, then an exile in France to return, and take upon him that crown to which he had a right by lineal deſcent. This invitation he readily accepted; ſo that at his return he was immediately placed on the throne amidſt the univerſal acclamations of the people.

A. D. 800. Egbert on his firſt acceſſion, directed his conduct in ſuch a manner as to prevent the leaſt ſuſpicion of the grand deſign he had concerted, while in the court of Charlemagne, namely, that of reducing the ſeven Saxon kingdoms, into one grand monarchy. Inſtead of ſeeming to aſpire to conqueſt, he appeared the kind mediator between the other kings, and became ſo reſpected for his prudent deciſions, that they appealed to his award upon all occaſions. Thus by obtaining their confidence he gradually aroſe to an aſcendency at which he did not ſeem to aim, and from an adviſer became a dictator to his royal cotemporaries.

A. D. 808. Egbert was not inſenſible of the great power and authority he had over all the monarchs of the heptarchy; but ſtill he thought it neceſſary to act with the greateſt precaution, leſt they ſhould be alarmed, and thereby prompted to meaſures that might interrupt the proſecution of his main deſign. He wiſely conſidered that it would be in vain to attempt any thing againſt the Saxons while the Britons remained in a condition to oppoſe him. He knew they would be ſure to join the weaker party, and though nothing could make them hearty friends, yet a little diſcipline might render them formidable enemies. He therefore determined to commence hoſtilities againſt the antient inhabitants of the iſland, and having raiſed a conſiderable army, marched into Cornwall, fully reſolved, if poſſible, to make himſelf maſter of that part of the country. No ſooner were the Britons informed of Egbert's arrival in their territories than they immediately marched againſt him, and the two armies meeting at a place called Camelford a deſperate battle enſued, which was attended with great ſlaughter on both ſides, but at length victory declared in favour of Egbert. This battle was followed by many others, and the war carried on with great ſpirit on both ſides for a conſiderable time, till at length the genius of Egbert prevailing, the Corniſh Britons were vanquiſhed, and Cornwall was added to the dominions of the conqueror.

While Egbert was attempting to reduce the Corniſh Britons, thoſe who inhabited Wales contributed all they could to their aſſiſtance. This ſo irritated Egbert, that he made an expedition into their country, and after totally ſubduing them, made a law, which enacted, that if any Welchman preſumed to paſs Offa's Dyke, the offence ſhould be capital, and he ſhould anſwer for his preſumption by the loſs of his life.

The great ſucceſs of Egbert's arms over the Britons attracted the attention and excited the envy of the other Saxon princes. But no one was able to contend with him except Bernulf king of Mercia, who had reduced the Eaſt-Angles, and made the kings of Eſſex and Kent his tributaries. Bernulf was particularly alarmed at the ſucceſs of Egbert; he ſaw that unleſs ſomething happened to check him in his purſuit after conqueſts, he would ſoon be maſter of the whole heptarchy. He therefore increaſed his army, and taking the opportunity of Egbert's abſence, invaded that part of Weſſex which bordered on his own dominions.

A. D. 823. Egbert was no ſooner informed of this event, than he immediately marched his forces againſt the invader of his country. The two armies met at a place called Elandine (now Wilton) in Wiltſhire, and a deſperate battle enſued. The conteſt was long and bloody; but at length the fortune of Egbert prevailed, and Bernulf was obliged to ſeek his ſafety in flight, leaving the greater part of his army dead on the field of battle.

Egbert now determined to make a bold attempt for effecting the plan he had ſo long concerted. He did not, however, chuſe to proſecute his deſign by purſuing the conqueſt he had made over the Mercians. He marched with his forces into the kingdom of Kent, where Baldred the then monarch, held his power as tributary to Bernulf king of Mercia. The Kentiſhmen made very little oppoſition to the forces of Egbert; in conſequence of which Baldred fled for ſafety to the oppoſite ſide of the Thames, leaving the Weſt-Saxons in full poſſeſſion of his kingdom.

The great power of Egbert ſo intimidated the Eaſt and South Saxons that they quietly ſubmitted to his victorious arms; and Egbert, having taken poſſeſſion of their reſpective kingdoms, annexed them to his own dominions.

The example of the Eaſt and South-Saxons was followed by the Eaſt-Angles, who not only implored the protection of Egbert, but alſo took up arms in his defence. This ſo irritated Bernulf, king of Mercia, to whom they had been long ſubject, that he marched at the head of his forces againſt them, in order to chaſtiſe them for their perfidy. The Eaſt-Angles were exceeding formidable, having received conſiderable aſſiſtance from Egbert; ſo that Bernulf had a difficulty to ſurmount much greater than he imagined. As ſoon as the two armies met a deſperate battle enſued, which laſted ſome time with equal obſtinacy on both ſides, till at length victory declared in favour of the Eaſt-Angles, and Bernulf was found among the ſlain.

This defeat convinced the Mercians that it was in vain to make any father attempts upon the Eaſt-Angles, more eſpecially as they were ſupported by the powerful Egbert. The immediate danger of their own country now called for their whole attention, to guard againſt which they placed one Wiglaf, a perſon of known valour and military proweſs, on the throne of Mercia.

A. D. 825. But the power of Egbert was not to be reſiſted. He marched at the head of his forces into the heart of the Mercian territories, and obtained eaſy conqueſts over a weak and diſheartened people. Wiglaf was driven from one province to another, and at length obliged to fly for ſhelter to Seward, abbot of Croyland. In conſequence of this, Egbert made himſelf maſter of the kingdom of Mercia; but at the interceſſion of Seward he reſtored Wiglaf to the throne, permitting him to retain the title of king, on condition of paying him an annual tribute. This condeſcenſion produced an advantageous effect, the Mercians (who eſteemed Wiglaf) being perfectly reconciled to the ſubmiſſive ſtate in which they were reduced by the powerful Egbert.

A. D. 826. The only kingdom of the heptarchy that now remained unconquered was Northumberland, which, by inteſtine broils, had been long in the moſt diſtracted ſtate; all civil ſubordination was loſt, and the ſhadow of royalty only held by Ealdred. As ſoon, therefore, as Egbert had penetrated with his formidable army into the territories of Ealdred, he immediately diſpatched meſſengers with offers of ſubmiſſion, and reſigned his kingdom to the conqueror, only ſtipulating that he might, in future, govern as a deputy, what, before, he had ruled as a king.

A. D. 829. The victorious and intrepid Egbert having thus ſucceſsfully obtained the ultimate wiſhes of his ambition, by reducing the whole ſeven kingdoms of the heptarchy to his authority, convened a general aſſembly of all the different ſtates to meet at Wincheſter, where by the unanimous conſent of both clergy and laity, he was ſolemnly crowned king of England. Immediately after the ceremony he iſſued a proclamation or edict for aboliſhing all diſtinctions among the Saxon kingdoms, and commanded that, in future, the whole ſhould be called by the common name of ENGLAND.

Egbert was now poſſeſſed of more power and glory than any monarch that had had hitherto preſided in the iſland; and what he had acquired by the force of arms he endeavoured to preſerve by the judiciouſneſs of his conduct. He permitted the inhabitants of the ſeveral kingdoms that had formed the Heptarchy to enjoy their former laws and cuſtoms, and to chuſe their kings, only paying him an annual tribute as a mark of ſubjection. By theſe means he reſtored peace throughout his dominions, and obtained the univerſal reſpect and affection of his ſubjects.

But theſe flattering days of proſperity were ſoon obſcured by the clouds of adverſity, and the tranquillity of the nation interrupted by the appearance of the Danes, who, for ſome time back, had, at different periods, committed the moſt barbarous ravages in different parts of the iſland.

A. D. 831. A conſiderable body of theſe piratical invaders now landed in the iſland of Shepey, which they ravaged, and returned to their ſhips loaded with plunder. This ſucceſs encouraged them to make a deſcent the year following at Tinemouth, but being reſolutely oppoſed by the inhabitants, they re-embarked, and cruiſing along the coaſt landed a body of near fifteen thouſand men at Charmouth in Dorſetſhire.

A. D. 833. Egbert was no ſooner informed of the landing of theſe ferocious invaders than he immediately marched againſt them; but his army being too weak, they gained a compleat victory, and Egbert himſelf was indebted to the darkneſs of the night for his ſafety. The Danes, however, had ſuſtained ſo conſiderable a loſs in the action, that they did not think proper to continue their ravages, but retreated to their ſhips, and, for ſome time, quitted the iſland.

A. D. 836. The Britons in Cornwall had been long diſſatisfied with their ſituation, and were determined, if poſſible, to ſhake off the Saxon yoke. To effect this they invited over the Danes to join them, and a numerous body of theſe pirates landing in Cornwall, a conjunction was immediately formed, they took the field and marched into the dominions of Egbert.

But Egbert, notwithſtanding his late defeat, was not to be intimidated. As ſoon as he heard of this conjunction, he collected his forces, and marched with all expedition to give the enemy battle. The two armies met at a place called Hengſton-hill, where the fortune of Egbert prevailed: the combined army was totally defeated, great numbers ſlain, and the reſt obliged to ſave themſelves by a precipitate flight. The Danes retired to their ſhips, and the Britons ſecured themſelves by taking ſhelter in their mountains.

Egbert now flattered himſelf with ſpending the remainder of his days in eaſe and tranquillity: but the reſtleſs Danes continuing to harraſs his dominions, he was once more called into the field, and was once more victorious. The Danes were again defeated, and obliged to return without their booty.

A. D. 838. From the repeated attacks of the rapacious Danes, Egbert was convinced of the neceſſity of a fleet to check their progreſs, and accordingly fitted out a number of ſhips for that purpoſe; but he had no ſooner accompliſhed this buſineſs than he paid the debt of nature, leaving the crown to his ſon Ethelwolf.

Egbert

Egbert was formed both for conqueſt and government, being intrepid, wiſe and humane. He acquired a kingdom by his valour and military proweſs, and rendered his people happy by his prudence, beneficence, and impartial adminiſtration of juſtice. He reigned as king of the Weſt-Saxons twenty-ſeven years, and ten years as ſovereign of England.

Remarkable Occurrences during the reign of Egbert.

803. A dreadful famine in Scotland.
824. A great Mortality in England, and another Famine in Scotland.
826. An Inundation of the Humber, which did conſiderable damage.
831. Dongale, king of Scotland, drowned in paſſing the river Spey.
836. A violent Inundation of the Tweed, which did conſiderable damage, and deſtroyed great numbers of cattle.

CHAP. II.

ETHELWOLF.

Ethelwolf, being attached to a monaſtic life, neglects the affairs of government, in conſequence of which the Danes land in different parts of England, but are oppoſed by the inhabitants with various ſucceſs. Ethelwolf at length marches againſt them, and is defeated. He relinquiſhes a part of his dominions to his ſon Athelſtan. The Danes continue to commit farther ravages in various parts of the iſland. Ethelwolf makes a pilgrimage to Rome, and on his return marries Judith, the daughter of king Charles the Bald. During his abſence a conſpiracy is formed to diveſt him of the ſovereignty, but on his arrival matters are accommodated, and tranquillity reſtored. He grants the tithes of the kingdom to the clergy, which is confirmed by the ſtates and people. Makes his will, and ſoon after pays the debt of nature.

A. D. 838. THE prudent and diſcerning Egbert, being conſcious of the advantages he had obtained from the extreme devotion to which the Engliſh Saxons were attached, endeavoured to remove the like from his ſon Ethelwolf; and therefore, when on his death-bed, beſought him not to become a ſlave to that indolence which he ſaw predominant in his temper, and which, he was apprehenſive, ſhould it be indulged, might prove fatal to him and his kingdom.

Ethelwolf had been educated in a cloiſter, and even taken the orders of a ſub-deacon in the monaſtery of Wincheſter during the life of his elder brother; but, on his death, pope Leo granted a diſpenſation, whereby he was permitted to marry, and aſſume a ſecular life. After leaving the cloiſter he ſerved under his father againſt the Danes with great reputation, but he could never ſhake off his attachment to a monaſtic life; and when he acceded to the throne, notwithſtanding the advice of his dying parent, he gave a looſe to his favourite paſſion, neglected the affairs of government, and preſerved the character of a monk, inſtead of that of a monarch.

The Danes, encouraged by the indolent diſpoſition of Ethelwolf made ſeveral deſcents in England, and committed the moſt horrid ravages wherever they went. In the firſt year of his reign a conſiderable body of theſe piratical rovers landed at Southampton; but before they could pillage the country, Wulfheard, a brave and intrepid general, attacked and routed them with great ſlaughter, obliging thoſe who eſcaped to fly to their ſhips with the greateſt precipitation.

Soon after this they made a ſecond deſcent at Portland, upon which Ethelwolf, who was too inactive to take the command of the army himſelf, diſpatched Edelhelm, a brave and experienced officer, to oppoſe them. For ſome time the Saxons engaged the pirates with ſuch fury, that they were thrown into the utmoſt diſorder; but receiving freſh ſupplies from their ſhips, they rallied, and returned to the charge with ſuch reſolution, that the Engliſh were entirely defeated, and Edelhelm, their commander, fell among the ſlain.

A. D. 839. In the beginning of this year the piratical Danes landed at Romney, where they were oppoſed by Herebert, a brave and experienced general; but he alſo was defeated, and loſt his life in battle. Elated with this ſucceſs, the Danes penetrated farther into the country, ſo that all Eaſt-Anglia and Kent felt the effects of their barbarous fury: and ſoon after London, Canterbury and Rocheſter, met with the like fate. As the whole deſign of theſe expeditions was plunder they ſeldom met with any other oppoſition than from the militia of the place where they landed; ſo that they embarked with their booty before the people whom they pillaged could be properly ſuſtained by the army.

A. D. 840. From the variety of deſcents made be theſe piratical invaders in different parts of the kingdom, they had diſcovered the natural fertility of the country, and were determined, if poſſible to make a ſettlement in the iſland. Accordingly, a numerous body of them landed at Charmouth, where Egbert had, ſome years before, been defeated. Alarmed at the great danger which now threatened his kingdom, Ethelwolf was rouſed from his monkiſh lethargy, and placing himſelf at the head of his forces, marched with all expedition againſt the invaders of his country. A bloody battle enſued, in which the troops of Ethelwolf were defeated, and the enemy continued maſters of the field. But notwithſtanding this ſucceſs, the barbarians were convinced, from the great oppoſition they had met with, that a ſettlement could not be attempted with ſucceſs. They therefore abandoned their deſign for the preſent, and after pillaging the country retired to their ſhips, and once more quitted the iſland.

Ethelwolf was now convinced that a continued courſe of activity was neceſſary to fruſtrate the attempts of the reſtleſs and barbarous Danes. But the fatigues of military duty were far from being agreeable to his diſpoſition. He therefore, in order to procure that indolent tranquillity which he valued much more that power, reſolved to diveſt himſelf of part of his dominions, and accordingly

The great power of Egbert ſo intimidated the Eaſt and South Saxons that they quietly ſubmitted to his victorious arms; and Egbert, having taken poſſeſſion of their reſpective kingdoms, annexed them to his own dominions.

The example of the Eaſt and South-Saxons was followed by the Eaſt-Angles, who not only implored the protection of Egbert, but alſo took up arms in his defence. This ſo irritated Bernulf, king of Mercia, to whom they had been long ſubject, that he marched at the head of his forces againſt them, in order to chaſtiſe them for their perfidy. The Eaſt-Angles were exceeding formidable, having received conſiderable aſſiſtance from Egbert; ſo that Bernulf had a difficulty to ſurmount much greater than he imagined. As ſoon as the two armies met a deſperate battle enſued, which laſted ſome time with equal obſtinacy on both ſides, till at length victory declared in favour of the Eaſt-Angles, and Bernulf was found among the ſlain.

This defeat convinced the Mercians that it was in vain to make any father attempts upon the Eaſt-Angles, more eſpecially as they were ſupported by the powerful Egbert. The immediate danger of their own country now called for their whole attention, to guard againſt which they placed one Wiglaf, a perſon of known valour and military proweſs, on the throne of Mercia.

A. D. 825. But the power of Egbert was not to be reſiſted. He marched at the head of his forces into the heart of the Mercian territories, and obtained eaſy conqueſts over a weak and diſheartened people. Wiglaf was driven from one province to another, and at length obliged to fly for ſhelter to Seward, abbot of Croyland. In conſequence of this, Egbert made himſelf maſter of the kingdom of Mercia; but at the interceſſion of Seward he reſtored Wiglaf to the throne, permitting him to retain the title of king, on condition of paying him an annual tribute. This condeſcenſion produced an advantageous effect, the Mercians (who eſteemed Wiglaf) being perfectly reconciled to the ſubmiſſive ſtate in which they were reduced by the powerful Egbert.

But the fatigues of military duty were far from being agreeable to his diſpoſition. He therefore, in order to procure that indolent tranquillity which he valued much more that power, reſolved to diveſt himſelf of part of his dominions, and accordingly ingly reſigned the counties of Eſſex, Kent, and Suſſex to his ſon Athelſtan.

A. D. 845. The inveſting of Athelſtan with the ſovereign power over theſe parts of his dominions greatly contributed towards the ſecurity of the ſouthern coaſt; but the other parts of the kingdom were ſtill expoſed to the ravages of the mercileſs Danes. A prodigious number of theſe piratical invaders landed near the mouth of the river Parret in Somerſetſhire; but being attacked with great fury by the Engliſh forces, they were totally defeated, and the principal part of their army cut to pieces.

A. D. 851. This overthrow had ſo ſickened the Danes that they deſiſted from any farther invaſions for the ſpace of ſix years, at the expiration of which they landed in much greater bodies than they had hitherto done, being reſolved to accompliſh their grand deſign of making a ſettlement in the iſland. But the event did not anſwer their expectations. One party was routed at Wenbury, by Ceorle governor of Devonſhire, and another was defeated by Alcher governor of Kent, while Athelſtan defeated them in a naval engagement near Sandwich, took nine of their ſhips, and obliged the reſt to leave the coaſt.—As no mention is made of Athelſtan after this action, it is conjectured he fell in the glorious attempt of reſcuing his country from the ravages of an inveteand mercileſs enemy.

A. D. 852. But notwithſtanding theſe misfortunes the Danes were not to be intimidated. They embarked the following ſpring on board a fleet of three hundred ſail, entered the river Thames, ravaged London and Canterbury, and penetrated into Surry; but being met at a place called Oakly, by Ethelwolf and his ſon Ethelbald, a deſperate battle enſued, which terminated in favour of the Engliſh, the Danes being routed with great ſlaughter.

A ſhort time after this the Danes landed in the Iſle of Thanet, where they were attacked by Ealker and Huda governors of Kent and Surry. The beginning of the action was favourable to the Engliſh; but at length victory declared for the Danes, and both the governors fell in the conflict. The Danes then removed to the Iſle of Sheepey, where they took up their winter quarters, and erected ſeveral fortifications for their future ſecurity.

A. D. 854. Ethelwolf had, for ſome time, formed the reſolution of making a pilgrimage to Rome, and, notwithſtanding the dangerous ſituation of his kingdom, he was now determined to carry his deſign into execution. Accordingly, taking with him his youngeſt ſon Alfred, he repaired to that city, where he was received with particular marks of reſpect by Leo IV. the then pontiff; and in his turn gave his holineſs the moſt ſubſtantial proofs of his ſubmiſſion and regard. During his ſtay at Rome he ſpent the greater part of his time in religious exerciſes, viſiting every ſhrine, and paying his devotions to every relic. He rebuilt the Engliſh college which had been reduced to aſhes, and engaged to extend the tax of St. Peter's-pence throughout his kingdom. Beſides this liberality, he undertook to pay an annual tribute of three hundred marks, two thirds of which were appointed for defraying the expence of tapers in the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul, and the other third was a preſent to the pope himſelf.

A. D. 855. After ſtaying a year at Rome, Ethelwolf took leave of his holineſs, and ſet out for his own dominions. On his way he ſtopped at the court of France, where he fell in love with Judith, daughter of Charles the Bald. This young princeſs was a widow, though no more than thirteen years of age; but notwithſtanding the great diſparity of their years, Ethelwolf married her, and indulged himſelf for ſome time in the French court, without paying the leaſt attention to the welfare of his country.

In the mean time England was expoſed to the inſults of the rapacious Danes, who, taking advantage of the king's abſence, made ſeveral incurſions from their ſettlement in the Iſle of Sheepey. Ethelbald, the king's ſecond ſon, a prince of an aſpiring diſpoſition, was ſo irritated at the negligence of his father, that he formed a deſign of ſeizing the ſcepter, in which he was joined by the greater part of the nobility, but more particularly Alſten, biſhop of Wincheſter, who was an undaunted patriot, and at that time in great reputation with the people. Several conſultations were held on the ſubject, and it was at length reſolved that Ethelbald ſhould aſſume the government, and take poſſeſſion of that throne, which his father, from his weakneſs and ſuperſtition, was ſo ill qualified to fill. Meaſures were accordingly concerted for fixing the ſovereignty in Ethelbald, but before they could be carried into execution, Ethelwolf, accompanied by his new queen, returned to his dominions.

The arrival of the king did not intimidate Ethelbald: he proſecuted his deſign with the ſame vigour as before, and Ethelwolf made preparations for oppoſing him. The torch of civil diſcord was now lighted, and every thing ſeemed to threaten deſtruction to the country, when the noblemen and prelates interpoſed, and, by their good offices, prevailed on the king and his ſon to accommodate their differences without the effuſion of human blood. This was accordingly done by Ethelwolf's ceding to Ethelbald the antient kingdom of Weſſex, reſerving the other parts of the iſland to himſelf.

Peace and tranquillity being thus reſtored, Ethelwolf, inſtead of attending to the affairs of government, reſolved to indulge his favourite paſſion of augmenting the power of the church; and accordingly beſtowed on the clergy a donation for which they had contended for ſeveral centuries. They had maintained that the Moſaic law, which gave to the Levites the tenth part of all the produce of the land was obligatory to Chriſtians, and this doctrine they preached up with the utmoſt aſſiduity; but hitherto the intereſt of the laity had been too ſtrong for their arguments. The power of Ethelwolf, however, effected what all their eloquence had attempted in vain. He ſummoned a general aſſembly of the ſtates, and, by a formal charter, granted tithes to the church, which he ordered to be levied throughout the kingdom. This grant was confirmed by the ſtates and people, who might probably be the more ready to conſent thereto, from conſidering it in a religious light, and ſuppoſing that it might be a means of their obtaining the Divine aſſiſtance againſt the ferocious Danes, who had had long been a terror to the inhabitants of various parts of the iſland.

Ethelwolf, having thus accompliſhed his grand deſign in favour of the church, ſpent the reſt of his days in acts of charity and devotion. At length, finding his end approaching, he made his will, in order to prevent any diſputes that might otherwiſe ariſe among his children after his death. He bequeathed his regal domains to his two eldeſt ſons, with this diſtinction, that Ethalbald ſhould ſtill enjoy the territories already aſſigned him, and Ethelbert thoſe which had been retained by himſelf. If either died, the ſurvivor was to ſucceed to the whole, and in caſe of the deaths of both, the third ſon, was to be the next heir. His perſonal eſtates he gave to charitable uſes, and ordered that all his ſucceſſors ſhould maintain one poor perſon out of every tenth family.

Ethelwolf, having thus ſettled his temporal concerns, directed his attention towards making the neceſſary preparations for futurity, and at length paid the debt of nature, after ſwaying the Engliſh ſceptre for the ſpace of nineteen years. He died at Wincheſter on the 13th of January, 857, and was buried at Steining in Suſſex. He left behind him the character of a well-diſpoſed prince, who might have ſhone in his exalted ſphere, had he not been actuated by the predominant bigotry and ſuperſtition of the age in which he lived.

CHAP. III.

ETHELBALD AND ETHELBERT.

Ethelbald purſues wicked courſes, for which he is reprimanded by Swithin biſhop of Wincheſter. He reforms, but ſoon after dies, leaving his brother Ethelbert ſole monarch of England. The Danes land at Southampton, and deſtroy the city of Wincheſter. They are oppoſed by the Engliſh, and defeated with great ſlaughter. They land in the Iſle of Thanet and commit the moſt horrid barbarities. Death of Ethelbert.

A. D. 857. AS no oppoſition was made to the will of the late king, Ethelbert took poſſeſſion of the dominions of his father, while Ethelbald kept his ſeat on the throne of Weſſex.

Ethelbald was a very wicked and profligate prince: he was both indolent and perfidious, and governed his people in the moſt arbitrary and cruel manner. Soon after the death of his father, he committed inceſt, by marrying Judith his mother-in-law, for which, and other vices, he was reprimanded by Swithin biſhop of Wincheſter. This good prelate, being grieved at the enormous actions of his maſter, exerted his utmoſt endeavours to bring him to a ſenſe of his crimes, and at length happily ſucceeded. Ethelbald was convinced of the impropriety of his conduct, and began his reform by divorcing his wife Judith. A change of government immediately ſucceeded, and Ethelbald endeavoured to make atonement for his faults by a ſtrict obſervance of religious duties, and beſtowing benefactions on the church. But the people were hardly ſenſible of this happy alteration when the king paid the debt of nature, leaving his brother Ethelbert ſole monarch of England.

A. D. 860. The diſpoſitions of theſe two princes were directly oppoſite, Ethelbert being as remarkable for his virtues as his brother had been for his vices. His adminiſtration was conducted with ſuch prudence and moderation, that tranquillity prevailed throughout his dominions, and he lived univerſally reſpected and beloved by his ſubjects.

But this tranquillity was ſoon diſturbed by the reſtleſs Danes. The Engliſh had been ſome time free from their barbarous ravages, and ſuppoſing themſelves ſecure under the mild government of Ethelbert, made no preparations to prevent their being again oppreſſed by theſe piratical invaders. A naval force, the only bulkwark that could defend them, was neglected: the coaſts were unguarded, and the whole kingdom expoſed to the invaſions of foreign enemies.

A. D. 862. In conſequence of this remiſſneſs, a conſiderable body of Danes landed at Southampton, and not meeting with any oppoſition they extended their ravages to Wincheſter, which they firſt plundered, and then reduced to aſhes. The inhabitants, inſtead of attempting to make any reſiſtance, betook themſelves to flight, which filled the Danes with ſuch an inſolent confidence, that they feared no oppoſition, and therefore marching into the more interior parts of the country, they reduced the inhabitants to the moſt abject ſtate of diſtreſs, plundering wherever they went, and marking their route with deſolation and ruin.

Ofric and Ethelwolf, two diſtinguiſhed generals of the Engliſh forces, hearing of the diſtreſſed ſituation of their countrymen, and the rapid progreſs made by theſe barbarous invaders, marched with all expedition againſt them. The conſequence of this was, that a deſperate battle enſued, which, for ſome time, was maintained with great obſtinacy on both ſides, till at length victory declared in favour of the Engliſh. The Danes were routed with great ſlaughter, and the few that eſcaped the ſword ſaved themſelves by a precipitate flight, leaving the plunder they had obtained in the hands of the conquerors.

A. D. 865. But notwithſtanding this defeat, the Danes were far from being intimidated. A prodigious body of them landed in the Iſle of Thanet, and committed ſuch horrid ravages as are ſhocking to humanity. The inhabitants of Kent, deſirous of diverting the ſtorm which threatened them, had recourſe to negotiation, and agreed to pay them a conſiderable ſum of money, in order to ſave their eſtates from inevitable ruin. The Danes readily agreed to theſe propoſals; but being perſuaded that they could gain more by pillage than the ſums ſtipulated in the treaty, they perfidiouſly took advantage of the truce, and, re-commencing their ſhocking ravages in the night, laid the eaſtern part of the country waſte with fire and ſword.

ſword. They ſpared neither age nor ſex, and wherever they went their paths were marked with the moſt horrid deſtruction. The churches were levelled with the ground, the monaſteries reduced to aſhes, and thoſe of a religious order treated with the moſt inhuman brutality.

A. D. 866. Theſe ſhocking acts of cruelty greatly diſtreſſed the mind of Ethelbert. He ſaw with grief the miſeries of his country which he could not prevent; and giving way to deſpair, it ſo wrought upon his ſpirits as to diveſt him of life, after having reigned ſole monarch ſix years univerſally beloved and revered by his ſubjects.

CHAP. IV.

ETHELRED I.

Ethelred accedes to the throne on the death of his brother Ethelbert. The Danes land in Eaſt-Anglia, and make themſelves maſters of Northumberland. They commit the moſt horrid ravages in different parts of the kingdom. Remarkable inſtance of virtuous fortitude in the abbeſs and nuns of Coldingham. The Danes defeat the Engliſh at Thetford, and cruelly put to death Edmund the tributary king of Eaſt-Anglia. Ethelred and Alfred march againſt them, but are defeated. Another battle takes place, in which the Engliſh prove victorious. Ethelred again marches againſt the invaders of his country, but is defeated, receives a mortal wound, and dies.

A. D. 866. SO ſtrictly was the will of Ethelwolf adhered to, that notwithſtanding Ethelbert left two ſons, yet, on his demiſe, his brother Ethelred ſucceeded to the throne, to which he was admitted by the unanimous voice of the people.

Ethelred began his reign with an act of injuſtice, by poſſeſſing himſelf of ſome territories which had been jointly given by his father between him and his brother Alfred. In conſequence of this Alfred appealed to the nobles, who had been witneſſes to the deed, and a new convention was ratified, ſtipulating that Alfred ſhould ſucceed to the kingdom on the death of Ethelred, and that, in the mean time, he ſhould poſſeſs certain domains for ſupporting him in a manner conſiſtent with his dignity. This being ſubmitted to by Ethelred, an accommodation took place, and the two brothers unanimouſly agreed to exert their joint efforts againſt the Danes, who were now become ſo formidable as to require the ſtrongeſt union to prevent their becoming maſters of the whole iſland.

The continual deſcents of theſe piratical invaders had greatly weakened the authority of the kings of Weſſex over the princes of Mercia, Eaſt-Anglia, and Northumberland. The tributary princes of thoſe reſpective diſtricts had almoſt thrown off their allegiance, and were on the point of aſſuming the ſame authority they had held previous to the diſſolution of the heptarchy.

The moſt powerful of theſe tributary princes was Oſbert, king of Northumberland, from whoſe miſconduct the Danes were encouraged to make farther devaſtations in various parts of the iſland. Oſbert, returning one day from hunting, called at the houſe of Bruen Brocard, a nobleman of diſtinction, for refreſhment. Brocard happening to be abſent, his lady, a woman of great beauty, entertained the king, who, after dinner, ſeduced her to her chamber, under pretence of ſecret buſineſs, and violated her honour. On her huſband's arrival ſhe informed him of the outrage, at which he was ſo irritated, that he vowed a ſevere revenge; but his reſentment was not confined to the perſon who had injured him: the meaſures he took were of a general nature: he ſacrificed to a perſonal injury the lives of thouſands, and involved his country in miſery and diſtreſs. He privately made a voyage to Denmark, informed Ivar, the then reigning monarch, of the injury he had ſuſtained, and requeſted him to eſpouſe his cauſe, by attempting to make himſelf maſter of Northumberland, which he repreſented to be in ſo weak a ſtate, that it might be taken without the leaſt danger. Ivar readily liſtened to this propoſal, and a powerful fleet was immediately fitted out under the command of him and his brother Hubba, on board of which was a prodigious number of troops, and every thing neceſſary for effecting the deſign projected by Brocard.

A. D. 867. Thus prepared, the Danes embarked for England, and landed, without the leaſt oppoſition, in the territories of the Eaſt-Angles, where they took up their winter quarters.

In the enſuing ſpring they marched into Northumberland, and directed their courſe towards York, where Oſbert at that time kept his court; and had he ſatisfied himſelf with defending that city, the Danes would, in all probability, have been defeated. But the impetuoſity of his courage gained the aſcendancy over his prudence. On their approach near the city he ſallied out to meet them, and a deſperate battle enſued, in which Oſbert fell among the ſlain. The Danes obtained a compleat victory, and the inhabitants, in order to ſecure their lives and properties, entered into a treaty with Ivar, by which he was permitted to take quiet poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Northumberland.

A. D. 868. Not ſatisfied with the poſſeſſions they had already obtained, the Danes reſolved to extend their conqueſts, and accordingly penetrated into Mercia, committing the moſt horrid ravages in their march. Buthred, the then tributary prince of that province, fearful of the conſequences, applied for aſſiſtance to Ethelred; who readily promiſed to join his forces in order to ſtop the progreſs of the invaders. He accordingly ſet out with his brother Alfred, at the head of an army, and joining the Mercians, approached the Daniſh forces; but they had poſted themſelves in ſo advantageous a place, that Ethelred was deſirous of avoiding a battle, in conſequence of which both parties conſented to a truce.

A. D. 869. But this truce was ſoon broke by the perfidious Danes, who, directing their march towards towards Northumberland, committed the moſt horrid outrages. Among other acts of cruelty, they plundered the monaſtery of Bardney in Lincolnſhire, put all the monks to death, and then levelled the building with the ground. The monaſteries of Peterborough, Ely, and indeed all that were ſituated in their way, ſhared the ſame fate; towns and cities were laid in aſhes, women raviſhed and murdered, and neither age, ſex or quality were ſufficient to ſecure the wretched inhabitants from the wantonneſs of ſavage cruelty. The cataſtrophe of the abbeſs and nuns of Coldingham Abbey in Yorkſhire was truly deplorable. Underſtanding that the Danes intended to attack the convent, Ebba, the abbeſs, in order to ſecure herſelf and nuns from falling ſacrifices to the luſtful paſſions of the Danes, propoſed that they ſhould disfigure their faces, by cutting off their noſes and upper lips. The propoſal was readily embraced, and the abbeſs ſetting the example, it was followed by the whole ſiſterhood. This expedient produced the deſired effect with regard to their honour, but it was purchaſed at the expence of their lives: for the brutal Danes, incenſed at their diſappointment, ſhut up the nuns in the monaſtery, and ſetting fire to it, they all periſhed in the flames.

A. D. 870. After continuing ſome time in Northumberland, the Danes made a deſcent into the province of Eaſt-Anglia, committing in their route the moſt horrid ravages. Edmund, the then tributary king of that diſtrict, led his forces againſt them, and the two armies meeting at Thetford a dreadful battle enſued, which terminated in favour of the Danes. The Engliſh forces were totally routed, and the victors purſuing their conqueſt, great numbers were put to the ſword. Edmund himſelf was taken priſoner, and became an object of their ſavage cruelty, the barbarians tying him to a tree as a butt or mark, and then ſhooting him to death with arrows. His remains were afterwards decently interred, and from the ſpot where they were depoſited, together with the circumſtances of his death, the town of St. Edmund's-bury in Suffolk received its name.

A. D. 871. Having ſecured the kingdom of Eaſt-Anglia, the Danes marched into the country of the Weſt-Saxons, the only people that could diſconcert their deſign of ſubjecting the whole iſland to their ambition and cruelty. They ſoon penetrated as far as Reading in Berkſhire, which, from its ſituation on the confluence of the rivers Thames and Kennet, they found might be eaſily defended with a ſmall force againſt a powerful army. Here, therefore, they fixed their headquarters, and to render the poſt more difficult of acceſs, they made a deep trench between the two rivers, which they ſtrongly fortified with ramparts.

In the mean time Ethelwulf, earl of the county, a man of an intrepid diſpoſition, obſerving the ſituation of the enemy, and that they often ſent out ſtrong detachments to forage, determined to make an attack on them when they were at a proper diſtance from the camp. Accordingly he fell upon one of their ſtrongeſt parties at a place called Englefield, when, after an obſtinate reſiſtance, they were routed and put to flight, and one of their commanders killed on the ſpot.

This gleam of ſucceſs encouraged Ethelred and Alfred, who had united their forces, to march with all expedition againſt the enemy. On their arrival near Reading they were joined by the forces under the brave Ethelwulf, and having cut off all the advanced parties of the enemy, made preparations for attacking the fortreſs itſelf. The Danes, who had collected all their forces within the town, perceiving their danger, made a vigorous ſally on the Engliſh forces, and, after an obſtinate engagement, in which the brave Ethelwulf was ſlain, obtained a victory.

But this defeat was far from intimidating the Engliſh; on the contrary they were anxious for a ſecond engagement, that they might have the opportunity of revenging the death of the brave Ethelwulf. Accordingly, four days after their defeat they again marched towards the enemy, who advanced from the town to meet them, and drew up their army in two bodies, one of which was commanded by Ivar and Hubba, and the other by their generals. Ethelred made the like diſpoſition of his forces, placing himſelf at the head of one party, and his brother Alfred at that of the other.

The two armies met on a plain near Aſhdown, and the attack was begun with great fury by Alfred, who, for ſome time, nobly ſuſtained the ſhock of the whole Daniſh army. It happened that Ethelred was then engaged in hearing maſs in his tent, and though Alfred ſent a meſſenger requeſting his immediate attendance, yet he would not move till the ſervice was over. As ſoon, however, as Ethelred joined his forces with thoſe of his brother, the Danes, who had ſtood firm againſt the charge of Alfred, gave way, a dreadful carnage enſued, and the enemy was obliged to ſeek their ſafety by a precipitate flight. One of their principal commanders, with many of their nobles, were found among the ſlain.

The ſcattered remains of the Daniſh army fled to Reading, from whence, about a fortnight after their defeat, they made an excurſion, and were attacked by the royal brothers at Baſing in Hampſhire; but here victory declared in favour of the Danes, and the Engliſh, after ſuſtaining ſome loſs, were obliged to retire.

About two months after this the two armies met at Merton in Surry, and a deſperate battle enſued, which, for ſome time, appeared likely to terminate in favour of the Engliſh; but the Danes having rallied their forces, ruſhed to the charge with ſuch impetuoſity, that the Engliſh were obliged to give way, and the laurel they had ſo nearly obtained fell into the hands of the enemy. Many of the Engliſh nobility fell among the ſlain, and the brave Ethelred received a wound that proved mortal, and of which he died on the 27th of April, 872, leaving the kingdom to his brother Alfred. He was buried at Winburn in Dorſetſhire, and his death was univerſally lamented by his ſubjects, whom he had governed with moderation, prudence, juſtice and humanity.

CHAP. V.

ALFRED, ſurnamed THE GREAT.

Alfred ſucceeds his brother Ethelred on the throne of England. Marches againſt the Danes, and is worſted. Enters into two treaties with them, both of which they violate, after committing the moſt horrid ravages, and make themſelves maſters of Exeter. Deſtroys the Daniſh fleet, marches to Exeter, and enters into another treaty, in which he obliges them to quit the kingdom. Another body of Danes make themſelves maſters of Mercia, and commit the moſt horrid ravages. Alfred conceals himſelf in the cottage of a cow-herd, and afterwards retires to a deſart part of Somerſetſhire. Odun, earl of Devonſhire, engages the Danes, and obtains a compleat victory. Alfred gets admiſſion into the Daniſh camp by diſguiſing himſelf in the character of a muſician. He engages the Danes, and obtains a compleat victory. Allows them the ſame privileges with his own ſubjects. Eſtabliſhes a militia, encreaſes his navy, and erects fortreſſes in different parts of the kingdom. A prodigious body of Danes land in England, under the command of a famous leader named Haſtings; upon which Alfred marches againſt them, obtains a compleat victory, and obliges them to abandon the iſland. He divides the kingdom into counties, hundreds and tythings. Makes many wiſe regulations for the good order and government of his ſubjects. His death and character.

A. D. 872. ON the death of Ethelred his brother Alfred* ſucceeded to the throne, and was crowned† at Wincheſter amidſt the univerſal acclamations of the people. Though only twenty-two years of age at the time of his acceſſion, yet he had given ſo many inſtances of his being a good man, a ſound politician and a courageous ſoldier, that no prince, perhaps, ever aſcended the throne with a more favourable proſpect of reigning in the hearts of his ſubjects. But at the ſame time he was ſurrounded with difficulties, and expoſed, on every ſide to the moſt imminent dangers from a lawleſs and barbarous enemy. Many of the principal cities in his kingdom were levelled with the ground; the farms were deſtroyed; agriculture was neglected; and the dejected peaſant pined for want of bread, in the midſt of fields that lately waved with all the beauties of a golden harveſt.

Such a ſituation would have ſtaggered the fortitude of a ſoul leſs intrepid and enterprizing than Alfred's; but his penetrating genius pointed out reſources to ſupport him under all his difficulties, and he determined either to relieve his country, or glorioufly periſh in the attempt. He therefore applied himſelf with great diligence to revive among his troops that diſcipline which he thought moſt likely to lead to conqueſt. He knew that great difficulties could only be ſurmounted by great efforts; and that the utmoſt activity was neceſſary to prevent the moſt alarming misfortunes. The meaſures he took were, therefore, of ſuch a nature as to preſage the reſtoration of happineſs and tranquillity to his people. They ſaw the noble exertions of royalty in their defence, and flattered themſelves with future felicity. The firmneſs and intrepidity of the monarch revived the drooping ſpirits of the ſubject. The ſoldiers caught the noble infection, and doubted not but, under ſo able a leader, their future efforts would be crowned with ſucceſs.

Satisfied of the affections of his people, and the unſhaken confidence of the army, Alfred applied himſelf with great diligence to correct every abuſe which had crept into the civil adminiſtration; but his attention was ſoon called off from the affairs of government to thoſe of the field. The barbarous Danes ſtill continued to commit the moſt horrid ravages, and though Alfred's forces were very inferior in point of number to thoſe of the enemy, yet he collected what troops he could, and marched againſt them, reſolved, if poſſible, to relieve his people from ſuch mercileſs oppreſſors. The two armies met at Wilton, and a deſperate battle enſued, in the commencement of which the Engliſh had the advantage, and obliged the Danes to quit their ground; but the latter finding by the purſuit, the inferiority of Alfred's forces in point of number, rallied, and charging the Engliſh overpowered them merely by dint of ſuperiority of numbers. This engagement, however, ſo fully convinced the Danes of the military proweſs of Alfred, and the ſpirit with which the Engliſh troops were likely to behave under ſuch a commander that they willingly entered into a treaty with him for a ſafe retreat, promiſing on that condition, to depart the kingdom. They accordingly marched to London, where they were permitted to take up their winter quarters.

A. D. 873. The perfidious Danes did not long preſerve the treaty they had made with Alfred.

* Alfred had given very early prognoſtics of thoſe great virtues and ſhining talents by which he afterwards ſaved his country from utter ruin and ſubverſion. He was always the favourite of his father; but being indulged in all the pleaſures of youth, his education had been ſo greatly neglected, that, when twelve years of age, he was totally ignorant of the loweſt elements of literature. His genius was firſt rouſed by the recital of Saxon poems, in which the queen greatly delighted; and this ſpecies of erudition expanded thoſe noble and elevated ſentiments which he had received from nature. Encouraged by the queen, and ſtimulated by his own ardent inclination, he ſoon learned to read thoſe compoſitions, and then proceeded to acquire a knowledge of the Latin tongue, in which he met with authors better adapted to his genius and heroic ſpirit. Abſorbed in theſe elegant purſuits, his acceſſion to royalty was rather an object of regret than triumph; but being called to the throne by the voice of the whole nation, in preference to his brother's children, as well as in conformity to the will of his father, he ſhock off his literary indolence, and boldly exerted himſelf in defence of his people.

† Alfred was the firſt monarch of this country, at whoſe coronation the ceremony of anointing was performed.

fred. Inſtead of making any preparations for quitting the kingdom, they applied themſelves to their old practices, pillaging the adjacent country, and committing the moſt violent diſorders wherever they went. Buthred, the tributary king of Mercia, (in whoſe territories London was ſituated) purchaſed a peace with them, on condition of their retiring to Lindſey in Lincolnſhire. But this was a diſtrict they had already laid waſte, and was therefore no agreeable ſpot to a people whoſe trade was rapine and violence. They ſo far, indeed fulfilled their engagement with Buthred as to retire to the place ſtipulated; but they ſoon removed from thence into Derbyſhire, and laid the whole country deſolate with fire and ſword. Buthred, finding himſelf unable to withſtand an enemy, who could neither be reſiſted by force, nor bound by treaty, gave himſelf up to deſpair, abandoned his kingdom, and repaired to Rome, where he ſpent the remainder of his days in the gloomy receſſes of a cloiſter.

A. D. 874. On the abdication of Buthred, the Danes made themſelves maſters of Mercia, and ſet up one Ceolwulph, a man of mean abilities, to govern that part of the kingdom as their deputy, while they concerted meaſures for reducing the whole to their authority. They had received conſiderable reinforcements from the continent, and being too numerous to ſubſiſt in one place, they divided their army into two bodies. One of theſe, commanded by Halfden, a Daniſh king, marched into Northumberland, and wintered on the banks of the Tyne; while the other, headed by three celebrated chiefs, took up their quarters at Cambridge.

A. D. 875. The proceedings of the Danes greatly alarmed Alfred. He clearly ſaw that it would be impoſſible to conquer an enemy whoſe armies were continually reinforced with freſh troops; and therefore wiſely applied himſelf to prevent, if poſſible, their future increaſe. To effect this, he fitted out a fleet of ſhips in order to guard the coaſts, and was ſoon convinced that the meaſures he had taken were not in vain. A Daniſh ſquadron of ſeven ſail made an attempt to land on the coaſt of Kent, but were prevented by the fleet of Alfred, who, engaging them, took one of their ſhips, and ſo greatly ſhattered the reſt, that they were obliged to retire.

A. D. 876. In the beginning of this year Halfden ſurpriſed Wareham-caſtle, at that time the ſtrongeſt fortreſs in Weſſex. Rouſed at this daring depredation, Alfred immediately marched with his forces againſt them, reſolved, if poſſible to chaſtiſe them in a ſevere manner for their perfidious proceedings. But on his arrival, Halfden, not thinking it prudent to engage, ſued for peace, and offered to give hoſtages for the faithful obſervance of the treaty. Alfred liſtened to his propoſal, and a treaty was concluded, by which the Danes engaged to quit the kingdom; and in order to oblige them to pay a ſtrict attention to the articles, he compelled them to ſwear upon the bracelet, which was the moſt ſacred object of Daniſh adoration.

But no oaths were ſufficient to bind theſe unfeeling barbarians, nor could even their regard for their hoſtages, which, on this occaſion were the nobleſt in their army, induce them to obſerve the terms of the treaty. They continued quiet, indeed, for two or three months, and ſeemed to make preparations for their departure; but they waited only for the opportunity of attacking Alfred's army to advantage. It was not long before their wiſhes were anſwered. The Britiſh cavalry, confiding in their ſtrict adherence to the late treaty made with Alfred, diſperſed themſelves into ſmall parties, in order to procure forage for the Engliſh forces. This was particularly obſerved by the Danes, who reſolved to take advantage of ſo favourable an incident. They accordingly iſſued from their camp in the night, attacked the parties of cavalry, ſeized their horſes, and mounting them fled to Exeter. The ſudden and unexpected appearance of the enemy ſtruck the inhabitants with deſpair: they flew to arms, but it was too late: the Danes eaſily made themſelves maſters of the place, increaſed the fortifications, and there took up their winter quarters.

A. D. 877. The perfidious conduct of the Danes greatly affected Alfred, who determined, if poſſible, to reſcue his ſubjects from the oppreſſion of ſuch mercileſs invaders. He therefore applied himſelf to put his navy on a more reſpectable footing, in order to deſtroy their power by ſea, and prevent their receiving any farther reinforcements from the continent. Accordingly, a formidable fleet was fitted out, which immediately ſet ſail in order to block up Exeter by ſea, while Alfred marched with his forces to attack it by land. The Engliſh ſquadron, in their paſſage to Exeter fell in with the grand fleet of the Danes, conſiſting of one hundred and twenty ſail, loaded with military ſtores, and having on board a ſtrong reinforcement of troops. A deſperate engagement took place, which, for ſome time, was very obſtinate on both ſides; but at length victory declared in favour of the Engliſh, and the whole Daniſh fleet was totally deſtroyed.

The news of this defeat ſo terrified the Danes, that when Alfred arrived with his forces before Exeter, inſtead of making any attempt to oppoſe him, they had again recourſe to negotiation, offering to give freſh hoſtages, and engaging to quit the iſland. Alfred had ſufficiently experienced their natural perfidy, and was therefore determined to act with the utmoſt caution. He, indeed, concluded a treaty with them, but would not ſuffer them to march by land from Exeter. He received their hoſtages, and compelled them to embark on board their ſhips for their own country.

A. D. 878. Alfred now flattered himſelf with being able totally to prevent any future depredations from the barbarous Danes, and to reſtore peace and tranquillity to his ſubjects. But in this he was greatly miſtaken. During his ſtay at Exeter a prodigious body of theſe piratical invaders landed on the coaſt of Kent, and ſoon after receiving conſiderable reinforcements, penetrated into Mercia, and committed the moſt horrid barbarities, laying the whole country waſte with fire and ſword. Add to this, thoſe who had quitted Exeter landed and joined them, ſo that, like a general inundation, they covered the whole face of the country. The wretched inhabitants were ſo aſtoniſhed and intimidated, that they abandoned their habitations, and ſought their ſafety in a ſpeedy flight: great numbers retired to the continent continent, while others took up their reſidence in the mountains and foreſts of Wales.

Alfred, finding it impoſſible either to remove the fears of his ſubjects, or collect a ſufficient body of forces to oppoſe the enemy, yeilded to the torrent of misfortune; but at the ſame time his ſoul was too great to give way to deſpair. He knew that without ſome judicious ſtep he muſt fall a ſacrifice to the ſuperior power of a barbarous and inveterate enemy, and therefore determined to ſecret himſelf for a time, in ſome private retreat, not doubting but a future opportunity would offer by which he might be enabled to preſerve, and procure happineſs and tranquillity to his ſubjects. Accordingly, having diſpoſed of his family to perſons on whoſe circumſpection and fidelity he could rely, he wandered about for ſome time in the character of a peaſant, and at length obtained admiſſion into the cottage of a cowherd, where, to conceal the dignity of the monarch, he ſubmitted to become the domeſtic of a clown *.

After Alfred had remained ſome time in this humiliating retreat, he left it, and joining his band of choſen friends, retired to a moraſs in Somerſetſhire, formed by the waters of Parret and Thane †. In the center of this moraſs he built a fortreſs, which he encloſed with intrenchments; but its greateſt ſecurity was, the intricate roads leading to it, and the foreſts and moraſſes with which it was ſurrounded. From this retreat Alfred and his followers made frequent and unexpected ſallies upon ſtraggling parties of the Danes, who often felt the vigour of his arm without being able to diſcover the quarter from whence the blow proceeded.

While Alfred continued in this obſcure retreat, Hubba, a Daniſh prince, landed with a freſh body of troops at the mouth of the Taw near Barnſtaple in the north of Devonſhire, and beſieged the Caſtle of Kenwith. Odun, earl of Devonſhire, with his followers, had taken ſhelter in this fortreſs, and ſeeing their danger reſolved to make one bold attempt to prevent falling into the hands of a mercileſs enemy. They accordingly made a ſudden ſally upon the Danes early in the morning, and taking them unprepared routed their whole army; no leſs than twelve hundred were cut to pieces, while the reſt fled for ſafety to their ſhips, leaving Hubba, their leader, dead on the field of battle. But what rendered this action ſtill more remarkable was, the conquerors taking the famous magical ſtandard of the Danes. This ſtandard was called Reafen, from its having the figure of a raven embroidered on it by the three ſiſters of Hubba, and was conſidered by the Pagans as the palladium of their preſervation.

Encouraged by this ſucceſs, Alfred now determined to carry into execution a project he had ſome time formed, but which he had kept a profound ſecret even from his deareſt friends. The Daniſh camp was at no great diſtance, and Alfred reſolved, if poſſible, to get a view of it, in order to diſcover the ſtate and proceedings of the enemy. To effect this, he took upon him the character of a muſician, a profeſſion which he knew to be held in the higheſt eſteem amongſt the moſt barbarous of the northern nations. Alfred's love of the liberal arts had given him great opportunities of perſonating this character to advantage. He therefore, without any difficulty, obtained admiſſion into the Daniſh camp, and ſo highly entertained them with his muſic and facetious humour, that he was introduced into their general's tent, where he continued ſeveral days, and even gained the favour of that ferocious leader.

While Alfred remained in this ſituation, he took particular notice of the ſupine ſecurity of the Danes, their contempt of the Engliſh, and their diſſolute manner of waſting what they had acquired by rapine and violence. He ſaw that riot had uſurped the place of order, and that diſcipline was loſt in intemperance.

Encouraged by theſe favourable appearances, Alfred left the camp, and returned to his friends, whoſe drooping ſpirits he revived, by telling them the particulars of what had paſſed, and aſſuring them that he doubted not of being yet ſucceſsful againſt the barbarous invaders of their country. He immediately diſpatched meſſengers to the moſt conſiderable of his ſubjects, ſummoning them to aſſemble, together with their followers, at Brixton, near Sherwood foreſt, in Wiltſhire. This was agreeable news to the diſtreſſed inhabitants; they had long been in the moſt abject ſtate, and anxiouſly wiſhed for the opportunity of retaliating the cruelties they had ſuffered on the barbarous invaders of their country. They accordingly aſſembled with the greateſt alacrity, and every perſon capable of bearing arms appeared at the place of rendezvous on the day appointed.

But how great was their ſurprize when they beheld their beloved monarch, whom they had long conſidered as no more! The joy they expreſſed on this occaſion is more eaſy to be conceived than deſcribed. Alfred acquainted them with the expectations he entertained of conquering his foes, and once more reſtoring peace and tranquillity to his kingdom. This ſo operated on the minds of his affectionate ſubjects, that they knew not how to expreſs their ſatisfaction. Even thoſe who had tamely ſubmitted to the Danes were aſhamed of their conduct, and from the diſtinguiſhed proofs of virtue and reſolution which had been given by Alfred, and his few choſen friends, they unanimouſly determined to follow their examples, and either

* It is ſaid, by ſome writers, that while Alfred was in this ſituation, there occurred the following circumſtance. The cowherd's wife, conſidering the king in the light of a common domeſtic, one day deſired him to mind ſome cakes that were baking before the fire, while ſhe was employed in other affairs of the family. But that Alfred, neglected the injunction, which ſo enraged the good woman, that ſhe ſeverely reprimanded the king, telling him, he was ready enough to eat the cakes, when baked though he was negligent in taking care of them while doing.

† Another ſtory related of Alfred is, that while he continued in this obſcure retreat, a pilgrim one day ſtopped at his houſe, and aſked charity; upon which Alfred, who then poſſeſſed only one loaf of bread, cut it aſunder, and gave one half to the beggar. But both theſe ſtories are evidently nothing more than legendary tales, and ought therefore to be expunged. We have only mentioned theſe to ſhew what fabulous narrations are related in former hiſtories, the like of which it ſhall be our buſineſs to avoid, and (guided only by the pen of truth) ſhall attend to ſuch authentic facts as are moſt eſſentially neceſſary to explain and illuſtrate the Britiſh annals.

either recover their liberty, or periſh in the glorious attempt.

From the diſtinguiſhed alacrity of the people in ſo punctually attending agreeable to the orders of Alfred, and their expreſſing their reſolution of ſupporting him to the laſt extremity, Alfred made not the leaſt doubt but he ſhould prove ſucceſsful in the buſineſs he was about to undertake; and therefore, placing himſelf at the head of his ſubjects, marched immediately againſt the enemy.

The Daniſh army was encamped at a place called Yatenden on the borders of Hampſhire, and was formed in the moſt confuſed and irregular manner: from the conqueſts they had made they dreaded no oppoſition, and ſupinely imagined they had no enemy to fear. Alfred marched towards the camp with the greateſt privacy, and taking advantage of the knowledge he had previouſly acquired of the place, directed his attack againſt the moſt unguarded quarter of the enemy. The Danes, imagining that Alfred had periſhed in the wrecks of his fortune, and that with him the glory and power of England had expired, were ſurprized at ſeeing an Engliſh army, but ſtill more aſtoniſhed when they were informed that Alfred was at their head. Confuſion now took place among the barbarians, whom Alfred charged with ſuch impetuoſity that, notwithſtanding their numbers, they were totally routed, and the greater part cut to pieces. Thoſe who eſcaped fled to a neighbouring fortreſs for ſhelter; but Alfred ſurrounded their retreat, and by cutting off all ſupplies of proviſion, ſoon obliged them to ſurrender.

But lenity ſtill glowed in the breaſt of Alfred; he could not be cruel even to an enemy that had ruined his country. He therefore not only gave them their lives, but even formed a ſcheme for rendering them friends and uſeful confederates. He offered to give them ſettlements in the kingdoms of Eaſt-Anglia and Northumberland, which they had depopulated, provided they would embrace the Chriſtian religion, and, to the utmoſt of their power, prevent any more of their countrymen from landing in thoſe parts of the iſland. Theſe terms were readily accepted by the greater part, and thoſe who rejected them were compelled immediately to quit the place, which they accordingly did, and embarked for Flanders.

About three weeks after this convention was ſigned, Guthrun, the Daniſh chief, ſet the example, which was followed by his countrymen, of fulfilling the treaty made with Alfred. Being attended by thirty of his principal officers, he repaired to Aller, a ſmall village in Somerſetſhire, where they all received the ceremony of baptiſm. Alfred himſelf ſtood ſponſor for Guthrun, gave him the name of Athelſtan, and admitted him as his adopted ſon.

A. D. 879. This change of religion produced the effect which had been conceived by Alfred. No ſooner were the Danes placed in the different parts aſſigned them, than they began to direct their thoughts to induſtry and agriculture inſtead of plunder and rapine. Houſes were built; the land cultivated; private property defended; virtue and induſtry encouraged; and every precaution taken to defend themſelves againſt the encroachments of their countrymen, or the invaſions of foreigners. To encourage them to perſevere in this conduct, Alfred made them denizens, and preſented Guthrun with a ſhort code of laws for the good government of his ſubjects. This, and other ſalutary meaſures taken by Alfred produced the deſired effect, and the conquered Danes, inſtead of a barbarous, became a civilized people.

A. D. 880. Alfred, having thus eſtabliſhed his power, and again firmly fixed himſelf on the throne of his anceſtors, employed his time in cultivating the arts of peace, and repairing the miſchiefs that had been occaſioned by the war. He rebuilt the towns and cities that had been deſtroyed, particularly London, which he embelliſhed with many ſtately edifices, appointed it as the place where the aſſembly of the ſtates ſhould annually meet, and declared it the metropolis of the kingdom. He eſtabliſhed civil and military inſtitutions, encouraged induſtry by every means in his power, and executed juſtice with the ſtricteſt impartiality. He formed a regular and formidable militia for the defence of the nation, ſo that ſtrong bodies of forces were always in readineſs to act againſt the common enemy. He alſo ordered a great number of ſhips to be built on an improved plan, one hundred and thirty of which he ſtationed at proper diſtances along the coaſt. He likewiſe inſtructed his ſubjects in the art of navigation, and invited the moſt expert ſeamen from different nations to ſerve in his marine. He built caſtles and fortreſſes in thoſe parts of the kingdom which were moſt expoſed to the attempts of any enemy, all of which were well garriſoned, and furniſhed with every requiſite for making a noble defence. In ſhort, Alfred carried into execution every method he could project for preſerving the internal ſtrength of his kingdom; and took all poſſible meaſures for fixing his people in a laſting ſtate of happineſs and tranquillity.

A. D. 892. From the precautions taken by Alfred, peace and harmony prevailed for ſome years throughout the iſland. But this tranquillity was at length interrupted by the piratical Danes. A prodigious body of them, under the command of an enterprizing leader named Haſtings, had committed great ravages in different parts of France, but at length meeting with ſome repulſe, they reſolved to leave the continent, and try their fortunes in England.

Haſtings accordingly fitted out three hundred ſail of ſhips, and embarking all his forces, ſtood over to the Engliſh coaſt. This powerful fleet was divided into two ſquadrons, one of which conſiſting of two hundred and twenty ſail, entered the harbour of Rye in Suſſex, where they landed their forces, and ſeized the caſtle of Appledore. The other, commanded by Haſtings himſelf, entered the mouth of the Thames, and landed at Milton, where they threw up entrenchments, and built a ſtrong fortreſs for their future ſecurity. Both parties diſperſed themſelves into the neighbouring counties, and the dreadful ravages, which had ceaſed for ſeveral years, were now again reſumed, an emulation ſeeming to ſubſiſt between the two chiefs who ſhould moſt excel in acts of outrage and cruelty.

Alfred was no ſooner acquainted with theſe horrid tranſactions, than he immediately flew to the relief of his people. Placing himſelf at the head of a ſelect body of ſoldiers (whom he always kept about his own perſon) he marched againſt the enemy, and being joined by the armed militia from all quarters through which he paſſed, appeared in the field with a very powerful army. All the ſtraggling parties of the Danes, whom neceſſity, or the love of plunder, had driven to a diſtance from their chief encampment, were deſtroyed by the Engliſh, and the communication between their two bodies entirely cut off. Thoſe who firſt encamped at Appledore had made an incurſion to a conſiderable diſtance; but on hearing that the Engliſh were marching againſt them, they retreated towards their camp. Alfred, however, continuing his route with the greateſt expedition, came up with them at Farnham, where a deſperate battle enſued, which, for ſome time, was ſupported with great obſtinacy on both ſides. At length victory declared in favour of Alfred, who not only made a dreadful carnage among the pirates, but likewiſe took their baggage, and recovered all the plunder they had taken in their reſpective incurſions. Thoſe who eſcaped fled with the utmoſt precipitation, and getting on board their ſhips, ſailed up the Coln, and fortified themſelves at Brickelſey in Eſſex. Haſtings, hearing of this defeat, immediately abandoned Milton, and took poſſeſſion of Beamfleet, near the Iſle of Canvey, where he haſtily threw up fortifications for his future defence.

A. D. 894. Alfred was now convinced that he had been long protecting a people, who, notwithſtanding the moſt ſolemn ties, had continued in their hearts his inflexible and inveterate enemies. While he was engaged in oppoſing the new invaders, the Danes of Eaſt-Anglia and Northumberland perfidiouſly took up arms in favour of their countrymen. Regardleſs of oaths, and ſtrangers to gratitude, they renounced their allegiance, fitted out a numerous fleet, and landing in Devonſhire, laid ſiege to the city of Exeter. As ſoon as Alfred was informed of theſe proceedings he immediately marched, at the head of a conſiderable body of forces, to the relief of the inhabitants, leaving a proper number of troops in London to act againſt the power of Haſtings. On his arrival at Exeter, he found that the Danes had poſſeſſed themſelves of that city, in conſequence of which he made immediate preparations for inveſting the place; but the enemy, not chuſing to make any reſiſtance, fled with the utmoſt precipitation to their ſhips, having embarked on board of which they ſet ſail for Beamfleet, in order to join their countrymen under the command of Haſtings.

In the mean time the forces left behind in London, hearing that Haſtings had marched, at the head of a conſiderable body of troops, to pillage the adjacent country, took the advantage of his abſence to attack his fortifications at Beamfleet, which they carried by ſtorm, and poſſeſſed themſelves of a prodigious quantity of rich plunder, which the enemy had, for ſecurity, depoſited in that fortreſs. Great numbers of the Danes were made priſoners, among whom were the wife and two ſons of Haſtings. Theſe were ſent to Alfred, who generouſly returned them to the pirate with this remarkable meſſage: "I am determined, at the "hazard of my life, to oppoſe the foreign and do-"meſtic enemies of my country; but women and "children ſhould be ſacred from the horrors of "war. I therefore return your wife and children, "as none ought to be detained in captivity, but "ſuch as are capable of committing hoſtilities."

Struck with the noble generoſity of the Engliſh monarch, and terrified at the power of his arms, Haſtings ſent meſſengers to Alfred (who was then on his return from the weſt of England) to ſue for peace, and ſolicit his clemency. Alfred's humanity always ſuperſeded his reſentment. He therefore readily granted the requeſt of Haſtings, and that on no other condition than his immediately departing the kingdom.

Theſe conditions were readily accepted by Haſtings; but he obſerved them no longer than ſuited his intereſt. He, indeed, embarked his forces under pretence of ſailing to the continent, but, inſtead thereof, he landed them on the oppoſite ſide of the Thames, and joining his countrymen, reſolved, if poſſible, to reimburſe himſelf for the loſſes he had ſuſtained at Beamfleet. As a neceſſary ſtep towards his future deſigns, he ſtrongly fortified Shoebury in Eſſex, where he received conſiderable reinforcements by the gradual influx of the fugitive Danes from other parts of the kingdom. Thus ſtrengthened, he reſolved immediately to throw off the maſk, and begin his depredations. Accordingly, proceeding at the head of his forces towards the north, he made a junction with the Northumbrian Danes, and then, turning weſtward, penetrated as far as the Severn, and ſtrongly intrenched himſelf at a place called Badington in Montgomeryſhire.

As ſoon as Alfred was informed of the perfidious proceedings of Haſtings, he immediately ſent an army againſt him under the command of three experienced generals, who being joined by a body of Welch, blocked up the Danes in their camp. In this ſtate they continued ſome time, till at length, being reduced to the utmoſt extremity by famine, they ſallied out of their lines in a fit of deſperation, with a deſign of cutting their way through the beſiegers; but this attempt was far from ſucceeding to their wiſhes: the greater part were cut to pieces, many killed in the purſuit, and the reſt eſcaped by taking ſhelter under the covert of the adjoining woods. Theſe roved about the country for ſome time, till at length, being reinforced by a body of their countrymen from Northumberland, under the command of one Laf, a Daniſh chief, they reſolved to make another attempt to penetrate into Wales. They accordingly marched with all expedition to Cheſter, where they entrenched themſelves before the king's forces could come up with them; and as the ſeaſon was too far advanced for the Engliſh to undertake a ſiege, the Danes therefore took up their winter quarters in that city.

A. D. 896. In the ſpring of this year the Danes quitted Cheſter, but inſtead of penetrating into Wales as they had intended, they took their route acroſs the country into Eaſt-Anglia, from whence they proceeded to Eſſex, and ſeized on a ſmall iſland called Merſey. Being here joined by great numbers of their countrymen, they repaired on board their ſhips, ſailed up the Thames to the mouth of the Lee, and towing their veſſels up that river, fixed their ſtation at Hertford.

The proximity of the Danes to London greatly alarmed the inhabitants of that city. It was then the time of harveſt, and they were apprehenſive of being deprived of the fine crops that adorned the country for many miles round. But Alfred, in order to calm the fears of his ſubjects, marched with a conſiderable army towards Hertford, and encamped in ſuch a ſituation, as not only to protect the reapers, but to have the opportunity of minutely obſerving the motions of the enemy.

In this ſituation the two armies continued for ſome time, when the great Alfred conceived a deſign of deſtroying the Daniſh fleet by the following ſtratagem. He ordered ſeveral large trenches to be cut from the river to the low grounds, then drawing off the main ſtream, he turned it into the leſſer channels, and, by this ingenious device, the ſhips of the enemy were left aground. Aſtoniſhed at ſuch an expedient, and dreading the enterprizing genius of Alfred, the Danes fled with the utmoſt precipitation, and the Engliſh, after getting off what ſhips they could, deſtroyed the reſt.

KING ALFRED the Great, forming a CODE of LAWS, and DIVIDING the KINGDOM into Counties, Tythings, Hundreds, &c.

Alfred being determined, if poſſible, totally to extirminate the inhuman ravagers of his country, purſued them to the Severn, from whence they continued their retreat to Northumberland. But reflecting on the military talents of Alfred, and deſpairing of ſucceſs while a man of his abilities poſſeſſed the throne, they determined to quit the kingdom, and endeavour to make up for their loſſes in England by plundering ſome other nation. Accordingly, being ſupplied with ſhips by their friends in Northumberland, they all embarked and ſailed for Normandy, after having been greatly diminiſhed in their numbers, diſappointed in their proſpects of plunder, and obliged to carry away with them leſs property than they brought.

Alfred now determined to ſecure himſelf from any future moleſtation of the piratical Danes, by endeavouring to acquire a ſuperiority of power on the ocean. He had attentively conſidered the conſtruction of the Daniſh veſſels, and invented others formed in a more advantageous manner. They were built in the ſhape of gallies, and were both longer and higher than thoſe of the Danes, but at the ſame time they were ſo contrived, that the bulk did not impede their ſwiftneſs of ſailing.

A. D. 897. Alfred had ſcarce finiſhed theſe veſſels before he had occaſion to uſe them. A ſquadron of Daniſh ſhips appeared hovering off the coaſt of Dorſetſhire, upon which Alfred ordered out nine of his new-conſtructed gallies againſt them. In conſequence of this a ſharp engagement enſued, in which the Danes were totally defeated, and great numbers of them taken priſoners. Theſe were conducted to the king at Wincheſter, who, in order to deter the Danes from making any future invaſions, ſentenced them to be hanged as piratical murderers, and enemies to mankind.

Being now freed from foreign enemies, Alfred directed his attention towards reſtoring good order in his kingdom, and purſuing ſuch other meaſures as might be moſt conducive to the future happineſs of his ſubjects. From the laſt ravages of the Danes the kingdom was reduced to the moſt dreadful ſtate of anarchy and confuſion. The whole country was infeſted with bands of robbers, whoſe dreadful outrages rendered all property precarious. Senſible that the execution of very ſevere juſtice could be the only means of putting an end to theſe alarming enormities, and eſtabliſhing order in the ſtate, Alfred ſet about means to obtain this deſirable end, and the meaſures he purſued were ſuch as evinced the diſtinguiſhed abilities of which he was poſſeſſed.

He began his reform with dividing the kingdom into counties, which were ſubdivided into hundreds, and the hundreds into tythings. Each houſholder was anſwerable to the king for the good behaviour of his family, his ſervants, and even of his gueſts, provided they continued with him above three days. Every youth, at the age of fourteen, was obliged to regiſter himſelf in ſome tything, when all the houſholders immediately became anſwerable for his conduct, nor could any perſon change his habitation without a certificate from the head of the tything to which he belonged. As the tything was anſwerable for the conduct of each individual, ſo the hundred was anſwerable for its different tythings, and the county for its different hundreds. The county, hundred and tything had each its particular court, the firſt of which was held twice a year, and the two laſt once a month for the deciding of cauſes. The biſhop, and eoldermen preſided in the firſt, the conſtable in the ſecond, and the tything-man in the third. By theſe admirable inſtitutions every houſholder was obliged to watch the conduct of his neighbour; nor could any crime be long concealed, or go long unpuniſhed. Small offences were tried in the tything-court, but the larger were heard in thoſe of the hundred and county. Their method of deciſion deſerves to be particularly remembered, becauſe it was the origin of that great privilege peculiar to Engliſhmen, namely, of being tried by juries. Twelve freeholders were choſen, who being ſworn, together with the preſiding magiſtrate, to adminiſter impartial juſtice, proceeded to examine the perſon accuſed, who was either condemned or acquitted, as they thought him guilty or innocent.

From theſe courts there lay an appeal to the king himſelf in council; and as the people had the greateſt confidence in the impartiality and integrity of Alfred, appeals were frequently made to him from all parts of the kingdom. Alfred was indefatigable in the diſpatch of theſe cauſes; but ſuſpecting that the great number of apppeals made to him aroſe from the want of abilities in his magiſtrates, he was determined to remove that inconvenience. To effect this he took particular care that they ſhould be well acquainted with the laws of their country, and, that none might have the opportunity of pleading ignorance, he formed a new code, which he collected from the ſcripture, and from the laws of his predeceſſors Ina, Offa and Ethelbert. This body of laws (though now loſt) ſerved long as the baſis of Engliſh juriſ-prudence, and is generally eſteemed the origin of what is denominated the common law.

Alfred was particularly diligent in ſeeing the excellent laws he had made ſtrictly executed. He minutely examined the conduct of all his nobles and judges, reviſed their deciſions, and ſeverely puniſhed all who were guilty of partiality. By purſuing theſe prudent meaſures, all violences and oppreſſions were removed. Robberies were no longer feared, and a breach of the peace, a public offence, or a private injury, were almoſt unknown.

The care of Alfred for the encouragement of learning among his ſubjects was another very uſeful branch of his legiſlation, and tended to reform the Engliſh from their former diſſolute and barbarous manners. He erected ſchools in various parts of the kingdom, and obliged all freeholders, who poſſeſſed two hides of land, to ſend their ſons to theſe ſeminaries till they were ſixteen years of age.

He invited over learned men from various parts of the continent, and founded, or at leaſt rebuilt, the univerſity of Oxford. Perſons of merit and learning only were appointed to offices of truſt: the ignorant and indolent gained not the favour of Alfred. His own example was a powerful incentive to the induſtry of his ſubjects, and a noble emulation was excited among all ranks of people throughout his kingdom. He divided the natural day into three equal parts, one of which was devoted to ſtudy and acts of piety; the ſecond to the diſpatch of buſineſs; and the third to the relaxation and refreſhment of his body. And that he might properly know how the hours paſſed, he made uſe of burning tapers of equal length, which were marked with lines, and fixed in lanthorns; an expedient invented by himſelf, the principles of dialling, and the mechaniſm of clocks and watches being then unknown. By thus huſbanding every moment of his time, he became one of the moſt learned perſons of his age; and as he perfectly underſtood the Latin language, he tranſlated the fables of Æſop, the Hiſtory of Bede, and ſeveral other works, for the uſe of his ſubjects.

The conduct of Alfred in the diſpoſition of his own revenues was equally conſiſtent with the manner in which he employed his time. He divided them into two parts, one of which he conſigned to pious, and the other to civil uſes. The former he ſubdivided into four parts, the firſt of which was diſpenſed to the poor in general; the ſecond to the ſupport of religious houſes founded by himſelf; the third to the public ſchools; and the fourth to the building and repairing churches, monaſteries, and other public foundations. The moiety devoted to civil uſes was ſubdivided into three parts: the firſt was deſtined to the ſupport of his houſhold; the ſecond to the payment of his workmen; and the third to the entertainment and relief of ſtrangers who reſorted to his court.

As Alfred was fond of learning, his court was the reſort of all who were eminent in their ſeveral profeſſions, and he particularly familiarized himſelf with ſuch as he thought moſt capable of giving him information in any beneficial branch of knowledge. By theſe means he acquired no leſs ſkill in the mechanical than he had done in the liberal arts, ſeveral of which he cauſed to be practiſed with great advantage throughout his dominions. In ſhort, the attention of Alfred was particularly engaged in concerting meaſures for promoting the happineſs and proſperity of his ſubjects; and in this he was aſſiduouſly employed from the time of his having conquered the piratical Danes to that of his death, which happened on the 26th of October, A. D. 900, in the 52d year of his age, afaer reigning upwards of twenty-eight years. His remains were interred at Wincheſter, and his grave bedewed with the tears of an affectionate and grateful people.

From the concurrent teſtimonies of the moſt eminent writers, and Alfred's great actions, it is evident that he was the able general, the profound ſcholar, the eloquent ſpeaker, the ſage politician, the polite gentleman, and the worthy man upon all occaſions. He had a fine perſon, a calm but lively aſpect, a graceful mien, and a genteel addreſs. He was naturally of a quiet and chearful temper, agreeable in converſation, and affable to all. He knew how to condeſcend without ſinking below his dignity, and how to endear himſelf to his ſubjects, without leſſening their veneration. He never mentioned his enemies but in terms which expreſſed great tenderneſs, nor his friends without a proper regard to their merit. He was temperate in his diet, moderate in all his deſires, charitable, benevolent and generous; at once the father and king of his people. In ſhort, he was poſſeſſed of every talent, and of every acquiſition that can adorn the human mind; without one vice to ſully the luſtre of his virtues. If the reader deſires a further elucidation of his character, let him now look on his country, which has ſo much flouriſhed in arts, in arms, in commerce, and in freedom: theſe are the monuments of Alfred's glory: theſe the effects of his unwearied attention.

Alfred left behind him five children, namely, two ſons and three daughters: all of whom inherited a conſiderable ſhare of the talents and virtues of their father.

CHAP. VI.

EDWARD THE ELDER,

Edward ſucceeds his father Alfred on the throne of England. Is oppoſed by his couſin Ethelwald, in conjunction with the Danes. Edward marches againſt them, and Ethelwald, being deſerted by the Danes, is obliged to quit the kingdom. He returns with a body of foreign troops, and is again joined by the Danes. Engages a party of the king's forces and is ſlain. Edward continues to be haraſſed by the Danes, whom, with the aſſiſtance of his ſiſter Elfleda, he repeatedly defeats. Engages Leofrid, a Daniſh chief, in ſingle combat. Quells a general inſurrection of the Danes, and reſtores tranquillity to the kingdom. His death and character.

A. D. 900. ON the death of Alfred, his ſecond ſon Edward (ſurnamed the Elder from his being the firſt Engliſh monarch of that name) ſucceeded to the throne, and was crowned winh great ceremony at Kingſton upon Thames, by Plegmund, archbiſhop of Canterbury,

At the time Edward aſcended the throne, the nation was in a perfect ſtate of tranquillity; but this was ſoon interrupted by means of his couſin Ethelwald, who laid claim to the crown as the ſon of Ethelbert, elder brother to the late king. Accordingly having got together ſome adherents, and a ſmall body of forces, he made himſelf maſter of Winburn in Dorſetſhire, which he fortified, and ſeemed determined to ſupport his claim at the hazard of his life.

A. D. 901. As ſoon as Edward was informed of his couſin's rebellion, he immediately marched at the head of a body of forces againſt him; but on his approach Ethelwald, being fearful of the conſequences, deſerted his friends, and even his wife, and fled to the Danes in Northumberland, who received him with open arms, and acknowledged him for their king.

Edward, hearing of the retreat of his rival, and the revolt of the Danes, reſolved to march againſt them, before they could be joined by any of their countrymen from the continent, or ſtrengthen themſelves ſelves by an union with any other parties in the iſland. Accordingly, having reduced Winburn, he marched with ſuch expedition into Northumberland, that the Danes were aſtoniſhed, and being fearful of the conſequences, agreed to baniſh from their country the prince they had undertaken to protect. But this pretended loyalty, the effect of fear, did not ſatisfy Edward, who ſeized upon their principal fortreſſes as the moſt eligible method of ſecuring their allegiance.

Ethelwald being compelled to quit the kingdom, repaired to Normandy, from whence, having obtained the aſſiſtance of a conſiderable body of forces, he returned in the year 904, and landed in Eaſt-Anglia. The appearance of a Norman army gave great encouragement to the Danes, who, laying aſide their fears, declared openly for Ethelwald. But the abilities and alacrity of Edward rendered all his attempts abortive. Ethelwald marched, indeed, at the head of his forces into Glouceſterſhire, and committed the moſt dreadful ravages on the peaceable inhabitants; but on the approach of the Engliſh army he was obliged to deſiſt, and returned, for ſafety, into Eaſt-Anglia. Edward led his forces into the enemy's country, and laid the frontiers waſte; but not thinking it prudent to penetrate into the heart of Eaſt-Anglia, he retreated from their territories, at the head of the greater part of his army. The whole of his forces were ordered to follow; but the Kentiſh men, either to revenge themſelves on the perfidious Danes, or from expectations of acquiring a larger ſhare of plunder, ſtaid behind, and took up their quarters at Bury. But this diſobedience proved in the end fortunate to Edward. The Danes, taking advantage of the king's abſence, aſſaulted the Kentiſh forces with great reſolution; but met with ſo ſtrong a reſiſtance, that though they gained the advantage, it was dearly purchaſed, their braveſt leaders, among whom was Ethelwald himſelf, being ſlain in the action. In conſequence of this the Danes immediately ſued for peace, which Edward concluded with them at a place called Ickford in Buckinghamſhire.

A. D. 911. Ever reſtleſs, and ever perfidious, the Danes broke the treaty they had made with Edward, and committed the moſt horrid ravages in various parts of the country. Exaſperated at their perfidy and cruelty, Edward led his forces againſt the inſurgents, and coming up with a large body of them at a place called Tetnal in Staffordſhire, defeated them with great ſlaughter, and deprived them of all their plunder.

A. D. 912. About this time Edward loſt his brother-in-law Etheldred prince of Mercia, on whoſe death Elfleda, his widow, a worthy daughter of the great Alfred, took upon her the reins of government, and nobly aſſiſted her brother in his wars with the Danes. Being a woman of exceeding great courage, ſhe threw off the weakneſs peculiar to her ſex, and took upon herſelf the command of a body of troops in perſon, at the head of whom ſhe ſignalized herſelf on various occaſions, and was at once admired by the ſoldiers, and reſpected by the officers.

A. D. 913. Edward having, by the aſſiſtance of his heroic ſiſter, procured an interval of eaſe, applied himſelf to works of public utility, and the encouragement of learning. He rebuilt the city of Hereford, which had been deſtroyed by the Danes, fortified Witham, repaired ſeveral churches and monaſteries, and erected the ſeminary of Cambridge into an univerſity.

A. D. 917. The tranquillity which the nation had enjoyed for about four years was again diſturbed by the reſtleſs and ferocious Danes, who made ſeveral incurſions, with detached parties, and committed the moſt horrid ravages. Edward and his ſiſter marched againſt them, and were ſo ſucceſsful that defeat ſucceeded defeat, they being in one part of the kingdom cut to pieces by Elfleda, and routed by Edward in another.

A. D. 918. But theſe ſmall incurſions were only the prelude to a more formidable invaſion. A numerous body of Danes, under the command of Otar and Rohault, embarked from the ſouthern coaſt of Britany, and entering the Severn, committed many ravages on the adjacent coaſts, till at length they were defeated by the militia of Herefordſhire and Glouceſterſhire. Rohault and Otar's brother were ſlain in the battle, and thoſe who eſcaped fled into a wood, which was immediately inveſted by the conquerors. In this emergency the Danes, as uſual, ſued for peace, promiſed to depart the kingdom, and give hoſtages for the performance of the treaty. They accordingly embarked, and ſailed from the mouth of the Severn in the night, but landed on the coaſt of Somerſetſhire, where being met by the militia of that county, the greater part of them were cut to pieces, and the few that eſcaped fled to Ireland. This ſucceſs was highly pleaſing to Edward, but his ſatisfaction was greatly checked by the loſs of his ſiſter Elfleda, who died ſoon after at Tamworth in Staffordſhire, to the unſpeakable regret of the whole nation.

A. D. 920. In the beginning of this year one Leofrid, a Daniſh chief, who was ſettled in Ireland, accompanied by Griffith ap Madoc, brother-in-law to the prince of Weſt Wales, landed at the head of a conſiderable army, with a deſign of making a conqueſt of the Welch dominions. They penetrated as far as Cheſter without meeting with any oppoſition. But Edward, having aſſembled his forces, marched with all expedition to the defence of his people, and meeting the invaders at Sherwood, a deſperate battle enſued. During the action Leofrid encountered hand to hand with Edward, and the conteſt continued equal for ſome time, till Edward, in giving the Dane a violent blow, broke his ſword at the hilt, and he muſt have fallen a victim to Leofrid, had not his ſon Athelſtan flown to his aſſiſtance. This prince was more fortunate than his father; for he wounded Leofrid ſo deſperately in the arm, that he dropped his ſpear, and ſurrendered himſelf a priſoner. The forces of the enemy were totally defeated, great numbers being ſlain, and the reſt immediately obliged to quit the kingdom. The two chiefs, Leofrid the Dane, and Griffith ap Madoc, the Welch prince, were both beheaded, and their heads placed on the tower of Cheſter.

A. D. 921. This conqueſt, and the ſevere puniſhment inflicted on the two leaders, ſo irritated the Danes, that a general inſurrection enſued, and the Engliſh were threatened with all the horrors of ſavage barbarity. But the vigilance and intrepidity of Edward baffled all their deſigns: they were driven from one part of the country to another: their caſtles were taken, and their towns laid in aſhes; ſo that they felt the ſame kind of diſtreſs they had ſo often inflicted on the Engliſh. Submiſſion now became their only reſource: they accordingly laid down their arms, ſued for peace, and readily embraced the terms offered by the victor. This was followed by the ſubmiſſion of all the Welſh princes; and even the king of Scotland conſented to hold his crown as a vaſſal to Edward.

A. D. 925. Thus did Edward once more reſtore tranquillity to the nation, to ſecure which, knowing the natural perfidy of the Danes, he directed his attention towards fortifying towns, and erecting caſtles in various parts of the kingdom. But while he was employed in this buſineſs he paid the debt of nature, to the great grief of all his ſubjects. He died at Farringdon in Berkſhire, and was buried by his father at Wincheſter.

Though Edward was inferior to Alfred with reſpect to genius and learning, yet he was equal to him in virtue and courage. He cloſely followed the ſteps of his father, and, like him, was reſpected by his neighbours, and univerſally beloved by his ſubjects, who, as the laſt teſtimony of their reſpect for him, watered his grave with the tears of affection.

CHAP. VII.

ATHELSTAN.

Athelſtan ſucceeds his father on the throne of England. A conſpiracy is formed againſt him. Marches againſt the Danes of Northumberland, and obliges them to ſue for peace. Reduces the kingdom of Scotland. Conſtantine, the Scottiſh monarch, Anlaff, a Daniſh prince, and Owen, king of the Cumbrian Britons, join in a confederacy againſt Athelſtan, who marches againſt them, and obtains a compleat victory. His death and character.

A. D. 925. ON the death of Edward, his ſon Athelſtan ſucceeded to the throne, and was crowned at Kingſton by Anthelm, archbiſhop of Canterbury, amidſt the univerſal acclamations of the people.

Athelſtan was hardly fixed in the ſeat of power when a conſpiracy was formed to arreſt the ſcepter from his hand; but before the deſign was ripe for execution, the plot was diſcovered, and Alfred (a nobleman of conſiderable authority who headed the faction) was apprehended, and committed to priſon. Alfred reſolutely denied the charge, and offered to prove his innocence by an oath before the pope. The king accepting the conditions, Alfred was conducted to Rome, where he took the oath preſcribed before pope John X. who then filled the papal chair; but he had no ſooner pronounced the words than he fell into convulſions, and three days after expired. This being conſidered as a ſufficient proof of his guilt, the king confiſcated his eſtate, and gave it to the monaſtery of Malmſbury.

The Danes of Northumberland, knowing of the conſpiracy formed againſt Athelſtan, and hoping to be joined by a powerful faction, revolted, and penetrated as far as the city of York. But Athelſtan marched againſt them with ſuch expedition, that the inſurgents were ſurprized, and Sithric, their leader, was obliged to ſue for peace. This requeſt was readily granted by Athelſtan, who, in order to attach Sithric more firmly to his intereſts, not only made him king of Northumberland, but likewiſe gave him his ſiſter Edgitha in marriage.

A. D. 926. The political ſtep taken by Athelſtan for obtaining a laſting peace with the Danes was rendered abortive by the death of Sithric, which happened a few months after his promotion. In conſequence of this his two ſons, Anlaff and Godfrid (by a former wife) aſſumed the ſovereignty, without waiting for the conſent of Athelſtan, who was ſo enraged at their preſumption that he drove them from the kingdom. Anlaff fled to Ireland, and Godfrid to Scotland, where he took refuge in the court of Conſtantine, who then filled the Scottiſh throne. Athelſtan ſent a meſſage to Conſtantine, requeſting him to deliver up the fugitive; which being refuſed, he marched a ſtrong army into Scotland, reduced the whole kingdom, and obliged Conſtantine to do him homage for the preſervation of his crown.

Though Conſtantine had been compelled to ſubmit to the ſuperior power of Athelſtan, yet he reſolved to take the firſt opportunity of endeavouring to recover the honour he had loſt by his ſubmiſſion. To effect this, in the beginning of the year 934, he formed a confederacy with Anlaff the brother of Godfrid, (who had collected a large body of forces in Ireland) and Owen, king of the Cumbrian Britons, in order to attack Athelſtan, and reduce his power to narrower bounds. Owen accordingly marched at the head of his Britons into Scotland, ſoon after which Anlaff landed his forces on the north ſide of the Humber, and marched immediately to join the allies.

Athelſtan, being informed of this confederacy, proceeded with all expedition to chaſtiſe the inſurgents. The two armies came within ſight of each other at a place called Bromſbury in Northumberland, but kept from an engagement for ſeveral days, each watching the opportunity of gaining ſome peculiar advantage. During this interval Anlaff laid a ſcheme for aſſaſſinating Athelſtan, to effect which he put in practice a ſimilar ſtratagem to that uſed by Alfred the Great. Diſguiſed like a muſician he entered the Engliſh camp, and was even introduced to play before the king, who handſomely rewarded him for the amuſement he had received. A ſoldier in Athelſtan's army happened to recognize the features of Anlaff, and after his departure informed the king who he was. Athelſtan blamed him for not having given more timely notice, that he might have been apprehended in the camp; when the ſoldier nobly replied, "My "liege, I firſt gave my military oath to Anlaff; "if, therefore, I had betrayed him, your majeſty "might juſtly have ſuſpected the like treachery to "yourſelf. But to evince my loyalty, I entreat "your majeſty to remove your tent, as I have no "doubt but a deſign upon your perſon will be the "conſequence of Anlaff's obſervations." The "king, after rewarding the ſoldier for his fidelity, ordered his tent to be removed; and the ſpot where it ſtood was ſoon after occupied by a biſhop who had that evening joined Athelſtan with a reinforcement of troops. Every thing continued quiet till midnight, when Anlaff at the head of a choſen body of forces, broke into the Engliſh camp, repaired immediately to the ſpot where the king's tent ſtood, and ſlew the biſhop, with all his followers. This incident occaſioned a general alarm, and Anlaff narrowly eſcaped with his life.

Early the next morning Athelſtan led his forces againſt againſt the allied army, and the action ſoon became general. The conteſt was very ſevere for ſome time, till at length victory declared in favour of the Engliſh. The allies were driven from the field of battle with great ſlaughter, and the few that eſcaped ſought their ſafety in a precipitate flight, among whom were the two leaders Anlaff and Owen. Conſtantine, chagrined at his defeat, reſigned his crown, retired to a convent, and died in obſcurity.

A. D. 941. Having thus ſubdued his enemies, Athelſtan reſted from the toils of war, and applied himſelf, with the utmoſt aſſiduity, in purſuing ſuch meaſures as were moſt likely to promote the happineſs and proſperity of his people. But while he was labouring for the good of his country, he paid the debt of nature, in the 46th year of his age, and 16th of his reign. He died at Glouceſter, and was buried in his favourite church at Malmſbury.

With reſpect to the character of Athelſtan, it is acknowledged by all hiſtorians, that he was learned without being pedantic, generous without oſtentation, and pious without ſuperſtition. He was an able general, a conſummate politician, a ſincere friend, and an indulgent maſter. He was particularly deſirous of ſpreading the knowledge of the Goſpel among his ſubjects; for which purpoſe he cauſed the Bible to be tranſlated into the Saxon language, that every perſon might enjoy the advantage of being acquainted with the ſacred writings. In ſhort, his whole attention was directed to the welfare of his people, ſo that it is no wonder he ſhould live beloved, and die univerſally lamented.

CHAP. VIII.

EDMUND I.

Edmund ſucceeds his brother Athelſtan. Is greatly diſturbed by the Danes. Marches againſt them; and comes to an accommodation. Quells a diſturbance in Northumberland, and reduces the Cumbrian Britons. Is baſely aſſaſſinated by Leolf the Robber.

A. D. 941. ON the death of Athelſtan, his brother Edmund ſucceeded to the throne, and was crowned with great ſolemnity at Kingſton, in the 18th year of his age.

Edmund was no ſooner ſeated on the throne than he met with diſturbances from the Danes under Anlaff, who conſidering the youth of the king as a fair opportunity, reſolved to renew his claim to the crown of Northumberland. He was at this time in Ireland, where he had a conſiderable body of forces; but not thinking theſe ſufficient for his intended enterprize, he formed an alliance with Olaus king of Norway, from whom he received a ſtrong reinforcement of ſhips and men. Having acquired this aſſiſtance, he immediately invaded Northumberland, and being joined by the Danes, over-ran the country, after which he purſued his rout into Yorkſhire, took the city of York, and then penetrated into Mercia.

In the mean time young Edmund, being informed of the rapid progreſs of the enemy, aſſembled what forces he could, and marched with all expedition againſt them. The two armies met at Cheſter, where an obſtinate battle enſued, which continued till night put an end to the conteſt. Both armies remained in the field, in order to renew the fight as ſoon as the morning appeared; but at the inſtigation of the archbiſhops of York and Canterbury, an accommodation was formed, and a ſtop put to the farther effuſion of human blood. Peace was concluded between the contending parties, and Anlaff was ſhamefully permitted to enjoy the throne of Northumberland.

A. D. 943. But though Anlaff had thus obtained the regal dignity, yet he did not hold it long without diſturbance. Having contracted large debts with the king of Norway for his aſſiſtance, he laid a very heavy tax on his ſubjects to fulfil his engagements, and being inexorable to their complaints, totally loſt their affections. The inhabitants of Deira, wearied with the burden, revolted, and ſending for Reinald, the nephew of Anlaff, from Ireland, crowned him king at York. Anarchy and confuſion now ſucceeded: the kingdom was divided into parties, and each endeavoured to eſtabliſh their own power on the ruin of others.

A. D. 944. Edmund, thinking this a favourable opportunity of recovering the countries he had loſt, marched with all expedition, at the head of his forces towards Northumberland, and arrived on the frontiers before the Danes had the leaſt notion of his deſign. Being thus ſuddenly ſurprized, the two kings thought proper to ſeek their ſafety by flight, and the Danes not chuſing to make any oppoſition without their leader, ſubmitted to Edmund, who, in conſequence thereof, became maſter of the whole kingdom.

A. D. 945. Edmund now reſolved to turn his arms againſt the Cumbrian Britons, for having aſſiſted the Northumberland Danes in their late revolt. He accordingly marched into their country at the head of his forces, drove their prince from the throne, and beſtowed his dominions on Malcolm, king of Scotland, on condition of his doing homage, and defending the northern countries from the future invaſions of the Danes.

Edmund made ſeveral excellent laws for the good government of his ſubjects. Among others he paſſed a law for preventing robberies, in which it was enacted, that in gangs of robbers the oldeſt ſhould be put to death.

A. D. 948. A ſhort time after this an incident happened, which proved fatal to Edmund. On the 6th of May the king and his nobility repaired to Puckle church in Glouceſterſhire, in order to celebrate the feaſt of St. Auguſtine. During the entertainment Edmund obſerved at one of the tables, a notorious robber named Leolf, whom he himſelf had baniſhed for his crimes. Enraged at his inſolence, he ordered him immediately to quit the room; but, on his refuſing to obey, Edmund was ſo incenſed, that he leaped from his ſeat, ſeized him by the hair, and threw him on the floor. On this Leolf, thinking his death inevitable, drew out a ſhort dagger, and gave the king a mortal wound, of which he inſtantly expired. The nobles, who were witneſſes of this act of regicide, immediately fell upon the murderer, and put him to death.—Thus, by an ignoble hand, fell Edmund, in the ſeventh year of his reign, and twenty-fifth of his age.

EDRED.

Edred ſucceeds his brother on the throne. Marches againſt the Danes of Northumberland, and reduces them to obedience. Suffers himſelf to be duped by Dunſtan, abbot of Glaſtonbury. Dies of a quinſey.

A. D. 948. THE late Edmund left two ſons, namely, Edwy and Edgar, but being both infants, their uncle Edred was unanimouſly choſen ſucceſſor to the throne, and crowned at Kingſton by Odo, archbiſhop of Canterbury.

The reign of this prince, like that of his predeceſſor, commenced with diſturbances from the Danes of Northumberland, who no ſooner heard of the death of Edmund, than they renounced their allegiance, and flew to arms. Edward immediately marched againſt them, and having laid waſte their country with fire and ſword, as a puniſhment for their rebellion, obliged them to renew their oaths of allegiance, and then returned with his forces.

A. D. 949. Provoked at the devaſtations made by Edred, the Danes of Northumberland broke into a new rebellion, and were again ſubdued; and in order to prevent any future inſurrections, Edred placed garriſons in the principal fortreſſes under an able governor. He likewiſe obliged Malcolm, king of Scotland, to renew his homage for the lands which he held in England.

A. D. 950. The Northumbrian Danes being thus ſubdued, and tranquillity reſtored, Edred ſpent his time in religious exerciſes, and from his diſtinguiſhed zeal became the dupe of Dunſtan, abbot of Glaſtonbury, who directed both the ſpiritual concerns of the king, and the temporal concerns of the kingdom. Nothing either in church or ſtate was executed without his advice and concurrence. He was ſole treaſurer, and by his counſel moſt of the benefices in the kingdom were beſtowed upon monks, while the ſecular clergy were totally neglected and ſet aſide. This partiality excited very alarming commotions among the people, and, for ſome time, greatly diſturbed the tranquillity of the kingdom.

A. D. 955. But while the nation was thus threatened with the moſt imminent danger, the career of the imperious Dunſtan was checked by the death of the king, who, being ſeized with a quinſey, expired on the 23d of November, in the ſeventh year of his reign. He left two ſons; but as they were infants, his nephew Edwy, ſon to Edmund, was placed on the throne.

CHAP. X.

EDWY.

Edwy, on the day of his coronation, is groſly inſulted by Dunſtan, whom he baniſhes the kingdom. Ethelgiva, his queen, is barbarouſly treated by Odo, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and afterwards put to death. A rebellion is formed againſt Edwy, who is dethroned, and dies with grief.

A. D. 955. EDWY was only ſixteen years of age when he aſcended the throne, and ſo remarkable for his perſonal accompliſhments, that he obtained the ſurname of The Fair. A ſhort time before his acceſſion he married Ethelgiva, a beautiful princeſs of the blood royal; but this alliance being within the degrees of affinity prohibited by the canon law, Dunſtan violently declaimed againſt the king's conduct, (in which he was joined by the whole fraternity of monks) and thinking his influence leſſened by Edwy's fondneſs for his wife, determined, if poſſible, to break off the connection. It was not long before he gave a proof of his intentions. On the day of Edwy's coronation, being fatigued with the tedious ceremony, and willing to avoid the exceſſive drinking then univerſally practiſed, the king left his nobles, and retired to enjoy the converſation of his wife and mother, who were in an adjacent apartment. The nobles, looking upon the abſence of the king as an affront offered to themſelves, complained of the inſult. Dunſtan ſaw their diſguſt with a ſecret ſatisfaction, and, ſtarting from his ſeat, ruſhed into the apartment, reproached the king for his behaviour in the harſheſt terms, and forcibly dragged him back to the hall where the gueſts were aſſembled.

This violent outrage could not but excite the indignation of Edwy, who, by the advice of his friends, reſolved to be revenged on the inſolent Dunſtan. He accordingly ordered him to give an account of the ſums of money with which he had been entruſted during the late reign; but the haughty abbot refuſed to comply, in conſequence of which he was declared guilty of malverſation in his office, and baniſhed the kingdom.

This exertion of the royal authority raiſed the attention of the whole clergy, but none more than Odo, archbiſhop of Canterbury, who, ſuſpecting that Dunſtan's baniſhment aroſe from the reſentment of Ethelgiva, determined to take a ſevere revenge on that innocent princeſs. He accordingly ſent a party of ſoldiers to the palace, with orders to ſeize her and bring her before him; which being done, he firſt cauſed her beautiful face to be branded with an hot iron, and then ſent her, under a proper guard, to Ireland.

The cruel Odo was too powerful for Edwy to make any attempt to puniſh him for his audacity; but to give ſome vent to his reſentment, he baniſhed the whole order of monks from his kingdom, and gave the monaſteries of Glaſtonbury and Abingdon to the ſecular clergy. Thus the inconſiderate monarch and haughty prelate continued to mortify each other, till the latter ſpirited up prince Edgar to an open rebellion againſt his brother.

Edgar was a prince of an enterprizing genius, and an ambitious ſpirit. The archbiſhop, therefore, found but little difficulty in perſuading him to revolt. His own aggrandizement, and the approbation probation of the clergy overbalanced fraternal bonds and natural allegiance; and the ſanction of the Northumbrian and Mercian forces urged him on to proſecute the deſign of dethroning his brother.

A. D. 957. The rebellion excited by Odo now became too powerful to be eaſily ſuppreſſed, and the timid Edwy, inſtead of exerting a proper ſpirit, fled to Glouceſter, and in a fit of deſpair, immerſed himſelf within the walls of that city. In conſequence of this Edgar ſummoned together the principal nobility, both ſpiritual and temporal, who unanimouſly elected him to the ſovereign authority, and declared his brother incapable of any longer holding the reins of government.

The unfortunate Edwy ſurvived this popular injuſtice about two years, when he died of abſolute grief, leaving his brother Edgar in peaceable poſſeſſion of the throne.

CHAP. XI.

EDGAR.

Edgar recalls Dunſtan and loads him with favours. Increaſes his navy, and ſecures his dominions from foreign invaſions. Marries Elfrida, daughter of the earl of Devon. Is rowed down the river Dee by eight tributary kings. His death and character.

A. D. 959. THE firſt conſideration of Edgar, after his acceſſion to throne was, to conciliate the affections of the clergy, knowing it to be the only ſtep he could take to avoid that rock which had proved ſo fatal to his brother. He accordingly recalled Dunſtan, and loaded him with favours; firſt making him biſhop of Wincheſter, then advancing him to the ſee of London, and afterwards promoting him to the archbiſhoprick of Canterbury.

A. D. 960. Edgar now directed his attention towards cultivating the arts of peace, and eſtabliſhing tranquillity throughout his kingdom. To ſecure himſelf from foreign invaſions, he greatly increaſed his navy, which he divided into three ſquadrons. The firſt was ſtationed on the eaſtern, the ſecond on the weſtern, and the third on the northern coaſts of the kingdom. Theſe ſquadrons kept cruiſing during the ſummer months, and were always in readineſs to attack an enemy on their firſt appearance. He likewiſe maintained a body of diſciplined troops, which he quartered in the north, in order to keep the Northumbrians in ſubjection, and to repel the inroads of the Scots.

A. D. 961. The meaſures purſued by Edgar evinced his abilities for holding the ſcepter with credit to himſelf and happineſs to his people; but theſe abilities were greatly ſullied by his private conduct as a man. He was naturally of a very laſcivious diſpoſition, and particularly remarkable for the diſſoluteneſs of his manners. The virtue of no lady was ſafe, if celebrated for her beauty. He carried off and raviſhed a nun, though oppoſed by the whole convent. Dunſtan, indeed, reproached him for this atrocious crime, but no other puniſhment was inflicted on him than a prohibition from wearing his crown during ſeven years.

A ſhort time after this Edgar's amorous diſpoſition led him to commit an act of the moſt horrid nature. Elfrida, the daughter of the earl of Devon, one of the richeſt noblemen in the kingdom, had ſuch perſonal charms, as to become the univerſal object of converſation. Edgar often heard of the praiſes of this lady, and conceived a deſign of making her his partner in the throne; but doubting whether ſhe poſſeſſed thoſe charms diſplayed by common report, he diſpatched Athelwold his favourite and firſt miniſter, into Devonſhire, with directions to pay a viſit to her father, in order to obtain a ſight of her, and bring him a certain account of her beauty. Athelwold himſelf was young, and very ſuſceptible of the tender paſſions; ſo that the charms of Elfrida ſtifled in his breaſt every ſentiment of duty, and animated him with a reſolution of attempting to gain her for himſelf. He accordingly returned to Edgar and made a falſe report of the charms of Elfrida: he repreſented her as very plain in her perſon, and far from being an object proper for his affections. At the ſame time he artfully inſinuated, that though ſhe was unworthy to be the conſort of a king, ſhe would be an advantageous match for a ſubject, and the great riches ſhe poſſeſſed would be to him a ſufficient compenſation for the want of beauty in her perſon. Edgar readily gave his conſent, and Athelwold, ſoon after married Elfrida. Conſcious of the danger that muſt attend him, ſhould Edgar diſcover the treacherous part he had acted, Athelwold took every precaution to conceal the beautiful Elfrida from public obſervation. But his perfidy was not long unknown. Edgar, either by chance, or the information of ſome enemy to Athelwold, was informed of the whole tranſaction. Exaſperated at the treachery of his favourite, Edgar determined to take a ſevere revenge; but, for the preſent, he thought proper to diſſemble his rage, and told Athelwold, in a very careleſs manner, that he intended to hunt in the neighbourhood of his ſeat, and propoſed paying him a viſit. Alarmed at the king's deſign, and being incapable of making any plauſible excuſe to elude the royal viſit, Athelwold ſet out a few hours before the king, under pretence of making the neceſſary preparations. On his arrival he diſcovered the whole to Elfrida, conjuring her to uſe her utmoſt endeavours to conceal from the amorous monarch, thoſe charms which nature had ſo laviſhly beſtowed upon her, leſt they ſhould be the deſtruction of their domeſtic peace. But this requeſt was made to a woman conſcious of the power of beauty, and enflamed with the ambition of ſeing a monarch at her feet. Inſtead, therefore, of purſuing the advice of her huſband, when the king arrived ſhe took particular pains to employ all the graces of her perſon; in conſequence of which love and fury took poſſeſſion of the inſulted monarch's breaſt, though he had prudence enough to conceal it from the eyes of his perfidious favourite. It was not long, however, before he took a moſt ſevere revenge, for going with Athelwold to hunt in the foreſt of Harewood, he there ſtabbed him with his own hand. Elfrida, to expiate the guilt of being thought acceſſary to the murder of her huſband, erected a monaſtery on the ſpot where he was ſlain, and ſoon after was married to Edgar.

This incident terminated the vices and follies of Edgar, who ſpent the remainder of his reign in purſuing ſuch meaſures as did him honour both as a ſovereign and a man, and from which he was feared by his enemies, and univerſally beloved by his ſubjects.

A. D. 974. At this time the whole kingdom was infeſted with wolves, and Edgar exerted his utmoſt endeavours to extirpate them; but on being cloſely purſued they took ſhelter in the mountains and foreſts of Wales. Edgar, therefore, changed the tribute, which had been impoſed upon the Welch princes, into an annual tax of three hundred wolves. This ſcheme produced the deſired effect; and in a few years thoſe animals were no longer to be found in the iſland.

Edgar had now arrived to the higheſt ſummit of power, and to ſhew his authority he ſummoned his vaſſal princes to attend him at Cheſter. Theſe were eight in number, namely, Kennith king of Scotland, Malcolm king of Cumberland, Maccuſe king of the Iſles, and five petty kings of Wales. After paying the uſual homage, Edgar went into his royal barge, and was rowed down the river Dee by theſe eight tributary kings, another barge contained the principal nobility. In this manner they proceeded to the monaſtery of St. John the Baptiſt, where, having heard a complimentary oration, he returned to his palace.

A. D. 975. The peaceable reign of Edgar now drew towards a cloſe. He was ſeized with a violent fever, which, notwithſtanding all the art of medicine, took him off, in the 33d year of his age, and 16th of his reign.

Edgar had iſſue by his firſt wife Elfleda, Edward, who ſucceeded him on the throne; and by his ſecond wife Elfrida he had two ſons, viz. Ethelred (who was afterwards king of England) and Edmund, who died when he was only four years of age.

With reſpect to the character of Edgar, it muſt be acknowledged that he was a conſummate politician and a wiſe legiſlator. He made ſeveral excellent laws for the good order and government of his people. He regulated the coin of the kingdom, and reduced the weights and meaſures to one ſtandard. In ſhort, he exerted himſelf ſo much in promoting the happineſs of his people, and maintaining the honour of his crown, that it is to be wiſhed his failings as a man had been leſs, or that they had been for ever buried in the gulph of forgetfulneſs.

CHAP. XII.

EDWARD, ſurnamed the MARTYR.

Edward aſcends the throne, and is crowned at Kingſton; but after a ſhort reign, is treacherouſly aſſaſſinated by order of his ſtep-mother Elfrida.

A. D. 975. NO ſooner had Edgar paid the debt of nature than two powerful parties were formed, the one in favour of Edward, and the other of Ethelred. Dunſtan was at the head of the former, and the Queen Dowager Elfrida of the latter; but the archbiſhop and his party prevailed, in conſequence of which Edward was crowned at Kingſton upon Thames, being then little more than fourteen years of age.

A ſhort time after Edward's acceſſion to the throne Elfrida retired with her ſon Ethelred to Corfe Caſtle in Dorſetſhire. All animoſities between her and Edward ſeemed to be entirely forgot, and that peace and harmony, which had ſubſiſted between them before the death of Edgar, reſtored. This apparent reconciliation was real on the part of Edward; but much otherwiſe on that of Elfrida, who long nurſed in ſecret the fury of revenge, which ſhe at length gratified by cauſing the innocent Edward to be baſely aſſaſſinated.

A. D. 979. The young king, returning one day from the chaſe in Dorſetſhire, left his attendants, and rode up to Corfe Caſtle, to pay his reſpects to his ſtep-mother. Elfrida received him with all the external marks of affection, and deſired him to alight, in order to take ſome refreſhment. This, however, Edward refuſed, but requeſted that a cup of wine might be brought him as he was exceeding thirſty. The wine was accordingly brought, but while he held the cup to his head he was ſtabbed in the back by one of Elfrida's ſervants, whom ſhe had baſely prevailed upon to execute her horrid purpoſe. Edward, on receiving the wound, immediately clapped ſpurs to his horſe, to eſcape a ſecond blow, and reach his companions; but fainting with the loſs of blood, he fell from his horſe, and his foot being entangled in the ſtirrup, he was dragged a conſiderable diſtance along the road, and then expired. The ſervants of Elfrida followed Edward, took up the body, and threw it into a well, in order, if poſſible, to conceal the horrid murder. But their attempts were fruitleſs the body was found in the courſe of a few days, and privately interred at Wareham, from whence it was afterwards removed to the monaſtery at Shafteſbury.—Thus fell the unfortunate Edward, in the fourth year of his reign, during which nothing material occurred except violent feuds between the monks and ſecular clergy.

Elfrida, ſtung with remorſe at the horrid crime ſhe had committed, endeavoured to atone for her guilt by erecting two monaſteries, one at Ambreſbury in Wiltſhire, and the other at Wherwell in Hampſhire, to the latter of which ſhe retired, and ſpent the remainder of her days in penitence and obſcurity.

ETHELRED II.

Ethelred aſcends the throne on the death of his brother Edward. The Danes repeatedly invade England, and Ethelred repeatedly purchaſes a peace with them. Marries Emma, ſiſter to the duke of Normandy. Orders a general maſſacre of the Danes throughout his kingdom. Sweyn, king of Denmark, arrives with a large body of forces, and exerciſes the moſt horrid barbarities on the Engliſh. Makes a deſcent into Eaſt-Anglia, but is nobly oppoſed by Ulfketel the governor. The Danes again arrive, and the Engliſh purchaſe a peace. The Engliſh fleet is betrayed into the hands of the Danes, who again land, and commit the moſt horrid barbarities. Ethelred abdicates his throne, which is filled by Sweyn, king of Denmark, who ſoon after dies, and his ſon Canute declared king of England. Ethelred is recalled, and again aſſumes the ſovereignty. Is oppoſed by Canute, who, not chuſing to hazard a battle, retreats to his fleet. Canute returns with his army, and the Engliſh forces march againſt him, but by the treachery of Edric, one of their commanders, the latter are obliged to retreat, and Canute commits the moſt horrid barbarities. Death and character of Ethelred.

A. D. 979. ON the death of Edward, his brother Ethelred became lawful heir to the throne of England, and was crowned with great ceremony at Kingſton, by Dunſtan archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Ethelred, at the time of his acceſſion, was only in the twelfth year of his age, and conſequently wanted that experience which is neceſſary to govern a kingdom. Add to this, he had neither capacity, genius, or courage, and therefore was little able to rule in the midſt of a profound peace, much leſs in times of danger and diſtreſs. The nation was then divided into two factions, both of whom courted the favour of the king, and both endeavoured to blacken the character of each other. Ethelred wanted penetration to diſtinguiſh the careſſes of fidelity from thoſe of adulation, and became fluctuating and irreſolute: hence his whole conduct was a ſeries of timidity, indolence, perplexity and diſtruſt. The nobles had taken advantage of his brother's weakneſs, to render their power almoſt independent of the crown. The royal authority had, in a great meaſure, loſt its force, and the ſafety of the nation, which depended on the union of the nobility, was in the moſt imminent danger.

A. D. 982. The Danes were no ſtrangers to the imperfections of the king, and the weakened ſtate of the nation; and therefore thought it a proper opportunity of renewing their depredations. Accordingly, a large body of them, in ſeven ſhips, entered the channel, and made a deſcent on the iſle of Thanet, which having ravaged, they proceeded to Southampton, and then, re-re-imbarking, ſailed to the coaſt of Cornwall, where they committed they moſt horrid depredations.

In the mean time there happened ſome misfortunes of a domeſtic nature; in particular, the city of London was almoſt deſtroyed by an accidental fire: and the king, having a difference with the biſhop of Rocheſter, inſtead of turning his arms againſt the Danes, laid ſiege to the prelate in his own city; but, at the inſtigation of Dunſtan, he thought proper to withdraw his forces, though not till he had received an hundred pounds to reimburſe him for his trouble and expences. Some time after this Dunſtan paid the debt of nature, which greatly leſſened the conteſts that had been long held between the monks and ſecular clergy.

The Danes continued their ravages in different parts of the kingdom for ſome years without interruption, which gave ſuch encouragement to their countrymen, that, in 991, Guthmond and Juſtin, too Daniſh generals, landed with a powerful army at Ipſwich in Suffolk. Brithnoth, duke of Eaſt-Anglia marched againſt them with what forces he could collect, but being defeated and ſlain, the country lay open to the mercileſs invaders, who marked their route with blood and devaſtation. But neither the calamities of his country, nor the danger of loſing his crown, could rouſe Ethelred from the couch of indolence. He ſupinely neglected every means of defence, and, inſtead of oppoſing the enemy by the ſword, indiſcreetly paid them ten thouſand pounds to quit the kingdom.

A. D. 993. The puſillanimous conduct of Ethelred was productive of thoſe conſequences that might naturally have been expected. The Danes employed the money they received in fitting out a more powerful fleet, not to ravage, but to conquer the iſland. This formidable armament was commanded by Sweyn, king of Denmark, and Olaus, king of Norway. They ravaged Durham and Yorkſhire without oppoſition; but at length the Engliſh army appeared, and the Danes would probably have paid dear for their conduct had not three of the Engliſh commanders, all of Daniſh extraction, betrayed the cauſe they had undertaken to defend. They baſely went over to the enemy, and left their troops to be cut to pieces by the ſwords of the barbarians.

Fluſhed with ſucceſs the Danes next made an attack on London; but the citizens oppoſed them with ſuch ſpirit and reſolution, that, after loſing a great number of men, they were obliged to raiſe the ſiege, and make a precipitate retreat. This diſappointment ſo enraged the Danes, that they laid waſte great part of Kent, Suſſex, and Hampſhire, and committed the moſt horrid cruelties on the innocent inhabitants. In this diſtreſs recourſe was again had to negotiation, and the Danes agreed to quit the country on receiving the ſum of ſixteen thouſand pounds. The treaty was accordingly concluded, and the money being paid, the enemy returned to their own countries.

A. D. 999. But the interval of peace thus infamouſly purchaſed by Ethelred was of ſhort duration. New armies of barbarians, under different leaders, invaded the kingdom in various parts, and ſpread the horrors of war and devaſtation wherever they went. The cowardly indolence of the king, and the treacherous behaviour of his principal commanders, increaſed the dreadful calamities, and the kingdom muſt have fallen a prey to the barbarians, had it not been for a very unexpected incident. Robert, king of France, had defeated the army of Richard II. duke of Normandy, and threatened to drive him from his dominions. In conſequence of this Richard applied for aſſiſtance to the Danes in England, who immediately complied with his requeſt, and, reimbarking their forces, ſailed for the continent.

A. D. 1000. The Danes, having given the wanted aſſiſtance to the duke of Normandy, returned to England, and again commenced their ravages in various parts of the kingdom. The puſillanimous Ethelred, inſtead of taking any meaſures to oppoſe them, had recourſe to his uſual expedients, and agreed to pay them twenty-four thouſand pounds*, on condition of their immediately departing the kingdom.

A. D. 1002. After the departure of the Danes, Ethelred began to conſider what meaſures were moſt proper to purſue in order to prevent their future invaſions. He knew the duke of Normandy was capable of ſending him what ſuccours he might want to repel them, and that the Danes themſelves muſt deſiſt from committing farther ravages in England if deprived of his protection. He therefore diſpatched ambaſſadors to Richard, demanding his ſiſter Emma in marriage. This requeſt being accepted, that princeſs was conducted to the court of Ethelred, where the nuptials were celebrated with the utmoſt magnificence.

This alliance might have anſwered the moſt ſanguine expectations of Ethelred, had he not been prevailed upon to engage in a project that overwhelmed his people with miſery, and entailed a laſting infamy on his memory. Though the greater part of the Danes had, in conſequence of the laſt treaty, retired to their own country, yet a very conſiderable number ſettled in England, and treated the inhabitants with ſuch inſolence, that, by way of reproach, they were called Lordains, or Lord Danes. Their haughtineſs and perfidy excited the general hatred of the Engliſh, and the weak Ethelred, at the inſtigation of ſome of his baſe and treacherous courtiers, embraced a propoſal of maſſacring all the Danes throughout his kingdom. He accordingly diſpatched circular letters for this purpoſe to every part, Northumberland and Eaſt-Anglia excepted, the Danes in thoſe places being too numerous to be overcome by the Engliſh. The day fixed on for the execution of this horrid deſign was the 13th of November, and the bloody mandate was obeyed with the moſt rigorous punctuality. Neither age nor ſex were ſpared: the chriſtian and the pagan ſuffered the ſame fate. To implore mercy was in vain: to ſeek for ſafety by flying to the churches as ſanctuaries was equally fruitleſs, the devoted objects being either dragged from thence, and murdered, or ſlain at the altar. Even Gunilda, ſiſter to the king of Denmark, fell a victim to barbarous brutality. She had long lived in England, had embraced the Chriſtian religion, and was married to an Engliſh nobleman. She had always behaved with the greateſt prudence; but the goodneſs of her heart could not ſave her: ſhe was devoted to periſh with her friends by the barbarous orders of a weak and timorous monarch. Nor was her death ſufficient to ſatisfy the vengeance of barbarity. Cruelty was added to increaſe the horrors of her execution. Her huſband and children were firſt murdered before her face, and then ſhe herſelf ſuffered the ſame fate. But the fortitude with which ſhe underwent this horrid maſſacre does honour to her memory. She betrayed neither fear nor timidity; not a feature in her countenance was changed: ſhe was calm amidſt this ſcene of horror; and with her laſt breath told her inhuman murderers, that her death would not be long unrevenged.

A. D. 1003. It was not long before Gunilda's prediction was moſt amply verified. Her brother Sweyn no ſooner heard of the baſe tranſaction than, exaſperated to a degree of phrenſy, he bound himſelf by a moſt ſolemn oath to wreak his vengeance on the Engliſh. Accordingly, having embarked a very powerful army he landed in Cornwall, and ravaged the country with ſuch a degree of ferocity as clearly proved his deſign tended rather to revenge than conqueſt. The city of Exeter next became the victim of his vengeance. The whole place was laid in aſhes, and the wretched inhabitants put to death in the moſt cruel manner.

The alarming progreſs of Sweyn rouſed Ethelred from his indolence. He aſſembled an army to oppoſe him, and ſeemed determined to march in perſon againſt the enemy. But he was intimidated at the approach of danger, and therefore entruſted the command of his forces to Edric, duke of Mercia, a man of all others whom he had the leaſt reaſon to confide in, having given ſeveral inſtances of the moſt diſtinguiſhed perfidy. The injudicious conduct of the king was attended with conſequences which might naturally be expected. The traitor Edric no ſooner came within ſight of the enemy than he pretended to be taken ſuddenly ill, and ordered a retreat, which was purpoſely conducted in ſo careleſs a manner, that the Danes fell upon the rear of the Engliſh, many of whom were killed, and the reſt obliged to ſave themſelves by a precipi ate flight. From this diſaſter, occaſioned by the treachery of Edric, Sweyn was left to purſue his ravages without oppoſition. He accordingly deſtroyed the towns of Wilton and Old Sarum, and put all the inhabitants to the ſword; after which, the winter coming on, he embarked his forces, and returned to his own country.

A. D. 1004. In the following ſpring Sweyn returned with his army, and making a deſcent in the country of the Eaſt-Angles, laid the city of Norwich in aſhes. But he met with a noble oppoſition from Ulfketel, the governor of Eaſt-Anglia, who, raiſing a body of forces with the utmoſt expedition, marched againſt him. In conſequence of this a deſperate battle enſued, which, from the great ſuperiority of numbers, terminated in favour of Sweyn. But the attacks of Ulfketel were ſo well conducted, and made with ſuch fury, that many of the Danes were ſlain in the action; and Sweyn, not chuſing to hazard a ſecond battle, embarked his forces, and returned to Denmark.

A. D. 1005. But the miſeries of war were not the only calamity ſuffered by the Engliſh at this fatal period. A dreadful famine raged throughout the whole kingdom, occaſioned principally by the horrid ravages of the Danes, and many who had eſcaped the ſwords of the barbarians now periſhed

* This enormous ſum (for ſuch it muſt be deemed, conſidering the value of money at that period) was levied by means of a tax called Dane-gelt, or Dane's money, and was the firſt land-tax known in England. It was raiſed by the owners of land being obliged to pay twelve-pence per hide, the hide being as much as could annually occupy one plough and maintain one family.

riſhed for want. The Engliſh never experienced more dreadful calamities: they were driven to the brink of deſtuction, and ſunk under the weight of complicated misfortunes.

A. D. 1006. The dire effects of this calamity were hardly removed when the Danes again appeared, and renewed their ravages with their uſual barbarity. They waſted the country through which they paſſed, laid the towns and villages in aſhes, and murdered the innocent inhabitants. Every attempt to oppoſe them was rendered abortive by the treachery of the Engliſh officers, and the want of unanimity among the nobles. In this extremity recourſe was again had to the only expedient that ſeemed to promiſe ſucceſs, namely, that of purchaſing a peace from the enemy. But the Danes, grown inſolent by ſucceſs, refuſed to abandon the iſland till they had received the enormous ſum of 30,000l.

A. D. 1007. The next year Sweyn ſent a fleet of ſhips to make a demand of the like ſum, on pretence that the Engliſh had bound themſelves to pay it annually. In conſequence of this Ethelred, convinced that nothing could ſatiate the demands of the avaritious Danes, reſolved to put his kingdom in a proper ſtate of defence. To effect this a large fleet was immediately fitted out, towards the expence of which perſons of property were taxed in proportion to the value of their eſtates. But this powerful armament was rendered unſerviceable by the diſſentions that prevailed among the officers: they were ſtrangers to the virtue of forgiveneſs; and ſo far ſacrificed the ſafety of the nation to their private animoſities, as even to betray the greateſt part of the Engliſh navy into the hands of the enemy.

A. D. 1009. This diſaſter gave farther encouragement to the Danes, who returned in greater numbers, and committed the moſt horrid ravages wherever they went. No oppoſition could now be made againſt them, and the puſillanimous Ethelred procured their abſence by paying them the enormous ſum of 48,000l.

A. D. 1013. But no treaties whatever were binding to theſe rapacious invaders. They again returned this year, and renewed their ravages, if poſſible, with more brutality than before. Canterbury experienced the utmoſt rage of brutal ferocity. The city had held out nineteen days againſt all the aſſaults of the enemy, when it was baſely given up by the treachery of one of its inhabitants, named Elmar, and all the citizens, among whom was Alphage the archpiſhop, put to death by the moſt excruciating tortures.

A. D. 1014. The ſtrength and power of Sweyn had now arrived at ſuch a height, that the Engliſh gave up all as loſt; and the nobles, to ſecure themſelves from that fate which had befallen thouſands of their unhappy countrymen, ſubmitted to the tyrant, ſwore allegiance to him, and delivered hoſtages for their future behaviour. The wretched Ethelred fled with his family into Normandy, and was received by Richard II. with all the marks of kindneſs and affection.

The king having thus abdicated his throne, the inhabitants of London thought themſelves abſolved from their allegiance, and ſubmitted without heſitation to Sweyn, who, in conſequence thereof, was proclaimed king of England.

Sweyn began his reign of uſurpation with laying heavy taxes on his ſubjects. This increaſed their misfortunes, but it was uſeleſs to complain. The Dane was a ſtranger to compaſſion: the ſoft whiſpers of humanity pleaded in vain the cauſe of a people ſinking under the burthen of diſtreſs. They brooded in ſilence over their misfortunes, and gave themſelves up a prey to dejection. But fortunately for them and their country, this ſeaſon of calamity was of ſhort duration, Sweyn dying ſuddenly in leſs than ſix weeks after his uſurpation.

On the demiſe of Sweyn the Danes proclaimed his ſon Canute king of England; but the Engliſh, ſtill prejudiced in favour of Ethelred, determined to replace him on that throne to which he was juſtly entitled. In conſequence of this Canute was declared an outlaw, and a deputation diſpatched to Ethelred, requeſting his immediate return. Pleaſed with this teſtimony of the affection of his people, Ethelred readily complied with their requeſt, promiſing, at the ſame time, to govern them in future with juſtice, equity and moderation, and to exert his whole power in defence of his country.

A. D. 1015. Ethelred was received by the Engliſh with every demonſtration of joy, and a numerous army being immediately raiſed, he put himſelf at the head of it, and marched with all expedition againſt Canute, who, being determined to oppoſe him, had made preparations for ſeizing by conqueſt the crown he could not obtain by the ſuffrages of the people. Surprized at the expeditious march of the Engliſh monarch, Canute thought proper to decline an engagement, and retreated precipitately to his fleet; ſoon after which he ſailed for Denmark, in order to aſſert his right to the crown of that kingdom, which had been uſurped by his brother Harold.

The departure of Canute removed the fears of Ethelred, who now forgot all the promiſes he had made to his people. He diſcovered the ſame incapacity for government; and blindly gave himſelf over to the counſels and directions of the traitor Edric, who had ſo often overwhelmed him and his people with miſery and diſgrace. He even liſtened to the ſuggeſtions of that perfidious incendiary againſt two of his faithful adherents, and the firſt noblemen of his court. Edric pretended that they held a correſpondence with the Danes, and had even formed a deſign againſt his life. The weak Ethelred believed the traitor; in conſequence of which the noblemen were aſſaſſinated, and their eſtates confiſcated to the crown.

A ſhort time after this inhuman act, Canute, having terminated the troubles in Denmark, embarked his army, and landed without oppoſition on the coaſt of Weſſex. In conſequence of this Edmund, the eldeſt ſon of Ethelred, raiſed a conſiderable body of troops in the north, while Edric levied a number of forces in Mercia. The junction of theſe troops formed a conſiderable army, and the two generals led them directly againſt the enemy. The ſoldiers placed the greateſt confidence in Edmund, and marched under his banners with the greateſt intrepidity againſt the invaders of their country. Had Edric been faithful, in all probability Canute would have been totally defeated. But ſincerity was not to be found in Edric. He formed the baſe deſign of either taking away the life of Edmund, or delivering him into the hands of the enemy. But fortunately for himſelf and army, the prince diſcovered the infernal contrivance juſt as the troops were making preparations to engage. A retreat now became abſolutely neceſſary; and Edric, finding his perfidy diſcovered, went over to the enemy.

A. D. 1016. The defection of the traitor Edric greatly increaſed the ſtrength of Canute, who now ravaged the country without oppoſition. The diſtreſs of the people was augmented by inſolence, and barbarity was added to deſtruction. The heart, of Edmund was pierced as the miſeries of his country, but treachery prevented his affording them any relief. After making ſome fruitleſs expeditions into the north he repaired to London, in hopes of prevailing on his father to purſue more vigorous meaſures againſt the invaders of his country; but on his arrival he found the city in the utmoſt confuſion, occaſioned by the death of Ethelred, who expired a few days before in the 50th year of his age, and 37th of his reign.

Ethelred, in his perſon, was comely, fair, and of a genteel addreſs: in his diſpoſition he was timid, irreſolute, inconſiſtent and indolent. His attachment to the traitor Edric marks his character with weakneſs and folly; and the maſſacre of the Danes ſtains it with wickedneſs and cruelty. He was not, however, deſtitute of virtues. He enacted ſeveral excellent laws, ſome of which are extant; and it is upon record that he once diſmiſſed a judge, who had been guilty of a perverſion of juſtice. Theſe are circumſtances neceſſary to mention, becauſe the light as well as the ſhade ſhould be expoſed in every picture.

CHAP. XV.

EDMUND II. ſurnamed IRONSIDE.

Edmund on the death of his father is crowned king of England. Marches againſt the Danes, and ſeveral battles take place with various ſucceſs. Engages Canute in ſingle combat, the iſſue of which is to divide the kingdom betweeen them. Edmund, at the inſtigation of the traitor Edric, is aſſaſſinated

A. D. 1016. ON the death of Ethelred the ſovereign power devolved on his ſon Edmund, who, from his diſtinguiſhed valour, obtained the ſurname of Ironſide. He was proclaimed king at London amidſt the univerſal acclamations of the principal citizens, and inveſted with the regal dignity by Livignus archbiſhop of Canterbury.

But Edmund had little reaſon to expect any quietude in the ſeat of royalty. He had to contend with a moſt formidable rival in the perſon of Canute, who was then at the head of the Daniſh troops at Southampton, to which place many of the nobility and clergy had repaired, and not only choſe him king, but alſo ſolemnly renounced the race of Ethelred.

In the mean time Edmund, leaving a ſtrong garriſon in London, proceeded into Weſſex, the patrimonial kingdom of his family, where the inhabitants proclaimed him their legal ſovereign; and ſo attached were they to his intereſt that he ſoon raiſed a very powerful army, with which he determined to march immediately againſt the invader of his country.

While Edmund was in Weſſex, Canute reſolved to lay ſiege to London, and having ſailed up the river, landed his troops at Greenwich, and marched directly to inveſt the city. But he found much greater oppoſition than he expected, and was convinced that unleſs ſome expedient could be projected for preventing relief being brought to the beſieged, all his efforts would prove in vain. To effect this he had recourſe to the ſtratagem of altering the current of the river by cutting a new channel on the Surry ſide, having done which, he drew up ſome of his ſhips above the bridge, and thereby cut off all communication with the citizens from the weſtern and ſouthern parts of the capital. He now preſſed the ſiege with the utmoſt vigour; but the Londoners defended the place with ſuch obſtinacy, and made ſo many ſucceſsful ſallies, that Canute gave up all hopes of ſucceſs, and, withdrawing his forces, marched into Weſſex.

At the time Canute abandoned this enterprize, Edmund was advancing with all expedition to the relief of his capital; and the two armies meeting at Penne in Somerſetſhire, a deſperate battle enſued, in which Edmund proved victorious, and Canute was obliged to retire with great loſs.

Canute having recruited his forces, again advanced againſt Edmund, and the two armies met at a place called Sceorſtan, on the borders of Glouceſterſhire. The battle was maintained with great obſtinacy on both ſides till night put an end to the conteſt. But as ſoon as morning appeared it was renewed with double fury, and victory hovered over the ſtandard of Edmund, when the traitor Edric, (who commanded a large body of Canute's forces) by a ſtratagem, changed the fortune of the day. He cut off the head of one Oſmar, whoſe countenance greatly reſembled that of Edmund, and fixing it on the point of a ſpear carried it through the ranks in triumph, calling out to the Engliſh, "Behold the head of your king! Edmund is no more!" This ſtratagem had ſo far the intended effect as to throw the Engliſh into the utmoſt confuſion, and Edmund was obliged to raiſe his helmet before he could convince them of the deception; but he could not, with all his efforts, regain the advantage he had loſt. The victory was again doubtful, and ſo continued till night put an end to the conteſt.

Edmund, far from being diſcouraged, determined to renew the fight the enſuing morning; but the firſt bluſhes of the dawn convinced him that no enemy was near, Canute having in the night retreated with his army from the field of battle.

The traitor Edric, having failed in his late ſtratagem, now hit upon another for ruining Edmund. He went to the king's camp, and, with all the marks of ſincere contrition, implored his pardon, promiſing in future to ſerve his country with as much zeal and vigilance as he had hitherto ſerved its enemies. Edmund was too ſuſceptible of compaſſion: he believed the traitor's repentance to be real, again admitted him into favour, and gave him a principal command in his army.

Succeſs, for ſome time, attended the ſtandards of Edmund: ſeveral parties of the Danes were defeated, till at length Canute determined to riſk his fortune on one deciſive battle. In conſequence of this the two armies met, and Edmund attacked the enemy with ſuch impetuous fury, that they muſt have been totally defeated, had it not been for the treachery of Edric, who, inſtead of charging the Daniſh army, fled with the forces under his command from the field of battle. This incident threw the Engliſh into the utmoſt confuſion; and Edmund, after loſing great numbers of his men, was compelled to retreat.

But this misfortune did not damp the ſpirits of the intrepid Edmund. He applied himſelf, with the utmoſt alacrity, to recruit his forces, and ſoon found himſelf at the head of an army ſufficient to diſpute the palm of victory with the enemy. Canute was aſtoniſhed to ſee Edmund again approaching, and was alarmed for the conſequences. He had purchaſed the laſt victory with the blood of many of his beſt officers, and even owed his ſucceſs to treachery. He, however, led his forces againſt the Engliſh, and both armies drew up in order of battle, in which ſtate they continued for ſome time without either one or other giving the ſignal to engage. During this interval of inaction, an officer in the Engliſh army advanced, and, in a florid ſpeech, diſplayed the great diſtreſs which the war had brought upon the innocent inhabitants; and at the ſame time obſerved, that as the two kings were equal in regard to perſonal courage, it would be an act of humanity for the two leaders to put a final period to their quarrel by ſingle combat, adding, that the victor ſhould be acknowledged ſovereign by both armies.

This propoſal met with univerſal approbation, in conſequence of which the two leaders retired to the iſle of Alney formed by the Severn, their troops lining the banks of the ſtream, and impatiently waiting the event of a combat, which was to decide the fate of the kingdom. The conteſt laſted for ſome time with equal courage on both ſides, when Canute, finding himſelf likely to be overpowered by the ſuperior ſtrength and agility of Edmund, propoſed making a diviſion of the kingdom, and terminating their quarrel by an act of mutual friendſhip. The generous Edmund (who was more deſirous of healing the wounds of his bleeding country than of being placed in the ſeat of power) readily liſtened to the propoſal, in conſequence of which the two princes threw away their ſwords, and cordially embraced each other, to the great ſatisfaction of both armies, who gave a general ſhout of undiſſembled joy. Having made a mutual interchange of armour, in token of amity, the treaty was formally concluded, by which it was ſtipulated, that all the northern parts of the kingdom ſhould be ceded to Canute, and that Edmund ſhould preſerve the reſt, with the title of ſupreme king of England.

In conſequence of this treaty both armies were immediately diſbanded, and the Engliſh now flattered themſelves that a final period was put to their diſtreſs: that diſcord would be ſucceeded by harmony, and the noiſy terrors of war give place to the calm pleaſures of domeſtic peace. But all their hopes were blaſted by means of the treacherous Edric, who, fearful that Edmund would call him to an account for his perfidy, hired two ruffians to aſſaſſinate him, which horrid deed was committed at Oxford, after he had held the ſcepter little more than nine months. And thus did the brave Edmund fall a victim to the treachery of one of the moſt execrable villains that ever diſgraced human nature.

From the ſhort reign of this prince, and the number of events that took place during the time, his virtues could not be ſufficiently diſplayed to form a proper idea of his character. It may, however, be ſaid with juſtice, that he was courageous and benevolent; intrepid in danger, and patient in adverſity. He was a friend to the brave, a friend to the virtuous and a friend to his country.

Edmund left two ſons, namely, Edmund and Edward, neither of whom ſucceeded to the throne.

CHAP. XVI.

CANUTE THE GREAT.

Canute is crowned king of England. Baniſhes the two ſons of Edmund. Puts to death the traitor Edric. Marries Emma, ſiſter to the duke of Normandy. Goes over to Denmark. Reduces Norway. Makes a pilgrimage to Rome. Returns, and obliges Duncan, grandſon to the king of Scotland to pay him homage. His death and character.

A. D. 1017. AS ſoon as Canute was informed of the death of Edmund (which information he received from the mouth of the treacherous Edric) he immediately repaired to London, and convening an aſſembly of the nobles and repreſentatives of the people, produced witneſſes, ſuborned for the purpoſe, to declare, that, in the late treaty between the two kings it was ſtipulated, that, in caſe of the demiſe of either party, the ſurvivor ſhould inherit his poſſeſſions, to the total excluſion of his iſſue, and other heirs. The members were aſtoniſhed at this unexpected claim, but not being able to diſpute the matter with a prince, who had a numerous and well-diſciplined army ready to obey his nod, they unanimouſly ſwore allegiance to Canute, who was immediately proclaimed king of England, and ſhortly after crowned with great pomp and magnificence.

But though Canute had thus obtained the Engliſh crown, to which he had neither lineal nor equitable right, yet he was exceeding uneaſy concerning Edward and Edmund, the ſons of the late king. To remove his fears on this head, he ſent the young princes to the king of Sweden his ally, whom he entreated to put them to death. But the Swediſh monarch, ſhocked at this inhuman requeſt, and at the ſame time afraid of the reſentment of Canute, ſent them to Solomon, king of Hungary, who, to his honour, cordially received the unfortunate exiles, and gave them an education ſuitable to their birth. Edmund, the eldeſt, died ſoon after, but his brother Edward married Agatha, daughter of Henry II. emperor of Germany, by whom he had Edgar Atheling, and Margaret, afterwards queen of Scotland.

The removal of the two princes was far from ſatisfying Canute, who next proceeded to put to death ſome noblemen, whom he knew to be ſtill attached to the race of their antient kings. The traitor Edric was likewiſe put to death. He had the the aſſurance to reproach Canute with ingratitude, and complained that the rewards he had received were inadequate to his paſt ſervices. Provoked at his inſolence, and deteſting his character, Canute immediately ordered him to be beheaded, and his body thrown into the Thames.

But there were ſtill other objects who diſturbed the repoſe of Canute. Theſe were Alfred and Edward, the ſons of Ethelred, who were now grown up to mens eſtate, and remained in the court of Richard II. duke of Normandy, who might, as Canute juſtly feared, endeavour to place one of them on the Engliſh throne. To avert this ſurmiſed evil, Canute determined to ſecure the alliance of Richard. He accordingly ſent a ſplendid embaſſy to him, requeſting his ſiſter in marriage, and offering his own ſiſter Heſtritha to the Norman prince. Theſe propoſals were readily accepted by Richard, the double nuptials celebrated with great pomp, and a ſolid friendſhip formed between the two princes.

A. D. 1018. The wars of Canute had exhauſted his treaſury, and in order to pay off the arrears of his army, he laid a tax of 82,000l. upon the nation, 15,000l. of which was paid by the citizens of London. The chearfulneſs with which the Engliſh raiſed this money ſo pleaſed Canute, that he convened an aſſembly of the ſtates at Oxford, where he paſſed an act to incorporate the Engliſh and Danes as one people, and re-eſtabliſhed ſeveral of the moſt popular laws of Edgar and Edward the Elder. He likewiſe enacted, That no market, fairs or aſſemblies ſhould be held on Sundays; and that all Chriſtians ſhould receive the ſacrament at leaſt three times in the year.

A. D. 1019. Canute, being now fully ſecured on the Engliſh throne, turned his attention to the affairs of his own country, which was then in great danger from the Vandals, who had defeated the Danes in ſeveral engagements. He therefore went over to Denmark with a conſiderable army, one half of which was compriſed of Engliſh under the command of Godwin, earl of Kent. Having landed his forces he marched with all expedition towards the enemy, with whom, in the courſe of ſeveral days, he came up towards ſunſet. The day being ſo far declined he thought proper to encamp his army, deſigning to engage the enemy early the enſuing morning. But in this he was diſappointed by means of earl Godwin, who, being determined to ſignalize himſelf, ſecretly drew off his Engliſh forces in the night, and marching as privately as poſſible to the enemy's camp, attacked them with ſuch impetuoſity that they were totally routed, and the greater part cut to pieces. This gallant action ſo pleaſed Canute, that he gave Godwin his ſiſter Thyrſa in marriage, and ever after diſtinguiſhed him with peculiar marks of affection.

A. D. 1020. The war being terminated in Denmark, Canute returned to England, whither he had no ſooner arrived than he removed every officer who had been guilty of oppreſſion during his abſence, particularly the dukes of Eaſt-Anglia and Northumberland, whom he baniſhed the kingdom. Theſe acts of juſtice greatly increaſed the eſteem the Engliſh had already conceived for him, and to win their affections ſtill farther, he appeared to be deeply penetrated with grief on account of the great multitudes of people, who had fallen victims to his ambition. To make ſome atonement he built a church at Aſhdown, on the ſpot where he fought a bloody battle with Edmund; and founded chauntries in thoſe places where any ſlaughter had been made of the Engliſh.

In this manner Canute ſpent his time for about eight years, when he formed the deſign of making himſelf maſter of Norway. Olave, the king of that country had long laboured to reſtrain the ferocity of his ſubjects, and render their lives conformable to the precepts of religion. But theſe reſtraints were odious to the Norwegians, and they determined to dethrone him. Canute, taking advantage of theſe diviſions, landed in Norway at the head of a powerful army, drove Olave from the throne, and was crowned king; ſo that being now poſſeſſed of three great kingdoms, he became the moſt powerful prince in Europe.

A. D. 1029. Canute, on his return to England, dedicated his whole time to what was then conſidered as the nobleſt acts of piety, namely, the founding of churches and monaſteries. He granted a charter to the celebrated monaſtery of St. Edmundſbury, by which all lands and privileges were confirmed. He likewiſe gave the profits of the port of Sandwich to Chriſt-church in Canterbury, and founded a monaſtery of Benedictine monks in Norfolk.

A. D. 1032. In the beginning of this year, Canute made a pilgrimage to Rome, where he preſented large donations to the churches, and confirmed whatever his predeceſſors had done in favour of the Engliſh college in that city. He likewiſe procured various privileges for the churches in England, and engaged all the princes through whoſe dominions he paſſed, to exempt the Engliſh pilgrims and merchants from all tolls and duties which had been before exacted from them.

Canute, on his return to England, was received by his ſubjects with the utmoſt demonſtrations of joy; and indeed he juſtly deſerved this teſtimony of their affection. He enforced all the laws which had been made by his predeceſſors, particularly thoſe of Ethelred; added ſeveral new ones adapted to the times, and took every method he could project for promoting the welfare and happineſs of his people.

A. D. 1033. But while Canute was employed in cultivating the arts of peace among his ſubjects, his attention was called off to ſupport the dignity of his crown. Duncan, grandſon to Malcolm king of Scotland, being in poſſeſſion of Cumberland, refuſed to do homage to Canute for that fief, ſaying, it was due only to ſuch kings as were natives of England. Provoked at this inſolence of a Scottiſh prince, Canute marched at the head of a powerful army to reduce him to obedience; but by the interpoſition of the prelates and nobility of both kingdoms, a peace was concluded, Duncan agreeing to pay homage to Canute, as alſo to the future kings of England.

A. D. 1034. Canute, from his conduct, and the great power of which he was poſſeſſed, became the adulation of his ſubjects, and his courtiers would frequently flatter him in ſuch a manner as if they had thought him more than mortal. This was highly diſpleaſing to Canute, who reſolved to check them for ſuch abſurd conduct, and to point out to them the limited authority of earthly monarchs. Accordingly, one day when his courtiers were carrying their flatteries to an unbounded height, Canute, who then kept his court at Southampton, led them to the ſea-ſide, and ordering a chair to be placed on the beach near the ſurface of the tide, which was then flowing, he ſat himſelf down, and, with a majeſtic tone of voice, thus addreſſed himſelf to the water: "Thou, O ſea, art a part of my dominions, and "the land whereon I ſit is mine. I therefore "charge thee not to encroach any farther on my "land, nor preſume to wet the feet of thy ſove-"reign." But the ſea continued its uſual courſe, and waſhed him with its billows: upon which Canute, riſing from his ſeat, and turning to his courtiers, ſaid, "Behold the narrow limits of mortal "power! the ſceptered hand of human greatneſs "exerts its force in vain. The ſea rolls on in con-"tempt of its authority: the operations of nature "make no diſtinction between the monarch and the "ſlave. Learn then, from this example, to ſet "proper bounds to flattery; and remember, that "He only deſerves unlimited praiſes who holds "in his hands the powers of nature, and whoſe "voice both the winds and the ſea obey." It is ſaid, that Canute would never after wear his crown, but ordered it to be placed on the head of the crucifix in the cathedral of Wincheſter.

A. D. 1036. Canute ſpent the remainder of his days in acts of piety and devotion, and at length paid the debt of nature at Shafteſbury, on the 12th of November, and was interred in the old monaſtery at Wincheſter. He left by his firſt wife two ſons, namely, Sweyn and Harold; and by Emma, his ſecond wife, another ſon called Hardicanute, and a daughter named Gunilda, who was married to Henry III. emperor of Germany.

With reſpect to the character of Canute, it is ſo inconſiſtent with itſelf that it is impoſſible to draw it in general terms. We muſt therefore, to do him juſtice, trace his actions, and characterize him differently at different periods. His youth was marked with blood and cruelty: his age with piety and devotion. He ſacrificed every thing in the morning of his reign to ambition; in the evening, to acts of benevolence and piety. The ſcepter was at firſt the rod of tyranny: at laſt the index of mercy. No monarch ever raiſed popular odium ſo high, or allayed it ſo effectually. He was a great general, a conſummate ſtateſman, and a wiſe legiſlator. When age had ſoftened the paſſions of youth, and the precepts of religion had eraſed the impreſſions of a ferocious education, Canute became a moſt excellent prince; and the virtues he practiſed during the peaceable time of his adminiſtration, gave him a much better claim to the title of Great than all his victories. In ſhort, his conduct during the latter part of his reign, totally obliterated his vices at the beginning, and he lived beloved, and died lamented.

CHAP. XVII.

HAROLD I. ſurnamed HAREFOOT.

Harold, after ſome diſturbances relative to the ſucceſſion, is crowned king of England. Forms a conſpiracy, in conjunction with Godwin, earl of Kent, for deſtroying the two ſons of Ethelred. Incurs the hatred of his ſubjects. His death and character.

A. D. 1036. CANUTE, ſome time before his death, made a will, by which he appointed his ſon Hardicanute to the throne of Denmark, and Sweyn to that of Norway, leaving the crown of England to Harold. But this was contrary to the treaty made between him and Richard duke of Normandy at the time of his marriage with Emma, in which it was ſtipulated that the crown ſhould be ſettled on the iſſue of ſuch marriage. In conſequence of this a great diſſention took place among the people, the Engliſh declaring for Hardicanute, and the Danes for Harold. At length, however, the diſpute was terminated by a general aſſembly of the ſtates, in which it was agreed that the kingdom ſhould be divided between them. Accordingly, all the country on the north ſide of the Thames was allotted to Harold, and the reſt of the kingdom to Hardicanute. But as the latter was then in Denmark, it was ſtipulated, that Emma, the queen-mother, aſſiſted by earl Godwin, ſhould govern his part of the kingdom during his abſence.

But this diviſion of the kingdom was far from being agreeable to Harold, who reſolved, if poſſible, to make himſelf maſter of the whole. He knew that Godwin was the only perſon capable of fruſtrating his deſigns, and took an effectual method to gain him over to his intereſt. Avarice was the ruling paſſion of that powerful nobleman, and Harold determined to gratify it. He accordingly ſeized the treaſures of his father Canute, and giving the greater part to Godwin, he abandoned the intereſt of Hardicanute, and embracing that of his rival, Harold was declared king of England.

This was a mortifying ſtroke to Emma, who now formed a ſcheme for obtaining the throne for one of her two ſons by Ethelred, namely, Alfred or Edward, who were then at the court of Normandy. But to prevent any ſuſpicion of her deſigns, ſhe appeared perfectly ſatisfied with her ſituation, and dedicated her time to acts of piety and devotion.

The firſt ſtep Emma took towards facilitating her intentions was, to requeſt of Harold that her ſons might be permitted to viſit her, which being readily granted, ſhe wrote a letter to Normandy, and they immediately embarked, with proper retinues, for England. But they had no ſooner arrived than Godwin, judging the true intent of their viſit, hinted his ſuſpicions to Harold, who ſeemed greatly alarmed, and readily complied with a propoſal made by Godwin, to get them into their hands, and put them to death.

Emma, being apprehenſive leſt ſome evil deſign might be formed againſt her ſons, never permitted them to be both abſent at the ſame time; for while one was paying his viſits to the nobility, ſhe carefully kept the other at home. At length Harold took the opportunity of inviting both princes to ſpend ſome days at his court. This was a very diſagreeable circumſtance to Emma, who, however, made an excuſe for keeping Edward with her, and ſending Alfred only. Godwin went to meet the young prince and his train on the road to London, and paid him ſuch an apparent reſpect that his Norman attendants were highly delighted; but on a ſudden they were ſtopped at Guildford-caſtle, and compelled to enter, under pretence of taking ſome refreſhment. Their fears did but anticipate their fate; for the eyes of young Alfred were put out, and all his attendants cruelly murdered. The unhappy prince was ſent to the monaſtery of Ely, where he ſoon after died; but whether of grief or ſome farther violence is unknown. In conſequence of this treacherous act, Edward haſtily quitted the kingdom, and fled to Normandy; and Emma, being ordered to leave the country, retired to the court of Baldwin, earl of Flanders, who received her with great cordiality, and aſſigned Bruges for the place of her reſidence.

A. D. 1038. Harold was now fully eſtabliſhed on the throne of England, and to prevent any attempts that might be made to his prejudice in future, he fitted out a powerful fleet for the protection of his coaſts, to ſupport which he laid a heavy tax on his ſubjects. But the people paid this tax with great regret, becauſe they conceived it was principally intended to oppoſe the attempts of Edward, whom they deemed the lawful heir to the throne.

A. D. 1040. The natural tyranny of Harold, and his frequent acts of cruelty, procured him the hatred of his ſubjects; and he would certainly have been dethroned had not death ſuddenly taken him off on the 18th of May, to the great ſatisfaction of the principal part of his ſubjects.

Harold had not the leaſt pretenſions to any of the good qualities of his father. He was headſtrong, brutal and cruel, paying no regard to morality or the principles of piety. His vices have been handed down to us in the moſt odious colours; but his virtues, if he had any, are buried in oblivion. He was ſurnamed Harefoot, from the amazing rapidity with which he walked, and in which he is ſaid not to have had any equal.

CHAP. XVIII.

HARDICANUTE, or CANUTE II.

Hardicanute aſcends the throne of England. Orders the body of his brother to be taken up, and thrown into the Thames. Acts with great cruelty to his ſubjects. Is guilty of intemperance, which occaſions his death.

A. D. 1040. AS ſoon as Hardicanute heard of the death of Harold he immediately embarked for England, and landed at Sandwich on the 13th of June, amidſt the univerſal acclamations of the people. The Engliſh and Danes vied with each other who ſhould evince the moſt profound reſpect for their new ſovereign, whoſe proper name was Canute; but he acquired the appellation of Hardy from the uncommon ſtrength of his conſtitution.

The Engliſh promiſed themſelves great happineſs under the reign of this prince; but they ſoon found themſelves miſtaken, for no ſooner was he placed on the throne, than he committed an act ſhocking to humanity. He ordered the dead body of his brother Harold to be dug up, the head cut off, and the carcaſe thrown into the Thames. Theſe orders were ſtrictly obeyed, but the body, being afterwards found by ſome fiſhermen, was delivered to the Danes, who buried it in the church of St. Clement Danes in the Strand. The king, being informed of this, ordered it to be a ſecond time dug up, and caſt again into the river; but being afterwards found once more, it was carried privately to Weſtminſter, and there interred.

The next act that marked the character of this prince was, the impoſition of a heavy tax on his ſubjects, for defraying the expence of the navy that had brought him to England; a circumſtance the more cruel, as the kingdom was at that time threatened with a famine. So untimed a tax produced univerſal diſcontent throughout the nation; and at Worceſter two perſons were killed who were employed to collect it. This circumſtance ſo enraged the king, that he ſent Godwin, and two other noblemen, with a body of forces, againſt Worceſter, who firſt plundered, and then reduced the city to aſhes.

A. D. 1041. In the beginning of this year Edward, the ſon of Emma, left Normandy, and came to England, in order to learn the manners of a people whom he hoped, ſome time or other, to preſide over. Edward met with a very welcome reception, and it was not long before he demanded juſtice againſt Godwin, (as ſuppoſed at the inſtigation of his mother) for being concerned in the murder of his brother Alfred. The accuſer was the archbiſhop of York, and the king did not ſeem to have any objection to bringing the offender to trial; but Godwin, who well knew the diſpoſition of the king, made a well-timed appeal to his avarice; for ſoon after he was cited to anſwer the charge, he ſent the king a magnificent preſent of a ſuperb galley, carved and gilt in a very curious manner, and rowed by eighty men, each of whom wore a golden bracelet on his arm of the weight of ſixteen ounces. This ſplendid bribe anſwered the propoſed end: the earl was permitted to exculpate himſelf upon oath, nor did he make any ſcruple to ſwear, that he had no concern in the death of Alfred.

A. D. 1042. The great partiality* ſhewn by Hardicanute to the Danes rendered him univerſally hated by the Engliſh, whom he ſo oppreſſed that they had reaſon to conſider him more as an enemy than a king. But fortunately for them he did not long wield the ſcepter. He fell a martyr to the vices of his countrymen, namely, drunkenneſs and gluttony; for being at Lambeth celebrating the nuptials of a Daniſh nobleman, he drank to ſuch exceſs that it terminated his life on the 18th of June, after an inglorious reign of only two years. The Engliſh, in deriſion to his memory, uſed to commemorate the day of his death as an holiday, and to diſtinguiſh it by the name of Hog-Wedneſday, in alluſion to the immoderate luxury of this prince, whoſe palace was one continued ſcene of gluttony and drunkenneſs.

CHAP.

* It is ſaid, that in conſequence of the king's great partiality to the Danes, they became ſo inſolent during his reign, that if an Engliſhman met a Dane on a bridge, he was obliged to wait in a ſubmiſſive poſture till the other had paſſed him. And we are farther told, that the cuſtom of pledging each other when we drink had its riſe at this period; becauſe the Danes would frequently ſtab Engliſhmen while drinking, ſo that no one choſe to drink in the preſence of a Dane, without another perſon pledging himſelf for his perſonal ſecurity.

CHAP. XIX.

EDWARD, ſurnamed the CONFESSOR.*

Edward, by the intereſt of earl Godwin, is elected king, and crowned at Wincheſter. Begins his reign with acts of cruelty to his mother. Shews a partial attachment to the Normans, Quarrels with earl Godwin, and baniſhes him the kingdom. Aboliſhes the tax called Dane-gelt. Receives a viſit from William duke of Normandy. Is reconciled to earl Godwin. Aſſiſts Malcolm king of Scotland in the recovery of his dominions. Quells a diſturbance among the Welſh. Privately appoints William duke of Normandy his ſucceſſor. Rebuilds the abbey at Weſtminſter. His death and character.

A. D. 1042. AT the time of Hardicanute's death, Edward, the ſon of Ethelred II. by Emma, was the only perſon in the kingdom who had any kind of pretenſion to the crown of England, and indeed the only one whom the Engliſh wiſhed to be their ſovereign. But Edward was fearful of meeting with ſome difficulties from Sweyn, the ſon of Canute, who was then in Norway. To avoid this he ſolicited the protection of earl Godwin, the moſt powerful man in the kingdom; and though it was but a few months before that Edward demanded legal juſtice againſt him, yet the earl promiſed to eſpouſe his cauſe, on condition of his ſwearing to marry his daughter Editha.

This being agreed to by Edward, the earl immediately ſummoned a convention of the nobles for the election of a king; who being met, he expatiated on the miſeries the kingdom had ſuffered from the Danes, and then, taking the prince by the hand, addreſſed them in words to this effect: "Behold your king! this is prince Edward, the ſon of king Ethelred and queen Emma, and to him I pay my allegiance." In conſequence of this Edward was unanimouſly elected king, though the ceremony of his coronation, on account of a dearth which then prevailed, was poſtponed till the enſuing year, when it was ſolemnized with great pomp at Wincheſter.

A. D. 1043. Edward began his reign with an act which was far from being to his credit either as a man or a king. He firſt ſeized all the lands held by his mother from the crown, after which he repaired to Wincheſter, and ſtripping her of all her treaſures and effects, left her only a very moderate penſion for her ſubſiſtence. Not ſatisfied with this, he ſoon after accuſed her of a criminal correſpondence with Alwin, biſhop of Wincheſter. Her oſtenſible impeacher was Robert the Norman, who was afterwards archbiſhop of Canterbury; but he not having any evidence to make good his allegations, inſiſted upon her undergoing the fire ordeal, in order to purge herſelf from the imputation. This being accepted by Emma, ſhe walked blindfold over nine red-hot plough-ſhares without receiving the leaſt injury, to the great confuſion of her accuſers, and the aſtoniſhment of the ſpectators.†

A. D. 1044. Edward was now alarmed at receiving intelligence that Sweyn, king of Denmark, the ſon of Canute the Great, was making preparations for invading England, in order to aſſert his right to the crown. On this important occaſion earl Godwin acted with great ſpirit and diligence: he put the Engliſh fleet upon a reſpectable footing, ordered thirty-five ſail of large ſhips to rendezvous at Sandwich, and even perſuaded Edward (who was one of the moſt unwarlike kings that ever ſat upon a throne) to repair on board, and take upon himſelf the command. It was Godwin's intent to prevent the Danes from landing by attacking their fleet at ſea; but the expedition was rendered abortive by an unexpected incident, Sweyn, inſtead of invading England, being obliged to ſtay at home, in order to defend his own territories from the invaſion of Magnus, king of Norway, who had entered his dominions with a formidable army.

All danger being now over, and England happily enjoying peace, Edward determined to fulfil his promiſe made to earl Godwin, and accordingly married his daughter Editha: but the marriage was never conſummated, though ſhe was equally diſtinguiſhed for the beauty of her perſon, and the graces of her mind.

A. D. 1045. At this time the Engliſh coaſts were greatly infeſted by Daniſh pirates, and twenty-five ſail of their veſſels arriving at Sandwich, the terrors of the Engliſh began afreſh; for the pirates not only plundered the country, but even ſeized on ſome of the inhabitants, whom they carried abroad, and ſold as ſlaves: but earl Godwin, with the dukes Leofric and Siward, ſoon took ſuch ſteps as ſecured the people on the coaſt from any farther danger.

After this a variety of incidents rapidly followed each other to produce a rupture between the king and Godwin. Sweyn, one of the earl's ſons, having carried off and debauched the abbeſs of Leominſter in Herefordſhire, was baniſhed the kingdom; on which he retired to Denmark, and fitting out a fleet of ſhips committed ſeveral outrages on the Engliſh coaſts. He afterwards murdered earl Bearn, who had kindly undertaken to procure his pardon from Edward. Theſe enormous crimes rendered him rather an object of deteſtation than of mercy; but the great power of his father, joined with the intereſt of ſeveral of the prelates and principal nobility, procured his pardon, and he returned to England.

A. D.

* Edward is ſaid to have taken his ſurname from his great piety; but how far he merited that epithet will be found in the ſequel. His canonization as a ſaint did not take place till many years after his death, when pope Alexander III. gave him the diſtinguiſhed title of Confeſſor.

† Many modes of trial, equally ſingular with this, are, at this day, uſed in various countries, particularly in Africa, where perſons are tried by means of a liquor called Bonda, which the criminal is obliged to drink. If he is ſo far inebriated as to fall down in a ſtate of inſenſibility, he is pronounced guilty, and immediately dragged to execution; but if, after drinking, he is capable of ſtanding upright, he is declared innocent.

A. D. 1046. The people in general were highly pleaſed with the conduct of Edward on this occaſion; but he ſoon forfeited their eſteem by the great attention he paid to foreigners. Being educated at the court of Normandy, he had formed ſtrong attachments to the manners and cuſtoms peculiar to that country. In conſequence of this his court was filled with Normans, on whom were beſtowed the principal poſts of honour and profit both in church and ſtate; and their intereſt was ſoon ſo great that no favour was to be obtained from Edward but by their intereceſſion. Godwin perceived their influence and was alarmed for the conſequence. He remonſtrated with the king on the impropriety of his conduct, but in vain; Edward continued firm to his attachments, which ſo irritated Godwin that he determined to take the firſt favourable opportunity of ſhewing his reſentment.

Nor was it long before an opportunity offered. Euſtace, count of Boulogne, having paid a viſit to the king, ſet out for Dover on his return to his own dominions. One of his ſervants, who was ſent before to provide lodgings in the town, behaving in a very inſolent manner, a fray enſued, in which the ſervant loſt his life. Exaſperated at this Euſtace and his attendants broke open the houſe where the fray happened, the maſter of which fell a victim to his reſentment. The town was now alarmed, and a general fray took place, in which twenty of the inhabitants were killed, and nineteen of the count's ſervants. After the fray was over Euſtace returned to Edward, and demanded juſtice; upon which the king, allowing the validity of his claim, ordered Godwin, who was then governor of Dover, to march immediately at the head of a body of troops, and chaſtiſe the inhabitants. But Godwin peremptorily refuſed to obey the king's orders. He boldly told him that, as earl of Kent, it was his duty to protect the very people he was ordered to puniſh: that the laws of England did not admit of ſubjects being condemned unheard; and that the only method of adjuſting the affair was by legal trial.

Edward conſidered the boldneſs of Godwin as an inſult on majeſty, and ſeverely reprimanded him for his diſobedience. But Godwin was not to be intimidated by the frowns of power: he refuſed to obey the king's orders, chuſing rather to hazard his own ſafety than inflict puniſhment on the innocent, or ſacrifice the liberties of his country at the ſhrine of foreign inſolence.

A. D. 1048. Though Edward did not think proper to inſiſt any farther on his orders being obeyed, yet he determined to puniſh Godwin for his behaviour. Nor was it long before an opportunity offered for executing his deſign. The Welſh had made inroads into the Engliſh territories, of which Sweyn, one of the earl's ſons, was governor, who, with his father Godwin, raiſed a powerful army to oppoſe them. Edward ſummoned a meeting of the nobility at Glouceſter to enquire into the cauſe of theſe diſorders, when it was repreſented by the enemies of Godwin, that he and his ſon had been the aggreſſors. In conſequence of this, Edward determined to wreak his vengeance not only on the earl but his his whole family; and accordingly, having cited them to appear before the council, and they refuſing to obey the ſummons, he baniſhed them the kingdom. Godwin himſelf retired to the court of Baldwin earl of Flanders, and his ſon Harold went to Ireland. But Edward's reſentment did not ſtop here: he ſhewed it in a conſpicuous manner to his amiable conſort, the daughter of Godwin, whom he ſtripped of every thing valuable, and then immured her within the walls of a monaſtery.

A. D. 1050. Edward having, by his ſtrong attachment to foreigners, incurred the general hatred of the Engliſh, determined now to do ſomething that might gain their affections. The tax, known by the name of Danegelt, had long been a very heavy burthen to them. The reaſons which originally rendered it neceſſary had ceaſed for many years, but the impoſt was ſtill continued. Edward, therefore, perſuaded that he could not perform an action more acceptable to his people, totally aboliſhed this tax, and diſtributed all the ſurplus of what had been collected, which then remained in the treaſury, among the different diſtricts from whence it had been gathered.

A. D. 1051. In the beginning of this year William, duke of Normandy, paid a viſit to Edward, and was received with the warmeſt marks of gratitude. He had protected and ſupported Edward in his exile, and merited a ſuitable return. The duke was highly ſatisfied with his reception, and returned to Normandy, loaded with preſents. Soon after William's departure Emma, the king's mother, paid the debt of nature, and her remains were interred at Wincheſter.

A. D. 1052. During theſe tranſactions Godwin had obtained from the earl of Flanders a powerful ſquadron, and being joined by his ſon Harold with another fleet from Ireland, they committed ſome depredations on the Engliſh coaſts, after which they ſailed up the river Thames, and advancing near London, threw the inhabitants into the utmoſt confuſion. The king ſeemed determined to oppoſe them with ſuch ſhips as could be haſtily got together; but his council objected againſt this proceeding as bordering on raſhneſs, and adviſed him to make uſe of more gentle methods to induce Godwin to return to his obedience. The earl, being informed of the ſentiments of the council, ſent a very humble meſſage to Edward, proteſting, in the ſtrongeſt manner, that he had no other intention than that of ſubmitting his actions to a fair trial, nor wiſhed for any thing more than that of being reſtored to his honours and eſtates. In conſequence of this, and the powerful intercеſſion of the nobility, Edward agreed to pardon Godwin, who accordingly gave hoſtages for his future good behaviour; but Edward not thinking his own power ſufficient to ſecure them, they were ſent to the court of Normandy.

From this period the earl's power and influence became much more conſiderable than before; and thoſe foreigners, who had long baſked in the ſunſhine of royalty, were, by his means, baniſhed the kingdom. But Godwin did not long ſurvive his reſtoration. He was ſuddenly deprived of the faculty of ſpeech as he ſat at dinner with the king, in which ſtate he continued for three days, and then expired *.

On

* There are two accounts given of the immediate cauſe of Godwin's death. One is, that he died of an apoplectic fit; and the other, that while the king was ſpeaking of his brother Alfred, in terms reproachful to the earl, the latter wiſhed a piece of bread he was about to ſwallow might be his laſt if he was any way acceſſary to the death of that prince, and that he was

On the death of Godwin, his eldeſt ſon Harold, who far ſurpaſſed him in abilities, ſucceeded to all his authority, and proved an equal ſupport to the Engliſh againſt the Norman intereſt. By his great affability and addreſs, he gained the particular friendſhip of Edward, and both the nobility and people were firmly attached to his intereſt.

A. D. 1054. Peace and tranquillity now prevailed in England, but the kingdom of Scotland was involved in terror and confuſion, owing to the ambition of Macbeth, who had driven Malcolm from his dominions, and uſurped the ſovereignty. The unfortunate Malcolm applied to Edward for ſupport againſt the tyrant of his country; and that prince, thinking it a duty incumbent on kings to aſſiſt royalty in diſtreſs, ſent 10,000 men, under the command of Siward, earl of Northumberland, to drive the uſurper from the throne. Siward, who was one of the moſt intrepid generals of the age, immediately joined his forces to thoſe under the command of Macduff, the Scottiſh commander, and marched againſt the rebels. A deſperate battle enſued, in which Macbeth was totally defeated, and obliged to fly to the mountains for ſhelter; and Malcolm was re-placed on the Scottiſh throne. Siward, ſoon after, paid the debt of nature, and Tofti, by the intereſt of his brother Harold, was made earl of Northumberland.

A. D. 1056. The Welſh had, for ſome time, made frequent inroads into the Engliſh territories, and committed the moſt horrid depredations on the inhabitants. Alfegar, ſon of the duke of Mercia, and brother-in-law to Harold, held a treaſonable correſpondence with the inſurgents, and being found guilty of the crime, was declared an out-law, and baniſhed the kingdom. In conſequence of this he immediately repaired to Ireland, where he ſoon raiſed a large body of forces, and landing in Wales, joined the army of Griffith, prince of that country. Theſe combined troops ſoon after defeated a body of Edward's forces, and then marching into Herefordſhire, entered the capital of that county, maſſacred the inhabitants, and reduced the whole city to aſhes. Exaſperated at theſe inhuman proceedings, Edward diſpatched Harold, at the head of a body of forces, to chaſtiſe the inſurgents. The abilities of the Engliſh general ſtruck the invaders with terror: they fled into South-Wales, and applied, in the moſt ſubmiſſive manner, to Edward for peace. Their requeſt was accordingly granted, and the tranquillity of the country reſtored; ſoon after which, Alfegar, at the interceſſion of Harold, received a pardon, and was reſtored to his eſtates and honours.

A. D. 1057. The greatneſs of Harold's merit, and his diſtinguiſhed popularity among the people, excited the jealouſy of Edward, who, having no children of his own, was deſirous of ſettling the ſucceſſion to the crown, in order, if poſſible, to prevent the horrors of a civil war. To effect this he ſent to Hungary for his nephew Edward, the ſon of Edmund Ironſide, who accordingly arrived in England with his two daughters; but he did not long ſurvive his arrival; and Edgar Atheling, the ſon of that prince, was too young to ſucceed to the government.

Edward, being thus diſappointed in his deſign, turned his thoughts towards his kinſman William duke of Normandy, who had ſufficiently eſtabliſhed his reputation for prudence and intrepidity. Secrecy was abſolutely neceſſary to procure ſucceſs, and it was accordingly obſerved with the greateſt caution. Edward, in the moſt private manner, tranſmitted his deſign to William, who received the intelligence with pleaſure, and eagerly embraced the flattering hopes of adorning his brow with the Engliſh diadem.

A. D. 1058. Some time after this Harold requeſted permiſſion of Edward to make a voyage to Normandy, in order to obtain the enlargement of his brother Ulnoth and his nephew Hacun, who had been delivered among the hoſtages for the good behaviour of Godwin, but were ſtill in confinement at that court. This requeſt was exceeding diſagreeable to Edward, who, fearful that Harold might diſcover what had paſſed between him and the duke, refuſed to give his conſent. Harold, however, reſolved to take that liberty which Edward would not grant, and accordingly embarked for Normandy; but a violent ſtorm overtook him in his paſſage, and he was driven into one of the ports of Picardy, in the government of the count of Ponthieu, who detained him priſoner at his court, and demanded a very exorbitant ſum for his ranſom. In this ſituation he wrote a letter to William who ordered the count to ſet him at liberty; in conſequence of which he repaired immediately to Rouen, where he was received by the duke with the greateſt marks of eſteem.

William was charmed with the noble qualities of his illuſtrious gueſt; and Harold had the addreſs to perſuade him that he had undertaken the voyage merely from his great regard to the Norman court, and his ſtrong inclinations to enter into ſuch engagements with William, as might prove advantageous to their mutual intereſts. In conſequence of this William communicated to Harold his deſigns upon the crown of England, and the ſecret contract between him and Edward on that ſubject; at the ſame time, as he was not ignorant of Harold's views, gave him to underſtand that he expected he would reſign his pretenſions. The earl, who had never ſuſpected any ſuch colluſion between the king and the duke, now found himſelf on the brink of a precipice, and that the only method of preventing his deſtruction was, to diſſemble his ſentiments. He therefore, with the greateſt appearance of candour, acknowledged he had entertained thoughts of aſpiring to the crown before the arrival of prince Edward from Hungary, but would now readily promiſe to join his intereſt in behalf of William; and, to cement their friendſhip, propoſed marrying his daughter. The duke, being highly pleaſed with his frank manner of deportment, conſented to his propoſal, and after Harold had confirmed his promiſe by an oath before the ſtates of Normandy, he was betrothed to his daughter, who was then too young for the conſummation of the marriage.

Both parties now appearing perfectly ſatisfied, Harold returned with his hoſtages to England, whither he had no ſooner arrived than he took was choaked by the bread ſticking in his throat. But it is the opinion of moſt hiſtorians, that he died of an apoplectic fit, and that this ſtory was made by the Norman writers in after-times to degrade the character of a man who had been ſuch an inveterate enemy to their countrymen.

every opportunity of encreasing the national prejudices against the Normans, and of strengthening his own party, among the nobles, as the surest methods of baffling the duke's designs. Edward perceived his intentions, but took no pains to counteract his projects, having no connexions that he valued above his own peace and tranquillity, which he determined, if possible, to preserve during the remainder of his days.

A. D. 1063. A circumstance now happened greatly in favour of Harold, as it recommended him still more to the affections of the people. The Welsh had again made inroads on the English territories, and committed the most horrid depredations on the inabitants. Harold marched at the head of a body of forces to repel the insurgents, and such was his success that he obliged them to dethrone their king Griffith, and to become tributary to England. But the Welsh soon after restored their king; upon which Harold harrassed marched at the head of his forces, and terrified them in such a manner that they sent him the head of Griffith as a token of their submission.

During these transactions the Northumbrians, being greatly oppressed by earl (Tosti, the brother of Harold,) expelled him the county. In consequence of this Harold, by the king's command, marched to chastise them. The Northumbrians met Harold at Northampton, and convinced him that their behaviour had originated not from rebellious principles, but those of self-defence; for that the conduct of their governor had been so rapacious as not to be endured. Harold represented the matter to the king in its genuine light, and procured a pardon for the Northumbrians; after which Morcar, son of the duke of Mercia, was appointed their governor.* This circumstance procured Harold the entire confidence of the people in the north, and greatly contributed to his future advancement.

A. D. 1065. While Harold was pursuing every measure for ingratiating himself into the affections of the people, Edward, who now stooped under the weight of age and infirmities, was employing his time in acts of devotion. He had, for some years, vowed to undertake a pilgrimage to Rome; but not being able to perform it, obtained the pope's dispensation, on condition of rebuilding the abbey of Westminster, which had been entirely destroyed by the Danes. † This work engaged his whole attention, and on its being finished, he summoned a general council of the nation to confirm the charter he had granted to that edifice. By this charter he exempted it from all episcopal jurisdiction, settled large revenues on it, and granted it the privileges of a sanctuary. He attended, with great devotion, the dedication of this religious structure, and seemed to be re-animated on that solemn occasion. But this was the last action of Edward's reign. He was soon after seized with a violent fever, which put an end to his life on the 5th of January, in the 24th year of his reign; and his remains, pursuant to his own request, were interred in the abbey he had so lately consecrated.

Though Edward had been married many years, yet he never cohabited with his queen, and this continence, from whatever cause it proceeded, occasioned him afterwards to be ranked among the saints.

With respect to the general character of Edward, it must be acknowledged that he had but few virtues, nor any very atrocious vices. The principal among the former was his strict attention to the administration of justice. He compiled a body of excellent laws, which he collected from those of Ethelbert, Ina, and Alfred. This compilation, though now lost, was long the object of the peoples attention, and the various laws contained in it were strictly observed throughout the kingdom.

Edward the Confessor was the first monarch who touched for the King's Evil. The opinion of his sanctity procured belief to this cure among the people; and his successors regarded it as a part of their power and grandeur to support the same opinion. This practice however, has been long laid aside, as it was attended with ridicule in the eyes of all men of understanding.

CHAP. XX.

HAROLD II.

Harold is crowned king of England. Acts with great prudence, and is beloved by his subjects. Is opposed by William duke of Normandy. Battle of Hastings. Death of Harold.

A. D. 1066. HAROLD, by his judicious conduct, had so effectually gained the affections of the people, that on the death of Edward he was immediately declared his successor. The title of Edgar Atheling, to whom the crown should have descended, was not even mentioned, much less the claim of the duke of Normandy, who had, indeed, no other title than the intentions of Edward in his favour. Harold, therefore, having assembled the council, was unanimously chosen to the sovereignty, and the day following Edward's death was crowned king by Aldred, archbishop of York.

The first steps taken by Harold after his accession was, to pursue such measures as were most likely to secure the affections of his people. He accordingly eased them of several oppressive taxes, listened to their complaints, and dispensed justice with an impartial hand. He knew that Edgar Atheling was beloved by his people, as the only remaining heir of their antient kings: he therefore took him under his immediate protection, created him earl of Oxford, and caused him to be educated in such a manner as if he had a serious intention of his succeeding to the crown when he should arrive at years of maturity. By these prudent

* From this time Tosti bore an implacable hatred to his brother Harold, and it is recorded that he took the following cruel method of shewing his resentment. Going to his brother's country-house with his attendants, he killed some of his domestics, cut their bodies into pieces, barrelled them up, and sent them as a present to Harold, immediately after which he fled, with the utmost expedition, to Flanders.

† This edifice was taken down by Henry III. who erected the present magnificent structure (which was fifty years in building) in its stead, except that part which was afterwards added to it by Henry VII. and called Henry the VIIth's chapel.

dent measures Harold secured the affections of the Engliſh, who conſidered him at once as their father and their king.

But while Harold was thus employed in ſettling the domeſtic tranquillity of the nation, he was interrupted by his brother Tofti, who having obtained ſome ſhips and troops from the earl of Flanders, made a deſcent on, and plundered the Iſle of Wight; after which he proceeded to Sandwich, but hearing that Harold was preparing to march againſt him, he ſailed northwards, and in his way pillaged the coaſt till he arrived in Lincolnſhire. Here he landed, and committed the moſt horrid depredations on the inhabitants; but was met by the joint forces of the earls of Northumberland and Mercia, when a ſharp battle enſued, in which Tofti was defeated, and obliged to retire to his ſhips with conſiderable loſs.

After this defeat Tofti left the coaſt, and ſailed to Norway, where he found Harfagar, the king of that country, making preparations for invading England, to which he had been induced by William duke of Normandy, who thought it might facilitate his long intended project of attempting the conqueſt of Britain. Tofti and Harfagar having united their forces, which conſiſted of three hundred ſhips, ſet ſail for England, and entering the Humber, landed in Yorkſhire, where they committed the moſt violent depredations, and at length poſſeſſed themſelves of the city of York. Harold advanced, at the head of an army, againſt the enemy, whom he met at Stanford-bridge on the river Derwent. A deſperate battle enſued, which was fought with great obſtinacy on both ſides, till at length victory declared in favour of Harold, and the two leaders, Harfagar and Tofti, fell among the ſlain. But this defeat, though glorious to Harold, was attended with fatal conſequences: he loſt many of his braveſt officers and ſoldiers in the action, and diſguſted the reſt by refuſing to divide among them the ſpoils taken from the enemy, which he reſerved to ſupply the exigencies of the ſtate.

During theſe tranſactions William, duke of Normandy, ſent ambaſſadors to Harold, demanding that he ſhould reſign the crown in his favour, and threatening, in caſe of refuſal, that he would declare war againſt him. Harold told the ambaſſadors that the duke had no right to the crown; that if he had engaged himſelf in his intereſt by an oath, it was extorted from him, and that he was determined to ſupport his right againſt all oppoſition. This anſwer ſo enraged the duke that he made immediate preparations for invading the kingdom, in which he was greatly aſſiſted by the princes of the neighbouring ſtates, particularly the court of Bretagne, who ſent him a body of five thouſand men under the command of his eldeſt ſon. But what tended ſtill more to render his deſign ſucceſsful was, the pope's declaration in his favour. He ſent him a conſecrated banner, and publiſhed a bull, declaring the juſtice of his cauſe, and animating all the Chriſtian powers to aſſiſt him in his attempt on the Engliſh throne. In conſequence of this Harold was declared a perjured uſurper, and every perſon excommunicated who dared to oppoſe the armies of Normandy. But ſtill the great ſupport of war was wanted. William was poſſeſſed of very little treaſure, and the ſtates abſolutely refuſed to grant the prodigious ſums he required. The wealth of individuals, however ſupplied what the ſtates had refuſed, and William was ſoon enabled to collect a fleet of three thouſand ſail, and an army of forty thouſand men, a force which he imagined ſufficient to enable him to effect his intended purpoſes.

With this powerful armament William ſet ſail from Normandy, and on the 29th of September landed, without oppoſition, at Pevenſey in Suſſex. The duke himſelf, as he leaped on ſhore, happened to fall; upon which, fearful that his troops might think it a bad omen, he graſped a handful of the ſoil, and riſing with great agility, and extending his arm, called out, "Thus I take poſſeſſion of the country." Having refreſhed his troops, he ſent back his fleet to Normandy, to convince his followers that they had no hope but conqueſt, and then proceeded by the ſea ſide to Haſtings, where he erected a fort, and publiſhed a manifeſto, declaring the motives by which he had been induced to engage in the expedition.

As ſoon as it was known that the Normans had landed, a general alarm took place throughout the kingdom. Forces were immediately raiſed to join the army of Harold, who was then at York, and who immediately haſtened with all expedition to London. Immediately on his arrival a council of war was called, when ſeveral of Harold's officers were for deferring a battle, alledging, that if he acted only on the defenſive, as the winter was approaching, the enemy would, in all probability, be ſoon reduced to the neceſſity of leaving the kingdom. But Harold was deaf to all advice, and a reſolution was taken to engage the Norman army. In conſequence of this Gyrth, the king's youngeſt brother, a nobleman poſſeſſed of great courage and wiſdom, endeavoured to diſſuade Harold from the reſolution of expoſing his perſon in battle. "Let us not, ſaid he, venture upon one chance of war the liberties of England, the properties of Engliſhmen, and the fortunes of our families. Reſerve yourſelf for better times. While you are ſafe, the enemy can never be ſaid to conquer; but on your perſon the fate of our country depends. Leave me to fight with the Norman; and I will take care to diſcharge the duty of a brother, a general, and a ſubject. If I ſucceed it is in a good cauſe: if I fall, it is with a quiet conſcience; while, in either caſe, you will ſurvive to reap the glory, or to repair the misfortune." But Harold was inflexible to this advice: he determined to give the enemy battle in perſon, and riſk his crown on the fortune of a ſingle day.

In conſequence of this reſolution Harold marched, at the head of his forces, within ſight of the Norman army, when William, having poſted himſelf on an advantageous ſpot, ſent a meſſenger to Harold, offering to decide the conteſt by ſingle combat, that it might ſpare the effuſion of much blood: but this challenge Harold refuſed, telling the meſſenger that he would leave the event to the God of armies.

All negotiations were now at an end, and the hour was approaching which was to put a final period to the diſpute between the two powerful armies. The night preceding the battle was ſpent in a very different manner by the contending parties. The Normans paſſed it in prayer; but the Engliſh in riot and diſſipation. The dawn, however, put a period to their reſpective exerciſes, and both armies prepared for battle.

The fight began with equal fury and bravery on each ſide; but the Engliſh ſoon obliged the enemy to retire. The Normans, however, returned to the charge, and were again driven back by the Engliſh. The battle continued the whole day, and victory, more than once, ſeemed to declare in favour of Harold. The abilities of the two commanders, and the valour of their troops, were equal. Liberty animated the Engliſh; glory, blended with deſpair, the Normans. The former knew, that every thing they held dear depended on their valour: the latter, that a retreat was impoſſible. William flew from rank to rank, from ſquadron to ſquadron, animating his troops by his words, and encouraging them by his example. Harold, with equal ſpirit, and with ſuperior ſucceſs, oppoſed him. William, perceiving his danger, had recourſe to a ſtratagem which was attended with ſucceſs: he ordered his men to make a haſty retreat, which drawing the Engliſh from their ranks, he ſuddenly faced about, and returning to the charge with freſh fury, repulſed the purſuers, with great ſlaughter. The Engliſh, however, regained the advantageous ground they had quitted, and again bid defiance to the attacks of the enemy. At laſt Harold and his two brothers were ſlain at the head of their forces, and the ſoldiers having loſt their leaders, fled from the field of battle. Above ſixty thouſand of the Engliſh fell in this dreadful conteſt; and William purchaſed the victory with the loſs of fifteen thouſand of his beſt troops.

Thus was gained by William duke of Normandy the great and deciſive victory of Haſtings, after a battle which was fought from morning till ſunſet. The next day the Normans buried their dead on the field of battle, and permitted the Engliſh peaſants to do the like by their deceaſed countrymen. The bodies of Harold and his two brothers were found, and ſent to their mother, who cauſed them to be interred in the abbey at Waltham, which had been founded by Harold.

The Norman writers have traduced the character of Harold, in order to render that of the conqueror more ſplendid, a circumſtance which too often attends a change of fortune. But it muſt be acknowledged that he was a prince poſſeſſed of many virtues. He was humane, generous, affable and intrepid: he was a champion for freedom, and fell in its defence. In ſhort, if we except the injury he did to Edgar Atheling, in excluding that young prince from the throne of his anceſtors, his character is without blemiſh; and from his general conduct while he reigned he appears to have been in all reſpects well qualified to wield the ſcepter with reputation to himſelf, and happineſs to his people.

Harold, by his firſt wife had three ſons, namely, Edmund, Godwin and Magnus, who, on the death of their father, immediately fled to Ireland. By his ſecond wife he had a ſon named Wolf, whom William Rufus afterwards knighted.

The death of Harold put a period to the Anglo-Saxon government, after it had continued above ſix hundred years, from its commencement in the perſon of Hengiſt, the firſt king of Kent.

CHAP. XXI.

Containing a conciſe View of the political government of the Saxons, their Manners, Cuſtoms, Laws, &c.

ON the death of Harold (the laſt of the Anglo-Saxon kings) the throne was filled by a ſtranger; and new laws, new cuſtoms, and even a new conſtitution, were introduced, inſtead of thoſe which had been obſerved by the Saxons. It will, therefore, be neceſſary, in this place, to give the reader ſome account of the government, manners, laws, &c. of thoſe people.

The Saxons had no idea of a deſpotic power: liberty was their darling object, and they conſidered a king only as a more diſtinguiſhed citizen, bound by the ſame laws, and ſubject to the ſame cuſtoms, as themſelves. They had no eſtabliſhed rule with regard to the right of ſucceſſion to the crown: the children, indeed, often ſucceeded their father in the ſeat of power; but a ſmall circumſtance was ſufficient to ſet it aſide. All affairs of moment, eccleſiaſtical or civil, were propoſed in the general aſſembly of the nation, called Wittenagemot; and without the conſent of the body, no laws were binding on the ſubject. The biſhops, abbots, and aldermen, or governors of provinces (called earls after the Daniſh invaſion) formed a part of this national council; but whether the repreſentatives of boroughs, or the more wealthy citizens, compoſed the other, cannot be aſcertained.

The Saxons were divided into three claſſes, viz. nobles, freemen and ſlaves. The nobles chiefly reſided on their own eſtates, and were at great expence in maintaining hoſpitality. The greater part of the freemen were their farmers, whoſe buſineſs was chiefly confined to agriculture; and the ſlaves were employed in domeſtic occupations.

With reſpect to the manners of the Saxons, they were, like thoſe of mankind in general, blended with virtue and vice. They were valiant and generous, but at the ſame time intemperate and riotous; nor did they deem drunkenneſs diſgraceful. Their attachment to gaming was ſo great, that many, after having gamed away their property, and even wives and children, would ſtake their own freedom, and run the chance of becoming the ſlave of their antagoniſt. They were addicted to ſudden ſtarts of paſſion, and as ſudden fits of generoſity, and from the ſallies of anger would make haſty tranſitions to the meltings of humanity. They were large in ſtature, robuſt in conſtitution, intrepid in danger, active in emergency, and inured to fatigue; but they were particularly cruel to thoſe whom they made captives by force of arms.

Before the reign of Edmund I. death was never inflicted by the Anglo-Saxon laws, crimes of every kind being compenſated with pecuniary fines. A price was fixed on the head of each perſon according to his rank, even that of the king not excepted. The price of wounds, and the loſs of members was fixed; and was always proportioned to the ſize and danger of the former, and the uſe of the latter.

The Anglo-Saxons had various methods of trial; but that by juries was the moſt prevalent. However, where the crime could not be proved by witneſſes, recourſe was had to the moſt ridiculous methods, equally calculated to puniſh the innocent or the guilty. Theſe were, ſingle combat, and the trial of fire or water, which were called ordeal. The celebrated Monteſquieu, in ſpeaking of theſe ſuperſtitious practices, very juſtly obſerves, that "our anceſtors reſted the honour, the fortune, and the lives of citizens, on circumſtances which depended leſs on reaſon than chance; and frequently made uſe of proofs that could not convict, and which had no manner of connection either with innocence or guilt. How many evils has the culture of reaſon removed, and how many benefits has it procured to mankind!"

The military ſtrength of the nation conſiſted in the militia. Every freeman was under an indiſpenſible neceſſity of arming in defence of the ſtate: he marched to battle under the ſtandard of his lord, and was not to leave the army till the time of his ſervice was expired.

With reſpect to learning it was at a very low ebb during the time of the Saxons. Alfred, indeed, exerted himſelf nobly in defence of literature, as did alſo his ſucceſſor Edward the Elder, the firſt of whom founded the univerſity at Oxford, and the latter that of Cambridge. But their labours were not ſufficient to complete their noble deſigns. The ravages of the Danes deſtroyed the lovely branch which Alfred and his ſon had planted, and ſpread over the whole kingdom a blacker cloud than before.

Before Alfred the moſt diſtinguiſhed perſon for learning was Bede, or Beda, an Engliſh monk. He wrote ſeveral books on theology; but his chief work is an eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, which diſplays a genius and aſſiduity that might, in a more enlightened age, have led to diſcoveries of the moſt important nature.

The moſt learned man of his time after Bede was Aſſer Menevenſis, biſhop of St. David's in the reign of Alfred, whom he greatly aſſiſted in his ſtudies. He wrote ſeveral hiſtorical books, one of which is ſtill extant, and intituled, "Annales Rerum Geſtarum Alfredi Magni." Three editions of this work have been publiſhed; one by archbiſhop Parker, another by Camden, and a third by Wiſe.

St. Dunſtan is ſaid to have been a good muſician, painter and graver; but he has no title to be conſidered as a man of learning.

A. D. 1066. THE fatal iſſue of the battle of Haſtings threw the Engliſh into the utmoſt conſternation. Harold, with his two brothers, were ſlain, and his children had made their eſcape into Ireland. Edgar Atheling, though beloved by the people, as the deſcendant of their antient kings, had neither inclination to take, or capacity to guide, the helm of government. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, indeed, placed him on the throne, and nobly exerted himſelf to reſtore order and ſubordination among a terrified and divided people. But his attempts were fruitleſs: every ſalutary ſcheme was oppoſed; and every meaſure which tended to promote unanimity, and baffle the deſign of the Conqueror, was rendered abortive.

During this perplexed ſtate of affairs among the Engliſh, the victorious William was taking meaſures for renewing the advantage he had already gained, and obtaining that crown to which he had long aſpired. Having refreſhed his forces, he left Haſtings, and marched to Dover, the caſtle of which was full of ſoldiers, who had fled thither after the battle; but ſo great was their conſternation that they immediately delivered up the fortreſs on terms of capitulation.

Having left a ſtrong garriſon in the caſtle, William marched at the head of his victorious army towards London; and the nearer he approached, the greater was the confuſion of the Engliſh. No plan was formed for oppoſing his march, nor was any general choſen to head the troops againſt him. The clergy, inſtead of exerciſing their authority to heal the diviſions, and ſtimulate the people to courage and unanimity, laboured to increaſe the diſorder. Moſt of the dignified eccleſiaſtics were Normans, and therefore juſtified an enterprize which was undertaken by papal authority. The friends to the conſtitution of England perceived it was now too late to ſupport the falling ſtate of their country; that oppoſition would only tend to exaſperate the conqueror, and forge heavier chains for a brave and warlike people. They therefore determined to ſubmit to William, and ſheath the ſword which threatened deſtruction to their country. Accordingly, the primate, the nobility, the principal citizens, and even Edgar Atheling himſelf, repaired to the Norman camp, and entreated him to accept a crown which his great ablities had rendered him worthy of enjoying. In conſequence of this, Chriſtmas-day was fixed for his coronation, which was accordingly performed at Weſtminſter-abbey by Aldred, archbiſhop of York, amidſt the univerſal acclamations of the people *.

A. D. 1017. The firſt ſtep taken by William after his coronation was, to poſſeſs himſelf of the treaſures which had been amaſſed by Harold, and were then depoſited at Wincheſter. With theſe he gave rewards to his followers, diſtributed charities to the monaſteries, ſent preſents to the churches of France, Aquitain and Burgundy, where maſſes had been ſaid for the ſucceſs of his expedition, and remitted large ſums to the pope, with coſtly preſents to the church of St. Peter at Rome. He likewiſe (in order to conciliate the affections of the Engliſh) erected a church and monaſtery in the field where Harold was ſlain. The church was dedicated to St. Martin, and the abbey, which was filled with Benedictine monks, and exempted from epiſcopal juriſdiction, was called Battle-abbey. He granted the citizens of London a new charter, by which all the privileges and immunities that city enjoyed in the reign of Edward the Confeſſor were confirmed. He affected to treat the Engliſh nobility with diſtinguiſhed reſpect, and not only careſſed Edgar Atheling in a particular manner, but granted him large eſtates, and confirmed to him the title of earl of Oxford, which had been conferred on him by Edward the Confeſſor.

From theſe acts of kindneſs the Engliſh flattered themſelves with a long ſeries of domeſtic tranquillity under a wiſe and impartial ſovereign. But they were ſoon convinced of their miſtake. The king ſeized on all the eſtates of thoſe who had joined Harold againſt him, and gave them to the Norman officers. He erected fortreſſes in various parts of the kingdom, and filled them with foreign troops. He diſarmed the people and broke up the militia. Theſe meaſures were very diſagreeable to the Engliſh, who now perceived that William acted rather as a conqueror than a king; and that he appeared to wiſh that power, rather than the affections of his ſubjects, might be the ſupport of his crown.

Having taken theſe neceſſary precautions for the internal ſafety of the kingdom, William determined to gratify his love of ſtate and magnificence, by viſiting his native country, where he doubted not of being welcomed with ſignal marks of congratulation by the neighbouring princes. Accordingly, having appointed his brother Odo (biſhop of Bayeux) and his couſin William Fitz-oſborne (whom he had created earl of Arundel and Hertford) to the joint government of the kingdom, he ſet ſail for Normandy, accompanied by ſuch of the Engliſh nobles, as he ſuſpected might take advantage of his abſence, and foment his new ſubjects to rebellion. On his arrival in Normandy he took up his reſidence in the abbey of Feſcamp, where he was viſited by Rodolph, uncle to the king of France, and a great number of the principal perſons in Normandy and the adjoining provinces, all of whom congratulated him on his acceſſion to the throne of England.

But while William was receiving theſe honours in Normandy, all the precautions he had taken to ſecure the tranquillity of England were fruſtrated. Odo and Fitzoſborne exerciſed the power inveſted in them with ſuch intolerable oppreſſion and rapacity as juſtly provoked the general indignation of the people, and urged them to take up arms in vindication of their violated rights. The people of Kent, after repeated remonſtrances to Odo, ſupplicated the aſſiſtance of Euſtace, count of Boulogne, who ſoon after landed a body of forces in the neighbourhood of Dover, which effecting a junction with the Kentiſhmen, they made an attack upon the garriſon of that place, during the abſence of the governor. But the Norman being timely apprized of the intended aſſault, had the fort put in a ſtate of defence, and the aſſailants were repulſed with great ſlaughter. Euſtace's nephew was taken priſoner, and the count himſelf, with a few of his followers, narrowly eſcaped.

Though the Engliſh failed in this attempt, yet it was far from diſpiriting their countrymen, who broke out into open rebellion in various parts of the kingdom. They even formed a ſcheme for maſſacreing all the Normans, which, in all probability, might have taken place, had it not been for the ſudden and unexpected arrival of William from Normandy, who had, no doubt, received private information of the intended conſpiracy.

But though William's return allayed the ſtorm that had been raiſed in his abſence, yet it gave ſuch a diſguſt to the Engliſh, that he determined to curb their turbulent ſpirit by oppreſſion, to cloſely rivet the chains of ſlavery, which before he had only an opportunity to fit on, and in future to rule them with a rod of iron.

A. D. 1068. The firſt inſtance William gave of his intention to rule by arbitrary power was manifeſted in his reviving the tax called Danegelt, which had been abrogated by Edward the Confeſſor. Aldred, archbiſhop of York, who had hitherto ſtrenuouſly ſupported all the meaſures of William, exerted his utmoſt endeavours to ſuppreſs this reſolution. To effect this he had recourſe to perſuaſions and remonſtrances; but finding all endeavours fruitleſs, he not only abandoned the intereſt of William, but anathematized him and all his family. This, however, had no effect upon William: he defied the eccleſiaſtical as well as the temporal power, and levied the tax with the utmoſt rigor.

This violent and arbitrary proceeding occaſioned inſurrections in various parts of the kingdom. The people of Exeter refuſed to take the oath of allegiance, or to admit a Norman garriſon. In conſequence of this William marched with a body of of forces to Exeter, and made the neceſſary preparations for reducing them to obedience by force of arms; but the inhabitants implored and received pardon; on which William built a caſtle in the city, and placed in it a large body of his Norman troops.

* During the ceremony a tumult enſued, which had liked to have produced very fatal conſequences. The abbey was ſurrounded with a body of Norman ſoldiers, who hearing a confuſed noiſe within, imagined it aroſe from tumult and diſorder, and that the life of their duke was in danger. Fired at what they conſidered as a perfidious ſtratagem of the Engliſh, without giving themſelves the leaſt time for examination, they ſet fire to the adjacent houſes, and aſſaulted the populace with the utmoſt fury. The alarm ſpread with amazing rapidity, and deſpair was viſible in every countenance; but as ſoon as the new king was able to paſs through the crowd, he appeared among his troops, and at length, with great difficulty, ſuppreſſed the outrage.

But this inſurrection was trifling compared with thoſe which took place in the north, where Edwin and Morcar (earls of Northumberland and Mercia) combined with Sweyn king of Denmark, Malcolm king of Scotland, and Blethwin prince of North Wales, to make one vigorous effort for the recovery of their antient liberty. William, however, marching againſt them with a numerous army, diſconcerted their ſcheme, but pardoned the inſurgents on their ſubmiſſion. He ſoon after concluded a peace with the king of Scotland, which deprived the other parties of any future aſſiſtance from that quarter. When we ſay the inſurgents were pardoned, it muſt be underſtood only the leaders of the different parties; for many who were leſs guilty were ſeverely puniſhed, and ſome, who had no concern in the inſurrection, were impriſoned.

Morcar, and ſome other noblemen, retired to Scotland, and perſuaded prince Edgar, with his mother and ſiſters to accompany them. They were all received with the greateſt reſpect by the Scottiſh king, who was ſoon after married to Margaret, the eldeſt ſiſter of Edgar.

A. D. 1070-2. Having reduced the inſurgents, and erected caſtles in different parts of the kingdom, William reſolved to introduce thoſe innovations he thought neceſſary to ſupport that deſpotic power by which he was determined to govern the kingdom. He confiſcated the eſtates of the Engliſh nobility, and gave them to the Normans and other foreigners, who had aſſiſted him in the conqueſt of the country; by which means the moſt antient and opulent families were reduced to indigence, and pined for want on the very eſtates which had deſcended to them through a long line of illuſtrious anceſtors. He likewiſe introduced the feudal polity, which had been long eſtabliſhed in France and Normandy. He divided the kingdom into ſeven hundred baronies, which he beſtowed on his particular friends, no Engliſhman being ſuffered to enjoy that honour. Nor were the clergy exempted from theſe arbitrary proceedings: he put the church lands on the ſame eſtabliſhment with others, and obliged the eccleſiaſtics to furniſh their proportion of men for the wars, though the Saxon churches had exempted them from all military ſervice. The Monks were compelled to ſupply his troops, which he quartered on the monaſteries, with proviſions. He depoſed many Engliſh abbots and biſhops, and appointed foreigners to ſupply their places: in particular, Lanfranc, an Italian, was promoted to the ſee of Canterbury. Thomas, a canon of Bayeux, was created archbiſhop of York, and the ſee of Winchester was filled up by one of his own chaplains.

Nor did William ſhew a leſs deſire of accumulating riches than extending his power. Being informed that many perſons had lodged their plate, money, and other valuables, in the monaſteries, he gave orders that thoſe places ſhould be ſearched, when his emiſaries, being properly inſtructed, not only ſeized upon what had been concealed, but alſo took away the church plate, and even ſtripped the ſhrines of their offerings.

The Engliſh now felt the chains of ſlavery, which had, for ſome time, been forging for them. Some were frightened into paſſive obedience, while others formed the noble reſolution of ſhaking off their chains, or periſhing in the attempt. Accordingly many of the latter retired to the Iſle of Ely, and ſet at defiance all the power of William. Among theſe was the brave Hereward de Wake, reputed the greateſt warrior of his age. He was choſen captain of this reſolute band, and bravely exerted the great talents he poſſeſſed. As ſoon as William was informed of this oppoſition, he immediately marched at the head of a body of forces to chaſtiſe the inſurgents. But it was no eaſy taſk to drive them from their retreat. He attacked the iſland ſeveral times without ſucceſs, and was at length obliged to turn the ſiege into a blockade. This, however, not anſwering his wiſhes, he had recourſe to ſtratagem, and effected by art what he found exceeded his abilities to perform by force. Knowing that the monaſtery of Ely had very large poſſeſſions that lay out of the bounds of the iſland, he ſeized them, and after poſſeſſing himſelf of their moſt valuable effects, gave the lands to his ſoldiers. Alarmed for their eſtates, the monks offered to betray the iſland, and pay him a thouſand marks provided he would reſtore to the convent the lands he had ſeized. William readily embraced the offer, and Thurſton the abbot opened a paſſage to the royal army. The gallant Hereward, finding himſelf betrayed, cut his way through the Norman troops ſword in hand; but the reſt were obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion, and great numbers of them were made priſoners, among whom was Morcar, earl of Northumberland.

During theſe tranſactions Malcolm king of Scotland made an irruption into the northern provinces; in conſequence of which William, having quieted the diſturbances in the Iſle of Ely, marched with his forces into the north; but on his approach Malcolm retired, and William following him, he was glad to make peace, and to pay the uſual homage to the Engliſh crown. By one of the articles of the treaty Edgar Atheling was to return to England, and renounce all right to the crown, on receiving a ſufficient maintenance from the Conqueror.

A. D. 1073. William, having thus reduced the Engliſh to ſubjection, and concluded a peace with the Scottiſh monarch, it might have been expected that he would have enjoyed ſome reſpite from the toils of war. But the alarms of invaſion were not yet over. Philip, king of France, either jealous of William's growing power, or hoping that the unſettled ſtate of his affairs in England would prevent him aſſiſting his ſubjects on the continent, attacked the duchy of Normandy, and made himſelf maſter of the city of Mans, the capital of the province of Maine. Alarmed at this unexpected attack, William paſſed over to the continent at the head of an Engliſh army, who, on their arrival, were joined by ſome troops levied in Normandy. He immediately attacked the invaders, recovered the territories they had taken, and obliged Philip to make peace with him on his own terms.

A. D. 1074. But while William was endeavouring to eſtabliſh peace in his Norman dominions, he received advice that freſh troubles were excited in England by perſons whom he little ſuſpected of diſaffection. Several of the Norman barons, who had engaged with him in the conqueſt of England, and were enriched by the wealth he had beſtowed upon them, determined no longer to ſubmit to his imperious ſway. Robert, the youngeſt ſon of William Fitz-Oſborne, earl of Hereford, had, a little before the king's departure for Normandy, applied to William for permiſſion to marry his ſiſter to Ralph de Gauder earl of Norfolk, and received a peremptory denial. Enraged at this refuſal, fuſal, it was reſolved to ſolemnize the marriage during the king's abſence, and the ceremony was accordingly performed with the greateſt magnificence. The imperious behaviour of William naturally became the ſubject of converſation, the moſt bitter reflections were made on his tyrannical government, and they unanimouſly came to the reſolution of no longer ſubmitting to his arbitrary adminiſtration. They accuſed him of uſing every ſpecies of tyranny over the Engliſh, who, they ſaid, were unjuſtly ſubjected to the arbitrary nod of an uſurper. Earl Waltheof, one of the greateſt warriors of the age, was the only Engliſhman who retained any power. He had, ſome time before, married Judith, the king's niece, and was created earl of Northumberland for his valour. This brave ſoldier was one of the gueſts, and joined with the reſt in the conſpiracy to dethrone William; but fearful of their own power, it was agreed to ſolicit the aſſiſtance of Sweyn, king of Denmark, whom they knew to be a profeſſed enemy to the imperious Norman.

This plan was laid, and agreed to by Waltheof, at the time the company were in their height of jollity, and when there was no time for reflecting on the conſequences that were likely to attend ſo raſh an action. But cool reflexion ſoon convinced Waltheof that the conſpiracy was at once idle and unjuſt. Remorſe ſucceeded, and he informed Lanfranc, archbiſhop of Canterbury, of the whole deſign. The prelate perſuaded him immediately to croſs the ſeas, and reveal all he knew to William. Waltheof followed the advice of the archbiſhop; but unfortunately for him he had alſo revealed the ſecret to his wife, who (having previouſly placed her affections on another perſon) ſent an expreſs to William, and uſed all her art to incenſe him againſt her huſband. Waltheof, however, met with a gracious reception from William, and flattered himſelf he had nothing to fear. The diſappearance of Waltheof alarmed the conſpirators, and ſome ſteps taken by the regency convinced them that the ſecret was diſcovered. In conſequence of this they immediately flew to arms, without waiting the arrival of the Danes, on whoſe aſſiſtance they placed their chief confidence. But all their efforts were fruitleſs: they were defeated wherever they went; ſo that when William landed in England, he found the conſpiracy entirely ſuppreſſed.

Immediately on the arrival of William, a parliament was ſummoned at Weſtminſter, where the caſe of thoſe concerned in the late rebellion came under conſideration, and they were proceeded againſt with the utmoſt ſeverity. Some of inferior rank were puniſhed with the loſs of their eyes, and others with that of their feet or hands. Earl Waltheof, notwithſtanding the proof of fidelity which he had given in diſcovering the plot, was tried for being an accomplice, and, upon the information of his own wife, ſentenced to loſe his head. Lanfranc exerted all his intereſt to ſave him; but William was inflexible, he was determined to quench even the ſmalleſt ember of rebellion with blood, and accordingly Waltheof was beheaded at Wincheſter on the 29th of April 1075. Thus fell the laſt Engliſhman who had enjoyed any conſiderable degree of power in the nation after the conqueſt. His infamous wife did not long enjoy her inhuman triumph over her huſband; for ſhe was univerſally deſpiſed, and ſuffered that diſgrace and contempt her perfidy ſo juſtly merited.

A. D. 1076. In the beginning of this year William received an embaſſy from pope Gregory VII. requiring him to do homage for the kingdom of England, and demanding the payment of Peter's-pence, which the liberality of the Saxon princes had conſtantly ſent to Rome; but without ever intending to render the cuſtom binding to their ſucceſſors, or conſidering it as a mark of ſubmiſſion to the holy ſee. William, however, was not to be terrified at the unreaſonable demands of the pontiff. He told the ambaſſadors that the money ſhould be ſent as ſoon as it could be collected; but, in the moſt peremptory terms, abſolutely refuſed to pay him homage. And, to convince the pope that he was in earneſt, and deſpiſed his power, he ſoon after publiſhed an edict, prohibiting his ſubjects from acknowledging his ſuperior authority, or obeying any commands from Rome without his permiſſion.

A. D. 1077. While the nation appeared to be in a tolerable ſtate of tranquillity, William met with freſh diſturbances from a quarter he little expected. His eldeſt ſon Robert, who was a prince of an enterprizing diſpoſition, determined to obtain that power to which he thought himſelf juſtly entitled. William had promiſed, before the peers of France, that as ſoon as he was ſettled on the Engliſh throne, his eldeſt ſon Robert ſhould be left in poſſeſſion of Normandy. Philip, king of France, deſirous of creating diſſentions in the family of William, inſtigated Robert to demand the poſſeſſion of his patrimony. Robert, fired with what he conſidered as an injury, laid his claim before his father, and urged it with ſome warmth; upon which William was highly offended, and ſent him for anſwer, "that he was never accuſtomed to ſtrip till he went to bed, and that therefore he ought to wait till his deceaſe."

This peremptory anſwer ſo irritated Robert that he determined, if poſſible, to make himſelf maſter of Normandy by force of arms, and accordingly raiſed a powerful body of troops to effect his deſign. As ſoon as William was apprized of this he went over to Normandy with an Engliſh army, and compelled Robert and his followers to take refuge in the caſtle of Gerberoy, which the French monarch had provided for their reception in caſe of neceſſity. In this place William beſieged them, and ſeveral ſkirmiſhes happened, but with very little advantage to either party. At length Robert, diſdaining to be ingloriouſly ſhut up within the walls of a caſtle, drew out his forces, and gave his father battle. The conteſt was very ſharp, and for ſome time, continued equal. At length an arrow, from an unknown hand, ſtruck Williams's horſe, which immediaiely fell, and the king was thrown, almoſt breathleſs, to the ground, where he was in the utmoſt danger of being trampled to death. In this deplorable ſituation he called for help; and Robert, hearing the well-known voice of his father, was ſtruck with horror. All the ſentiments of duty and filial reverence were awakened in his breaſt: he raiſed his father from the ground with the utmoſt tenderneſs, threw himſelf at his feet, implored his pardon, and offered to purchaſe his forgiveneſs by any atonement. But William, without complying with his requeſt, immediately drew off his army, and repaired to Rouen; upon which Robert diſbanded his forces, and followed him. The queen interpoſed in behalf of her ſon, and her influence, added to the ſubmiſſion of Robert, at length produced a reconciliation. gain produce the ſame alarming events. He therefore brought his ſon with him to England, and ſent him at the head of an army to repel the Scots, who taking advantage of William's abſence, had made inroads in the northern parts of England. This ſervice Robert ſoon performed, and returning to London was received by his father with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy. Some time after this William built the Tower of London, to keep in awe the citizens, of whom he entertained a conſtant jealouſy.

A. D. 1081. The nation being now in a perfect ſtate of tranquillity, William dedicated his thoughts to the purſuit of thoſe meaſures that were likely to preſerve his own power, and ſecure himſelf in that elevated ſtate which he had obtained by the force of arms. Among other things he determined to finiſh a ſurvey of the kingdom, which had been began by Edward the Confeſſor. In this ſurvey an account was taken of all the lands in England, their extent in each diſtrict, their value and quality, and the number of tenants, cottagers, freemen and ſlaves; together with black cattle, ſheep, hogs, cattle for draught, and other animals, with the names of thoſe to whom they belonged; and the number of mills and fiſheries. This work was ſix years in compiling, and was at firſt called "The Roll of Wincheſter, becauſe originally kept in that cathedral; but it was afterwards named Dombec, or Doomſday-book, becauſe its evidence was deciſive, and there was no appeal from its authority.

During the time the proper commiſſioners were employed in making the before-mentioned ſurvey, an event took place of a very ſingular nature, and which particularly attracted the attention of the public. Odo, biſhop of Bayeux, ſome time before created earl of Kent, and appointed chief juſticiary of the kingdom, had amaſſed immenſe ſums of money by the moſt illegal and oppreſſive methods. He was naturally turbulent and ambitious, and deeply tinctured with the folly of the times, by placing confidence in the idle predictions of aſtrologers. One of thoſe itinerant fortune-tellers, among other ridiculous aſſertions, foretold that Gregory, who then filled the papal chair, ſhould be ſucceeded by a prelate named Odo. Animated with the hopes of obtaining that ſeat of envied greatneſs, Odo, who placed the moſt implicit faith in what was then called the language of the ſtars, determined to employ the vaſt treaſures he had collected by the rapacious hand of injuſtice, in procuring the papacy. He therefore purchaſed a palace at Rome, furniſhed it in the moſt ſuperb manner, and employed a great number of agents to engage the voices of the cardinals in his favour. He endeavoured to keep his deſign a profound ſecret, and propoſed to withdraw privately out of the kingdom, and take up his reſidence at Rome, till the death of Gregory ſhould open a way to the ſucceſſion. But his intentions could not be concealed; and one of his pretended friends informed William of the chimerical projects formed by his brother. The loſs of ſuch enormous ſums, and the conſequences that might attend his endeavours to obtain the papacy, determined William not to ſuffer him to leave the kingdom. He therefore ordered him to be arreſted; but his officers being intimidated at the great power of the clergy, heſitated to execute his orders, being more fearful of eccleſiaſtical than civil puniſhment. William perceived their ſcruples, and ſeized the ſhop with his own hands. It was in vain that Odo pleaded his exemption from temporal juriſdiction. William anſwered, that he did not arreſt him as biſhop of Bayeux, but as earl of Kent. Pope Gregory had recourſe alternately to perſuaſions and menaces to obtain the releaſe of Odo; but in vain. William ſet all the thunders of the vatican at defiance, and Odo was kept cloſely confined in one of the caſtles of Normandy during the life of his brother.

A. D. 1082. William, like moſt of the Norman kings, was fond of hunting, and the methods he took to indulge himſelf in this diverſion have juſtly loaded his memory with reproach. Not contented with thoſe large foreſts poſſeſſed by former kings in different parts of England, he reſolved to make a new foreſt near Wincheſter, the uſual place of his reſidence, without diminiſhing his own revenue. He accordingly laid waſte the county of Hants for an extent of thirty miles, expelling the inhabitants from their houſes, ſeizing their property, and even demoliſhing the churches and convents, without making the unhappy ſufferers the leaſt compenſation for the injury. Nor was he ſatisfied with this inhuman ſtretch of his tyrannical power. He enacted the moſt ſevere laws relative to the foreſts, by which thoſe who dared to kill a deer, or a hare, were condemned to loſe their eyes, while at the ſame time the moſt horrid crimes were only compenſated with a fine. But it was uſeleſs to complain. William laid every oppreſſion he could think of on the Engliſh. He not only robbed them of their wealth and eſtates, but even formed a project for depriving them of their language. He ordered the French to be taught in the ſchools throughout the kingdom. It was ſpoken at court, and therefore ſtudied by the polite part of the inhabitants. It was alſo uſed in the courts of juſtice, and all the public acts, and private contracts, were written in that language.

A. D. 1087. In the beginning of this year William went over to Normandy in order to quell a rebellion which had broke out in that part of his dominions. But he had not been long in Normandy before a miſunderſtanding took place between him and Philip of France, which was attended with very fatal conſequences. It happened that William was taken ill, and for ſome time confined to his bed. He was always corpulent, which increaſing with his years, he was now become exceeding unweildy. Philip turned this natural infirmity into ridicule. Knowing of William's illneſs he jocoſely aſked one of his attendants, "Whether the king of England was delivered of his big belly." This being reported to William, he was ſo highly enraged, that he declared he would celebrate his recovery at Notre Dame with ten thouſand lances inſtead of lights; alluding to the practice of women, who then offered wax tapers at the altar after their recovery from child-birth.

As ſoon as William's health was reſtored he immediately proceeded to fulfil his promiſe. He entered France at the head of a very powerful army, and committed the moſt inhuman ravages that fury, blended with malice, could invent. Towns and villages, churches and chapels, palaces and huts, were alike deſtroyed: a ſmoaking deſert cloſed the rear of his army. The city of Mantes was one of the unfortunate places that fell into his hands, and felt the dreadful effects of his unbounded rage. He laid the whole in aſhes, and beheld with ſatisfaction this horrid ſacrifice to his revenge. But his triumph was of no long continuance: his horſe, terrified at the ſmoking ruins, plunged violently, and throwing the rider forward bruiſed his belly againſt the pommel of the ſaddle. A rupture, attended by a fever, was the conſequence, and William was conveyed to Rouen. Senſible of his danger, he was ſtruck with remorſe for the many violences and cruelties he had committed to ſatisfy the cravings of an unbounded ambition. To make ſome atonement he gave money to rebuild the churches which he had deſtroyed at Mantes, and ordered conſiderable ſums to be diſtributed to the poor. He likewiſe gave orders for the enlargement of a great number of priſoners; and then, commanding his principal officers to ſurround his bed, he ſpoke much of his military reputation; but acknowledged that he had not honeſtly obtained the crown of England, and that he thought himſelf anſwerable for the lives of thoſe who were loſt in that conqueſt. Soon after this he paid the debt of nature, on the 9th of September, 1087, in the 61ſt year of his age, the 52d of his reign over the Normans, and the 21ſt of his reign over the Engliſh.

As ſoon as William's attendants perceived he was dead, they immediately plundered his coffers, and ſeized his moſt valuable effects. They even ſtripped his corpſe of the rich mantle with which it was covered, and then left the remains of this mighty conqueror naked and expoſed. A country gentleman beheld this ſcene of rapacity, and was touched with compaſſion. He cauſed the body to be embalmed at his own expence, and made the neceſſary preparations for interring it in the abbey-church of Caen, which had been founded by William. The proceſſion was awfully ſolemn, and a funeral oration was pronounced by Gilbert, biſhop of Evreux, who, with ſix other prelates, attended the mournful ceremony. But juſt as they were going to depoſit the body in the earth, one Anſelm Fitz-Arthur, a Norman gentleman, preſſed forward through the crowd, and, with an audible voice, forbad the prelates to inter the body. "On that ſpot, ſaid he, once ſtood my father's houſe, which was unjuſtly ſeized by William, who I now ſummon before the Moſt High to anſwer for that flagrant act of tyrannical oppreſſion." This occaſioned a general confuſion among the people, till at length it was agreed to give thirty ſols for permiſſion to inter the body; beſides which young Henry promiſed, if his claim ſhould appear to be well founded, he would make him a reaſonable ſatisfaction for the eſtates of which he had been deprived.

Such was the end of William I. the mighty Conqueror of England; a prince liberally endowed by nature with all the talents neceſſary for placing him on the pinnacle of human greatneſs. His genius was piercing, and improved by a noble education. He was intrepid in danger, and fruitful in reſources: a great general, and a valiant ſoldier. He was formed to ſhine both in the cabinet and the field. He was an excellent judge of men, and employed none but thoſe of the greateſt capacity either in church or ſtate. But his ambition carried him beyond the bounds of humanity. He availed himſelf of the right of conqueſt (the only title by which he had acquired a great kingdom) to trample on the laws of juſtice, and erect the throne of deſpotiſm upon the ruins of the conſtitution of a free people. He ſacrificed to avarice every principle of juſtice, and to oppreſſion every dictate of humanity. He extended the iron rod of tyranny over a people his arms had conquered; and felt not for the miſeries of innocence in diſtreſs. William, however, was not wholly deſtitute of virtues. In private life he was a tender huſband, an indulgent parent, and, where political intereſt did not interpoſe, a generous maſter. He introduced the regulation of the curfeu into England, by which all the inhabitants were obliged to put out their fires, and extinguiſh their lights on the ſound of a bell, which was tolled at eight o'clock in the evening.

With reſpect to exterior qualifications, he was remarkably tall, finely proportioned, and had a great dignity of aſpect; but towards the latter part of his life, he grew corpulent, and had a protuberance of belly which appeared diſguſtful to beholders, and was diſagreeable to himſelf.

William left three ſons, namely, Robert, William and Henry. To his eldeſt ſon Robert he bequeathed Normandy; and wrote a letter to Lanfranc, archbiſhop of Canterbury, deſiring him to crown his ſecond ſon William king of England. He gave to Henry nothing more than the poſſeſſions of his mother Matilda, who had been dead about four years; but foretold that he would one day ſurpaſs both his brothers in opulence and power.

Beſides theſe ſons, William left five daughters, one of whom died young, one was an abbeſs, and the other three married into very reſpectable, princely, and noble families.

expedition to England, before any intelligence of the death of the Conqueror could reach the kingdom. On his arrival he immediately applied to Lanfranc, who having been entruſted with the care of his education, looked upon him with the affection of a parent. But notwithſtanding this, he refuſed to exert himſelf in his favour, unleſs he would promiſe, "To govern with equity and moderation, maintain the liberties of the people, and behave like a dutiful and obedient member of the church." Rufus made this promiſe in the moſt ſolemn manner, in conſequence of which, as ſoon as the death of his father was publicly known in England, Lanfranc cauſed Rufus immediately to be proclaimed king; after which, having aſſembled the biſhops, with a great number of the principal nobility, he proceeded to the ceremony of coronation, which was performed at Weſtminſter on the 5th of October, A. D. 1087. Thus Rufus obtained that crown, which by right belonged to his elder brother Robert, who, in the mean time, contented himſelf with taking quiet poſſeſſion of Normandy.

A ſhort time after the coronation of Rufus, Odo, biſhop of Bayeaux, the chief miniſter and favourite of Robert, arrived in England, under pretence of ſoliciting the reſtitution of an eſtate he had formerly poſſeſſed as earl of Kent, and which had been confiſcated by William the Conqueror. The king received him with the moſt diſtinguiſhed marks of reſpect, and immediately reinſtated him in his former poſſeſſions. But the recovery of an eſtate was not the principal deſign of Odo's viſit. His intentions were, to wreſt the ſcepter from the hands of Rufus, and give it to Robert, as the undoubted heir to the Conqueror. He accordingly applied to ſeveral of the principal barons, whom he found ready to ſupport the pretenſions of his patron, provided they could be aſſured of a ſufficient force from Normandy to ſecond their intended deſigns.

Having thus far ſucceeded, Odo ſent a letter to Robert, aſſuring him that nothing but his preſence, at the head of a body of Norman troops, was wanting to recover that throne from which he had been unjuſtly excluded by the caprice of his father. Though Robert was naturally exceeding indolent, yet he was not inſenſible to the calls of ambition. He received the news with great ſatisfaction, and returned for anſwer, that as ſoon as his friends were in a condition to declare in his favour, they might be aſſured of his arrival at the head of a powerful army.

Odo communicated this intelligence to the partiſans of Robert, who were ſo elated that they immediately retired to their reſpective caſtles, and broke out into open rebellion. Several parts of the kingdom were at once thrown into the utmoſt confuſion, and many of the counties again laid waſte by the ſword of deſolation. William was alarmed at theſe proceedings; but inſtead of purſuing any violent meaſures, he followed the advice of Lanfranc, and endeavoured to ſuppreſs the rebellion by means the moſt gentle and conciliative. He choſe rather to convince the inſurgents of the folly of ſupporting a cauſe pregnant with deſtruction, than force them to ſubmiſſion by ſtrength of arms. The ſucceſs of theſe prudent meaſures was ſoon apparent: the chiefs of the conſpirators abandoned the cauſe of Robert, and became the firm friends and adherents of Rufus. Odo, finding his ſcheme thus rendered abortive, fled to Normandy, and his poſſeſſions being ſeized by Rufus, he diſtributed them among thoſe who had particularly engaged themſelves in his intereſt.

A. D. 1088. While William was ſurrounded with enemies, and felt the crown, as it were, totter on his brow, he ſhewed every mark of favour and reſpect for his ſubjects. But no ſooner did he find himſelf firmly fixed in the ſeat of power, than, forgetting the promiſes he had made to Lanfranc, he treated his ſubjects with the cruelties of a conqueror. Inſtead of mitigating, he greatly increaſed the ſeverity of the foreſt laws, which had been enacted by his father. It was in vain for the Engliſh to complain: he was deaf to their petitions, and beheld their miſeries without giving them the leaſt redreſs. Lanfranc remonſtrated with him, in the moſt forcible manner, on theſe deſpotic proceedings. He reminded him of the ſolemn promiſes he had made when a candidate for the crown, and urged the noble and generous conduct of the Engliſh in his favour. William's haughty ſoul was ſtung to the quick at this freedom taken by the primate; but not judging it politic to quarrel with a perſon of his great influence in the kingdom, he affected to turn it off in a jeſting manner, ſaying, "Piſh! man, doſt think kings can keep all their promiſes." It was not long, however, before this check to William's tyranny was removed by the loſs of Lanfranc, whoſe death was juſtly regretted both by Normans and Engliſh. He made no diſtinction between the two nations, every good man being ſure of his favour and protection. He gained the love of all parties; and was juſtly conſidered as a faithful and vigilant paſtor, and an able and upright ſtateſman.

William, being now no longer under reſtraint by the adminiſtration of Lanfranc, determined to give a full career to his natural tyranny and avarice. The Engliſh were at once inſulted and oppreſſed; and even the privileges of the church, ſo ſacred in thoſe early times, proved a feeble rampart againſt his uſurpations. Eccleſiaſtical benefices were put up to ſale, and the higheſt bidder was ſure to be the purchaſer. Nor were theſe illegal methods ſufficient to ſatisfy his avarice: he delayed appointing ſucceſſors to vacant benefices, that he might have the opportunity of ſeizing their revenues. Theſe tyrannical proceedings ſpread an univerſal alarm throughout the kingdom; but the terror of his authority ſtifled the voice of complaint, ſo that the people ſeemed to be fixed in a ſtate of the moſt abſolute ſubjection.

A. D. 1090. Robert, duke of Normandy had, by his natural ſupineneſs and puſillanimity, loſt the Engliſh crown; and was now in danger of being deprived of his Norman dominions. The reſtleſs and independent ſpirit of his vaſſals was greatly increaſed by his injudicious and negligent adminiſtration. The ſword of civil diſcord was drawn, and Normandy felt all the horrors of an inteſtine war. Robert had mortgaged near one third part of his dominions to his brother Henry for three thouſand pounds. In conſequence of this Henry, fearful (from the great diſturbances among the barons) that he might loſe what he had obtained from his brother, applied to the Engliſh monarch for aſſiſtance, and adviſed him to attack the Norman dominions of his brother. Rufus, whoſe avarice was never ſatisfied, readily took this advice, and immediately went over to Normandy at the head of a powerful army. Robert was in no condition to oppoſe him. William, therefore, ſoon poſſeſſed himſelf of the principal towns in Normandy, mandy, and even the capital itſelf was on the point of falling into the hands of the invader, owing to the treachery of Conan the governor. Robert applied to the king of France for aſſiſtance, but in vain, that monarch being ſtrongly attached to the intereſt of William. Henry now ſaw his error, and trembled for his own property. He therefore deſerted the party of Rufus, and joined Robert with an excellent body of forces. The two brothers arrived juſt time enough to ſave the capital; and Robert, exaſperated at the conduct of the governor, ordered him to be thrown headlong from the battlements of the caſtle, as a puniſhment for his perfidy.

William being thus diſappointed in poſſeſſing himſelf of the capital of Normandy, made preparations for proſecuting the war with redoubled vigour. But at the interceſſion of ſome powerful nobles, both of England and Normandy, a treaty of peace was concluded between him and Robert, in which it was ſtipulated, that on the death of either, without iſſue, the ſurvivor ſhould ſucceed to both dominions. In this treaty not the leaſt notice had been taken of the intereſts of Henry, which ſo much exaſperated that prince, that he retired, with his troops, to St. Michael's Mount, a ſtrong fortreſs on the coaſt of Normandy, from whence he made conſiderable depredations on the adjoining parts of the country. Robert and William, with their joint forces, beſieged him in this place, and reduced him and his army to great diſtreſs for want of water. Robert, on hearing this, not only granted his brother Henry permiſſion to ſupply his garriſon with that neceſſary article, but alſo ſent him a large quantity of wine for his own table. Being reproved by William for what he thought an ill-timed piece of generoſity, he replied, "What! ſhall I ſuffer my brother to periſh with thirſt? Where ſhall we find another when he is gone?

While William lay encamped before St. Michael's, an incident happened of a very ſingular nature, and which evinced that though he was of a moſt avaricious diſpoſition, yet he had ſome ſenſe of generoſity. One day, riding out to take a ſurvey of the fortreſs, he was attacked by two ſoldiers, and diſmounted. In conſequence of this one of them drew his ſword in order to diſpatch him, upon which William exclaimed, "Hold fellow, I am the king of England." The aſſailant immediately threw down his ſword, raiſed him from the ground with the greateſt marks of reſpect, and received a noble reward.

Henry maintained a brave defence for about ſeven weeks: but was at length compelled to decline the conteſt; and being deprived of all his poſſeſſions, wandered from place to place, accompanied only by a few of his faithful attendants, who ſhared with him the diſtreſſes of extreme poverty to which he was frequently reduced.

A. D. 1094. William after concluding a treaty of peace with his brother Robert, left Normandy, and returned to England. On his arrival he found the kingdom in the utmoſt confuſion, owing to the inroads of the Welſh, who, exaſperated at the tyranny of the Norman barons, entered the Engliſh territories, and committed the moſt cruel depredations on the inhabitants. Exaſperated at their cruelties, William marched againſt them at the head of a numerous army, and having repulſed and killed great numbers of the main body the reſt made a precipitate flight, and retired to the mountains, upon which William returned with his forces to the capital.

Some time after this a moſt dangerous conſpiracy was formed againſt the life of William by ſome of the principal barons in the kingdom, at the head of whom was Robert Mowbray, then the moſt powerful ſubject in England. As ſoon as William was informed of this conſpiracy, he took the moſt prudent meaſures poſſible to render it abortive. He ſummoned Mowbray to appear before him at Wincheſter, to anſwer for his conduct in plundering four merchant ſhips, which had put into an Engliſh port under his juriſdiction. Mowbray, conſcious of his guilt, refuſed to obey the royal mandate; in conſequence of which William marched with an army againſt him, and Mowbray, not being in a condition to engage in battle, ſhut himſelf up in Bamborough Caſtle, which the king immediately inveſted. Mowbray, knowing that the fortreſs, though impregnable, muſt, for want of proviſions, be forced to ſurrender, found means to make his eſcape, and, repairing to Tinemouth endeavoured to corrupt the governor of that place; but before he could effect his purpoſe, he was taken priſoner by a detachment of William's army. After the departure of Mowbray the garriſon in Bamborough caſtle ſurrendered, and the governor impeached all the conſpirators. Mowbray was ſentenced to be confined for life, ſeveral others were put to death, and the eſtates of the greater part confiſcated. Count D'Eu was impeached of being engaged in this conſpiracy. He, however, denied the charge, and offered to vindicate himſelf by ſingle combat with his accuſer; but being defeated, he was ſentenced to be deprived of his ſight, and ſuffer caſtration. His couſin, William D'Alderi, was ſentenced to be publicly whipped, and afterwards hanged on a gallows thirty feet high. Thus was this dangerous conſpiracy ſuppreſſed, and peace and tranquillity once more reſtored to the nation.

A. D. 1095. In the beginning of this year a great difference took place between the king and Anſelm, archbiſhop of Canterbury, the cauſe of which aroſe from a ſchiſm that happened in the church of Rome. Two prelates claimed the pontifical dignity. Odo, biſhop of Oſtia, under the name of Urban II. was acknowledged pope in Italy and France, while his competitor, Gilbert, archbiſhop of Ravenna, under the title of Clement III. was conſidered as the ſucceſſor of Peter, by ſeveral of the European powers, among whom was the king of England. Anſelm oppoſed his ſovereign, diſdaining to ſubmit to any temporal authority. He even determined to mortify William, and accordingly demanded leave to repair to Rome, and receive his archiepiſcopal pall from the hands of pope Urban II. adding, that he conſidered him as the true head of the church. Provoked at this inſolence, William was, with the utmoſt difficulty, reſtrained from laying violent hands on the primate, who, perceiving that he ſhould not be ſupported by the prelates and clergy, quitted the kingdom. In conſequence of this William immediately ſeized the temporalities of the archiepiſcopal ſee; nor could he be perſuaded to reſtore them during the remainder of his life.

A. D. 1096. This year produced one of the moſt extraordinary occurrences recorded in the annals of hiſtory, namely, the Cruſades, which was patronized by pope Urban, and in which many princes of Chriſtendom engaged. Peter the Hermit, a native of Amiens in Picardy, having made a pilgrimage to Jeruſalem, was ſo affected at the ſufferings inflicted by the infidels on the Chriſtians of Paleſtine, that he formed the bold reſolution of attempting to relieve them from the oppreſſion of the Saracens, and make a conqueſt of that country in which Chriſtianity was firſt promulgated. His plan being approved by the pope, he began to preach the propriety of entering on the intended buſineſs, and urged all Chriſtian princes to contribute their aſſiſtance towards the recovery of the Holy Land. He travelled bare footed and bare headed from court to court, and preached, as he went from place to place, with a zeal that proved how much he was in earneſt. The princes, nobility and clergy, encouraged his deſign wherever he went; and a council being held at Clermont, the pope himſelf recommended the expedition, and the people univerſally called out, "It is the will of God."

A. D. 1097. The ſpirit of emigration now ſpread itſelf throughout Europe, and great numbers of the firſt rank ſold their poſſeſſions at much leſs than their value, in full confidence of obtaining a better ſettlement in Aſia: nor is it to be wondered at when we conſider the diſpoſition of the times, and that the pope gave ſuch countenance to the deſign as to promiſe great indulgencies to thoſe who ſhould engage in the enterprize.

Among the various princes who were deſirous of diſtinguiſhing themſelves on this memorable occaſion, was Robert duke of Normandy. But his finances not being adequate to the expence of ſuch an undertaking, he offered to mortgage his dukedom to his brother William for ten thouſand marks. Rufus did not heſitate to conclude the bargain; and having raiſed the money by levies on his ſubjects went over to Normandy, and paid it to his brother, who, after putting him in poſſeſſion of his dominions, ſet out, at the head of his vaſſals, to gather laurels on the plains of Paleſtine.

Thus was England and Normandy once more united, and the many contentions that had ſubſiſted between the barons of the two provinces, entirely laid aſide. Both were ſubjects to William, and both felt the weight of his power.

A. D. 1099. William had not long left Normandy before he had occaſion to re-viſit that part of his dominions, owing to the depredations of a powerful nobleman named Helie, who poſſeſſed himſelf of ſeveral towns in Normandy, and at length laid ſiege to the city of Mans. William was hunting in the New Foreſt when he received advice of this tranſaction, upon which, turning to his attendants, he aſked them in what direction the city of Mans lay. Being anſwered, he immediately turned his horſe's head towards the place, and rode full ſpeed to the ſea-ſide, calling to his attendants, "Let him that loves me follow me." Dartmouth was the firſt ſea-port town they came to, where finding a veſſel ready to ſail, they immediately went on board; but the maſter heſitating to put to ſea on account of the tempeſtuous weather, William aſked him if he ever heard of a king being drowned." Silenced by this reproof, the maſter ſailed immediately out of the harbour, and the next morning reached Barfleur in ſafety.

No ſooner did Helie hear of William's arrival in Normandy, and that he was marching towards him at the head of a powerful army, than he inſtantly raiſed the ſiege of Mans, and retreated with his forces. William followed the flying enemy, attacked their rear, and took Helie priſoner. The captive nobleman was treated with great indignity, at which he was ſo incenſed, that he told Rufus, "he had little cauſe for triumph, as his ſucceſs was owing rather to ſurprize than valour." Adding, "that if he were again at liberty, he would not find it eaſy to defeat him in a fair engagement." The king, piqued at theſe bold words, immediately ordered Helie to be ſet at liberty. "Be gone, ſaid he fiercely, do "thy worſt; and, by the face of St. Luke, "if thou haſt the good fortune to conquer "me, I will not aſk the ſmalleſt return for "the freedom I now confer upon thee." But no action happened between them. Helie retired to his own territories, and William returned to England.

During theſe tranſactions Robert was diſplaying the greateſt courage againſt the infidels in Paleſtine. After the greateſt fatigues, and the loſs of multitudes of people, the famous city of Jeruſalem was taken, and the diadem of that celebrated capital offered to Robert. But the great reputation he had gained in the fields of Aſia, induced him to hope that it would now be eaſy for him to recover his duchy, and even get poſſeſſion of the Engliſh throne. He therefore declined the offer, and the crown of Jeruſalem was placed on the head of Godfrey of Boulogne, a prince equally diſtinguiſhed for his virtues and military proweſs.

A. D. 1100. But though Jeruſalem was recovered from the infidels, numbers of warriors continued to flock from moſt parts to the plains of Aſia. William, earl of Poctiers, and duke of Guienna, reſolved to engage in this buſineſs, and for that purpoſe raiſed a very powerful army; but his finances being inſufficient to diſcharge the expence of the expedition, he applied to Rufus, offering to mortgage his duchy for the ſum wanted. The king, with his uſual avidity, concluded the bargain, raiſed a large army, and fitted out a powerful fleet, with a view of taking perſonal poſſeſſion of the earl's territories.

But while theſe preparations were making, an accident intervened which at once put an end to the life and ambition of Rufus. William frequently amuſed himſelf with hunting in the New Foreſt, in which excurſion he was always attended by Walter Tyrrel, a French knight, who was celebrated for his great ſkill in archery. In the courſe of the day the king and Tyrrel were ſeparated from the reſt of the company, upon which William alighted from his horſe to wait till they joined him. Juſt at this juncture a ſtag ruſhed from an adjacent thicket, and paſſed the king. William immediately let fly an arrow, which wounding the animal he followed it in expectation that it would ſoon fall. While William was engaged in watching the wounded ſtag, another iſſued from the ſame thicket, and croſſing the path between Tyrrel and the king, the knight ſhot an arrow, which, either by glancing againſt a tree, or the horns of the animal, changed its direction, ſtruck the monarch in the breaſt, and piercing his heart, he fell on the ground, and immediately expired. Tyrrel, who had been the innocent cauſe of this fatal cataſtrophe, fled immediately to the ſea ſide, and eſcaped to France. The royal corpſe was treated with the ſame indignity as that of his father. His attendants, who feared his power, and had followed his fortunes, paid no reſpect to his remains. The body was ſuffered to lie in the poſture it fell for ſome time, till at length a peaſant coming up with his cart, they threw it in, and in that ignominious manner conveyed it to Wincheſter, where it was interred without the leaſt ceremony.

Thus, by an accidental ſtroke * fell William Rufus, on the 2d of Auguſt, A. D. 1100, in the 44th year of his age, and 13th of his reign.

William was in perſon of a middle ſtature, but appeared ſhorter than he really was, owing to his great corpulency. His complexion was florid, his hair of a yellowiſh red, and one of his eyes ſpotted, which rendered it unlike the other. He had a ſtrong powerful voice, which he frequently exerted, in order to intimidate thoſe to whom he was ſpeaking; but the ſound of his voice was exceeding diſagreeable owing to a natural impediment he had in his ſpeech.

With reſpect to the character of William, it muſt be acknowledged, that he had ſome virtues, and many vices. He was intrepid and magnanimous, a lover and encourager of arts and learning, and a friend to real merit. But he was ungrateful, avaricious, tyrannical, perfidious, cruel and diſſolute. In ſhort, his few virtues were obſcured by his vices, which were ſo diſtinguiſhed as to fix a laſting ſtain on his memory.

Remarkable Occurrences during the reign of Rufus.

1088 A dreadful earthquake, which ſhook the whole kingdom. This was followed by a great ſcarcity of fruit, and ſo late a harveſt, that corn was not properly ripe at the end of November.

1091 A violent ſtorm happened, which did conſiderable damage in various parts of the kingdom, particularly at Winchelſcomb in Glouceſterſhire, where the ſteeple of the church was thrown down.
A few days after this there was another ſtorm, which threwn down upwards of 500 houſes in London only, and blew off the roof of Bow-church; and at Saliſbury it not only deſtroyed many houſes, but likewiſe threw down the ſteeple belonging to the cathedral.

1094 This year was remarkable for ſo great a mortality among men and beaſt, that the ground remained untilled, and what added to the calamity was, its being ſucceeded by a very ſevere dearth.

1096 This year was remarkable for the commencement of the Cruſades, or Holy War.

HENRY I. ſurnamed BEAUCLERC.

Acceſſion of Henry I. His marriage with Matilda, daughter to the king of Scotland. Robert invades England, but by means of Anſelm the primate an accommodation is effected between him and his brother Henry. Diſpute between the king and Anſelm. Henry makes himſelf maſter of Normandy. Engages in foreign wars. Death of prince William. Second marriage of the king. His death and character.

A. D. 1100. AS the late king left no iſſue, the throne of England fell, by right, to his elder brother duke Robert; but that prince being then abroad, Henry, the younger brother, determined to ſeize the crown in his abſence. He, therefore, immediately on hearing of William's death, repaired with all expedition to Wincheſter, and made himſelf maſter of his brother's treaſures. This acquiſition inſured him ſucceſs. He eaſily gained over the nobility and prelates to his intereſt, and on the 5th of Auguſt, three days after his brother's death, was crowned with great ceremony by Maurice, biſhop of London.

In order to inſure the affections of his ſubjects, Henry, on the very day of his coronation, publiſhed a charter, confirming the privileges of his ſubjects, and redreſſing the grievances under which they laboured. By this charter (copies of which were diſperſed throughout the kingdom) the churches were reſtored to all their immunities, and exempted from thoſe impoſitions under which they had laboured during the late reign. He engaged to admit the heirs of barons to the enjoyment of their eſtates, without exacting thoſe enormous fees which had been required by the two preceding princes. He promiſed to remit the wardſhip of minors, by which the crown had received the profits of their poſſeſſions during their minority. He engaged not to oppoſe any marriages which the barons might contract for their daughters or other relations, unleſs the perſons propoſed were known to be his enemies. He promiſed to exerciſe with juſtice and moderation the right of levying impoſts, to pardon all paſt offences, to remit all debts due to the crown, and to maintain in full force the laws of Edward the Confeſſor.

This charter was ſoon followed by another, in which he granted many ample privileges to the citizens of London. In particular he aboliſhed the curfeu, which had been eſtabliſhed by William the Conqueror, and was always conſidered by the Engliſh as a badge of their ſlavery.

Theſe were not the only meaſures Henry took to gain the affections of his ſubjects. To ſhew the ſincerity of his intentions for their welfare, he committed Ralph Flambard, biſhop of Durham, the oppreſſive and deteſted miniſter of Rufus, to the Tower; but the artful prelate found means to make his eſcape, and fled to France, where he endeavoured to embroil that government he could no longer direct.

Henry was no ſtranger to the great reſpect which the Engliſh bore for Anſelm, archbiſhop of Canterbury, who had been baniſhed in the former reign, on a quarrel with the king, and went to Lyons. He therefore recalled that prelate, reſtored him to his former dignity, and took him into his particular favour.

the Engliſh throne, Henry now determined to enter into marriage with Matilda, daughter to Malcolm king of Scotland, by Margaret, ſiſter to Edgar Atheling. That princeſs had been brought up in the monaſtery at Wilton ever ſince the death of her father. She was not only a lady of moſt deſirable accompliſhments, mental and perſonal, but alſo an unexceptionable match in point of intereſt, her uncle Edgar having no children, and the old Engliſh party eſteeming her as the only ſurvivor of the Saxon race, from whom they might expect a continuance of that antient line. Nothing, therefore, could tend more to promote the deſigns of Henry, than his forming an union with this princeſs. But there was an impediment to be removed before he could accompliſh his wiſhes. She had worn the veil, but never taken the vows; and it was a matter of doubt whether or not it was lawful for her to marry. The king applied to Anſelm, who refuſed to decide the queſtion by his own authority. He therefore ſummoned a general council at Lambeth, where he ſo enforced his arguments for Matilda's being at liberty to marry, as to obviate every negative plea, and the nuptials were accordingly celebrated with great magnificence, to the general ſatisfaction of the people of both kingdoms.

A. D. 1101. During theſe tranſactions duke Robert arrived in Normandy from his expedition into the Holy Land, and knowing he had been deprived of his right in not ſucceeding to the throne of England, determined to aſſert his claim. He accordingly raiſed a very powerful army, with which he landed at Portſmouth, where he was joined by ſeveral of the moſt powerful barons in the kingdom, who thought, as he was the elder brother, he ought to have had the preference in the ſucceſſion.

The crown of Henry now tottered on his brow: he knew his brother was advancing towards the capital, and feared the conſequences. He therefore applied to Anſelm, who effectually interpoſed his good offices in favour of Henry. He publickly repreſented to the people the fatal conſequences that muſt inevitably enſue from a civil war, and prevailed on them to think favourably of the mild and equitable government of their then ſovereign. He likewiſe declared that, if Robert perſiſted in his deſign of driving Henry from the throne, he would excommunicate him and all his adherents. This had the deſired effect. Eccleſiaſtical cenſures were at that time more dreaded by the common people than the moſt powerful armed force. Robert, therefore, found that inſtead of his troops increaſing, they daily decreaſed in numbers; and even thoſe that continued firm to his intereſt, advanced with timidity.

Henry, placing himſelf at the head of his forces, marched againſt his brother; and the two armies encamped within ſight of each other on a plain not far from Wincheſter. They remained in this ſituation for ſome time without coming to action, Henry being fearful his troops would deſert him on the day of battle, and Robert declining to engage in expectation of receiving freſh reinforcements.

During this interval of inaction, Anſelm exerted all his intereſt to ſheathe the ſword of war, by concluding a peace between the two brothers. After ſome difficulties he obtained his wiſhes, and a treaty of accommodation was effected on the following terms: 1. That the king ſhould reſign to Robert full poſſeſſion of Normandy. 2. That the friends of each party ſhould have full reſtoration of all their lands and eſtates, both in England and Normandy. 3. That Henry ſhould pay to Robert the yearly ſum of 3000 marks of ſilver; and that if either of the two died without lawful iſſue, his demeſnes ſhould be inherited by the ſurvivor as well in England as Normandy.

This treaty being ſigned by proper perſons on each ſide, as guarantees for its faithful execution, both armies were diſbanded, and Henry took his brother Robert with him to court, where they lived together in the greateſt apparent harmony for the ſpace of two months, at the expiration of which Robert took his leave, and embarked for Normandy.

Robert had no ſooner left England, than Henry violated the treaty which had been made between them. He commenced proſecutions againſt thoſe barons who had declared in favour of Robert; and they, thinking it would be imprudent to appear, were baniſhed the kingdom, and their eſtates confiſcated. As ſoon as Robert heard of theſe tranſactions he conſidered it his duty to intercede, and attempt the recovery of the poſſeſſions of thoſe noblemen who had ſuffered in violation of the treaty between him and his brother. He accordingly came over to England, for that purpoſe; but Henry, not being in any fear from the attempts of an enemy, paid no regard to his remonſtrances. Inſtead thereof he treated him with the utmoſt contempt, and even hinted that his own liberty was in danger. Robert clearly ſaw his ſituation and was glad to make his eſcape to his own dominions.

A. D. 1103. A moſt violent diſpute now took place between the king and Anſelm, archbiſhop of Canterbury, which had like to have been productive of the moſt fatal conſequences. The prelate determined, if poſſible, to curtail the royal prerogative in matters eccleſiaſtical, and to render the authority of the mitre little inferior to that of the crown. He had two grand points in view, one of which was, to oblige the clergy to celibacy, and the other to wreſt from the crown the right of giving inveſtiture to biſhops and abbots. A ſynod was accordingly convened, in which a ſentence of excommunication was pronounced againſt married prieſts. Having thus far ſucceeded, Anſelm determined to proceed, and accordingly propoſed, that all the biſhops who had received inveſtiture from the king ſhould reſign their ſees, or be immediately excommunicated. Henry, exaſperated at theſe inſolent proceedings, ſummoned Anſelm to appear before him in the king's court. The prelate accordingly obeyed, and was commanded inſtantly to do homage to the king and to conſecrate ſuch perſons as had been nominated to vacant ſees, or to depart the kingdom. Henry likewiſe declared, that no perſon ſhould reſide in any part of his dominions, who refuſed to pay the allegiance due to a ſovereign." But Anſelm deſpiſed the threats of royalty, and, with the reſolution of a man conſcious of his power, told the court, "that he was not to be intimidated from doing his duty: that he ſhould immediately retire to Canterbury, where he would continue to exerciſe his archiepiſcopal functions, and wait the iſſue with the utmoſt reſignation. As Henry was determined not to part with ſo valuable a branch of his prerogative, and the prelate not to recede from the cauſe he had undertaken, there remained no hopes of an accommodation. At length was agreed by both parties to ſend a deputation to Rome, in order to lay the whole diſpute before his holineſs; and that, in the mean time, the biſhops and abbots ſhould continue to exerciſe the functions of their repective offices.

A. D. 1105. But this eccleſiaſtical diſpute did not divert Henry from attending to ſuch other matters as concerned his intereſt. An opportunity now ſeemed to offer for faciliating the deſign he had long entertained of poſſeſſing himſelf of Normandy, and annexing that duchy to his own dominions. His brother Robert, though a brave and generous prince, neglected the affairs of government, and wholly employed his time in diſſolute pleaſures, whereby his ſubjects became a prey to the avidity of his officers, and rapine and injuſtice ranged at large over the dominions of Normandy. The mildneſs of his diſpoſition gave a boldneſs to depredation, and his indolence a tacit ſanction to outrage. Thus neglected by their own prince, and ſubject to the continual inſults of rapine and violence, the Normans applied to Henry for redreſs. That prince liſtened with pleaſure to their complaints; but not having even a ſhadow of a pretence to juſtify a rupture with his brother, he did not think proper to comply immediately with their requeſt. He, however, wrote a letter to Robert, repreſenting, in the ſtrongeſt terms, the enormity of his conduct in not redreſſing the grievances of his ſubjects, and ſecuring their properties from tyrannical invaders. He entreated him, in the moſt preſſing manner, to reſume the conduct of a prince, and to act in ſuch a manner as might procure him the glorious title of being father of his people. He farther told him, that he thought it his duty as a brother, and the reſpect he had for the inhabitants of Normandy, to uſe every means in his power to redreſs their grievances; and that, if he ſhould turn a deaf ear to theſe remonſtrances, he muſt not think it ſtrange if he exerted himſelf in favour of his diſtreſſed countrymen.

This artful letter, though varniſhed over with ſeeming love and kindneſs, was, in fact, intended only to farther his deſign, by inflaming the minds of the Normans to a greater pitch of diſcontent againſt Robert. Henry took particular care to have the letter made as public as poſſible, and the iſſue fully anſwered his expectations; for, in a very ſhort time after, he received a general application from the Norman nobility, beſeeching him to have compaſſion on the miſeries of their church and ſtate, and take them under his immediate care. This was what Henry aimed at. He accordingly no ſooner received the invitation, than he haſtened to comply with it; and, towards the cloſe of autumn, paſſed over to Normandy at the head of a powerful army.

Henry landed at Barfleur, and as ſoon as his arrival was known the Norman nobility immediately repaired to his camp; but the ſeaſon being too far advanced, he did not think it prudent to commence hoſtilities againſt Robert. Many of the Norman and Engliſh barons now feared the conſequences that might attend an open rupture between the two brothers, and laboured aſſiduouſly to bring about a reconciliation. Their endeavours were attended with ſuch ſucceſs that Robert paid a viſit to Henry, and, by the interpoſition of ſome of the moſt moderate noblemen on each ſide, their diſputes ſeemed to be amicably terminated. But this was far from being the caſe. Henry's deſign was to make a conqueſt of the country, and therefore, after taking leave of his brother, he ſeized the ſtrong towns of Bayeaux and Caen belonging to Robert, and having garriſoned them with Engliſh troops, returned to his dominions.

This was an act contrary to the laws both of nature and nations. Robert ſent a letter to his brother remonſtrating with him on his conduct; but Henry, inſtead of paying any attention to his complaints, treated them with contempt, and in the beginning of the following year went over to Normandy at the head of a powerful army. He opened the campaign with the ſiege of Tanchibray; and it became ſufficiently evident both from his preparations and progreſs that he intended to uſurp the entire poſſeſſion of Normandy. Robert was now rouſed from his accuſtomed indolence, and being joined by the earl of Mortaigne and Robert de Belleſme, earl of Shrewſbury (two inveterate enemies to Henry) he ſoon raiſed a conſiderable army, with which he marched towards his brother's camp, intending to finiſh, by one deciſive battle, the diſpute between them. He was now entered upon that ſcene of action, in which alone he was qualified to excel; and, accordingly, he ſo animated the Norman troops by his example, that they made great havock among the Engliſh, and had nearly obtained the victory, when Belleſme ſuddenly drawing off his forces, the reſt of the army was thrown into the utmoſt diſorder, and, in a ſhort time, totally defeated. Among the noble priſoners taken by Henry were the duke himſelf, and Edgar Atheling, the latter of whom had followed Robert in his expedition to Jeruſalem, and returning with him had taken up his reſidence in the court of Normandy.

This victory was followed by the entire reduction of the country. Rouen immediately ſubmitted to the conqueror. Falais, after ſome negotiation, opened its gates; and, by this acquiſition, beſides making himſelf maſter of an important fortreſs, Henry got into his hands the perſon of prince William, the only ſon and heir of Robert. In conſequence of this ſucceſs Henry called together an aſſembly of the ſtates of Normandy, and having received homage from all the heads of the duchy, and ſettled the government, he returned to England, bringing with him as priſoners his brother Robert and Edgar Atheling. The unfortunate Robert was detained in priſon during the remainder of his life, which was twenty-eight years when he died in the caſtle of Cardiff, in Glamorganſhire. Henry gave Edgar Atheling his liberty, and ſettled on him a ſmall penſion, with which he retired, and continued in privacy during the remainder of his life. Prince William was left in Normandy under the care of Helie de St. Saen, who had married Robert's daughter, and who, being a man of diſtinguiſhed probity and honour, diſcharged his truſt with the greateſt fidelity.

A. D. 1107. The famous controverſy between Henry and Anſelm the primate, was now drawing to a concluſion. The deputies returned from Rome, and brought with them an excommunicative letter from Paſchal the pope to the king, for his having aſſumed the right of inveſtitures. Henry concealed the contents of this letter, and prevailed on the biſhops who brought it to declare, that the pope did not diſapprove of his granting benefices, though he did not chuſe to declare his opinion in writing. Anſelm, who was well acquainted with every thing that had paſſed at Rome, ſupported the cauſe he had had undertaken with firmneſs and reſolution. He not only refuſed to conſecrate ſome new biſhops, who had received inveſtiture from the king, but alſo to communicate with them. Henry was irritated to the higheſt degree; and the prelate, to avoid the ſtorm which he ſaw gathering, retired to Rome. The people were alarmed at the departure of the archbiſhop, and dreaded the conſequences of an excommunication. They beheld, in idea, the flames of diſſention and diſcord lighted up by the dreadful torch of religious fury. Henry himſelf was deſirous of avoiding the conſequences, and diſpatched an ambaſſador to Rome, who told the pope, that his maſter would ſooner loſe his crown than part with the right of granting inveſtitures. "And I, replied Paſchal, would rather loſe my head than allow him to retain it." Thus every thing indicated a rupture between Henry and the pope: but the former not chuſing to hazard the conſequences of the pontiff's great authority, wiſely gave up the claim of inveſtitures, on which Paſchal conſented to his exacting from the biſhops the homage they owed him as temporal peers. Thus was an accommodation at length happily effected; and Anſelm, returning to England, was reinſtated in his archiepiſcopal dignity.

A. D. 1108. In the beginning of this year, Henry convened a general aſſembly of the ſtates, in which, at the requeſt of his nobles, he removed ſeveral cuſtoms that had been long oppreſſive to his ſubjects, among which were the following: His court and attendants had, for ſome time, claimed the privilege of living upon free quarter, in all places through which their maſter paſſed. This occaſioned the land to be abandoned by the inhabitants, when they ſuſpected a royal progreſs; for the inſolent attendants ſpoiled and plundered all that came in their way, while the people retired, with all the proviſion they could carry off, into woods and receſſes. But an effectual ſtop was now put to this abuſe by the king's proclamation, which inflicted ſevere corporal puniſhments on all who, in future, ſhould be guilty of the like depredations.

Another grievance, which particularly called aloud for redreſs, was, defacing the current coin of the kingdom. Small money, ſuch as pence and half-pence, were often broken by the country people, for the convenience of change; by which means, when they were not divided into equal pieces, the ſmaller ones remained in the hands of the proprietor, to his great prejudice. This abuſe, which had come to a great height, was remedied by the coining of pence in one round piece, with two creaſes interſecting it into four equal parts, ſo that, by breaking it according to thoſe creaſes, it might fall into two half-pence, or four farthings.

A. D. 1109. In this year, the famous Anſelm, archbiſhop of Canterbury, paid the debt of nature, univerſally regretted by the clergy. He was a prelate of great learning, conſidering the age in which he lived; but ſo ambitious and haughty, that he greatly hurt the peace of the church, which it was his duty to preſerve. Power, and not piety, was the end he wiſhed to attain. He ſacrificed internal purity to external magnificence, and preferred the ſhadow to the ſubſtance of religion.

About this time ambaſſadors arrived from Henry IV. emperor of Germany, to demand Matilda, Henry's daughter, in marriage; and the terms of the treaty were adjuſted in the preſence of the council. In conſequence of this treaty, Henry impoſed an extraordinary tax of three ſhillings upon every hide of land throughout the kingdom, by which he raiſed a noble portion for his daughter, who did not leave England till the following year.

A. D. 1110—1116. Though Henry had for ſome time, been maſter of his brother's territories, he found it very difficult to defend his uſurpation. He was frequently involved in wars; and for ſeveral years found it neceſſary at times to croſs the ſeas, in order to ſtop the inroads of the neighbouring princes and diſcontented barons. William, the ſon of duke Robert, who was left in the care of his brother-in-law, had taken up his reſidence in the court of Anjou, where he became ſo beloved that a reſolution was formed by the neighbouring princes, of obtaining for him the dominions of his father. Lewis king of France was at the head of this aſſociation, and accordingly joining the other princes, he marched a conſiderable body of forces into Normandy, with a reſolution of ſupporting William in his juſt rights againſt all the power of the uſurper. Henry was now ſufficiently alarmed, and accordingly went over to Normandy at the head of a powerful army. But he was too far advanced for any military operations of conſequence to take place; and the two armies, after a few ſkirmiſhes of no material conſequence, retired into winter quarters.

A. D. 1119. The two ſucceeding campaigns were ſpent to very little purpoſe. Henry was obliged to act on the defenſive, and the allied army made but a ſlow progreſs in reducing the fortified towns in Normandy. At length, Henry, having gained over the earl of Anjou to his intereſt, was able to meet the enemy in the open field. The two armies met in the plain of Brenneville, when a bloody battle enſued, which was continued with great fury for ſome time, when fortune ſeemed inclined to give the palm of victory to the French and Norman army. Henry himſelf began to tremble for the conſequences. In this alarming criſis the Engliſh, who formed the rear of Henry's army, advanced, and charged the enemy with ſuch fury, that, unable to ſuſtain the ſhock, they gave way, and fled with the utmoſt precipitation. All attempts to rally them proved fruitleſs. Lewis himſelf was hurried away with the torrent, thrown from his horſe, and eſcaped by the aſſiſtance of a peaſant, who conducted him from this dreadful ſcene of confuſion, through woods and bye-paths, to the caſtle of Andeli.

A. D. 1120. Lewis, after this defeat, thinking it would be difficult, if not impoſſible, to obtain the duchy for the young prince by force of arms, applied to the council of Rheims, aſſembled by pope Calixtus II. flattering himſelf with being able to turn the indignation of the pontiff againſt the Engliſh monarch. Aware of the danger, Henry took the moſt prudent method to divert the ſtorm. He ſent large preſents to Calixtus, and brought him over to his intereſt; ſo that all the attempts of Lewis were rendered abortive. The pope declared himſelf ſatisfied with the reaſons Henry had given for his conduct, and diſſolved the aſſembly. A peace was ſoon after concluded between the contending monarchs, and Henry continued maſter of the dominions of Normandy.

Peace being thus reſtored on the continent, Henry flattered himſelf that his public proſperity would inſure to him an inexhauſtible ſource of private happineſs; but in this expectation he was diſappointed by a domeſtic calamity that embittered the remainder of his life. William, his own ſon, who had been recognized as his ſucceſſor in a general council of the nation, and attended him into Normandy, was now on his return with his father to England. The ſhip in which the prince embarked was, by ſome accident, detained ſeveral hours after the reſt of the fleet, and the interval being ſpent in drinking, neither the maſter, nor any of the ſeamen were capable of directing the ſhip, in conſequence of which ſhe ſtruck upon a rock and foundered. All was now a ſcene of hurry and confuſion: the boats were hoiſted out, and every one endeavoured to provide for his own ſafety. The prince, with a conſiderable number of his attendants, leaped into the long boat, and, with great difficulty, got clear of the ſhip. But hearing the loud ſhrieks of his natural ſiſter the counteſs of Perche, he inſiſted on the boat being rowed back, in hopes of ſaving her. The ſailors accordingly obeyed, but they no ſooner reached the ſide of the ſhip, than ſuch numbers jumped into the boat that ſhe overſet, immediately ſunk, and they all periſhed. A butcher of Rouen, by clinging to the maſt, was the only perſon ſaved, and by whoſe means the circumſtances of this tragical accident were made known. The king, on hearing the melancholy news, fainted away; and it is recorded he was never ſeen to laugh from that moment to the day of his death.

A. D. 1121. The late melancholy accident having deprived Henry of an heir to the throne, and his amiable queen Matilda being dead, he determined to engage in a ſecond marriage with Adelais, daughter of Geoffrey, earl of Louvain. He accordingly ſummoned a council at London, where the match being propoſed and approved, deputies were appointed to carry on the negotiation, and the whole was tranſacted with ſuch expedition, that the nuptials were ſolemnized at Windſor in the month of February following.

A. D. 1122. In the beginning of this year Ralph, archbiſhop of Canterbury, paid the debt of nature, which circumſtance occaſioned a very warm conteſt between the monaſtic and ſecular clergy concerning the ſucceſſion to the Metropolitan ſee; but at length the king decided it in favour of the former, by nominating William de Corboil, abbot of the monaſtery of St. Oſyth, to ſupply the vacancy, who, being approved by the council, was ſoon after conſecrated by William biſhop of London.

About this time Fulk earl of Anjou ſent an embaſſy to Henry, demanding his daughter, who was contracted in marriage to the late prince William. She had fortunately come over with the king, and by that means eſcaped the fate of her huſband. Henry complied with the demand, and the young lady was immediately ſent back to her father.

A. D. 1123. This year Henry received advice of a confederacy being formed againſt him in Normandy. It conſiſted of ſome of the firſt perſons among the Norman nobility, who, from Henry's having no children, revived the claim of William, ſon to duke Robert. Theſe noblemen were ſupported by the earl of Anjou, who now gave his eldeſt daughter in marriage to the prince of Normandy, and with her the duchy of Maine; aſſuring him, at the ſame time, that he would aſſiſt him with all his forces to recover his paternal inheritance. Henry, not being in a condition to go over to Normandy himſelf, diſpatched thither his natural ſon Robert, and Ranulph, earl of Cheſter, with what forces they could collect, in order to ſtop the progreſs of the inſurgents. On their arrival in Normandy they were joined by all the king's troops in that duchy; but the confederates not having committed any act of hoſtility, they employed their time in making the neceſſary preparations for oppoſition, by viſiting all the fortified places, and putting them in the beſt poſture of defence.

During theſe tranſactions Henry received a viſit from cardinal de Crema, who came over as the pope's legate. He was received in the moſt pompous manner, but at the ſame time given to underſtand, that he muſt not attempt to make innovations in the kingdom, or do any thing prejudicial to the royal prerogative. He, however, aſſembled a general council at London, in which he preſided, and enacted, among other rigorous laws, a ſevere canon againſt marriage among the clergy, which he affirmed to be a moſt notorious crime. This excited the general indignation of the people, and to prevent any bad conſequences that might enſue, Henry ſent William, archbiſhop of Canterbury, to Rome, in order to claim the independency of the metropolitan power. But the prelate, inſtead of ſupporting, betrayed the cauſe of the Engliſh prieſthood, and returned veſted with a legative power, by authority of which he called a ſynod at Weſtminſter, and confirmed the canon againſt marriage among the clergy.

While Robert and the earl of Cheſter were repairing and augmenting the fortifications in Normandy, Henry was providing both money and troops in England, and about the middle of the ſummer, A. D. 1124, he embarked, and landed his forces at Rouen, where he ordered a general rendezvous of his army. But no action of conſequence happened during the whole courſe of the campaign; both parties employing themſelves in ſtrengthening their reſpective intereſts with the people and nobles. In the mean time, the king of France ſupplied the conſpirators with all kinds of neceſſaries, though he had not yet declared himſelf in their favour. Henry, therefore, thinking it more ſafe to have an open than a ſecret enemy, declared war againſt France, and both parties made preparations for taking the field early in the ſpring.

A. D. 1125. In the beginning of the month of March the French king, at the head of his forces, entered Normandy, and being joined by the army of the inſurgents, proceeded with all expedition towards Rouen; they were met on the way by the royal army, which had been increaſed by draughts from all the neighbouring garriſons, in order to oppoſe their progreſs. Henry's army was commanded by William earl of Tankerville, who concealed the greater part of his men in a bottom, where they could not be ſeen by the enemy. Having formed this ſtratagem, he engaged the inſurgents, at the head of a ſmall body of troops, near the village of Teroud, about eight miles diſtant from Rouen. At firſt the French bore down all before them, upon which Tankerville retreated with very little loſs towards the place where his men were planted in ambuſh, who ſuddenly ruſhing out entirely ſurrounded the enemy. The battle now became general, and laſted for ſome time with great obſtinacy on both ſides, but at length victory declared in favour of the Engliſh, great numbers of the enemy being ſlain, many taken priſoners, and the reſt obliged to ſave themſelves by a precipitate flight.

After this victory Henry marched againſt all the caſtles and forts belonging to the conſpirators, moſt of which ſurrendered on the firſt ſummons, and the the reſt after a very feeble reſiſtance. Additional works were now raiſed round Rouen, and the fortications of many other important places repaired and enlarged.

A. D. 1126. Having terminated the diſturbances on the continent, Henry returned to England, and on his arrival found the people in general very diſcontented, on account of the enormous taxes that had been impoſed upon them for ſupplying the exigencies of the campaign in Normandy, while the miſeries ſuffered by the lower ſort had almoſt driven them to deſpair. The perſons entruſted with the government during his abſence had almoſt totally neglected the executive part of juſtice, by which robberies, thefts and murders were become ſo frequent, and perpetrated in ſo open and daring a manner throughout the whole kingdom, that neither the life nor property of any perſon was ſecure. Henry, therefore, made it his firſt care to reform theſe abuſes, and enacted ſeveral ſevere laws againſt all diſturbers of the public peace: at the ſame time he ordered forty-four criminals, who had been convicted of enormous crimes, to be executed, and puniſhed in the moſt exemplary manner.

Henry now began to deſpair of having any iſſue by his ſecond queen, ſhe having been married near five years without ſhewing the leaſt ſign of pregnancy. He therefore now directed his attention towards providing an heir to the crown, that his death might not occaſion the kingdom to be diſtracted by inteſtine wars. In order to this he determined, in his own mind, to ſettle the ſucceſſion on his daughter Matilda, who, on the demiſe of the emperor her huſband, had returned to England, and from her perſonal as well as mental qualifications, was univerſally beloved by the people. Having formed this reſolution, Henry ſummoned a convention of all the immediate dependents on the throne, at which were preſent David, king of Scotland, and Stephen, count of Boulogne, the king's nephew. Henry laid his intentions before them, which being approved of by the whole aſſembly, Matilda was declared preſumptive heir to all the poſſeſſions of her father.

A. D. 1127. Henry being deſirous of ſtrengthening his power by foreign alliance, now propoſed a marriage between his daughter and Geoffrey Plantagenet, ſon of the count of Anjou; and the overtures being accepted, the ceremony was no ſooner ſolemnized than the count relinquiſhed his territories in favour of his ſon, and ſet out for Jeruſalem to be inveſted with the ſovereignty of that kingdom, vacant by the death of Baldwin earl of Flanders. In promoting this marriage the king rather provided for his own intereſt, than conſulted the honour or inclination of his daughter, who certainly derogated from the royal dignity, by eſpouſing a ſubject, merely from the impulſe of obedience to the will of her father.

A. D. 1128. Henry having thus attached to his intereſt a very powerful nobleman, reſolved to go over to the continent, and chaſtize the French for having ſo ſtrongly eſpouſed the cauſe of his nephew. Accordingly having raiſed a powerful army he went over to France, and laid ſiege to Aloſt, which made ſuch a reſiſtance that William prince of Normandy had time to come to its relief. In conſequence of this a battle enſued, and Henry would, in all probability, have been conquered, had not William been mortally wounded with a lance, of which he languiſhed five days, and then expired. This accident, together with the great ſuperiority of Henry's army, induced Lewis to conclude a peace with the Engliſh monarch; and as Robert had now no legitimate iſſue, Henry was left the undoubted heir to the duchy of Normandy.

Having made peace with Lewis, the king entered into an alliance with Theodoric, who had married Sibilla, his daughter-in-law, while the Normans, now from compulſion, quietly acquieſced in his government. At the ſame time, to conciliate their affection, he extended his forgiveneſs to all who implored his mercy, and attached many perſons of property and influence to his intereſt, by acts of benevolence and generoſity. He likewiſe releaſed ſome of the principal people who had been concerned in the late conſpiracy, reinſtated them in their poſts, and reſtored to them all their lands and poſſeſſions.

Henry, having thus fully ſecured himſelf in the poſſeſſion of Normandy, returned with his army to England, which he found in a perfect ſtate of tranquillity; and he had now the greateſt reaſon to hope that his life, which had hitherto been tempeſtuous and cloudy, would be cloſed in ſerenity.

A. D. 1130. In the ſpring of this year Henry took the opportunity of viſiting Normandy, to which he was invited as well from his natural affection for that country, as his tenderneſs for his daughter Matilda. Some time after his arrival that princeſs was delivered of a ſon, who was named Henry, and afterwards ſucceeded to the throne of England.

The king continued in Normandy for three ſucceſſive years, and then returned to England; but it was only to take a view of the general ſtate of public affairs, which having done, he again went over to the continent with a reſolution of ſpending the remainder of his days in his native country.

A. D. 1134. While Henry was enjoying his eaſe in Normandy, his brother Robert, whom he had, for ſome years, treated with great cruelty, paid the debt of nature in the caſtle of Cardiff. He was a prince of great humanity, affability and generoſity, though, by his indolence and profuſion he loſt that crown to which he had ſuperior claim and which had been ſo unjuſtly uſurped by his brother. His remains were interred in the choir of the cathedral at Glouceſter.

A. D. 1135. The tranquillity of England was now in ſome meaſure diſturbed by the Welſh, who made incurſions in different parts of the kingdom. Intelligence of this being ſent to Henry, then in Normandy, he made preparations for a ſpeedy return to England. But he was prevented from his deſign, by a ſudden illneſs, occaſioned by his having too freely gratified himſelf at a meal upon lampreys, a ſort of food more pleaſing to the palate than conſiſtent with the preſervation of health.

Henry's diſeaſe increaſed ſo faſt that he was convinced his diſſolution was near at hand. He therefore ſent for Hugh, archbiſhop of Rouen, his natural ſon Robert, earl of Glouceſter, and ſeveral other noblemen, then in Normandy, to receive his laſt commands. He importuned them, in the moſt pathetic manner, to uſe their utmoſt intereſts in favour of his daughter Matilda, declaring her and her children, by lawful ſucceſſion, to be the heirs of all his dominions both in England and Normandy. He then ordered conſiderable ſums to be diſpoſed of in charitable uſes, and gave handſome preſents to all his domeſtics. He likewiſe directed that all his debts ſhould be diſcharged: that all forfeitures and mulcts, lately fallen to the crown, ſhould be remitted; that the exiles ſhould be reſtored to their country; and that all, who had been been unjuſtly deprived of their eſtates, ſhould be reſtored to them, and ſuffered to enjoy them in peace and ſafety.

Henry, having thus ſettled his temporal concerns, reſigned himſelf up to the care of the clergy, and expired at the caſtle of Lyons, the firſt of December, A. D. 1135, in the ſixty-ſeventh year of his age, and thirty-ſixth of his reign. His body was carried the next day to Rouen, attended by a prodigious concourſe of people, and being there embalmed, was conveyed to Caen, and from thence to England, where it was interred in a monaſtery founded by himſelf at Reading in Berkſhire.

With reſpect to the character of Henry, it muſt be acknowledged he poſſeſſed all the qualities both of body and mind, natural and acquired, that could fit him for the high ſtation he attained. His perſon was manly, his countenance engaging, and his eyes clear, ſerene, and penetrating. The affability of his addreſs encouraged thoſe who might be over-awed by his dignity or wiſdom; and though he often indulged his facetious humour, he knew how to temper it with diſcretion, and always kept clear from any indiſcreet familiarities with his courtiers. His ſuperior eloquence and judgment would have given him an aſcendancy even had he been born in a private ſtation; and his perſonal bravery would have procured him reſpect, even though it had been leſs ſupported by art and policy. By his great progreſs in literature, he acquired the name of Beauclerc, or the ſcholar; but his application to theſe ſedentary purſuits did not leſſen the activity and vigilance of his government. He was a tender huſband, an affectionate parent, and a generous maſter. In ſhort, he poſſeſſed many valuable qualities, but theſe were unfortunately ſullied by a great number of faults. His behaviour to his brother and nephew have thrown ſuch a ſtain upon his memory as all his good actions can never obliterate. The bands of fraternal affection were ſeparated by the ſword of ambition; and the laws of juſtice, of humanity, and of nations, were ſacrificed at the ſhrine of unnatural uſurpation.

Henry was greatly addicted to women; and it is ſaid, by ſome hiſtorians, that he left behind him no leſs than ſeven illegitimate ſons, and ſix daughters.

In this king's reign, wheat to make bread for one hundred men one day was valued at one ſhilling; one ſheep at four-pence; one hide of land (as many acres as one team could plough) was taxed at one ſhilling per annum; and there being 244,400 hides ſouth of the Humber, this tax amounted to 12,220 pounds; to which may be added about an eighth for the lands north of the Humber.

Acceſſion of Stephen. War with Scotland. Inſurrection in favour of Matilda. Stephen taken priſoner. Matilda choſen to the ſovereignty. Stephen reſtored. Civil wars. Compromiſe between the king and prince Henry. Death and character of Stephen.

A. D. 1135. THOUGH the late king had taken every prudent meaſure he could deviſe for ſecuring the ſucceſſion of the Engliſh throne to his daughter Matilda, yet all his precautions were rendered abortive by the ambition of Stephen earl of Boulogne, on whom he had beſtowed very conſiderable poſſeſſions both in England and Normandy.

Stephen had entertained the thoughts of aſpiring to the crown long before the death of Henry, which event no ſooner took place, than he immediately reſolved to carry the deſign into execution. He had ſworn fealty to Matilda; but fidelity was not in the catalogue of Stephen's virtues. He flattered himſelf that riches and artifice would be ſufficient to over-balance the claim of that princeſs, and therefore haſtened with all expedition to England, in order to ſeize by uſurpation that crown which had adorned the brow of his patron.

The late monarch had made Henry, the younger brother of Stephen, abbot of Glaſtonbury, and biſhop of Wincheſter. He was of an active and turbulent diſpoſition; bold, diſſembling and faithleſs; ready to conform himſelf to the circumſtances of the times, and always preferred his own intereſt to that of his country. By a pleaſing addreſs and fluency of ſpeech he had gained the eſteem and admiration of the populace, while his familiar deportment procured him diſtinguiſhed reſpect from the clergy. The biſhop of Saliſbury was alſo a man of diſtinguiſhed abilities, very rich, and likewiſe had great influence over the people.

Theſe two prelates exerted themſelves with the moſt unwearied diligence to incenſe the minds of the people againſt Matilda, and ſuch was their ſucceſs, that when Stephen arrived in London, he was received with open arms by the citizens, who unanimouſly acknowledged him as their lawful king. In conſequence of this the two prelates jointly applied to William, archbiſhop of Canterbury, requeſting him to inveſt Stephen with the vacant ſovereignty, by an immediate performance of the ceremony of coronation. The primate declined a compliance, as being incompatible with the oath of fidelity he had lately ſworn to Matilda; but an expedient, as diſgraceful as the other meaſures by which the deſigns of the two prelates were anſwered, was contrived for removing the archbiſhop's objection. They prevailed on Hugh Bigod, ſteward of the houſhold, to ſwear, in the moſt ſolemn manner, before the primate, that the king, upon his his death-bed, expreſſed himſelf highly diſſatisfied with his daughter Matilda, and that his intention was to conſtitute Stephen ſole heir to his dominions. This oath removed all the ſcruples of the archbiſhop, and on the 26th of December Stephen was crowned with the uſual ceremonies.

Immediately after the ceremony Stephen took poſſeſſion of the late king's treaſures, amounting to an hundred thouſand pounds beſides plate and jewels. This enabled him to procure an aſcendancy over the more inferior clergy and nobility, who, from mercenary views, admitted his claim, and ſupported his meaſures, though they knew the firſt to be founded on injuſtice, and foreſaw that the others would be productive of national calamities.

Conſcious of the neceſſity of making ſome conceſſions to a people over whom he had arrogated the ſovereign power, Stephen began his reign with paſſing a charter, whereby he promiſed many advantages to the clergy, particularly, that on the demiſe of a biſhop he would inſtantly give the inveſtiture to the perſon appointed by a regular canonical election. He promiſed the nobility that they ſhould not be proſecuted for taking the diverſion of hunting in the royal foreſts; and to the people, that the tax of Danegelt ſhould be aboliſhed, and the laws of Edward the Confeſſor preſerved in their fulleſt extent.

Theſe flattering acts were the artifices of Stephen's ambition, and the ſtratagems he uſed to keep the crown of England on his head. But it was not long before he found the Engliſh noblemen were determined to make him keep his promiſes, and not, like his predeceſſors, break them as ſoon as he was firmly fixed in the ſeat of power.

Robert, earl of Glouceſter, a natural ſon of the deceaſed monarch, led the way to theſe neceſſary reſolutions. He was determined to ſupport the cauſe of Matilda; but the power of Stephen rendered it neceſſary for him to conceal his deſign. He accordingly ſwore allegiance to Stephen, but with this reſerve, that no innovation ſhould be made on his rights and dignities. Stephen ſaw the full force of this condition, but the great influence of that popular nobleman rendered it neceſſary to receive him upon theſe terms. The clergy, pleaſed with the cautious reſerve of Glouceſter, annexed conditions to their oath of allegiance: they declared that it ſhould be binding no longer than while he defended the eccleſiaſtical liberties of England, and ſupported the diſcipline of the church. The barons were determined not to be wanting to themſelves in this fortunate criſis: they, therefore required, in return for their ſubmiſſion, the liberty of fortifying and putting their own caſtles in a poſture of defence.—The king was ſenſible, that if he rejected the terms preſcribed, his authority would be rendered very precarious: he therefore judged it expedient to acquieſce in the demands of his ſubjects, as being the ſureſt methods of ſecuring that crown he had taken ſuch illegal methods to obtain.

A. D. 1137. It was not long before Stephen was fully convinced of the licentious and turbulent deſigns of his nobles. Many of them had no ſooner finiſhed the fortifications of their caſtles, than they renounced their allegiance, and ſet the power of the crown at defiance. Stephen now ſaw his error, but it was too late to correct it. Freſh diſturbances aroſe every day, and the whole kingdom was threatened with all the horrors of a civil war. It was in vain to attempt the removal of theſe enormities by reaſon or perſuaſions. Stephen, therefore, made his own power the ſole meaſure of his conduct. He ſacrificed to the rage of deſpotic government both his own conceſſions, and the antient privileges of his ſubjects. His authority was chiefly ſupported by mercenary ſoldiers, who, having exhauſted the royal treaſury, ſubſiſted by depredations. Hence diſcontents among the people, and complaints againſt the adminiſtration, were loud in every quarter, and the whole country was rendered a ſhocking ſcene of turbulence and confuſion.

While the king was meditating plans for reſtoring public tranquillity, Robert, earl of Glouceſter was not leſs aſſiduouſly engaged in projecting meaſures for effecting a revolution; and having ſettled all preliminary points with his friends, he retired to Normandy, from whence he diſpatched to Stephen a formal renunciation of his allegiance, upbraiding him with having violated the ſtipulations annexed to his oath of fealty.

A. D. 1138. In the beginning of this year David king of Scotland (who had reſolved to uſe his utmoſt efforts to procure his ſiſter Matilda the poſſeſſion of her hereditary dominons) entered England at the head of a powerful army, and penetrated as far as Northallerton in Yorkſhire. Stephen marched at the head of his forces againſt him, and a deſperate battle enſued, which was maintained, for ſome time, with great obſtinacy on both ſides, but at length victory declared in favour of Stephen. The Scottiſh army was entirely routed, and David, being hurried away with the torrent, was obliged to retreat to Carliſle, where he was afterwards joined by his ſon, and great part of his army. This battle was diſtinguiſhed by the name of the battle of the Standard, on account of a lofty crucifix placed on a waggon accompanying the Engliſh army as an enſign.

The defeat of the Scots might have been fatal to the intereſts, both of David and his ſiſter, had Stephen known how to profit by his victory. But flattering himſelf that he had now ſecured full poſſeſſion of the throne, he ſet no bounds to his ambition. He engaged in a controverſy with his clergy, to whom he was indebted for the crown, and to whoſe authority he could not be a ſtranger. They had aſſumed the privilege of acting entirely as barons, without a proper regard to the duties of their profeſſional characters. Inſtead of exerting their endeavours to prevent the diſturbances occaſioned by the laity, they became parties in, and promoters of, petty inſurrections and tyrannical ravages. Two ſtrong fortreſſes, one at Sherborne, and the other at the Devizes, had been erected and fortified by the biſhop of Saliſbury, who had alſo laid the foundation of another caſtle at Malmeſbury; and his nephew, Alexander, biſhop of Lincoln, had built a ſtrong fortreſs at Newark. Alarmed at the increaſe of citadels in all parts of his dominions, the king determined to make ſome alteration in a matter which had ſo conſiderable an effect in weakening the power of the crown. As, therefore, the eccleſiaſtical profeſſion appeared to be wholly inconſiſtent, with military operations and the duties of war, he reſolved to begin his reform by deſtroying the fortreſſes erected by the clergy; and accordingly, having cauſed the biſhops of Saliſbury and Lincoln to be taken into cuſtody, he obliged them, by menaces, to deliver up their caſtles.

This bold attempt to infringe on the liberties of the church greatly alarmed the whole body of the clergy, and none more than Henry, biſhop of Win-

Wincheſter, who, having, a ſhort time before, been inveſted with legantine authority, convoked a Synod at Wincheſter, and ſummoned Stephen to appear in perſon. But the king was determined not to ſubject the civil to the eccleſiaſtical power, and therefore refuſed to obey the ſummons. He, however, ſent one Aubrey de Vere, the moſt learned lawyer of his age, to anſwer for him, who juſtified the king's proceedings with great eloquence and force of argument. He obſerved, that it was inconſiſtent with the functions of the clergy, as the preachers of peace, to engage in the tumults of civil diſcord; and that the caſtles they had erected and fortified could be conſidered in no other light than as the ſeats of diſcord and the aſylum of rebellion. The legate loſt all patience at this bold remonſtrance, and was juſt going to pronounce an eccleſiaſtical anathema on the king and all his adherents, when Aubrey gave him to underſtand, that whoever dared to pronounce any ſpiritual interdict againſt his ſovereign ſhould never live to behold the fruits of his inſolence. This ſpirited declaration had more effect than all his reaſoning. Aſtoniſhed at the boldneſs of the deputy, and dreading the conſequences of Stephen's reſentment, the ſynod did not think it prudent to proceed. The prelates therefore departed, and the two complaining biſhops were obliged to give up their fortreſſes.

A. D. 1139. The earl of Glouceſter being no ſtranger to the contentions between Stephen and the clergy, thought it a proper opportunity of attempting to obtain that crown which by right belonged to his ſiſter Matilda. Accordingly having prevailed on her to repair with him to England, they ſet ſail, attended by a retinue of one hundred and forty-knights, and, after a quick paſſage landed ſafe on the coaſt of Suſſex. The empreſs immediately repaired to Arundel caſtle, where ſhe was affectionately received by the queen dowager, who had eſpouſed William de Albini, earl of Suſſex; and the earl of Glouceſter repaired to Briſtol.

The arrival of the empreſs and her brother greatly alarmed Stephen. He was no ſtranger to the popularity of Glouceſter, and was fearful that the people would join his ſtandard, in order to place his ſiſter on the throne. He therefore advanced immediately to Arundel caſtle, at the head of a conſiderable body of forces, in order to make himſelf maſter of that fortreſs. The queen dowager, alarmed at the approach of Stephen, diſpatched a meſſenger, requeſting him not to beſiege the empreſs in her palace, but give her liberty to retire to ſome other place, aſſuring him that ſhe had received her only as a gueſt, not as a competitor for the crown. Stephen readily complied with her requeſt, and the empreſs naming Briſtol as the place ſhe choſe for her reſidence, the king ordered his brother Walleran, earl of Mellent, to eſcort her to that city.

The empreſs no ſooner arrived at Briſtol, where ſhe was received by her brother Robert, at the head of a body of forces, than ſhe openly declared her title, and aſſerted her claim to the crown of England, requiring all her ſubjects to come and pay their allegiance. This produced the deſired effect: the people flocked to her ſtandard from all quarters, and ſeemed to vie with each other in duty and affection. But what greatly contributed to her ſucceſs was, the intereſt of Miles, high conſtable of England, who abandoned the party of Stephen, and declared for the empreſs. This nobleman was then in poſſeſſion of the caſtle and city of Glouceſter, one of the moſt important fortreſſes in the kingdom. He had alſo great intereſt with many powerful noblemen, and was poſſeſſed of immenſe riches, which he freely gave the empreſs for the ſupport of her cauſe. His example was followed by ſeveral other diſtinguiſhed barons, and the party of the empreſs was ſoon able to contend with Stephen for the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh crown.

A. D. 1140. The whole kingdom now became a ſcene of anarchy and confuſion, almoſt every individual declaring for one or other of the contending parties. The powerful barons attacked each others territories with all the rage of the moſt implacable enemy. Caſtles, churches, monaſteries, towns, and villages, were levelled to the ground, or laid in aſhes, to gratify the private animoſity of contending nobles, and the moſt inhuman cruelties were practiſed on the innocent inhabitants.

In this ſhocking exigence recourſe was had to negotiation, and ſeveral treaties made between the contending parties; but they all proved abortive, and the horrors of a civil war continued to increaſe. At length the diſpute was terminated by the ſword. Stephen marched at the head of his forces, and laid ſiege to the caſtle of Lincoln, which being conſidered as a place of the utmoſt importance, Glouceſter determined, if poſſible, to relieve it. He accordingly marched with the utmoſt expedition, and his troops having forded the Trent, appeared in the neighbourhood before Stephen had received any information of his approach. A general engagement was now unavoidable, and both armies prepared for a conteſt that was to decide the fate of the crown of England. The battle was begun by William de Ypres, one of Stephen's generals, and conſidered as the beſt officer of his time. He fell with the utmoſt fury on a body of Welſh poſted in the left wing, and put them to flight; but purſuing the broken ſquadron too far, his diviſion was charged in flank, and entirely broken. The earl of Glouceſter taking advantage of this ſucceſs, fell with amazing impetuoſity on the infantry, which compoſed the center of the royal army, where Stephen himſelf fought in perſon. The conteſt was dreadful, and the field covered with the ſlain. For ſome time it appeared as if the palm of victory would have fallen on Stephen, but it was loſt from the cowardice of his cavalry, who making a precipitate flight, his infantry were obliged to ſave themſelves by a retreat. Stephen, diſdaining to turn his back on the enemy, continued to fight with the moſt aſtoniſhing bravery, till at length receiving a blow with a ſtone, thrown by an unknown hand, he was felled to the ground, and obliged to ſurrender himſelf priſoner to the duke of Glouceſter. He was treated with the greateſt reſpect by that accompliſhed nobleman; but experienced a moſt humiliating reverſe of fortune, on his being delivered into the hands of the empreſs. That imperious princeſs treated him with every indignity, committed him a cloſe priſoner to the caſtle of Briſtol, and ordered him to be heavily loaded with chains.

As ſoon as the friends of Stephen heard of his defeat and captivity, the greater part deſerted him: the city of London, and the county of Kent (where his queen, his ſon Euſtace, and his great friend and favourite William de Ypres ſtill retained their authority) were the only places that continued faithful to the impriſoned monarch. Even his brother, the biſhop of Wincheſter, courted the favour of the empreſs: the attractions of power were ſtronger than the bonds of fraternal affection.

Henry declared for Matilda, who, in return, promiſed him all the honours his ambition could deſire, or which a churchman could receive. Armed with the legantine authority and proud of diſplaying his power, he ſummoned a ſynod, and after aſſerting that the clergy only had the right of electing and ordaining kings, declared that the empreſs Matilda ſhould be placed on the throne of England. The only laymen ſummoned to this council were the deputies of London, who were ſo far from agreeing with the unexpected declararion of Henry, that they peremptorily demanded the liberty of their king. The legate only anſwered by laying before them the errors of Stephen's adminiſtration, upon which the deputies, after ſolemnly proteſting againſt the proceedings of the ſynod, returned to London; and Henry pronounced an anathema againſt all the adherents of the impriſoned monarch. Thus was the ſceptre of England diſpoſed of by an aſſembly of ambitious churchmen, who dared to trample upon the authority of the nobles, and deſpiſe the liberties of the people. The power of the mitre was exalted above the power of the crown; and the rights of Engliſhmen ſacrificed at the ſhrine of eccleſiaſtical tyranny.

A. D. 1141. The authority of Matilda ſeemed now to be firmly eſtabliſhed, and ſhe might probably have lived and died ſovereign of England, had it not been for her natural pride and inſolence, by which ſhe loſt the affections of thoſe who had ſo warmly eſpouſed her cauſe, and defeated all the deſigns of her brother the earl of Glouceſter.

Some time after Stephen's captivity, his queen, ſeconded by many of the nobility, petitioned Matilda for the liberty of her huſband: and offered, if their requeſt was granted, that he ſhould renounce the crown, and retire to a convent. Another matter was aſked for by Henry the legate, namely, that his nephew, prince Euſtace, might inherit Boulogne, with the other patrimonial eſtates of his father: and the Londoners ſolicited for the eſtabliſhment of king Edward's laws, inſtead of thoſe of king Henry, which they conſidered as grievous and oppreſſive. But all theſe petitions were rejected by the empreſs in the moſt haughty and peremptory manner.

The haughty prelate was ſo exaſperated at the denial of his requeſt from the perſon who had obtained ſuch power from his authority, that he determined on a ſevere revenge. Accordingly, availing himſelf of the general diſcontent excited by the imperious conduct of Matilda, he ſecretly inſtigated the Londoners to a revolt, and a conſpiracy was accordingly formed for ſeizing the perſon of the empreſs. By ſome means or other Matilda received intelligence of this deſign, and retired haſtily to Glouceſter, in order to have recourſe to the counſel of the earl of Hereford, being diſguſted with her brother the earl of Glouceſter, who had adviſed her to purſue conciliatory meaſures, contrary to her arbitrary inclinations. She, however, ſoon after repaired to Oxford, where ſhe ordered a general rendezvous of her troops and party.

While Matilda was taking meaſures for ſecuring her authority by force of arms, her brother the earl of Glouceſter was uſing his utmoſt efforts to bring about a reconciliation between her and the legate; but all his endeavours proving abortive, he went to Oxford, where he found the empreſs preparing to ſet out at the head of her army, with a deſign of reducing the caſtle of Wincheſter. She was attended by the earl of Hereford, and expected the arrival of the earl of Cheſter, who had promiſed to march to her aſſiſtance, but had privately made peace with the legate and the royal party. She, however, repaired with her army to Wincheſter, and with little difficulty ſoon obtained poſſeſſion of the fortreſs. The legate found means to withdrew himſelf before her arrival, and having aſſembled all his followers, he joined his force to that of the Londoners and Stephen's mercenary troops who had not yet evacuated the kingdom. With theſe reinforcements he marched againſt the empreſs, took the city of Wincheſter, and beſieged Matilda in the fortreſs.

The legate had furniſhed the caſtle with ſuch a ſtock of proviſions that the beſieged held out ſeven weeks, and every attempt to take it by aſſault was rendered abortive by the valour and conduct of the earl of Glouceſter. But famine at length effected what force had attempted in vain; and the garriſon had but one alternative, either to cut themſelves a paſſage through the legate's forces, or ſurrender at diſcretion. They choſe the former, and made the neceſſary preparations for the deſperate attempt. The care of the perſon of the empreſs was committed to the main body of their forces; while Glouceſter himſelf, at the head of a ſmall party, ſallied out of the caſtle, and attacked the beſiegers with the utmoſt fury. Alarmed at the vigour of this party of the beſieged, the legate's army left their poſts to repulſe this gallant and reſolute part of the garriſon. This produced the wiſhed-for opportunity, and the empreſs, with the principal part of the army, made her eſcape, and fled to Glouceſter; but her brother, being overpowered by numbers, was taken priſoner, and ſent, under a ſtrong guard, to the caſtle of Rocheſter.

The earl of Glouceſter, though only a ſubject, was as much the life of his own party as Stephen was of the other; and the empreſs, ſenſible of his merit, conſented to exchange the noble priſoners upon equal terms. The earl was accordingly brought to Wincheſter, to which city Stephen, (having been releaſed from his confinement) alſo repaired. The latter was a ſtranger to that haughtineſs ſo common to thoſe who diſpute for empire, and therefore held a familiar and, ſeemingly, friendly, diſcourſe with the earl; after which they took leave of each other, and Robert repaired to his ſiſter at Glouceſter.

A. D. 1142. The intrepid and faithful earl took every meaſure he could project for ſtrengthening the intereſt of his ſiſter Matilda; but it was eaſily foreſeen, that while the empreſs, by whoſe proud and arbitrary conduct all the advantages gained by her friends had been loſt, continued at the head of her party in England, they could never hope for ſucceſs. A general meeting, therefore, of her adherents were ſummoned to meet at the Devizes, where it was agreed, that Geoffrey Plantagenet, huſband to the empreſs, ſhould be requeſted to ſend over the young prince Henry, that he might appear at the head of his partizans in England. In conſequence of this reſolution the earl of Glouceſter went over to Normandy, which, during Stephen's captivity, had ſubmitted to the earl of Anjou. The earl ſucceeded in his commiſſion, and accordingly brought the young prince, with a reinforcement of four hundred men, to England.

During the abſence of Glouceſter, Stephen had ſurpriſed the caſtle of Wareham in Dorſetſhire, taken the city of Oxford, and beſieged the caſtle, where the empreſs had retired for ſafety. But on the landing of Glouceſter, affairs put on a more pleaſing aſpect: he made himſelf maſter of the caſtle at Wareham, took poſſeſſion of the iſland of Purbeck, Purbeck, and advanced, at the head of an army, to raiſe the ſiege of Oxford Caſtle. Stephen had, for ſome time, preſſed the ſiege with the greateſt vigour; but the inclemency of the ſeaſon (the winter being now far advanced) had ſo reduced his army, that he had hardly troops ſufficient to ſurround the place. The empreſs took advantage of this, and (before her brother's arrival) made her eſcape to Wallingford, where ſhe was ſoon after joined by the earl; and Stephen, having reduced the caſtle of Oxford, returned to London.

A. D. 1143---1146. After Matilda's eſcape from Oxford, nothing material took place between the contending parties: a few caſtles, indeed, were taken, and ſome ſkirmiſhes happened between detachments from each party, but nothing deciſive. But at length a circumſtance happened of the utmoſt conſequence to the empreſs. The earl of Glouceſter, the principal ſupport of her cauſe, died of a fever, and was buried at Briſtol. In this accompliſhed nobleman the empreſs loſt the only perſon that deſerved her entire confidence, perhaps the only one that ſerved her without views of intereſt. He was prudent, intrepid, generous and ſincere; and an enemy to tyranny, injuſtice and deceit. He was beloved by his friends, his ſoldiers and his country. His death was lamented by the good and the virtuous, and even Stephen himſelf dropped a tear of reſpect to his memory.

The death of this gallant nobleman gave a mortal blow to the party of the empreſs. She ſaw it would be in vain for her to contend any longer for the crown. Her troops deſerted her, her friends behaved with coolneſs, and every thing indicated a ſad reverſe of fortune. She therefore immediately withdrew to the continent, leaving Stephen in full poſſeſſion of the throne.

A. D. 1148---1150. After the departure of Matilda the ſovereignty was preſerved by Stephen, without any interruption from the party of his competitor, and all things appeared likely to produce the reſtoration of tranquillity. But at length an event took place, which greatly endangered the peace of the nation. Prince Henry (the ſon of Matilda) was deſirous of receiving the honour of knighthood, a ceremony which every gentleman in that age paſſed through before he was admitted to the uſe of arms; and which was even conſidered as a requiſite for the greateſt princes. At the ſame time he propoſed to receive the ceremony from his great uncle David king of Scotland; and for that purpoſe paſſed through England with a large retinue, attended by the moſt conſiderable of his partizans. He ſtayed ſome time with the king of Scotland; made ſome excurſions into England, and, by his dexterity and vigour in all manly exerciſes, by his valour, and his prudent conduct on all occaſions, he rouzed the hopes of his party, and gave indications of being able, ſome time or other, to obtain that crown which had been loſt by the indiſcretion of Matilda.

Soon after Henry's return from Scotland, his father Geoffrey paid the debt of nature; a ſhort time before which he made his will, leaving young Henry all the honours and revenues of his duchy. The king of France, incenſed at Geoffrey's doing this without firſt obtaining his conſent, invaded Normandy, and laid ſiege to Arques. He imagined Henry was too young to make any great oppoſition: but in this he was miſtaken; for that gallant prince made ſo powerful a diverſion in France, during the abſence of Lewis, that the latter was obliged to raiſe the ſiege of Arques, and march, with all expedition, to the defence of his own dominions. A peace was ſoon after concluded, and, Geoffrey Plantaganet being dead, young Henry took quiet poſſeſſion of the duchy of Normandy, together with the provinces of Anjou and Maine.

Some time after this Henry married Eleanor, daughter and heireſs of William, duke of Guienne, and earl of Poictou. This lady had been married ſixteen years to Lewis VII. king of France, and had attended him in a cruſade againſt the infidels; but her huſband, ſuſpecting her fidelity while abroad, procured a divorce, and reſtored to her the rich provinces of Guienne and Poictou, which, upon his marriage, became annexed to the crown of France. But neither the diſparity of years, nor the report circulated to the prejudice of the lady's character, were ſufficient to check the aſpiring ſpirit of young Henry, who, ſix weeks after the divorce, eſpouſed the princeſs, and conſequently became entitled to all her poſſeſſions.

A. D. 1151. While every thing ſeemed to forebode proſperity to the duke of Normandy, Stephen imprudently involved himſelf in a quarrel with the pope, though it muſt be acknowedged he had ſufficient reaſon for his conduct. The pontiff had ſummoned a council to meet at Rheims, but inſtead of permitting Stephen, or even the church of England, to elect the deputies required, the pope nominated them himſelf. Stephen complained loudly of this breach of national privilege; but Eugenius, who then filled the papal chair, regarded not his remonſtrances. Enraged at this inſult, the king would not ſuffer them to attend, and the pontiff, in revenge for this interpoſition, laid the kingdom under an interdict. By this ſentence all religious offices were ſuſpended, the churches ſhut up, and the dead not ſuffered to be interred in conſecrated ground. An univerſal terror was ſpread throughout the nation; and Stephen thought it neceſſary to make ſubmiſſion to the pope, in order to procure a reverſion of the ſentence.

A. D. 1152. Stephen was no ſtranger to the increaſing power and popularity of the duke of Normandy, and was fearful of the conſequences. In order, therefore, to ſecure the Engliſh ſceptre in his own family, he convened a council in London, at which he propoſed admitting his ſon Euſtace to an equal ſhare in the government. This being appproved, the archbiſhop of Canterbury was requeſted to anoint Euſtace as his ſucceſſor; but the primate abſolutely refuſed to aſſiſt in the ſolemnity. Incenſed at his denial, Stephen ordered the archbiſhop to be confined; but he found means to corrupt the guards, and getting his liberty, paſſed over to the continent. The departure of the primate rendered the king's attempt to ſecure the ſucceſſion in his family abortive; it being then conſidered, that the archbiſhop of Canterbury poſſeſſed an unalienable right to crown the kings of England.

A. D. 1153. The primate's refuſal of anointing Stephen's ſon as his ſucceſſor, greatly animated the party of Henry, who diſpatched meſſengers to Normandy requeſting him to repair to England, and attempt the recovery of a crown which had been wreſted from him by an uſurper. Henry readily liſtened to their importunities, immediately embarked, and landed on the 6th of January, at the head of a very ſmall body of troops; but their number was ſoon increaſed by the greater and moſt reſpectable part of the nobility in the kingdom.

Stephen saw the gathering storm, and laboured assiduously to break its force. He marched, at the head of his forces, to meet the duke of Normandy; but the badness of the roads so greatly retarded his progress, that Henry made himself master of several strong castles before Stephen could afford the garrisons the least relief. At length the two armies met in the neighbourhood of Wallingford, and made preparations for deciding, by a general action, the great contest for the English crown. But the nobles on both sides, willing to prevent the farther effusion of human blood, interposed their good offices, and a negotiation being proposed and agreed to, a suspension of arms was immediately proclaimed at the head of each army.

This circumstance gave great uneasiness to Eustace, who foresaw there could be no agreement between his father and a prince of Henry's ambitious temper, but what must be greatly to his prejudice. His late prospect of being raised to the throne embittered his reflections. He warmly expostulated with his father on the impropriety of coming to any accommodation with Henry. Stephen was far from being deficient in parental affection; but could not listen to his son's request: the necessities of the times compelled him to submit. Eustace, fired with resentment, left the army, and retired into Cambridgeshire, where he took the field at the head of an independent body of troops, and committed some depredations in different parts of the country; but did not long continue to practise these outrages, for he died soon after at St. Edmundsbury, and was buried at Feversham.

The death of Eustace greatly facilitated the negotiation then carrying on between Stephen and Henry. The bishop of Winchester was also now desirous of concluding a peace between the two princes. That pragmatical prelate, the flame of whose ambition had lighted up the torch of war that so long desolated the kingdom, seeing no prospect of the sceptre's continuing in his family, began now to cherish pacific sentiments. Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, who was returned to England, and reinstated in all his former dignities and possessions, laboured also with great earnestness to accomplish the desirable work of peace. The business was at length effected, and articles being drawn up, it was agreed to call a general council of the nobility at Winchester, in order to their being ratified. This was accordingly done, and the substance of the treaty was to this effect: that Stephen should enjoy the crown during his life, and that, on his death, Henry should succeed to the throne.

The treaty being thus concluded, the barons did homage to Henry as lawful heir to the crown, and the two princes repaired to London, that Henry might receive the fealty of the citizens. On their arrival in the capital, the people testified their satisfaction by the loudest acclamations, and Henry, after staying only a few days, embarked for Normandy, leaving Stephen in quiet possession of the throne.

A. D. 1154. Being now freed from all apprehensions of an enemy, Stephen solely directed his attention to remove the sufferings of the people, and heal the wounds of his distressed country. He reformed many abuses, made several wise and salutary laws, and gave many instances of his great abilities and love of justice. In short, he seemed as if resolved to devote the remainder of his days to the ease and benefit of his subjects, to pursue every method for securing their properties, protecting their persons, and diffusing through the whole kingdom universal tranquillity. But while he was employed in these offices of justice and humanity, he was seized with a disorder called the illiac passion, of which he died on the 25th of October, in the 50th year of his age, and 19th of his reign. His remains were interred in the abbey church of Feversham, which had been founded by himself, and where, a short time before, were deposited the remains of his wife, and son.

Ambition was the ruling passion of Stephen. To gratify this darling object, he trampled on the laws of justice, and plunged an innocent people into all the horrors of civil discord. But at the same time it must be acknowledged, that he was a prince of great fortitude, courage, activity and generosity. He harboured not the passion of revenge, and malevolence seems to have been a stranger to his breast. He dispensed justice impartially to his subjects, and cherished the virtue of forgiveness. In short, he possessed so many good qualities, that had he ascended the throne by right of inheritance, and lived in less troublesome times, his administration would, in all probability, have produced honour to himself, and happiness to his subjects.

Remarkable Occurences during the reign of Stephen.

A. D.

1135 On the day Stephen landed to take upon him the sovereignty of England, there happened a most dreadful storm of thunder and lightning, which being in the winter season was considered by the people as an omen of those troubles that afterwards took place throughout the kingdom.

1149 This year there fell so much rain in the summer season that all the fruits of the earth were destroyed, and a dreadful famine ensued, which lasted for some time, till relief could be obtained from foreign countries.

On the 9th of December, in the same year began a very severe frost. It continued till the 9th of February following, during which time the river Thames was entirely frozen over, so as to admit a passage not only for people, but likewise for horses and carriages.

1150 On the 21st of March there happened a remarkable eclipse of the sun, by which it was so dark that candles were lighted at noon-day, and near the sun were seen several stars.

From the Acceſſion of Henry II. to the Death of King John.

CHAP. I.

HENRY II. ſurnamed PLANTAGENET.

Acceſſion of Henry II. Firſt acts of his government. Henry marches againſt the Welſh. Goes over to France, and lays ſiege to Thouloufe, but, on the arrival of Lewis, raiſes the ſiege, makes peace with the French monarch, and returns to England. Goes again to France, and, with Lewis, pays diſtinguiſhed homage to the pope. Returns, and reſolves to make a reform among the clergy, to facilitate which he appoints Thomas a Becket to the ſee of Canterbury. Violent diſputes between the king and Becket. Conſtitutions of Clarendon. Becket, after behaving in an inſolent manner to the king, retires privately, and flies to the court of France. Henry paſſes over to the continent, in order to bring about a reconciliation with Becket; but without effect. Returns to England, and aſſembles a parliament at Windſor. Gets his eldeſt ſon Henry crowned, and ſerves the firſt diſh at his table. Goes over to the continent, and an accommodation takes place between him and Becket, who is reſtored to his archiepiſcopal dignities, but ſoon after aſſaſſinated. Compromiſe between Henry and the court of Rome. Conqueſt of Ireland. Revolt of young Henry and his brothers. Wars abroad, and inſurrections at home. Remarkable penance of Henry for the murder of Becket. William, king of Scotland, defeated and taken priſoner. Henry goes over to France, and an accommodation takes place between him and his ſons. Returns to England, and makes many wiſe regulations for the good of his ſubjects. Prince Henry again revolts, but ſoon after dies. His brother Geoffrey follows his example, but is ſtopped in his unnatural deſigns by being killed in a tournament. Revolt of prince Richard. Death and character of Henry.

A. D. 1154. AT the time Henry received intelligence of Stephen's death, he was engaged in beſieging a caſtle belonging to one of his mutinous barons on the frontiers of Normandy; but conſcious that his great power and popularity would prevent any ſchemes being formed for interrupting his ſucceſſion, and relying on the veneration in which he knew his perſon to be held in England, he determined to perſevere in his attempt of reducing the fortreſs, and accordingly continued the ſiege till the garriſon ſurrendered. As ſoon as this was accompliſhed he embarked for England, where he landed on the 8th of December, amidſt the univerſal acclamations of the people; and on the 19th of the ſame month he and his queen were crowned at Weſtminſter by Theobald, then archbiſhop of Canterbury.

A. D. 1155. The Engliſh had conceived very flattering ideas of the virtues and abilities of Henry; and the firſt acts of his government convinced them that their ideas were juſtly founded. He diligently applied himſelf to the removal of thoſe complaints which had been ſo general, in the late turbulent reign. He diſmiſſed the mercenary ſoldiers of Stephen, by which the kingdom was freed from a burthen that had occaſioned the moſt affecting complaints. The bands of robbers, who ſo long ravaged the country, were deſtroyed, and every ſpecies of violence ſuppreſſed: the powerful were reſtrained from acts of tyranny, and the licentious from diſturbing the repoſe of the peaceable and harmleſs. The laws were executed with proper authority; nor did any dare diſpute the power of the magiſtrate. The fortreſſes raiſed by the nobles, who had ſo often ſpread deſolation over various counties, were demoliſhed, except only a few, which were retained on account of their advantageous ſituation for the defence of the kingdom.

Henry was far from wanting aſſiſtance in eſtabliſhing theſe meaſures of national utility; he was ſupported by the people at large, and had nothing to fear but from a few turbulent barons, who at firſt oppoſed the deſtruction of their caſtles, but in a ſhort time quietly ſubmitted. Henry alſo paſſed a charter of liberties in which he confirmed all thoſe privileges which had been granted by his grandfather Henry I. By theſe, and other acts of popularity, Henry obtained the univerſal affection of his ſubjects, and perfect tranquillity was ſoon eſtabliſhed throughout the kingdom.

A. D. 1156. In the beginning of this year Henry embarked for Normandy, in order to puniſh the inſolence of his brother Geoffrey, who had made incurſions into Anjou and Maine, and poſſeſſed himſelf of the principal parts of thoſe provinces. Henry no ſooner diſembarked than his claims were univerſally acknowledged; upon which Geoffrey finding it would be in vain to contend with the ſuperior power of his brother, reſigned his claims for an annual penſion, to be paid by Henry, of one thouſand pounds. Soon after this Geoffrey took poſſeſſion of the county of Nantz, which the inhabitants, who had expelled count Noel, their prince, put into his hands, and inveſted him with the full power of adminiſtration.

A. D. 1157. Having ſettled his affairs in Normandy, Henry returned to England, and on his arrival found that the Welſh, who were ever reſtleſs and uneaſy, had entered the Engliſh territories, and committed the moſt horrid depredations on the innocent inhabitants. In conſequence of this Henry marched againſt them at the head of a powerful army; but the cowardice of his ſtandard-bearer had like to have proved fatal both to him and his whole army. The attack of the Welſh was made with all the fury natural to thoſe people, which ſo terrified Henry de Eſſer, who carried the royal royal ſtandard, that, throwing down the enſign, he fled with the utmoſt precipitation. Alarmed at miſſing the royal ſtandard, the Engliſh were intimidated, and, thinking the king was ſlain, were thrown into the utmoſt confuſion. Henry, perceiving the cauſe of the diſorder, rode through the ranks bare-headed to convince them of their miſtake; in conſequence of which the Engliſh, aſhamed of their puſillanimous conduct, returned to the charge with redoubled courage, and fell ſo violently on the inſurgents that they were obliged to ſeek their ſafety by flight, after great numbers had been killed on the field of battle. Thoſe who eſcaped retired with all poſſible expedition to their own country, ſoon after which Henry concluded a peace with the Welſh prince, and diſbanded his army.

A. D. 1159. Though Henry was maſter of great power and conſiderable poſſeſſions, yet he was very deſirous of increaſing them, and therefore laid claim to the county of Thouloufe, in right of his queen, to whom it belonged; but Raymond, count of Thouloufe, refuſed to deliver up the territories. In conſequence of this Henry determined to obtain them by force of arms, and accordingly paſſed over to the continent, and engaged a number of mercenaries to aſſiſt him in his intended expedition. He began his military operations by laying ſiege to Cahors, the capital of the province of Quercy, which he ſoon reduced, and made himſelf maſter of the place; but the city of Thouloufe made a gallant defence, and the Engliſh monarch exerted all his abilities to take it. Lewis, king of France, was alarmed at Henry's progreſs. He was fearful that if he ſhould be ſuffered to make himſelf maſter of the principal places in the heart of France, his ambition might puſh him on to farther conqueſts, and he might even advance to the very gates of Paris. Lewis therefore marched at the head of a body of forces, and threw himſelf into Thouloufe before Henry could become maſter of the city. In conſequence of this Henry immediately deſiſted from farther proſecuting his deſign, declaring he owed ſo much reſpect to Lewis, that he would not attack a place defended by him in perſon. He therefore raiſed the ſiege, and a treaty of peace was ſoon after concluded between the two monarchs.

A. D. 1160.-1163. This peace, however, was but of ſhort duration: ambition ſoon diſſolved the bands of amity between the two monarchs. Henry's eldeſt ſon had, for ſome time, been contracted in marriage to Margaret, the daughter of Lewis, and it was agreed in the treaty that the princeſs ſhould have the city of Giſor, with part of Norman Vexin, for her portion; and that thoſe places ſhould remain in the cuſtody of the Knights Templars till the marriage was celebrated. Anxious for obtaining poſſeſſion of theſe valuable places, Henry prevailed upon the cardinals Piſa and Pavia to grant him a ſynodical decree, diſpenſing with the nonage of the parties. In conſequence of this the nuptials were immediately celebrated, though the prince was but ſeven, and the princeſs only three years of age; and the Templars, conſidering themſelves as free from their engagement, delivered up the caſtle of Giſon, and the other places aſſigned as Margaret's dowry.

The French monarch was highly incenſed at the proceedings of Henry; and his firſt reſentment fell upon the Templars, to whom the cuſtody of the caſtle had been committed, and whom he baniſhed his dominions. This, in all probability, would have been ſucceeded by a war between the two monarchs, had it not been for Pope Alexander III. who was then in France, and being deſirous of preventing the effuſion of human blood, interpoſed and brought about a reconciliation *.

Henry, after having accommodated all differences with the French monarch, returned to England, and flattered himſelf with poſſeſſing a long ſeries of peace and tranquillity; but he was greatly deceived in his expectations, and his life rendered unhappy by the very perſon who owed his whole fortune to his bounty. This was the celebrated Thomas a Becket †, whoſe conduct ſet the nation in a flame, and rendered abortive the ſcheme which Henry had formed for confining the eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction within proper bounds, and of ſuppreſſing the licentiouſneſs of the clergy, who arrogated to themſelves the privileges which were contrary to the peace of ſociety. Henry was reſolved to correct theſe enormities, and, without depriving the church of its real privileges, to eſtabliſh proper limits to the pretenſions of the clergy. He conſidered Becket as the moſt proper perſon for aſſiſting him in the execution of this noble deſign, and accordingly on the death of Theobald, promoted him to the archiepiſcopal ſee of Canterbury.

Becket, before his promotion, had given a looſe to the uſual pleaſures and amuſements of the age; but his whole behaviour was changed after being placed at the head of the church. He reſigned the office of chancellor, renounced all concern in ſecular affairs, ſubmitted to the moſt rigid mortifications, and became laviſh in his generoſity to the poor. By this conduct he gained the general reſpect of the people; but inſtead of becoming an aſſiſtant to Henry in executing his grand deſign of limiting the privileges of the clergy, he purſued only ſuch meaſures as were moſt conducive to his own emolument. He attempted to recover all the lands that had been alienated from the ſee of Canterbury, pretending that none of his predeceſſors had any right to diſpoſe of the property of the church. Nor was he contented with this attempt to extend his authority and power: he aſſerted that it was the prerogative of the archbiſhop to fill vacant church livings in the manors of the military tenants, as well as thoſe of the churches of Canterbury.

* In order to account for the pope's interference on this occaſion, as well as to form an idea of the great authority poſſeſſed by the Roman pontiff at that period, it may not be improper to remark, that the two kings had, the year before, met the pontiff at the caſtle of Toris on the Loire; and gave him ſuch marks of reſpect, that both diſmounted from their horſes to receive him, and each holding one of the reins of the bridle, walked by his ſide, and in that ſubmiſſive manner, conducted him to the gate of the caſtle.

† Thomas a Becket was the ſon of a citizen of London, and had ſpent his youth in the ſtudy of the civil and canon law at Boulogne. He was poſſeſſed of very ſingular talents, and had a ſpirit not to be daunted even by the frowns of royalty. He had been raiſed by Theobald, archbiſhop of Canterbury, to conſiderable preferments in the church, and on Henry's acceſſion to the throne was recommended to him by that primate as a perſon worthy of his confidence and favour. Henry accordingly promoted him to ſeveral places of truſt, and in particular to that of chancellor, one of the firſt civil offices in the kingdom. After obtaining that high poſt he was made provoſt of Beverley, dean of Haſtings, and conſtable of the Tower; and, to complete his importance, was entruſted with the education of prince Henry, the king's eldeſt ſon, and heir apparent to the crown.

bury. He accordingly collated one Laurence to the rectory of Aresford; but the patron, who was a peer of the realm, reſolved not to ſubmit to ſo inſolent an intruſion, and immediately ejected Laurence from the benefice. This was conſidered by Becket as an unpardonable offence, and he pronounced the ſentence of excommunication againſt the patron.

As ſoon as Henry was informed of theſe proceedings he diſpatched a meſſenger to Becket, inſiſting that he ſhould immediately abſolve the patron; but the haughty prelate ſent him for anſwer, that it did not belong to him to command him either to abſolve or excommunicate any perſon whatever. A little reflection, however, convinced him of his error: a law, paſſed in the reign of William the Conqueror, inflicted the penalty of high-treaſon on any churchman, who ſhould promulgate an eccleſiaſtical cenſure on any military tenant of the crown, without the king's conſent; and the prelate, not chuſing to ſubject himſelf to this penalty, annulled the ſentence.

Henry was now convinced of his miſtake in the opinion he had entertained of Becket; but ſtill was reſolved, if poſſible, to reduce the power of the eccleſiaſtics; and an event ſoon happened which gave him the opportunity of attempting the execution of his deſign. A clergyman in Worceſterſhire debauched a gentleman's daughter, and in order to conceal the offence murdered the father. Henry gave orders that the criminal ſhould be tried in the ſecular court, and puniſhed according to the laws of the kingom. In conſequence of this Becket inſiſted on the privilege of the church, and poſitively aſſerted that no greater puniſhment could be inflicted than that of degradation, and being ſhut up in a monaſtery during the remainder of his life. He likewiſe added, that, to ſubject an eccleſiaſtic to the cognizance of the civil magiſtrate was an high infringement on the privileges of the church, and which he would always oppoſe to the utmoſt of his power.

Aſtoniſhed at the inſolence of Becket, the king called an aſſembly of all the prelates at Weſtminſter, and ſolemnly demanded, "whether they "conſented to, and allowed, that ſuch clergymen "as were convicted of felony ſhould be degraded, "and immediately on their degradation, deliver-"ed over to a ſecular officer for corporal puniſh-"ment." This demand, which was perfectly conſiſtent with juſtice, and the antient laws of the land, met with very little oppoſition from any of the clergy, except the archbiſhop, who alledged, that it was contrary both to the law and inſtitutions of the church, for a delinquent to undergo a double puniſhment for the ſame offence. At the ſame time told his brethren, that it ill became them (who were forbid to have any concern in ſentences of death) to expoſe any perſon of their own order to capital puniſhment. Swayed by the authority, and fearing the power of Becket, the biſhops declined coming to any reſolution on the ſubject of the king's demand. This greatly exaſperated the king, who put to them the following preciſe and deciſive queſtion: "Whether or not they were willing to ſubmit to the antient laws of the kingdom." The anſwer returned was equivocal: a ſalvo was added with regard to the clerical order and the privileges of the church; on which Henry left the ſynod with marks of the greateſt indignation.

The biſhops, alarmed at the abrupt departure of the king, repreſented to Becket, that his unreaſonable obſtinacy would, in all probability, be fatal to the privilege of the clergy; and therefore adviſed him to make conceſſions to offended majeſty. But the archbiſhop was deaf to their entreaties, declaring, that he was ready to lay down his life in ſupport of the canons of the church. Aſtoniſhed at the obſtinacy of Becket, the biſhops, who were not equally blinded by enthuſiaſm, conſidered that whatever honour their countenancing the prelate might reflect on them at the court of Rome, yet, as Engliſhmen, they had every thing to fear from the reſentment of an active and warlike prince. Inſtigated by theſe conſiderations, they waited on the king, and gave him an abſolute promiſe to ſubmit themſelves to the laws of the nation. Their example was followed by Becket, who promiſed, on the faith of an honeſt man, to pay a ſtrict adherence to the laws of the kingdom.

A. D. 1164. This ſubmiſſion was highly pleaſing to the king, who, in order to prevent any future controverſy, reſolved to have the laws of the kingdom fully explained and defined, that the limits of the civil and eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction, might be properly aſcertained. For this purpoſe he ſummoned a general council of the nobility and prelates at Clarendon, where the following laws (commonly called the Conſtitutions of Clarendon) were by the aſſembly framed and unanimouſly agreed to:

1. That all ſuits relative to the advowſon and preſentation of livings, ſhould be determined in the civil courts.

2. That the churches, belonging to the king's fee, ſhould not be granted in perpetuity without his conſent.

3. That clergymen accuſed of any crime, ſhould be tried in the civil courts.

4. That no perſon, particularly no clergyman of any rank, ſhould depart the kingdom without the king's licence.

5. That excommunicated perſons ſhould not be bound to give ſecurity for continuing in their uſual place of abode.

6. That the laity ſhould not be accuſed in ſpiritual courts, except by legal and reputable witneſſes.

7. That no chief tenant of the crown ſhould be excommunicated, nor his lands put under an interdict, except with the king's conſent.

8. That all appeals in ſpiritual caſes ſhould be carried from the archdeacon to the biſhop, from the biſhop to the primate, from him to the king, and no farther without the king's conſent.

9. That if any law-ſuit aroſe between a layman and a clergyman concerning a tenement, and if he diſputed whether the land be a lay or an eccleſiaſtical fee, it ſhould be determined by the verdict of twelve lawful men to what claſs it belonged, and if found to be a lay fee, the cauſe ſhould finally be determined in the civil courts.

10. That no inhabitant in demeſne ſhould be excommunicated for non-appearance in a ſpiritual court, till the chief officer of the place, where he reſided, be conſulted, that he might compel him, by the civil authority, to give ſatisfaction to the church.

11. That the archbiſhops, biſhops, and other ſpiritual dignitaries, ſhould be conſidered as barons of the realm; ſhould poſſeſs the privileges and be ſubject to the burthens belonging to that rank; and ſhould be bound to attend the king in his great council, and aſſiſt at all trials, till the ſentence, either of death or loſs of members, be given againſt the criminal.

12. That the revenues of the vacant ſees ſhould belong to the king; the chapter, or ſuch of them as he might think proper to ſummons, ſhould ſit in the king's chapel till they made the new election with his conſent; and that the biſhop elected ſhould do homage to the crown.

13. That if any baron ſhould refuſe to ſubmit to the ſpiritual courts, the king ſhould uſe his authority in obliging him to make ſuch ſubmiſſion; and if any one threw off his allegiance, the prelates ſhould, with their cenſures, aſſiſt the king in reducing him to ſubjection.

14. That goods forfeited to the king ſhould not be protected in churches or church-yards.

15. That all actions and ſuits for debt, due either upon oath or ſolemn promiſe, or otherwiſe contracted, ſhould be tried in the king's court.

16. That the ſons of villains, or copyholders, ſhould not be ordained without the conſent of the lord of the manor.

Such were the famous articles ſo well known under the title of "The Conſtitutions of Clarendon." The biſhops, over-awed by the barons, who were all gained over to the king's party, readily ſigned them; but Becket retracted his promiſe, and for ſome time abſolutely refuſed, till at length by the repeated ſolicitations of the nobility and clergy he was prevailed on to aſſent, and not only ſigned the articles, but likewiſe promiſed "legally with good faith, and without fraud, to obey them."

Having thus far ſucceeded in his deſign, Henry tranſmitted a copy of the articles to the pope in order to have them confirmed by a bull. But the pontiff was ſo far from complying with the wiſhes of the king, that he condemned and annulled them, as being incompatible with the rights of the church.

As ſoon as Becket was informed that the pope had rejected the articles, he expreſſed the deepeſt ſorrow for having ſigned them, redoubled his auſterities, and refuſed to exerciſe any part of his archiepiſcopal function till he ſhould receive abſolution from the pontiff.

The conduct of Becket ſo irritated the king, that it was generally apprehended by all Becket's friends his ruin was determined. The archbiſhop himſelf was alarmed, and applied to Henry for leave to viſit the pope, in order to confer with him on ſome important affairs relative to the church; but this the king abſolutely refuſed. The next day the prelate repaired to Woodſtock where Henry reſided; but the king would not permit him to enter the palace.

A few days after this Henry ſummoned a council at Northampton where no leſs than four articles of impeachment were preferred againſt the prelate. The firſt was for contumacy, in not having appeared at the king's court in perſon, to anſwer a writ brought againſt him by John, mareſchal of the Exchequer, who had ſued the primate in the archiepiſcopal court, for ſome laws belonging to the manor of Pagham, and, who, thinking the determination illegal, had appealed from thence to the king's court for juſtice. The archbiſhop endeavoured to defend himſelf, but was convicted, and fined 500l.

The ſecond article was, his having embezzled 300l. he had received as conſtable of the caſtles of Eye in Suffolk and Berkhamſtead in Hertfordſhire. In anſwer to this he alledged, that he had laid out a greater ſum in the repairs of royal caſtles; but the king denying this allegation, and demanding immediate judgment, he agreed to refund the money.

The third charge brought againſt him was for 500 marks which he had borrowed from the king. The archbiſhop pleaded that he was unprepared to anſwer to this charge; but the plea was over-ruled, and Becket obliged to give ſecurity for the payment.

The laſt charge was of much greater importance, and of a more complicated nature than either of the other three. He was required to give an account of his adminiſtration while chancellor, and to pay the balance due from the revenues of all the biſhoprics, abbies and baronies, which had, during that time, been ſubjected to his management. To this charge the primate replied, it could not be expected he was prepared to anſwer a charge of ſo complicated a nature, as he had not received any intimation of it in his ſummons; but promiſed to give the king ſatisfaction, if he would give him time to deliberate on the ſituation of his affairs and conſult with his friends. This requeſt being granted he left the court, and retired to his apartments, where he ſpent the whole night in cloſe conſultation with his friends, ſome of whom adviſed him to reſign his ſee, as the moſt probable means of making his peace with the king: others adviſed him to offer 10,000 marks as a compenſation; while a third party recommended, that he ſhould throw himſelf entirely on the mercy of his ſovereign, without making, or attempting to make, any terms whatever.

The archbiſhop, however, did not think proper to follow the advice of either party; but on the contrary reſolved to repair next day to the court, and, inſtead of giving any account of his ſtewardſhip, or making the leaſt ſubmiſſion, to inſiſt on the privileges of the church. Thinking ſome religious ſolemnity might attract the notice of the people in his favour, he propoſed walking to the court barefooted, dreſſed in his pontifical robes, and to carry in his hand the croſs of Canterbury. His friends, however, diſſuading him from this deſign, he laid aſide his pall and mitre, and wearing his other ſacred veſtments, with the cope above them, the croſs being carried before him proceeded in that manner on horſeback to the king's court. When he came to the outward court he alighted, and taking the croſs into his own hand, proceeded in that manner into the preſence chamber, where he ſet himſelf down, holding the croſs before him. Every perſon preſent was ſtruck with aſtoniſhment at his inſolence and folly. The biſhops, in particular, were aſhamed and confounded: they told him his behaviour looked as if he came prepared to ſet the whole kingdom in a flame, and to put his ſovereign at open defiance: they repreſented the ill conſequences of ſuch vain and inſolent behaviour, and endeavoured to perſuade him to deliver the croſs to the biſhop of Hereford; but the haughty prelate would not comply. At length the archbiſhop of York, being no longer able to bear with his inſolence, told him that, notwithſtanding the croſs was in his hand, he would find the king carried much ſharper weapons. "It is true, replied Becket, the king's weapon can kill the body, but mine can deſtroy the ſoul." This anſwer, which ſeemed to threaten the king and court with excommunication, was carried to Henry, then ſitting in an inner chamber, who was ſo provoked at ſuch an imperious menace, that he ſent for the nobles and prelates, to whom he complained loudly of Becket's intolerable inſolence in entering his court in ſuch a preſumptuous manner. The whole council joined in condemning this inſtance of the prelate's pride; and at the ſame time informed the king that Becket had intimated to them his deſign of appealing to the pope for protection.

Willing to avoid a rupture with the pontiff, though at the ſame time deſirous of puniſhing the inſolence of the prelate, Henry went into the preſence chamber, remonſtrated with Becket on the impropriety of his conduct, and reminded him of his having aſſented to, and ſubſcribed, the articles of Clarendon. Becket told him, the cauſe of God and the church had rendered his conſent to thoſe articles of no force; and that he put himſelf under the protection of the Roman pontiff, the ſupreme head of the church, to whom he appealed againſt the ſentences that either had, or might be pronounced, againſt him, and ſtrictly enjoined his ſuffragans not to join in any enterprize that was contrary to the privileges of the church.

The king and barons were ſo exaſperated at this arrogant behaviour, that a propoſition was made to commit the prelate to priſon; upon which, not chuſing to hear the ſentence denounced, he abruptly left the aſſembly, and retired, with his croſs erect before him, to the monaſtery of St. Andrews.

The next day Becket ſent three biſhops to the king to aſk a ſafe conduct for his departure; but this being denied, he retired privately, in the night, attended only by two ſervants, and fled to the continent. He was received by Lewis king of France, and pope Alexander, who was then at the court of that monarch, with every mark of reſpect. By the munificence of Lewis he lived with the utmoſt magnificence in the monaſtery of Pontigni, and the pope made preparations for iſſuing bulls to revenge his diſgrace.

As ſoon as Henry was informed of Becket's departure from the kingdom, he immediately diſpatched a very reſpectable embaſſy to the pope, to ſolicit the depoſition of the primate, offering, at the ſame time, in caſe his requeſt was granted, to double the revenue of Peter's-pence, and to render it a perpetual tax. But the pope was inflexible: he poſitively refuſed compliance on any terms whatever; upon which the ambaſſadors left his court, and returned to England. Immediately on their arrival Henry ſummoned an aſſembly of the nobles, when it was determined to ſequeſter all the poſſeſſions of the ſee of Canterbury, together with all the revenues of the churches, chapels, and rents of the clergy who adhered to Becket; and all the primate's relations and domeſtics, both clergy and laity, were baniſhed the kingdom.

A. D. 1165. Henry was apprehenſive theſe proceedings might ſo irritate the pope as to be productive of the moſt fatal conſequences. He therefore went over to the continent, in order, if poſſible, by a perſonal conference with his holineſs, to prevent an interdict being laid on the kingdom. An interview was accordingly propoſed, and it was agreed that Becket ſhould not be preſent. The archbiſhop was alarmed at this excluſion, being fearful that the pope, on hearing a fair account of the whole proceedings, would withdraw his protection, and abandon him to the vengeance of an enraged monarch. He therefore told his holineſs "he might be impoſed on by the fluent and plauſible ſpeeches of Henry, unleſs himſelf was preſent to interpret their meaning." The pontiff liſtened to this artful ſuggeſtion of the prelate, and inſiſted on the archbiſhop being preſent at the interview. But Henry diſdained to ſubmit to this propoſal, and, without taking leave of the pope, embarked for his own dominions.

A. D. 1166. As it was reaſonable to ſuppoſe the pontiff would exert all his power in favour of Becket, Henry, on his arrival in England, took every precaution he could project to render that power abortive. He prohibited all his ſubjects, under ſevere penalties, from receiving any mandates either from his holineſs or the archbiſhop, and from appealing to their authority in any inſtance whatever. He declared that whoever brought an interdict on the kingdom from the pope or Becket ſhould be deemed guilty of treaſon, and be puniſhed by death if done by a layman; by loſs of ſight if done by a ſecular clergyman; and by amputation of feet if by regular eccleſiaſtics. On the contrary, the pope and archbiſhop did all they could to wreak their vengeance on the king. Becket denounced anathemas againſt all his enemies, and at laſt pronounced the ſentence of excommunication againſt all that adhered to the conſtitutions of Clarendon, and abſolved every perſon from the oaths they had taken to obſerve them. Nay, he even went ſo far as to threaten to excommunicate the king, unleſs he repented of what he had done, and had ſuch influence over the pope as to obtain his ratification of the cenſures.

A. D. 1167. While the king and Becket were thus purſuing meaſures of the moſt contentious and dangerous nature, Lewis king of France interpoſed his good offices to bring about an accommodation. Becket declared he was ready to put an end to all diſputes, and to ſubmit to the king, on condition of having all his honours and poſſeſſions reſtored. At length an interview was agreed on, and Becket met the kings of France and England at a village in the neighbourhood of Paris; but the primate was ſo unreaſonable and haughty, that Lewis was perſuaded it would be impoſſible to bring about a reconciliation. Henry, deſirous of pacification, ſaid to Lewis, "There have been many kings of England, and there have been many archbiſhops of Canterbury: let Becket act towards me with the ſame ſubmiſſion which the greateſt of his predeceſſors have paid to the leaſt of mine, and I ſhall be ſatisfied." But Becket refuſed to acquieſce in ſo reaſonable a propoſal. Lewis was, or at leaſt ſeemed to be, diſguſted, and the two kings departed without taking leave of the archbiſhop; but the correſpondence and friendſhip between the monarch of France and the prelate was ſoon after renewed.

After this interview Henry viſited his Norman dominions, where he continued ſome time, during which he gave that duchy, together with the provinces of Maine and Anjou, to his eldeſt ſon Henry; Poictou and Guienne to his ſon Richard, and Britany to his third ſon Geoffrey, who held it as a fief depending upon Normandy, and ſwore fealty to his eldeſt brother. Lewis, as lord paramount of theſe fiefs, confirmed the grants, and the young princes did homage to the French monarch for their reſpective territories.

A. D. 1169. Henry, after having ſecured his Norman dominions in the poſſeſſion of his own family, returned to England, and immediately on his arrival ſummoned a parliament, or great council of the nation, to meet at Windſor. In this aſſembly the kingdom was divided into circuits; and certain earls, knights and clergymen, appointed commiſſioners to make a progreſs through theſe diviſions, in order to take cognizance of all abuſes committed committed by the ſheriffs, bailiffs, and other inferior officers. This inquiſition produced the moſt ſalutary effects; the ſubject was eaſed of many exactions, various grievances were redreſſed, and peace eſtabliſhed in every part of the kingdom.

A. D. 1170. Henry had, for ſome time, reſolved in his mind to take effectual meaſures for ſecuring the ſucceſſion of the crown to his eldeſt ſon; but thought proper to conceal his deſign till the very moment of its execution, leſt the turbulent primate ſhould find means to render the whole abortive. He did not forget the little regard the Engliſh had paid to their oath of fealty in the caſe of his mother, and was determined not to ſubject his own children to the ſame misfortune: he therefore reſolved to have the crown formally placed on the head of his eldeſt ſon Henry, then in the 16th year of his age. He accordingly adjourned the national aſſembly from Windſor to London. No perſon, not even the young prince himſelf, was acquainted with the real intentions of Henry. The aſſembly was, however, remarkably full, as the report was to be made from the commiſſioners who had been appointed to make a progreſs through the different circuits of the kingdom. As ſoon, therefore, as the report was read, Henry acquainted them with the reſolution he had formed relative to the coronation of his ſon, and was pleaſed to find it received with univerſal approbation. The only difficulty conſiſted in finding a prelate who was properly authorized to perform the ceremony. It was generally underſtood to be a prerogative peculiar to the archbiſhop of Canterbury; but that prelate not being in the kingdom, it was agreed that it ſhould be performed by Roger, archbiſhop of York, who had, ſome time before, been inveſted with a legantine authority for Scotland. Accordingly that prelate, aſſiſted by the biſhops of London and Durham, placed the crown upon the head of young Henry, and immediately after the ceremony William, king of Scotland, his brother David, and all the earls and barons of England, did him homage.

The young prince was of an haughty and imperious diſpoſition, and a ſtranger to generoſity and gratitude. His father, deſirous of diſplaying, before ſo great and noble an aſſembly, every mark of paternal love and reſpect for his favourite ſon, ſerved the firſt diſh at his table with his own hands, ſaying, with an endearing ſmile, "You may now boaſt, my ſon, of being as honourably ſerved as any monarch upon earth." But young Henry was too haughty to make a proper return to this diſtinguiſhed condeſcenſion in his royal parent. He turned to the archbiſhop of York, and whiſpered, with a contemptuous ſneer, "That he thought it no degradation for the ſon of a petty count to ſerve the heir of a great king." His father, however, did not hear this ungenerous reflection: he was yet a ſtranger to the natural ingratitude of his ſon.

Soon after the coronation of the young prince, Henry paid a viſit to his foreign dominions, where another effort was made for terminating the differences between the king and the ambitious primate. The pope, indeed, was juſt going to lay an interdict on Henry's dominions, but receiving a moſt humiliating meſſage from that prince, informing him of his wiſhes to bring about a reconciliation with Becket, he laid aſide his intentions. Soon after a conference was held in a meadow between Charton and Maine, where all the differences between the king and archbiſhop were finally adjuſted. It was agreed, that Henry ſhould receive the archbiſhop, his exiled clergy, adherents and relations into his favour: that the prelate ſhould be reſtored to his rights and poſſeſſions in the ſee of Canterbury, and be empowered to hold them in the ſame manner as before the conteſt began; and that ſatisfaction ſhould be made to the ſee of Canterbury, for the violation of its rights in the coronation of the young prince. Thus were matters accommodated between Henry and the archbiſhop, the latter of whom, after taking leave of the king, with the greateſt ſeeming ſatisfaction and reſpect, embarked for England, in order to reinſtate himſelf in the poſſeſſion of Canterbury.

Henry now hoped that Becket, from the great conceſſions he had made to him, would lay aſide all rancour and malice, and apply himſelf to the proper duties of his office, the cultivation of peace, and promoting brotherly love and charity throughout the kingdom. But in this he was greatly deceived. Becket no ſooner took poſſeſſion of his ſee than he iſſued out ſentences of excommunication againſt the biſhops of London and Durham, together with ſeveral of the king's miniſters, officers of the houſhold, juſticiaries, and the moſt conſiderable perſons in the kingdom. At this time Henry was at Bayeaux in France, and being informed of the violent proceedings of Becket, he cried out in the bitterneſs of grief and aſtoniſhment, "What! will none of my ſervants rid me of this ungrateful and imperious prelate." This exclamation produced conſequences little expected by Henry, at the time he ſpoke it. Four barons, or knights of his houſhold, agreed to revenge the cauſe of their maſter, and for that purpoſe privately withdrew from court, and paſſed over to England. As ſoon as Henry was informed of their departure he recollected the exclamation he made relative to Becket, and fearful that it might induce them to take ſome violent meaſures, immediately diſpatched meſſengers after them, to prevent any fatal cataſtrophe. But it was too late. The four conſpirators followed the archbiſhop into the church of Canterbury, and murdered him before the altar of St. Benedict.

Such was the tragical end of Thomas Becket archbiſhop of Canterbury, a prelate of the moſt imperious and inflexible ſpirit. He fell a victim to his own pride and obſtinacy in a cauſe which he fancied juſt, and in which he was guided by the moſt deſtructive prejudices. Unable to bear the leaſt contradiction, and fond of directing affairs of every kind, he treated all who oppoſed him with a virulence of behaviour, and a ſeverity of vengeance, which was neither ſuitable to the character of a chriſtian biſhop, or a decent member of ſociety. When he had any point to gain he advanced, without ſcruple, the moſt infamous falſehoods, and vouched them as truths under the ſanction of the moſt ſacred oaths. But notwithſtanding this, and his having been publickly condemned as a traitor to his country, yet he was canonized and revered as a martyr about two years after his death. This was done by order of pope Alexander, who alſo by a bull, directed to all the clergy and people of England, appointed the 30th of December to be annually kept as a feſtival in commemoration of his martyrdom.

A. D. 1171. Henry was greatly affected at the death of Becket. He dreaded the reſentment of the pope, and knew his enemies would exert all their influence with him to lay an interdict on his dominions. He therefore diſpatched a ſplendid embaſſy to Rome, to clear him of all ſuſpicion of being being any ways concerned in the death of Becket, and to avert the thunders of the vatican. Alexander, at firſt, refuſed an audience to Henry's ambaſſadors; but by the proper diſtribution of large ſums among the principal people of his court, the intention of Henry was fully anſwered, and the pope contented himſelf with iſſuing general denunciations againſt the principals and accomplices of Becket's murder. Two cardinals, however, were ſent with legantine powers into Normandy, in order to examine into the king's conduct, and a conference was opened at Avaranches, at which were preſent Henry and his eldeſt ſon, together with all the clergy of Normandy. After long debates the whole affair was ſettled, and all differences terminated between the pontiff and Henry, the latter of whom ſoon after left the continent, and embarked for his own dominions.

A. D. 1172. A ſhort time after Henry's return to England, he determined to put in execution a ſcheme he had ſome years before projected for obtaining the conqueſt of Ireland. Adrian IV. who at that time filled the papal chair, deſirous of augmenting the power and revenues of the holy ſee, encouraged Henry to purſue the plan he had formed, and granted him a bull, with the moſt ample privileges. But the diſturbances that happened between Becket and the king, prevented the latter from carrying his deſign into execution.

But before we proceed any farther, it may not be improper to give the reader ſome account of the Iriſh, the conqueſt of whoſe country was attempted upon the ſlighteſt foundation, and effected with an eaſe that borders almoſt on romance.

At this time the Iriſh were ſo unpoliſhed as to be little better than ſavages: they were even ignorant of agriculture, and deſtitute of laws, of manners, and learning. The iſland was divided into a number of ſmall principalities, each governed by its own prince, but all forming a political confederacy, though they frequently committed great violences againſt each other. They were incapable of making any defence againſt regular forces; and it was no eaſy matter to unite them into one body or nation, and govern them by wholeſome laws. Ferocious by nature, and fond of liberty, they oppoſed every attempt to civilize them; and, like the antient Britons, when attacked by a ſuperior force, fled to their foreſts and mountains for ſafety.

An event now happened which gave Henry a favourable opportunity of claiming his pretended right to Ireland in conſequence of the bull received from pope Adrian. Dermot, one of the petty kings of Ireland, being driven out of his dominions by a neighbouring chief, whoſe wife he had carried off, applied to the Engliſh monarch for aſſiſtance to recover his territories. Henry liſtened to the Iriſh chief, and empowered him to raiſe troops in England. He alſo gave general permiſſion to his ſubjects to aſſiſt the prince in perſon, but declined embarking himſelf in the enterprize. Excited by ambition ſeveral of the Engliſh barons determined to aſſiſt the Iriſh prince, among whom, Richard, earl of Striguel, ſurnamed Strongbow, was the chief. That noblemen poſſeſſed ſeveral large eſtates in Wales, where his tenants were numerous, and the ſituation of his territories very convenient for paſſing over to Ireland. Strongbow undertook to aſſiſt the Iriſh chief on condition of his giving him his daughter in marriage, and leaving him his territories. Accordingly theſe adventurers, at the head of their reſpective forces, landed in Ireland, defeated ſome conſiderable bodies of the wild Iriſh, and, not content with recovering the territories of Dermot, proceeded to the reduction of the whole iſland.

As ſoon as Henry was informed of the great ſucceſs of his barons, he was deſirous of acquiring the honour of being the conqueror of Ireland, and therefore went over in perſon at the head of a powerful army. But the Iriſh were already conquered, and there remained nothing for the king to do but receive the ſubmiſſion of a vanquiſhed people. Moſt of the tributary princes attended his court at Dublin, and ſwore allegiance to him. The clergy, who had laboured to render their country ſubject to England ever ſince Adrian iſſued a bull for that purpoſe, met in general aſſembly at Waterford, where they ſigned their ſubmiſſion, and delivered the inſtruments to Henry, who tranſmitted them to Rome, where they were confirmed by the pontiff.

Having thus taken poſſeſſion of Ireland, Henry returned to England, and flattered himſelf with enjoying a ſeries of eaſe and tranquillity; but he ſoon found himſelf deceived, and his quietude interrupted by the very perſons who ought moſt to have endeavoured to promote it. Henry, his eldeſt ſon, a prince of an haughty and inſolent temper, was weary of bearing the royal title without authority. He had married Margaret, daughter to Lewis king of France, and the ceremony of his coronation had been repeated by the archbiſhop of Rouen, in order that his conſort might be included in the ſolemnity. He had alſo been permitted to pay a viſit to his father-in-law, and continued ſome time at the court of France. Lewis embraced this opportunity of kindling the flames of domeſtic diſcord in the family of Henry. He perſuaded the prince that, in conſequence of the ceremony of coronation, he was entitled to an immediate poſſeſſion of a part of the dominions of his father.

In conſequence of this young Henry, who was naturally of an imperious and aſpiring diſpoſition, came over to England, and, in an abrupt manner, demanded from his father either the kingdom of England, or the duchy of Normandy. Henry was aſtoniſhed at this unexpected requeſt, and began to ſee his hopes of happineſs were built on a chimerical foundation. He endeavoured to convince his ſon of the extravagance of his demand, and painted, in ſtriking colours, the folly of a requeſt, which could only tend to weaken the power of his family, and, ultimately, his own authority. But all his arguments were fruitleſs: the prince diſcovered the higheſt diſcontent, blended with inſolence, at his father's refuſal, and, retiring to France, put himſelf under the protection of Lewis, whoſe deſire of leſſening the power of Henry had given riſe to this domeſtic diſcord.

But the diſobedience of his eldeſt ſon was not the only misfortune that diſturbed the happineſs of Henry. His queen Eleanor had long been jealous of him*, and carried her reſentment ſo far as to en-

* Henry eſpouſed his queen Eleanor, not from an attachment to her perſon, but from motives of ambition. The tenderneſs of conjugal affection had never ſubſiſted between them; and in proportion as her perſonal attractions decayed, ſhe became the object of the king's diſguſt; which was, perhaps, increaſed by his reflections on her infidelity to her former royal encourage her two younger ſons, Richard and Geoffrey, to follow the example of their brother. They accordingly repaired to the court of France, and inſiſted on being put into actual poſſeſſion of the territories aſſigned them by their father.

A. D. 1173. William, king of Scotland, had long beheld the great power of Henry, and trembled for the conſequences. As ſoon therefore as he heard of the claim made by young Henry, and that he had fled for protection to Lewis, he immediately repaired to the court of France, under pretence of renewing the league that had long continued between the Scottiſh and French nations; but, in reality, to concert proper meaſures for diſtreſſing the Engliſh monarch. Several of the moſt powerful barons, both in England and Normandy, likewiſe joined in the unnatural alliance for ſupporting the unreaſonable claims of an undutiful ſon on the dominions of an indulgent parent.

Henry was now ſurrounded with innumerable difficulties, from which nothing leſs than his amazing abilities could have extricated him. He determined to go over to the continent, and as it was not likely to bring his refractory ſons to obedience by the power of argument, to reduce them and their adherents by the force of arms. But the deſertion of many of his powerful barons gave him reaſon to fear his own ſubjects would deſert him in the day of battle, upon which he determined to have recourſe to foreign mercenaries for aſſiſtance. He accordingly, on his arrival upon the continent, took twenty thouſand Brabanders, all veteran troops, into his pay, and, with the aſſiſtance of theſe and his own abilities, was enabled to withſtand the efforts of his enemies. His magnanimity and military proweſs never ſhone with ſo much luſtre as in this alarming criſis. The thoughts of impending danger animated him with freſh courage. Bleſſed with the moſt aſtoniſhing preſence of mind, and wholly a ſtranger to fear, he viewed, with the utmoſt coolneſs, the many dangers with which he was ſurrounded, and planned the moſt prudent meaſures to render them abortive.

The operations of the confederate princes were begun by Richard, who repaired to Guienne, and excited the greater part of the inhabitants to take up arms againſt his father. Geoffrey fomented a rebellion in Britany, and put himſelf at the head of the inſurgents. Normandy was invaded by the king of France, aſſiſted by the earls of Flanders, Boulogne, and Blois. William, king of Scotland, who had ſome time before left the French court, marched with an army into the northern parts of England. And the earl of Leiceſter landed in Eſſex at the head of a large body of Flemiſh troops, to excite an inſurrection among the Engliſh.

But all the deſigns and endeavours of his foes were rendered abortive. Henry had taken ſuch precautions in providing for the defence of the frontiers of Normandy, that the French monarch, after loſing the greater part of his army, was obliged to abandon the enterprize. Ten thouſand Brabanders, ſent by Henry into Britany, defeated the rebels, and obliged them to return to their duty. Henry advanced at the head of his army againſt the inſurgents in Guienne, retook the places they had ſeized, and obliged them to lay down their arms, and ſubmit to his authority. And, to crown all, while theſe tranſactions were taking place on the continent, the army of Leiceſter was routed at St. Edmundſbury in Suffolk, and above ten thouſand Flemings ſlain on the ſpot.

A. D. 1174. Having reduced the inſurgents on the continent, Henry haſtened to England, in order to ſtop the progreſs of the Scots, who had invaded his dominions, and committed the moſt horrid ravages in various parts of the country. He landed at Southampton, and in order to gain the affections of his people, ſubmitted to an act of humiliation, which all the power of the church could not impoſe upon him. Conſcious of laying under very ſtrong ſuſpicions of being acceſſary to the death of Becket, he determined to remove every ſhadow of ſuch a thought by joining himſelf in the prevailing devotions of the times. He accordingly ſet out for Canterbury, and three miles before his arrival at the place, alighted from his horſe, and walked barefoot to the tomb of the ſaint, proſtrated himſelf before the ſhrine of Becket, continued the whole day in prayer, and watched all night the holy relics. The next morning he aſſembled a chapter of the monks, diſrobed himſelf before them, put ſcourges into their hands, and preſented his bare ſhoulders to the diſcipline and laſhes of theſe eccleſiaſtics. He afterwards made a ſolemn proceſſion to all the altars in the cathedral, and, retiring to the ſhrine of the canonized prelate, made an offering of forty pounds per annum towards the ſupport of a number of lamps kept continually burning before his tomb.

Having performed theſe ceremonies, which gave great ſatisfaction to the multitude, Henry left the cathedral, and proceeded towards London; but he had not gone far, when intelligence arrived that a deciſive victory had been obtained over the Scottiſh army, and that William their king was taken priſoner. This remarkable ſucceſs was immediately attributed by the people to the protection of St. Becket, and the ſame opinion prevailing throughout conſort, and the circumſtance of her ſuperiority in point of years. Henry was not addicted to many vices, but it muſt be acknowledged he preſcribed no limits to the indulgence of his paſſion for women; and he conceived that the former libidinous conduct of his queen, and the imperfections that time wrought in her features, afforded ſome countenance and excuſe for the numerous amours in which he engaged. Among the reſt of his miſtreſſes was Fair Roſamond, a lady who is equally celebrated in antient ballads and romances on account of her extraordinary beauty, and the ſingular manner of her death.

Roſamond Clifford, daughter of lord Clifford, was eſteemed by far the moſt beautiful woman of the age in which ſhe lived. Henry, whoſe heart was remarkably ſuſceptible of amorous impreſſions, conceived an ardent paſſion for her, and long loved her with unabating tenderneſs. That ſhe might not be expoſed to the jealous rage of Eleanor, the king concealed her in a labyrynth in Woodſtock-park, where he retired to paſs, in an interchange of tender endearments with his ſolitary beauty, thoſe hours which could be ſpared from the important cares inſeperable from his exalted ſtation. Fabulous hiſtorians have told us that it came at length to the knowledge of the queen; who, being guided by a clew of ſilk, found the retreat of her fair rival, whom ſhe compelled, by holding a dagger to her breaſt, to ſwallow poiſon. But the real truth is, that, after a courſe of time Roſamond ſhook off all connections with Henry, retired to the convent of Godſtow, and ſpent the remainder of her days in penitence.

Eleanor was not leſs obnoxious to Henry on account of her jealouſy than ſhe had been to her former huſband for her gallantries; and to her it was in a great meaſure owing that the diſturbances took place between Henry and his children. After the departure of Geoffrey and Richard, the queen diſguiſed herſelf in man's apparel, with the deſign of effecting her eſcape to France; but being diſcovered ſhe was immediately ſeized, and, by the king's order, committed to cloſe confinement.

out his dominions, greatly contributed towards ſuppreſſing the ſpirit of rebellion.

But many of the reſtleſs barons were ſtill in arms, in conſequence of which Henry marched immediately to chaſtiſe them, and reſtore that peace to his kingdom, which their unnatural rebellion had diſturbed. He firſt inveſted the caſtle of Framlingham, belonging to Hugh Bigod, one of the moſt powerful of the Engliſh mal-contents. But this nobleman was too well acquainted with the diſpoſition of Henry to attempt defending his fortreſs: he therefore opened a negotiation, and obtained pardon on condition of delivering up his caſtles of Framlingham and Bungay. The reſt of the diſcontented barons followed his example, and received their pardons on the like conditions.

During theſe tranſactions in England the French king had laid ſiege to Rouen, in which he was joined by the earl of Flanders. This re-inforcement enabled the French monarch to puſh the ſiege with vigour; and he flattered himſelf with being able to reduce the place before Henry could arrive with an army to oppoſe him. In this, however, he was greatly deceived. The garriſon made a gallant defence, and Henry landed before Lewis could even reduce the outworks. The preſence of the Engliſh monarch ſtruck the enemy with terror: the ſiege was immediately raiſed, and the combined forces fled with the utmoſt precipitation, leaving all their baggage in poſſeſſion of the Engliſh monarch.

Soon after this a conference was propoſed by Lewis for bringing about a general peace. This propoſition was readily approved by Henry's firſt and third ſon, as alſo by the Engliſh monarch himſelf; but the impetuous and reſtleſs Richard, ſon of Henry, was ſtill in arms in Poictou, committing acts of hoſtility on all the inhabitants who favoured the intereſt of his father, and therefore refuſed to come to any accommodation but on his own terms. Exaſperated at his obſtinacy, the younger Henry with the king of France, gave him up to the reſentment of his father, to whom they ſwore not to give any diſturbance, but, on the contrary, to aſſiſt him in reducing his ſtubborn ſon to obedience. Richard depending upon the ſupport of the French king and his brother, was amazed at finding himſelf deſerted by both, and fearing the conſequences if he ſhould perſevere, ſent a meſſenger to his father, ſoliciting his pardon, and promiſing immediately to deſiſt from his rebellious proceedings. In conſequence of this a conference was agreed to be held between Tours and Amboiſe, where all the three ſons made ample ſubmiſſion to their father, who allowed each of them penſions, aſſigned caſtles for their reſidence, and granted pardons to all thoſe who had combined with them in their diſobedience.

Having thus accommodated all differences abroad, Henry returned to England, and compelled the king of Scotland, then his priſoner, to ſign a treaty of peace, in which it was ſtipulated that William ſhould do homage to Henry for his dominions, as ſhould alſo the barons and biſhops of Scotland; and that the forts of Edinburgh, Berwick, Roxburgh, Jedburgh, and Stirling, ſhould be delivered up as ſecurities for the performance of the articles. The Scotch king, being releaſed from confinement, brought up all his barons, prelates and abbots, who, with himſelf, did homage to Henry in the cathedral church of York, and acknowledged him and his ſucceſſors for their ſuperior lord.

A. D. 1176—1178. Henry, having thus rendered abortive all the deſigns of his enemies, applied himſelf, with great diligence, to the purſuit of thoſe meaſures that were moſt likely to procure and eſtabliſh a general tranquillity throughout his kingdom. He eſtabliſhed laws for the ſuppreſſion of murder, robbery, burning of houſes, and counterfeiting the coin; according to which the perpetrators of thoſe offences were to be puniſhed by the amputation of the right-hand, and right-foot. Though the ordeal trial was not entirely aboliſhed, its influence was conſiderably leſſened; and perſons who had been ſubjected to this ſcrutiny, and eſcaped, were liable to a legal inveſtigation of their conduct, and, in caſe of conviction, baniſhed the kingdom.

In order that the laws might be properly executed, Henry divided the kingdom into ſix parts, and appointed judges to make regular circuits, for the purpoſe of trying cauſes, and protecting the inferior claſſes of his ſubjects from the cruelty and oppreſſion of the haughty barons. He likewiſe reſtored the mode of trial by jury, which, through the prevalence of the abſurd and barbarous cuſtoms of deciding conteſts by the ordeal and ſingle combat, had almoſt grown into diſuſe. To ſecure his dominions from the horrors that had been experienced from the formidable oppoſition of the refractory barons to the regal authority, he cauſed moſt of thoſe caſtles, which had been erected and fortified during the late civil diſcords, to be demoliſhed; and eſtabliſhed a regular militia to ſecure his dominions from foreign invaſion. Theſe wiſe regulations produced tranquillity throughout the kingdom; his people were protected, contented and happy.

A. D. 1179. Lewis, the French king, being worn out with age, was deſirous of reſigning his crown to his ſon Philip; but that young prince being taken ill on the day appointed for his coronation, Lewis, contrary to the advice of his council, undertook a pilgrimage for his recovery to the ſhrine of St. Thomas a Becket. Henry, being apprized of his arrival, met the French monarch at Dover, and accompanied him to Canterbury, where they both paid their devotions at the altar of St. Thomas. Lewis offered a maſſy cup of pure gold, beſtowed upon the monks a grant of two hundred gallons of wine annually, and freed them from all duties on ſuch goods as they ſhould, in future, purchaſe in any part of his dominions. After ſtaying four days, Lewis returned home, but in a ſhort time after his arrival was ſeized with an apoplectic fit, of which he died, leaving the crown to his ſon Philip.

No material tranſaction occured from this time till the year 1183, when young Henry (who was then with his queen at the court of France) again unſheathed the ſword of rebellion againſt his father, in which he was protected by the ambitious and aſpiring Philip, king of France. Young Henry committed ſeveral acts of hoſtilities in his father's territories, but was ſtopped in his proceedings by illneſs, being ſeized with a violent fever at Martel, a caſtle in the neighbourhood of Limoges. Finding himſelf in the moſt imminent danger, he diſpatched a meſſenger to his father, intreating the favour of a viſit, that he might die with the ſatisfaction of having obtained the forgiveneſs of a parent he had ſo groſly offended. Henry, fearful of truſting himſelf in the power of thoſe about the perſon of his ſon, refuſed to viſit him; but ſent a ring by one of the prelates as a token of his bleſſing and pardon. The biſhop found young Henry near his end, and received his dying requeſt, that his father would forgive his undutiful behaviour; that he would pay his knights and attendants their ſalaries, and pardon the barons of Guienne, whom he had excited to rebellion. The biſhop promiſed to relate theſe requeſts to his father, and on his return to England, faithfully performed his promiſe; but before an anſwer could be returned, the prince paid the debt of nature, on the 11th of June, in the 28th year of his age, leaving his wife Margaret without iſſue. As ſoon as Henry heard of his ſon's death, he burſt forth into the moſt exceſſive lamentations of grief, and accuſed himſelf of inhumanity for not having given him in perſon that aſſurance of forgiveneſs, which he had only ſent by another hand.

A. D. 1185. In the ſpring of this year Heraclius, patriarch of Jeruſalem, arrived in England, attended by the grand-maſters of the knights-templars and hoſpitallers, on an embaſſy from Baldwin, king of Jeruſalem, to ſolicit the aſſiſtance of Henry againſt the infidels in the Holy Land. The patriarch preſented the Engliſh monarch with the keys of the Holy Sepulchre, and thoſe of the Tower of David, in token of their deſire to place the crown of the Holy City on his head. Henry, however, refuſed the offer, but afterwards gave 50,000 marks of ſilver, in order to aſſiſt the Chriſtians againſt the infidels.

A. D. 1186. The tranquillity of the Engliſh monarch was now diſturbed by the conduct of his two ſons Richard and Geoffrey, who again broke into open rebellion againſt their father. Prince Richard, diſguſted at a deſign formed by his father of ſettling Guienne upon John, his youngeſt brother, departed the kingdom, and made preparations for ſeizing by force thoſe dominions which he thought belonged ſolely to himſelf. His brother Geoffrey peremptorily demanded of Henry, that Anjou ſhould be annexed to his duchy of Britany. This demand, however, was abſolutely refuſed, upon which Geoffrey repaired immediately to the court of France, in order to ſolicit aſſiſtance againſt his father: but before Philip could give any poſitive anſwer to his requeſt, Geoffrey, was killed in a tournament at Paris. This accident delivered Henry from the enterprizes of the moſt vicious of his ſons, Geoffrey being a prince in whom pride, diſſimulation and perfidy, were at once united. No principle of honour could bind, no precept of religion could reſtrain, that headlong prince. In ſhort, he practiſed every kind of vice, and, for that reaſon, was diſtinguiſhed by the opprobrious epithet of The Child of Perdition.

A. D. 1187. This year Henry received advice that the city of Jeruſalem was taken by the valiant and politic Saladine, ſultan of Egypt, and that Gey de Luſignan (the laſt prince that ſwayed the ſceptre of that kingdom) was in the hands of the infidels. This melancholy intelligence rekindled the ardour and enthuſiaſm of the warriors of Europe, and in particular Henry and Philip, who ſeemed to vie with each other in their readineſs to ſend ſuccours to Paleſtine. They both took the croſs, and both ordered, that ſuch of their ſubjects as did not chuſe to engage in the cruſade, ſhould pay the tenth part of their revenues, and moveable effects, to defray the expence of the armament; and this impoſt was diſtinguiſhed by the name of "Saladine's Tax."

A. D. 1188. But notwithſtanding the ſeeming ſincerity of Philip for directing his attention towards ſupporting the cruſades in Paleſtine, yet his conduct ſoon evinced how much more deſirous he was of enlarging his own dominions. Taking advantage of a quarrel that happened between prince Richard, and Raymond count of Thouloufe, he led an army into Berry, burnt Mount Richard, and took ſeveral towns in Auvergne. This perfidious conduct highly enraged the Engliſh monarch, who went over to Normandy, and put himſelf at the head of a powerful army. His ſon Richard joined him, and the great ſucceſs they met with in their enterprizes ſoon obliged Philip to ſolicit a conference. This was accordingly held, and a treaty of peace being concluded between the contending monarchs, Henry returned with his forces to England.

A. D. 1189. But it was not long before Henry ſufficiently experienced the perfidy of the French monarch. That ambitious prince treacherouſly brought over to his intereſt young Richard, who once more unſheathed the ſword againſt his aged parent. The conjunctive princes ſoon made themſelves maſters of ſeveral capital places belonging to Henry, who, in conſequence thereof, haſtily left England, in order to ſtop their farther depredations.

Henry marched with his troops to the city of Mans, which was ſoon after attacked with ſuch reſolution by the conjunctive forces of Philip and Richard, that Henry was obliged to abandon the place; in conſequence of which he repaired to the caſtle of Chinon, which he ſtrongly fortified, and then retired with his army to Saumur.

After the departure of Henry from Mans, Philip and Richard took poſſeſſion of the place, and marching into Tourain, made themſelves maſters of the city of Tours, from whence they directed their courſe towards Saumur; and it is probable they would have not only reduced that place, but alſo taken Henry priſoner, had not the neutral princes (who could not behold the unnatural alliance between Philip and Richard without regret) interpoſed, and brought about an accommodation. At their inſtigation a treaty was concluded at Cozay, near Tours; by which it was ſtipulated that Henry ſhould pay twenty thouſand marks to Philip: that all his ſubjects both in England and his tranſmarine dominions, ſhould ſwear fealty to Richard: that thoſe barons who had entered into a confederacy with Richard ſhould receive an indemnity for their offences: that his own nobles ſhould engage to compel him to obſerve this treaty; and, in caſe of his violating it, ſhould join Philip and Richard againſt him.

Theſe were terms of the moſt humiliating nature, but Henry's neceſſities compelled him to ſign them; and to complete his misfortunes, on demanding a liſt of the barons who were to receive his pardon, he found at the head of them the name of his ſon John, who had always been his favourite, and in whom he had placed the moſt implicit confidence. This ſhock was too great to be ſupported: Henry broke out into expreſſions of the utmoſt deſpair, curſed the hour of his birth, and beſtowed on his ungrateful and undutiful children a malediction, which he could not be prevailed on to retract. He retired to Chinon in all the anguiſh of a wretched parent, where he died of a broken heart, two days after ſigning the treaty of Cozay, in the 57th year of his age, and 35th of his reign.

The corpſe of this great prince was treated in the like indecent manner as that of the Conqueror of England;

England; for his ſervants, after rifling his wardrobe and treaſures, ſtripped the royal corpſe naked, in which indecent manner it remained till one of the pages, leſs brutal than the reſt, threw over it a ſhort mantle. In this condition it was viſited by his natural ſon Geoffrey, who alone had behaved dutiful, and who attended the corpſe to the nunnery of Fonteveraud, where it lay in ſtate in the abby church. The next day Richard, who went to view the dead body of his father, and who, notwithſtanding his criminal conduct, was not altogether deſtitute of feeling, was ſtruck with horror and remorſe at the ſight; and, as the people preſent obſerved, at that very inſtant blood ran out of the mouth and noſtrils of the corpſe, he exclaimed that he was his father's murderer, and expreſſed, though too late, a deep ſenſe of that undutiful behaviour, which had ſo greatly contributed to the death of an indulgent parent.

Henry II. was the greateſt prince of his time for wiſdom, virtue, and abilities, and the moſt powerful in extent of dominion of all that had ever filled the throne of England. His character, both in public and private life, is almoſt without a blemiſh; and he ſeems to have poſſeſſed every accompliſhment both of body and mind, which makes a man either eſtimable or amiable. He was of a middle ſtature, ſtrong, and well-proportioned: his countenance was lively and engaging; his converſation affable and pleaſing; his elocution, eaſy, perſuaſive, and always at command. He loved peace, but poſſeſſed both bravery and conduct in war; was provident without timidity, and temperate without auſterity. He preſerved an almoſt uninterrupted ſtate of health, and kept himſelf from corpulency, to which he was ſomewhat inclined, by a moderate diet, and frequent exercíſe, of which hunting was his favourite. When the affairs of his kingdom permitted him to enjoy leiſure, he had always recourſe to books, or the converſation of learned and ingenious men. His palace was a kind of academy, and his table a ſchool, where the moſt abſtruſe points of government and learning were debated. His affections, as well as enmities, were warm and durable; and his long experience of the ingratitude and infidelity of men never deſtroyed the natural ſenſibility of his temper, which always diſpoſed him to friendſhip and ſociety. He was wiſe in council, moderate in proſperity, and firm in adverſity. Not ſatisfied with forming good and wholeſome laws, he took care to ſee them executed with the greateſt punctuality: for this purpoſe he made frequent tours through all the different parts of his dominions, inſpecting the behaviour of his officers and magiſtrates, and ſeverely puniſhing thoſe, who were either negligent or unjuſt in the performance of their duty. In ſhort, he was at once the king and father of his people.

This prince ſo far aboliſhed the barbarous and abſurd practice of ſhips being forfeited, which happened to be wrecked on any parts of the coaſt, that if one man or animal was found alive in the ſhip, the veſſel and goods were reſtored to the owners.

He was alſo the firſt prince who levied a tax on the moveables and perſonal eſtates of his ſubjects, nobles as well as commonalty. Their zeal for the holy wars made them ſubmit to this innovation; and a precedent being once ſet, this taxation became, in ſome following reigns, the uſual method of ſupplying the neceſſities of the crown.

Takes the biſhop of Beauvais priſoner, and ſends his coat of mail to the Roman pontiff. Death and character of Richard.

A. D. 1189. RICHARD was moſt feelingly affected at the death of his father, and beheld, with horror, his former baſe and unnatural conduct. He ſaw, in a very different point of light, the ſervices of his pretended friends, who had inſtigated him to draw the ſword of rebellion, and lift his hand againſt the life of the moſt indulgent parent. He therefore diſcharged them from his ſervices, and, inſtead of the rewards they expected, loaded them with reproaches. He deſpiſed the courtiers who had baſely deſerted the intereſt of their maſter, and placed his confidence in thoſe who had ſerved his father with zeal and fidelity.

As Richard was on the continent at the time of his father's death, and no ways apprehenſive of any oppoſition being made to his ſucceſſion, he determined to adjuſt his affairs in that quarter before he embarked for England. In the mean time he diſpatched meſſengers to London, with orders for the immediate diſcharge of his mother from confinement on whom he beſtowed the adminiſtration of public affairs during his abſence.

Eleanor exerted herſelf ſo warmly in favour of Richard, that ſhe ſoon ſecured for him the oaths of allegiance from all orders of the ſtate, ſo that nothing was wanting but his preſence to have them properly ratified.

Richard, having ſettled his affairs on the continent, embarked at Barfleur, and ſoon after landed in England, where he was received by the people with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy. On his arrival he proceeded to Wincheſter, and there took up his reſidence till the 2d of September, when he repaired to London, and, the following day, was crowned at Weſtminſter, by Baldwin, archbiſhop of Canterbury.

The coronation of Richard was celebrated with great magnificence; but it gave riſe to a ſcene of the moſt horrid barbarity. The expeditions to the Holy Land, and the cruelties inflicted on the Chriſtians by the infidels, had filled the minds of the people with a kind of enthuſiaſtic madneſs. Whatever had even the moſt remote connection with this religious warfare was ſufficient to ſet the whole nation in a flame. The Jews had long been a deſpiſed people, and the ſufferings of the Chriſtians at Jeruſalem now raiſed the hatred of the people againſt them to the higheſt pitch. Richard knew this, and therefore prudently iſſued a proclamation, forbidding any of them to appear at Weſtminſter during the ceremony of the coronation. Thoſe deſpiſed people had long endeavoured, by their aſſiduous application to traffic, to ſhake off that contempt in which they had been ſo long held by the public at large. But their riches, inſtead of procuring them favour, excited the avarice, as much as their religion did the fury of the people. Deſirous of obtaining the protection of the new monarch, they collected among themſelves a very conſiderable ſum of money, which they intended preſenting to Richard on the day of his coronation. Several of the moſt eminent among them were accordingly ſelected; and, thinking their buſineſs a ſufficient exemption from the general prohibition, went to the gates of Weſtminſter-hall to tender him their preſent, and compliments of congratulation. The appearance of the Jews, and their diſregard of the royal mandate, awakened in the minds of the people all the fury of reſentment. A tumult immediately took place, and the poor defenceleſs Jews were murdered by the populace. Nor did this ſatisfy their reſentment: they entered the city, maſſacred all the Jews they could find, plundered their houſes, and then laid them in aſhes. The conflagration and carnage continued the whole night, notwithſtanding all the endeavours of the magiſtrates to ſuppreſs the tumult. And thus did ſeveral thouſands of the unfortunate Jews fall ſacrifices to the reſentment of a deluded multitude.

The king was ſo incenſed againſt the authors of this inhuman tragedy, that he ordered ſeveral of the principal leaders of the tumult to be put to death. He likewiſe publiſhed an edict, ſtrictly forbidding any inſult to be offered to the Jews, whom he declared to be equally under his immediate protection with the reſt of his ſubjects.

Richard had, a ſhort time before his acceſſion, taken the croſs from the hands of the archbiſhop of Tours, and, being firmly eſtabliſhed on the throne, was now determined to make an expedition to the Holy Land. He was, indeed, more a ſoldier than a devotee; and, to gratify his paſſion for military honours, and gather laurels in the field of Paleſtine, ſcrupled not to ſacrifice at once the intereſt of his crown, and the welfare of his people.

The whole attention of Richard was now engaged in forming ſchemes for raiſing money to defray the expences of the intended expedition. He had already ſeized upon his father's treaſures; and the biſhop of Ely happening to die without a will, Richard confiſcated his eſtate, which was very conſiderable, to his own uſe. He laid the moſt rigorous impoſts on the people, expoſed the crown lands to ſale, and even diſpoſed of the great ſeal of England to William Longchamp, his firſt miniſter.

Theſe unwarrantable proceedings gave great uneaſineſs to Ralph de Glenville, the chief juſticiary, who expoſtulated with Richard on a conduct ſo derogatory to his own dignity, and oppreſſive to his ſubjects. The king replied, "He would ſell the city of London itſelf, if he could find a purchaſer." The upright juſticiary was ſhocked at this anſwer, and remonſtrated more freely with the king on the conſequences that muſt attend ſuch precipitate and unjuſtifiable meaſures. But Richard, who would not ſubmit to admonition, ſo highly reſented the liberty taken by the juſticiary, that he deprived him of his poſt, committed him to priſon, obliged him to pay fifteen thouſand pounds for his liberty, and ſold his poſt of juſticiary to the biſhop of Durham for one thouſand marks. The king of Scotland, purchaſed for ten thouſand marks, his right of ſuperiority over that kingdom, an acquiſition of the greateſt conſequence ever made by his father.

Nor were theſe the only methods taken by Richard for obtaining a ſufficient ſum of money to carry on his intended expedition. He obtained a bull from pope Clement, empowering him to diſcharge from the cruſade all who (having engaged themſelves in the buſineſs) were unable to undertake the expedition, and excuſe others, who were unwilling to undergo the fatigues, on their paying a proportional ſum of money. He inſtituted offices of enquiry into the conduct of the magiſtrates throughout the kingdom; not for reformation, but oppreſſion. The innocent and guilty ſuffered in common, and nothing but paying large ſums into the king's coffers gave ſafety to the one, or indemnity to the other. Thus, by theſe illegal proceedings, did Richard reduce the patrimony of the crown, exhauſt the ſubſtance of his people, and proſtitute the juſtice of his country, merely to procure a temporary ſupply for indulging his religious zeal, and ſatisfying his unbounded vanity.

Richard had got over to his intereſt the principal part of the clergy, ſo that while he was accumulating treaſures to defray the expences of the expedition, they were zealouſly labouring to procure him ſoldiers. The pulpits reſounded with the great merit of ſerving in the holy wars. The confeſſors enjoined no penances but what tended to promote the grand deſign of recovering Paleſtine out of the hands of the infidels, and freeing the Chriſtians in that country from the dreadful burthen laid on them by the declared enemies of the goſpel. In conſequence of this the people were fired with enthuſiaſm, and the army ſoon became exceeding numerous: nor was there any officer or ſoldier who did not furniſh himſelf with common neceſſaries, either from his own property, or from the assistance of those who were equally zealous as himself, but from some infirmity, unable to engage in the expedition.

Being now sufficiently supplied both with men and money, Richard, (after constituting Longchamp, bishop of Ely, and Pudsey, bishop of Durham, regents of the kingdom during his absence) embarked his forces at Dover on the 11th of December, and landed the same day at Gravelines, where he was met by the earl of Flanders, who attended him to Normandy. After a short stay in that duchy, he marched with his forces to Gue de St. Remi, where he met Philip, king of France, who had engaged to act conjunctively with Richard in the intended expedition. The two kings swore mutually to support each other, and agreed, that in case either of them died during the crusades the other should take upon him the command of his army, and become master of his treasures, in order to carry on the war against the infidels.

A. D. 1190. Richard had hardly departed from his kingdom, when an event took place of a most melancholy nature, and which threatened a total annihilation of the wretched Jews throughout England. Mad with enthusiasm, and exasperated at the cruelties exercised on the Christians in Palestine, the people thought it a meritorious act to extirpate every person who refused to believe the doctrines of the gospel, and therefore resolved to make a general massacre of the Jews throughout the kingdom. Reason and humanity pleaded in vain: the unfortunate Hebrews were destined to destruction. The massacre began at Lynn, where these distressed people were all murdered, and their houses reduced to ashes. A similar fate attended those who resided at Stamford, Norwich, St. Edmunsbury, and Lincoln. But the most tragical scene was at York, where no less than five hundred men, besides women and children, fell sacrifices to the barbarous fury of religious zeal. The despised Jews, dreading the fate of their brethen in other parts of the kingdom, prevailed on the governor to admit them into the castle, hoping, by that means, to avert the storm of popular fury which threatened their destruction. But in this they were fatally mistaken; for the bigotted multitude surrounded the castle, and attacked the works with the utmost fury. The Jews offered to purchase the liberty of retiring at the price of all their riches: but they pleaded in vain; the ear of bigotry was deaf either to the voice of avarice or compassion. Driven to despair, and finding it impossible to defend themselves against such multitudes of enemies, they first murdered their wives and children, and after throwing their dead bodies over the walls upon the populace, set fire to the buildings, and perished in the flames. The regent Longchamp made a strict but fruitless enquiry after the authors of this horrid tumult. The laws wanted power to curb the licentiousness of a bigotted multitude.

While these melancholy transactions were taken place in England, the two kings on the continent (Philip and Richard) divided their armies, and each proceeded with all expedition, towards Palestine, it having been previously agreed between them to meet at Messina. Philip took the rout to Genoa, and Richard that to Marseilles, their respective fleets having received instructions to rendezvous at those ports. Richard waited some days at Marseilles, when his fleet not arriving, he hired twenty gallies, and ten large vessels, on board of which he embarked his forces, and sailed for Messina in Sicily, leaving orders for his fleet to follow him with all expedition. This order was punctually obeyed, and the fleet reached Messina as soon as the vessels that had been hired by Richard, who, on his arrival, found Philip, with his whole navy, ready to join him: but contrary winds, and other accidents occasioned so long a delay, that they were obliged to winter at Messina. This delay proved exceeding injurious to the enterprize, by laying the foundation of those animosities between Philip and Richard, that could never after be removed.

The long stay of the two monarchs at Messina with their powerful armies greatly alarmed Tancred, the king, or rather tyrant, of Sicily. That prince was very sensible his despotic administration had excited the general hatred of his people, and dreaded the consequences of their putting themselves under the protection of either of the two powerful kings. He therefore determined to sow the seeds of animosity between them, and prevent, by their discords, any application taking place that might be made by the Sicilians. Richard had long been affianced to Alice, the sister of Philip; and that princess had been sent, when very young, to the court of England. The consummation of this marriage, which had been delayed on various pretences, had furnished Philip with reason for quarrelling with Henry II. but the matter, at that time, seemed to be forgotten. Tancred revived the contention, by insinuating that his honour was concerned in the marriage of his sister, and that there was room sufficient to suspect the sincerity of Richard. The French monarch, alarmed at the suggestions of Tancred, immediately demanded that Richard should consummate the nuptials; but the English monarch gave sufficient proofs that Alice had violated the contract of marriage, having been with child by his father. Philip was amazed at this intelligence; but thought it more prudent to bury in silence the dishonour of his family, than insist further on the performance of the marriage.

The two kings now made the necessary preparations for reimbarking their forces, and proceeding, with all expedition, to Palestine: but queen Eleanor arriving with the princess of Berangera, daughter to Sanchez, king of Navarre (to whom Richard was soon after married) he determined, on this account, to make a longer stay in Sicily: upon which Philip, being strongly importuned by the Christians of Palestine to come to their assistance, took leave of Richard, who attended him to the seaside, and the two monarchs, at parting, expressed themselves in the highest terms of mutual friendship.

Queen Eleanor now gave her son a faithful account of the state of affairs in England, the principal particulars of which were as follow: Longchamp, (one of the regents) disdaining to have a colleague of equal authority, had thrown the bishop of Durham into prison, and governed the nation by his sole authority with all the tyranny of a despotic monarch. He ordered Geoffrey, the king's natural brother, who had been elected to the see of York, to be arrested; but the archbishop, having received intelligence of his design fled to the monastery of St. Martin, and took sanctuary in the church. The regent's officers paid no regard to the sanctity of the place; they dragged him from the altar in his sacerdotal robes, robes, and committed him priſoner to the caſtle at Dover.

Theſe tyrannical proceedings excited the univerſal deteſtation of all ranks of people, but not more ſo than the clergy. The biſhop of Lincoln excommunicated all concerned in this ſacrilegious violence, and the ſentence was confirmed in a general convocation held at Reading. The biſhops even threatened the kingdom with an interdict, if Geoffrey was not immediately releaſed. The regent was now ſufficiently alarmed, and therefore, for his own ſafety, thought proper to give orders for the enlargement of the prince. But this did not ſatisfy the clergy, who determined to put a final period to the deſpotic adminiſtration of Longchamp. Accordingly, a general aſſembly of the nobles and prelates was held at Reading, before whom the regent was ſummoned to appear, in order to anſwer for his conduct. He returned for anſwer that he would attend, but, being conſcious his actions would not bear inſpection, fled to London, and ſhut himſelf up in the Tower. He ſoon found it impoſſible to defend that fortreſs any length of time, and therefore ſubmitted to appear before the great council of the nation, who immediately deprived him of his poſts; in conſequence of which, finding himſelf deſerted by thoſe who had baſked in the ſunſhine of his greatneſs, he paſſed over to the continent, in order to apply to the pope for redreſs. After the departure of Longchamp, the great ſeal was given to Walter, archbiſhop of Rouen, a perſon of great prudence, modeſty and integrity, who always conſulted his colleagues in the affairs of government, and, by his prudent management, reſtored peace and tranquillity to the nation. But to return to affairs on the continent.

A. D. 1191. Richard ſtaid ſome time at Meſſina after the departure of Philip; but at length embarked his forces on the 10th of April, his whole fleet conſiſting of 150 ſail of large ſhips, and 53 well armed gallies. Queen Eleanor returned to England; but Berangera, and his ſiſter, the queen Dowager of Sicily, attended him on the expedition.

Before Richard could reach the coaſt of Syria, a deadful ſtorm aroſe, which ſeparated his fleet, and three of his largeſt ſhips were ſtranded on the iſland of Cyprus. Iſaac, the emperor, or tyrant of that iſland, though a profeſſor of the Chriſtian religion, was ſo far from aſſiſting theſe diſtreſſed ſoldiers (who were going to Aſia to defend the perſecuted followers of their common maſter) that he uſed them in a very cruel manner, and committed them all to cloſe confinement.

Exaſperated at this ungenerous treatment, Richard, who had taken ſhelter in the harbours of Candia, ſent a meſſenger to the tyrant, demanding that his ſubjects ſhould be ſet at liberty, and their effects reſtored. But Iſaac, inſtead of complying with ſo reaſonable a demand, returned a very inſolent anſwer to Richard. In conſequence of this the Engliſh monarch immediately ſailed to Cyprus landed his forces, and totally routed the tyrant's army. Iſaac, who was humbled by a ſingle ſtroke of adverſity, laid his crown at the feet of Richard, who ſent him in chains to Tripoli in Syria, and the conqueror by the general conſent of the people, was placed on the Cyprian throne.

Richard ſtayed a ſhort time at Cyprus, during which he was married to Berangera, and they were both crowned at Limiſſo, the capital of the iſland. A few days after the performance of theſe ceremonies Richard embarked for Paleſtine, carrying with him the daughter of the Cyprian prince. In this paſſage he took a very large ſhip belonging to Saladine, the chief commander of the infidels. She was laden with proviſions and military ſtores for the garriſon of Acre, together with a reinforcement of 1500 troops.

The Engliſh army landed time enough to ſhare in the glory of taking Acre, which had been ſome time beſieged by the French monarch. Richard was welcomed to the Chriſtian camp by Philip in perſon; and it was determined by the two monarchs to preſs the ſiege with the utmoſt vigour. By this conjunctive determination the moſt amazing acts of valour were every day performed, and the beſieged ſoon reduced to the utmoſt extremity. At length, Saladine, finding it impoſſible any longer to ſuccour the city, gave the garriſon leave to ſurrender. Accordingly, articles of capitulation were ſigned, and the city delivered up to the cruſaders, together with 500 Chriſtian captives.

The conjunctive kings, elated with their ſucceſs, reſolved to march with their forces to Jeruſalem, in order, if poſſible, to wreſt that city out of the hands of the infidels. Every neceſſary preparation was made for the armies to march, and the hopes of the cruſaders were raiſed to the higheſt pitch, when an unhappy diſſention aroſe between the two chiefs, and fruſtrated all their pleaſing expectations.

The diſtinguiſhed valour of Richard during the ſiege of Acre, his liberality to the ſoldiers, and the magnificence he diſplayed on every occaſion, procured him the hearts of the cruſaders, and filled the breaſt of Philip with malignant jealouſy. He, however, concealed his paſſion, till a diſpute, which now happened between Guy de Luſignan, and Conrade, marquis of Montſerrat, relative to the crown of Jeruſalem, gave him an opportunity of expreſſing his reſentment. Richard eſpouſed the pretenſions of the former, and Philip thoſe of the latter. During this conteſt, which, in reality, had nothing more than an empty title for its object (the city of Jeruſalem being then in the hands of the infidels) ſeveral ſharp meſſages paſſed between them; and Richard complained that Philip obſtructed the progreſs of the confederate army; adding, that he was ready to ſacrifice every perſonal conſideration to the intereſt of the cauſe he had, at ſuch expence, undertaken to ſupport.

It ſoon, however, appeared that Philip was determined to abandon the enterprize, but, aſhamed to avow his real motives, had recourſe to artifice and deception. He pretended that the climate of Paleſtine did not agree with his conſtitution, and therefore deſired of Richard that he would permit him to return. Richard, after exacting from him the moſt dreadful oath that he would not attempt any thing againſt his dominions, but, on the contrary, protect and defend them to the utmoſt of his power, conſented to his departure, and even furniſhed him with two of his beſt ſhips for carrying him and his retinue to Europe. Philip left the command of his army to the duke of Burgundy: and after giving him ſtrict orders to pay the ſame obedience to the king of England as to himſelf, ſailed to his dominions. Nor was Philip the only perſon who deſerted the enterprize; multitudes followed his example, ſo that the numerous army of the Chriſtians was greatly reduced in number.

After the departure of the French monarch, Richard determined to attempt ſome enterprize worthy the name of the leader of the Chriſtian armies. He accordingly made a general attack on Saladine's camp; but met with ſo powerful a reſiſtance, that he was obliged to retreat with conſiderable loſs. But this rebuff made no change in Richard's reſolutions: that martial ſpirit, which was his ruling paſſion, ſupported him under every misfortune. He determined to march his forces from Acre to Joppa, and fortify all the places that ſhould fall into his hands.

Saladine was no ſtranger to the deſigns of Richard, and therefore poſted himſelf in the way, at the head of an army of three hundred thouſand men, to oppoſe his paſſage. Richard glowed at this opportunity of ſignalizing his courage, fully perſuaded that, if he could defeat the army of Saladine, he ſhould open to himſelf a free paſſage to Jeruſalem, and, perhaps, make himſelf maſter of that city in a ſhort time.

The two armies meeting, they both prepared for a general engagement, which was to decide the fate of thouſands, and, poſſibly, of Paleſtine itſelf. The right wing of the Chriſtian army was commanded by James d'Aveſnes, and the left by the duke of Burgundy, while Richard in perſon led the center, or main body. Saladine had concealed part of his troops on the right behind ſome hills, which covered them from the ſight of the Chriſtians. On this body of reſerve he placed his greateſt hopes of victory; and therefore, without altering his poſition, waited the attack of the enemy, who began the action with their right wing. The Saracens ſupported the ſhock with great reſolution; and, by the ſuperiority of numbers, put that body into great diſorder. Their leader, James d'Aveſnes was ſlain, while endeavouring to rally his broken troops, and lead them once more againſt the infidels. The duke of Burgundy, at the head of the left wing, made a furious attack upon the right of the enemy. The Saracens, for ſome time, ſupported themſelves gallantly till at length Saladine gave orders for a retreat, upon which the duke followed them a conſiderable way from the main body of the army. Saladine perceiving his left wing ſtood firm, and that the duke of Burgundy was ſeparated from the reſt of the allied forces, ordered the body that lay concealed behind the hills to move forward. Theſe troops accordingly deſcended the eminences with ſuch amazing rapidity, that the duke's forces were ſurrounded, and prodigious numbers of them put to the ſword.

Richard no ſooner ſaw the ſituation of the duke than he immediately marched to his aſſiſtance, and fell on the troops of Saladine with ſuch aſtoniſhing impetuoſity, that they were ſoon compelled to give way. The valour of Richard entirely changed the fortune of the day, and Saladine was obliged to reinforce his right wing with part of his troops from the left. This motion, which cauſed ſome diſorder in that part of the Saracens army, gave the right wing of the Chriſtians time to recover themſelves, who fell on the remainder of the left wing of the enemy with ſuch reſolution, that they were obliged to ſave themſelves by a precipitate flight.

In the mean time Richard maintained the battle againſt the right wing with the moſt aſtoniſhing reſolution, in ſpite of the great ſuperiority of the enemy, who now directed their whole force againſt the Engliſh monarch. Richard would, however, have been in the moſt imminent danger, had not his right wing, meeting with no farther oppoſition, advanced to his aſſiſtance. The Saracens, finding themſelves attacked in flank by a freſh body of forces, began to give way; nor was it in the power of Saladine, though he exerted his utmoſt, to rally them. The Chriſtians took advantage of this diſorder, and preſſed the Saracens with ſuch vigour, that they betook themſelves to flight, leaving no leſs than 50,000 infidels dead on the field of battle.

In conſequence of this defeat, the Saracens abandoned the maritime cities of Aſcalon, Cæſarea, and Joppa, after demoliſhing the fortifications. Richard, marched with his victorious troops to Joppa, where he ſtaid ſome time to repair the fortifications, thinking, if, in his future efforts againſt the infidels, he ſhould be compelled to retreat, that would be a ſecure port from whence he might embark his forces for Europe.

During Richard's ſtay at Joppa an event took place which had like to have coſt him his life. He was exceeding fond of hunting, and frequently amuſed himſelf with that diverſion in the neighbourhood, attended only by a few of his moſt intimate friends. As he was one day returning from the chace, with only ſix perſons in his train, being greatly fatigued, he alighted from his horſe, laid himſelf under a tree, and fell aſleep. He was, however, ſoon rouſed by the approach of a ſmall party of Saracen horſe paſſing by the place. Richard immediately got up, mounted his horſe, and, as the Saracens were few in number, purſued them ſome time. The Saracens pretended to fly before him, but artfully drew Richard into an ambuſcade, where he was ſuddenly ſurrounded by a ſquadron of horſe. The king defended himſelf with great bravery for a conſiderable time, without the leaſt thought of retreating, notwithſtanding the prodigious diſparity of numbers. But even the valour of Richard would have been exerted in vain, had not one of his attendants, by a remarkable preſence of mind, ſaved him from impending deſtruction. No leſs than four of his attendants were already ſlain, when William Deſpreaux, a moſt ſincere friend to Richard, cried out, in the Saracen language, "Hold! I am the king of England." The eyes of the Saracens were now directed to Deſpreaux; and thoſe engaged with Richard immediately left him, that they might have a ſhare in ſeizing the perſon whom they imagined to be the Engliſh monarch. This ſtratagem gave Richard the opportunity of eſcaping from the enemy. Deſpreaux did not diſcover himſelf till he was taken before Saladine, when, falling at his feet, he ingenuouſly acknowledged the deception he had uſed for the ſafety of his maſter. Saladine commanded his fidelity, treated him with the greateſt reſpect, and gave him his liberty.

Richard, having finiſhed the fortifications at Joppa, began his march towards Jeruſalem, fully reſolved, if poſſible, to make himſelf maſter of that city. On his way he met with the army of Saladine, which was drawn up on the plains of Rama, in order to diſpute his paſſage. In conſequence of this another deſperate battle enſued, which was continued, for ſome time, with great obſtinacy on both ſides, till at length victory declared in favour of Richard, and the Saracens, after ſuſtaining conſiderable loſs, were obliged to ſave themſelves by a precipitate flight.

After this victory, Richard, having now no obſtacle in his way, proceeded on his march towards Jeruſalem: but the Knights Templars (who were in the intereſt of Philip of France, and therefore envious of the glory which Richard muſt obtain ſhould he make a conqueſt of the Holy City) perſuaded the Engliſh monarch to lay aſide his deſign till the enſuing ſpring, and take up his winter quarters at Aſcalon. Richard who did not ſuſpect the real motive of the knights, followed their advice, marched directly to Aſcalon, and rebuilt the fortifications which had been demoliſhed by the forces of Saladine.

A. D. 1192. Richard had not been long at Aſcalon when the contention, which had, ſome time before, commenced between Guy de Luſignan and the marquis of Conrade, relative to the crown of Jeruſalem, was revived; the conſequence of which was, that the duke of Burgundy refuſed to act any longer in conjunction with the Engliſh, and the French troops retired into places of ſafety, and ſpent their time in luxury and indolence.

Anxious for making himſelf maſter of Jeruſalem (the great object for which the cruſade had been undertaken) Richard put an end to the diſpute by declaring the marquis of Conrade ſovereign of Jeruſalem; but, at the ſame time gave Guy a real, for the loſs of a nominal, dignity, by preſenting him with the crown of Cyprus. The marquis, who was then at Tyre, pleaſed with obtaining the honour he had ſo long deſired, made preparations for joining the Chriſtian army at Aſcalon; but before he could embark with his forces, he was ſtabbed in the ſtreets of that city by two aſſaſſins.

This accident proved a freſh obſtruction to the progreſs of the Chriſtian army; but the widow of the marquis being ſoon after married to Henry count of Champagne, that nobleman was, in her right, declared king of Jeruſalem; and, at his ſolicitation, the French conſented to join the army of Richard, who immediately marched towards the capital of Paleſtine.

When Richard arrived within the neighbourhood of Jeruſalem he fortuuately met with the caravan of the Saracens, which had come from Babylon, and conſiſted of three thouſand camels, and four thouſand mules, loaded with the rich merchandize of the Eaſt, and eſcorted by ten thouſand horſe. The Saracens no ſooner perceived the Chriſtian army than they began to retreat; but Richard, at the head of five thouſand cavalry, attacked them with ſuch fury that they were put to flight, and the whole caravan fell into the hands of the Chriſtians. Richard, who was equally generous and brave, diſtributed the whole booty, which was of prodigious value, among his troops.

Immediately after this ſucceſsful incident, Richard marched with his army to the neighbouring eminences, from the ſummits of which they had a fair proſpect of the celebrated city of Jeruſalem, and the reduction of which was the great object of all their labour and toil. But when Richard thought himſelf ſure of conqueſt, and of putting a glorious period to the expedition, his hopes were rendered abortive by diviſions among the leaders of the confederate army. It was urged, in a council of war, that the ſcarcity, which then prevailed in the neighbouring countries would render it difficult, if not impoſſible, to procure proviſions neceſſary for their ſubſiſtence, and that therefore it would be imprudent, at leaſt for the preſent, to attempt inveſting the city.

But theſe reaſons were far from being ſatisfactory to Richard, who determined to lay ſiege to the city, which was then very thin of troops, great numbers having been drawn out to reinforce the army of Saladine. The duke of Burgundy, finding it impoſſible to divert Richard from his deſign, and at the ſame time envious of the glory which the Engliſh monarch would acquire by the reduction of Jeruſalem, drew off his forces, and marched directly to Tyre; and his example was followed by the duke of Auſtria, general of the French forces.

Theſe were diſcouraging circumſtances to Richard, whoſe mind was ſo bent on the reduction of Jeruſalem, that he even ſubmitted to ſolicit the aſſiſtance of the duke of Burgundy, and the count of Champagne himſelf, the nominal king of Jeruſalem, undertook the office of ambaſſador. But every attempt was made in vain. Steady to his purpoſe of depriving Richard of the glory of taking the capital of Paleſtine, the duke abſolutely refuſed to join the Chriſtian army. The Engliſh monarch was therefore obliged to abandon the enterprize, and accordingly marched his army to Acre. But he had hardly reached the neighbourhood of that city, when advice was received that Saladine had taken Joppa, and was preſſing the ſiege of the caſtle with ſuch fury, that unleſs a ſpeedy relief arrived, the garriſon muſt be compelled to ſurrender.

In conſequence of this intelligence, Richard (who never abandoned his ſoldiers in diſtreſs) marched with his forces to Joppa, whither he had no ſooner arrived than he fell on the beſiegers with ſuch aſtoniſhing fury, that they immediately gave up the enterprize, threw down their arms, and fled with the utmoſt precipitation.

But notwithſtanding this ſucceſs, it was impoſſible for Richard (whoſe army was materially weakened by the deſertion of the dukes of Burgundy and Auſtria) to defeat the numerous armies of Saladine, and carry his victories to the gates of Jeruſalem. At the ſame time, the violent enthuſiaſm of the cruſaders in general began to yield to time and fatigue; and they were now more deſirous of viſiting their own country than the capital of Paleſtine. Richard was no ſtranger to their wiſhes, and therefore determined to take the opportunity of coming to an accommodation with Saladine. Accordingly, a three year's truce was concluded between them, by which it was agreed, that Acre, Joppa, and ſome other ſea-port towns in Paleſtine, ſhould remain in poſſeſſion of the Chriſtians, and that all of that religion ſhould have liberty to perform pilgrimages to Jeruſalem unmoleſted.

Saladine continued faithful to his engagements, but did not live to ſee the expiration of the time limited for the truce, being ſuddenly taken off at Damaſcus juſt before that period arrived. He was a prince of the greateſt humanity and moderation; and his death was lamented by the Chriſtians. The laſt action of his life deſerves to be particularly noticed. He ordered that, at his funeral, his ſhirt ſhould be carried on the point of a lance through every ſtreet in Damaſcus, while a crier preceding it, proclaimed, with a loud voice, "This is all that remains of the mighty Saladine, the conqueror of the Eaſt." By his laſt will, he left conſiderable charities to be diſtributed to the poor of every denomination: the Chriſtian, Jew and Mahometan, ſhared equally the bounty of the generous and humane Saladine.

After ſigning the truce with Saladine, Richard, having no farther buſineſs of importance to detain him in Paleſtine, reſolved to haſten, with all expedition, to England. He accordingly embarked on board a large veſſel bound for the iſle of Corfu, from whence he ſet ſail in order to land on the coaſt of Italy; but was unfortunately ſhipwrecked near Raguſa in the gulph of Venice. He knew the danger of croſſing ſo large an extent of territory with his attendants, and therefore diſguiſed himſelf in the habit of a pilgrim, intending to travel through Germany, as the ſafeſt way, to his own dominions. But, unluckily, ſome German officers, who had ſerved under Leopold, duke of Auſtria at the ſiege of Acre, happened to recollect the perſon of the royal pilgrim, and gave their maſter the pleaſing information. Leopold, rejoiced at the thoughts of having the Engliſh monarch in his power, ordered him to be ſeized in the night at a village near Vienna, and ſent him in chains to the emperor.

As ſoon as the captivity of Richard was known in England, a general conſternation took place throughout the kingdom. His brother John (who had long formed a deſign of uſurping the Engliſh throne) conſidered it as a very fortunate event, and determined, if poſſible, to improve it to his own advantage. To effect this he went over to France, and ſolicited the protection of Philip, whom he knew to be an inveterate enemy to his brother. In conſequence of this, queen Eleanor exerted herſelf in the cauſe of Richard, and earneſtly conjured the council to take every precaution to render abortive the ungenerous deſigns of John.

A. D. 1193. The perfidious Philip received John with open arms, and a treaty was concluded between them, by which it was ſtipulated that the latter ſhould deliver up to Philip a great part of Normandy; and that John ſhould receive, in return, the inveſtiture of all the reſt of Richard's tranſmarine dominions. In conſequence of this treaty Philip invaded Normandy at the head of a powerful army, made himſelf maſter of ſeveral places, and extended his ravages to the gates of Rouen. But the time of the ſervice of his vaſſals being expired, he concluded a truce with the Engliſh regent, who agreed to pay him twenty thouſand marks to withdraw his army.

During theſe baſe tranſactions, the warlike Richard was ſuffering every kind of inſult and indignity in a German priſon. A warrior, who, at the head of his army, made even the mighty Saladine tremble, was now treated with contempt by the very perſon who ought to have protected him. The unfortunate Richard was at length taken before the diet, and accuſed of ſeveral crimes, which had no exiſtence but in the malignant minds of his enemies. He juſtified himſelf with an eloquence that confounded his perſecutors, and covered them with confuſion, and remonſtrated with them on the cruel treatment he had received in a country that had expreſſed the utmoſt ardour for the cruſade, and by princes who profeſſed the tenets of the goſpel. The princes of the diet were aſhamd of the emperor's conduct, and loudly declared they could not ſuffer the Germanic body to be ſtained with the imputation of violating the laws of nature and nations, by detaining in priſon, without any juſt cauſe, the perſon of a great king, who had ſo nobly ventured his life in the cauſe of Chriſtianity. The emperor was alarmed at this declaration, and offered to ſet Richard at liberty; but demanded 150,000 marks as a ranſom, of which 100,000 were to be paid to him before his releaſement, and hoſtages delivered to the duke of Auſtria, for the payment of the remainder at a future period.

As ſoon as the emperor's demand was made known in England, every method was taken that could be thought for raiſing the money with the utmoſt expedition. Twenty ſhillings were levied on every knight's fee, and the money then in the treaſury applied to purchaſe the liberty of a prince, who had ſo gallantly reduced the power of the infidels. The plate in the churches and monaſteries was melted down: the nobles, biſhops and abbots paid a fourth part of their annual revenues; the parochial clergy a tenth of their tithes; and William, king of Scotland contributed two thouſand marks towards the king's ranſom. The neceſſary ſum being thus raiſed, queen Eleanor, accompanied by Walter, archbiſhop of Rouen, went over to the continent, paid that part of the money then demanded by the emperor, and delivered up the hoſtages to the duke of Auſtria, for the remainder; in conſequence of which Richard was immediately ſet at liberty, in the preſence of the archbiſhops of Mentz and Cologne, and moſt of the German nobility.

A. D. 1194. Richard had not long left the imperial court, when ambaſſadors arrived from Philip of France, offering a large ſum of money to the emperor, if he would confine the Engliſh monarch one year longer. The baſe and perfidious emperor readily catched at the offer, and immediately diſpatched meſſengers to arreſt Richard, and bring him back to the imperial court. But his cruel deſigns were rendered abortive, Richard having embarked at the mouth of the Schelde, and loſt ſight of the German ſhore, before the meſſengers could overtake him.

Philip was aſtoniſhed when he heard that Richard was ſet at liberty; and wrote a letter to prince John in the following terms: "Take care of yourſelf: the devil is broke looſe."

Richard was releaſed from his confinement on the 4th of February, and on the 20th of March following landed at Sandwich, from whence he proceeded to London, amidſt the acclamations of the people, who ſeemed to vie with each other in teſtifying their ſatisfaction at his ſafe return. This endearing behaviour of his ſubjects almoſt baniſhed from the mind of Richard, the thoughts of thoſe indignities he had experienced during his impriſonment: all his alarms, fatigues and ſufferings were buried in oblivion. He was even deſirous of wiping off the ignominy of his captivity, and therefore ordered the ceremony of his coronation to be repeated, which was according performed, a few days after his arrival, at Weſtminſter, the king of Scotland carrying the ſword of ſtate.

Soon after the performance of this ceremony Richard declared his deſign of making a reſumption of all the crown revenues, and annulling all the contracts he had made before his departure to the Holy Land. He alledged, that the purchaſers had already indemnified themſelves with the profits of the eſtates: that neceſſity had compelled him to make the grants: that the money had been ſpent in an expedition favoured both by the clergy and laity; and that therefore it was unjuſt the crown ſhould bear the whole burthen. Theſe reaſons were unneceſſary, not a ſingle perſon diſputing the juſtice of reſumption. All the purchaſers gave up the poſſeſſions they had obtained from the king, and ſeemed to vie with each other who ſhould be firſt to make the required ſurrender.

Richard now called a parliament at Northampton, at which he demanded juſtice againſt his brother John, and his principal abettor, Hugh, biſhop of Coventry, both of whom were then in France. They were cited to appear within forty days, and anſwer the charges exhibited againſt them. But they both refuſed to obey the ſummons, in conſequence of which John was attainted of high treaſon, and the prelate was ordered to be tried by the biſhops in the king's court.

A. D. 1195. Richard had, ever ſince his arrival in England, reſolved in his own mind, to take the firſt opportunity he could of puniſhing the perfidious Philip, king of France; and the kingdom being now in a perfect ſtate of tranquillity, he determined on carrying his deſign into execution. A monarch leſs paſſionate and haughty than Richard could not have been eaſily prevailed on to pardon the deteſtable conduct of Philip, who, contrary to the moſt ſolemn oaths, and in defiance of all laws, both human and divine, had invaded his territories, and endeavoured to prolong the time of his captivity.

Having raiſed a very powerful army, Richard paſſed over to the continent, and immediately commenced hoſtilities againſt the French monarch. But no great conqueſts were made during the whole campaign. The only action of any conſequence happened at Fretteville, between the French and Engliſh cavalry, when the former were totally routed; and Philip loſt his chartulary, or regiſter of charters, which he always carried with him, containing the ſeveral particulars of his revenues, with a liſt of his vaſſals.

In the courſe of this war prince John, the king's brother (who was deſtitute both of honour and integrity) deſerted the French monarch, as he had before done his brother. Having invited to dinner all the officers of the garriſon of Evreaux, where he commanded, he ordered them to be maſſacred, and then delivered up the place to the king of England, of whom he craved pardon for his offences. Queen Eleanor interceded in his behalf, and with ſuch ſucceſs that Richard forgave his brother for what was paſſed, and again received him into favour. "I forgive him, ſaid Richard, and hope to forget his injuries as eaſily as he will my clemency."

During theſe traſactions the duke of Auſtria was ſeized with a violent fever, in conſequence of having cruſhed his leg by a fall from his horſe at a tournament; and finding his end approaching, was ſtruck with remorſe for his cruel behaviour to Richard. A proper reſtitution was not in his power to make; but he ordered, by his will, that all the Engliſh hoſtages ſhould be ſet at liberty, and his part of the king's ranſon remitted. The duke's ſon refuſed to obey his father's orders, but by the interpoſition of the clergy he was obliged to ſubmit, and they were fully diſcharged.

A. D. 1196. Richard, in order to ſupport his military operations againſt Philip, was obliged to load his Engliſh ſubjects with heavy taxes, which occaſioned a general commotion throughout the kingdom; and the great talents of Hubert, the chief juſticiary, were hardly ſufficient to prevent the general diſcontent from producing the moſt ſerious conſequences. Every day produced ſome freſh diſturbances, which were greatly increaſed by the harangues of one William Fitz-Oſbert, a perſon of mean birth, and ſtill meaner appearance. He was a lawyer by profeſſion, but pretended to be the advocate of the poor; and in order to render himſelf particularly remarkable as to perſon, ſuffered his beard to grow to an enormous length, from which circumſtance he acquired the appellation of Longbeard. He was continually exciting the ſpirit of reſentment in the poor againſt the rich, by the moſt inflammatory ſpeeches; pretending there was a colluſion among the great to eaſe themſelves of the load of public taxes, and throw the whole weight on the ſhoulders of the labouring people, who (he ſaid) were conſidered in no better light than as beaſts of burthen. Theſe inſinuations produced the intended effect: the fury of the people was raiſed to a degree bordering on madneſs; and a tumult enſued in St. Paul's church-yard, where ſeveral perſons loſt their lives, and many others were dangerouſly wounded.

Theſe dangerous commotions greatly alarmed Hubert the juſticiary, who ordered Longbeard to appear before him; but he was ſo far from paying any regard to the ſummons, that he killed the officer who delivered the citation. The more rational part of Longbeard's followers were ſtruck with horror at this inhuman act, and immediately abandoned the pretended advocate for the rights of the people. Longbeard obſerved this deſertion, but continued for ſome days, at the head of his rabble, to commit the moſt horrid barbarities on the citizens.

It was now thought high time for government to interpoſe, in order to prevent an open rebellion. Accordingly, a ſtrong party of ſoldiers were ſent into the city, with ſtrict orders to apprehend the incendiary, dead or alive. This appearance of the ſoldiery ſtruck a terror in the rioters, who retired, with Longbeard at their head, to the church of St. Mary-le-bow, where they ſhut themſelves up, hopeing a general inſurrection would be excited in their favour. But in this they were greatly miſtaken: the citizens ſaw their error, and gave up the wretch who had ſo baſely deceived them. When the ſoldiers came to the church in order to execute their commiſſion, Longbeard refuſed to ſurrender; and being driven from the body of the church by one part of them, who made a forcible entrance, he ran, at the head of his followers, into the ſteeple, from whence they diſcharged a prodigious number of ſtones, and other miſſiles, at the aſſailants. The officer, who commanded the ſoldiers, being unwilling to expoſe their lives to the attacks of a ſet of deſperadoes, ordered a large quantity of wet ſtraw to be carried into the body of the church, and ſet on fire. This had the intended effect, the inſurgents, being compelled to ſurrender, in order to prevent ſuffocation. Longbeard was ſentenced to be drawn at a horſe's tail through the principal ſtreets of the city, and afterwards to be hung in chains: but this ſentence was altered, and he, with nine of his principal accomplices, were hanged at Tyburn.

A. D. 1197. The war on the continent was ſtill carried on with the moſt unremitted animoſity by the two contending monarchs. In the ſpring of this year, Richard marched his army into Auvergne and Berry, where he poſſeſſed himſelf of ſeveral places; but they were ſoon after retaken by Philip.* In the mean time John, who had been harraſſing

* During theſe tranſactions Richard was informed that his Engliſh ſubjects were in great diſtreſs on account of a famine and mortality, which were equally felt in moſt parts of the kingdom. Soon after receiving this melancholy intelligence he harraſſing the people of Beauvais, being reinforced by a conſiderable body of Brabanders, advanced to the very gates of the city. Peter de Dreux, biſhop of Beauvais, a prince of the blood royal, diſdaining to be inſulted at the gates of his own capital, ſallied out, at the head of a choſen number of forces, in order to drive the enemy from their poſts. But this attempt proved unſucceſsful, his army being totally defeated, and himſelf taken priſoner.

John knew that Richard mortally hated the biſhop, and therefore ſent him to his brother, to be diſpoſed of as he ſhould think proper. Richard immediately gave orders that he ſhould be conveyed to a dark dungeon in Rouen, and heavily loaded with chains. A few days after ſeveral of the biſhop's friends interceded with Richard for a mitigation of the prelates ſentence. "You yourſelves (ſaid the king) ſhall be judges of my reaſons for this ſeverity. When I was taken priſoner in Germany, the emperor treated me, at firſt, with good manners and civility; but within a few days arrived the biſhop of Beauvais. Next morning he had his audience of the emperor, and a few hours after I was chained like a ſlave, and more irons heaped upon my limbs than if I had been the baſeeſt of criminals. Can you, therefore, condemn me for treating the biſhop in the ſame manner?" This ſilenced all the advocates of the prelate; but the pope ſoon after demanded his liberty, and claimed him as his ſon, and inſiſted highly on the privileges of the church. The king ſent the coat of mail, which the biſhop had worn in battle, and which was beſmeared with blood, to the pontiff, with a letter, containing theſe words: "This have we found: know then whether it be thy ſon's coat, or not." This laconic epiſtle put a ſtop to any farther interceſſion from his holineſs, who returned for anſwer, "that the coat ſent by the king did not belong to a ſon of the church, but to a ſon of the camp; therefore Richard was at liberty to treat the priſoner as he thought proper." The prelate, being thus abandoned, was obliged to purchaſe his liberty at the price of ten thouſand marks.

A. D. 1198. The French monarch, being now weary of a war which had greatly exhauſted his finances, applied to pope Innocent III. who then filled the papal chair, to employ his good offices in bringing about a peace with Richard. The pope readily complied with his requeſt, and ſent cardinal Peter into France to act as mediator between the contending parties. Accordingly a negotiation was begun, and a conſiderable progreſs made in a treaty for a durable peace, when the whole was rendered abortive by the unexpected death of the Engliſh monarch, the particulars relative to which are as follow:

A. D. 1199. A peaſant ploughing a field in the lordſhip of Vidomar, viſcount of Limoges, found a treaſure, containing, beſides money, ſeveral valuable pieces of antiquity. The peaſant delivered the whole to Vidomar, who ſent a part of it to Richard; but the king, not being ſatisfied, demanded the whole, as ſuperior lord of the ſoil. The viſcount, not readily complying with his demand, Richard, at the head of a company of Brabanders, beſieged him in the caſtle of Chaluz. The garriſon offered to ſurrender; but Richard replied, that ſince Vidomar had given him the trouble of coming himſelf to recover what was properly his own, he would enter the caſtle by force; and hang every man of them on the walls. This declaration rendered the beſieged deſperate, and they reſolved to ſell their lives as dear as poſſible.

In the afternoon of the ſame day Richard, accompanied by Marcadee, the leader of the Brabanders, approached the caſtle in order to reconnoitre its ſituation and avenues. But as he was taking a ſurvey of the works one Bertram de Gourdon, (who was on the walls of the caſtle armed with a croſs-bow) took aim at the king, and pierced his ſhoulder with an arrow. Richard immediately clapped ſpurs to his horſe, and returned to his quarters, from whence he ſent a meſſenger to Marcadee, with orders that he ſhould begin the aſſault, and after taking the place, hang up all the garriſon, except the perſon who had given him the wound. Theſe orders were punctually executed; the garriſon were all hanged, and Bertram reſerved a priſoner to ſuffer whatever puniſhment the king might think proper to inflict on him.

The wound which Richard received was not, of itſelf, dangerous; but from the ignorance of the ſurgeon in extracting the head of the arrow, a mortification enſued. In conſequence of this, Richard, ſenſible his life was drawing towards a period, ſent for Gourdon, and, on his approach, ſaid, "Wretch, what injury did I ever do to you, "that you ſhould endeavour to deprive me of my "life?" "What have you done to me, replied "the priſoner: you killed, with your own hands "my father and two brothers; and myſelf you "intended to have hanged. I am now in your "power; take your revenge: I ſhall willingly "ſubmit to the ſevereſt tortures, provided I can "think I have delivered the world from ſo great "a tyrant."

Struck with remorſe at the boldneſs and juſtneſs of this reply, Richard ordered the priſoner to be immediately ſet, at liberty; but Gourdon ſoon after falling into the hands of Marcadee, he ordered him to be flead alive, and afterwards hanged in chains.

The king did not long ſurvive the death of Gourdon, the mortification increaſing ſo faſt as to prevent every attempt to ſtop it fruitleſs. He paid the debt of nature on the 6th of April, in the 42d year of his age, and 10th of his reign.

Richard, a few hours before he expired, made his will, in which he deviſed not only the throne of England, but likewiſe all his other dominions, to his brother John, to whom he had been, for ſome time perfectly reconciled. He left conſiderable ſums of money to be diſpoſed of for the relief of the poor, beſides legacies to the greater part of his domeſtics.

It is ſaid that the archbiſhop of Rouen, preſuming on the privilege which a death-bed then gave to the clergy, viſited Richard a ſhort time before his death, and, in the courſe of converſation, he happened to go to a ſmall ſea port town called St. Valeri, where he obſerved a ſhip laden with corn from England. Knowing the diſtreſſes of his people on account of the famine, he determined to make examples of thoſe, who, from views of intereſt, had ſo materially contributed to increaſe them, and accordingly ordered all the people belonging to the veſſel to be immediately hanged at the yard-arm; having done which he put other men on board the ſhip, and ſent her with the corn back to England.

tion, adviſed the king (with whom he had had ſeveral ſharp diſputes) to put away his three daughters. "Daughters! replied the king: why "you know I have none." "Yes, ſaid the pre- "late, you have three, Pride, Covetouſneſs and "Luxury." "Then, ſaid Richard, that I may "may diſpoſe of them where I know they will be "cheriſhed, I leave my pride to the Knights Tem- "plars, my covetouſneſs to the Ciſtertians, and "my luxury to the prelates"

Richard excelled all the princes of his age for perſonal bravery and military proweſs; on which account he received the ſurname of Cœur de Lion, or Lion's Heart. He was ſo paſſionately fond of military glory, that he never thought any toils, any dangers, any difficulties, too great to attain it. In ſhort, war was to him a paſtime, and danger a ſpur to freſh atchievements.

In his perſon he was ſtrong and well-proportioned: his arms were long; his eyes blue and full of vivacity: his hair was of a yellowiſh colour, his countenance fair and comely, and his mein grand and truly majeſtic.

Few men were poſſeſſed of a greater ſhare of underſtanding, a more ſolid judgment, or more perſuaſive eloquence, than Richard. He had a ready wit, and was maſter of a delicate keen vein of ſatire, the latter of which qualification was evinced in the ſmart repartee he made to the archbiſhop of Rouen, when on his death-bed.

In his private character Richard, like moſt other great men, had a mixture of ſhining qualities and diſtinguiſhed vices. His ingratitude, and want of filial affection, are unpardonable. He was proud, haughty, ambitious, choleric, cruel and vindictive; but at the ſame time he was open, frank, generous and brave, and particularly rewarded thoſe who aſſiſted him in obtaining military honours.

During his reign the people were burthened with ſeveral very heavy taxes, but then it muſt be acknowledged he did not hoard up the money like a covetous miſer, it being chiefly employed in defraying the expences of a war, which (however abſurd it may appear in modern times) was, at that period, conſidered as laudable.

Upon the whole, it muſt be confeſſed, that had Richard lived longer, the natural enemies of this country (the French) would never have been able to extend their territories as they afterwards did; nor would England have been reduced to the miſerable ſtate in which ſhe appeared under the reign of his ſucceſſor.

Richard bore in the ſhield of his coat of arms three lions paſſant guardant; which bearing has been ever ſince continued by the Engliſh monarchs. In his reign alſo coats of arms came to be hereditary in families. Theſe owe their origin to the badges, which knights, and other military perſons, painted, for diſtinction, on their ſhields or banners, in thoſe expeditions into the eaſt, called the Cruſades.

Remarkable Occurrences during the reign of Richard I.

A. D.

1189 The citizens of London obtained the liberty of being governed by two bailiffs or ſheriffs; alſo to have a mayor for their principal governor. The two firſt ſheriffs, or bailiffs, were, Henry Cornhell and Richard Ryner; and the firſt mayor, Henry Fitz-Alwyn, who continued in that office upwards of twenty-five years.

1191 On Midſummer-day the ſun was eclipſed for three hours, and the ſtars were ſeen in the heavens at ten o'clock in the forenoon.

1192 Grain was ſo ſcarce in England, that wheat ſold for 20s. per quarter, a ſum equal to 6l. of the preſent money. This year there raged a violent fever, which laſted five months, and carried off innumerable multitudes of the people.

On Whitſunday there appeared a ſeeming ſun ſo like the real one that the aſtronomers were obliged to view them with their inſtruments in order to diſcover the difference.

1197 About this time lived Robin Hood and Little John, two diſtinguiſhed robbers, who concealed themſelves in retired parts of the country, and lived entirely by plunder. Robin Hood was betrayed in a nunnery at Berkley, and being ſick, deſired to be let blood; but after the orifice was cloſed, he opened it, and ſuffered himſelf to bleed to death.

It was during this reign that the citizens of London firſt divided themſelves into corporations, or, as they are now called, companies.

CHAP. III.

JOHN, ſurnamed LACKLAND.

John is crowned king of England. Divorces his wife, and marries Iſabella, daughter to the count of Angouleſme. Goes over to Normandy in order to quell ſome commotions excited by the earl of Marche. His nephew prince Arthur takes up arms againſt him, but is defeated and taken priſoner. Death of Arthur, and conſequences thereof. Philip, king of France, makes himſelf maſter of John's dominions on the continent. John returns to England, and quarrels with the pope. The kingdom laid under an interdict. John cruelly treats his ſubjects, both clergy and laity. Is excommunicated by the pope. The French king makes preparations for invading England. John reſigns his dominions to the pope, and ſubmits to hold them as tributary to him at the yearly payment of 1000 marks. Is abſolved, and the pope's interdict taken off his kingdom. John makes an unſucceſsful expedition to France. On his return the Engliſh barons oblige him to ſign a charter of liberties, called Magna Charta, and another, intituled, Charta de Foreſta. John retires in diſguſt to the Iſle of Wight, and prevails on the pope to condemn and annul the two charters. The king marches at the head of an army againſt the barons, and commits the moſt cruel ravages. The barons invite over Lewis, the dauphin of France, to their aſſiſtance. On his arrival the king retreats to Wincheſter, and Lewis marches to London, where the barons and citizens ſwear fealty to him. Several of the barons grow diſguſted at Lewis's partiality to foreigners, and make private aſſurances of their good intentions to John. The king marches into Lincolnſhire in expectation of being joined by the barons, but is diſappointed by an unforeſeen accident. His death and character.

A. D. 1199. THE late king had, by his will, left the crown of England to his brother John; but, it was a matter of ſome diſpute whether or not prince Arthur, ſon of his elder brother Geoffrey, had not a prior right. The barons of Normandy ſupported the pretenſions of Arthur, whom they conſidered as their lawful ſovereign. The inhabitants of Anjou, Maine and Touraine, declared openly in his favour: but Conſtantia, the mother of Arthur, fearing the barons would not be be able to ſupport the title of her ſon againſt the power of John, ſent the prince to Paris, and put him under the protection of Philip.

In the mean time the friends of John in England exerted themſelves with great aſſiduity in his favour. They exacted the oath of fealty to him from the citizens, burghers, corporations and military tenants of the crown; but the prelates and nobility, tenacious of their liberties, retired to their caſtles. In conſequence of this the archbiſhop of Canterbury (who was zealous in the cauſe of John) ſummoned them to an aſſembly at Northampton, when he painted the virtues of John in ſuch conſpicuous colours that they were prevailed on to follow the example of the reſt of the nation, which they accordingly did by taking the oath of fealty to his perſon and government.

Being informed of theſe proceedings, and having ſettled his affairs on the continent, John embarked for England, and landed at Shoreham on the 25th of May, from whence he immediately proceeded to London, where he was received with univerſal joy by the people, and two days after crowned at Weſtminſter by Hubert, archbiſhop of Canterbury.

As ſoon as John found himſelf fully eſtabliſhed on the throne, he reſolved to paſs over to Normandy, in order to conclude that treaty of peace with Philip, king of France, which had been entered into by his brother Richard. Accordingly, a conference was held between the two monarchs, when the following preliminaries were agreed on as the baſis of a definitive treaty. That Lewis, ſon to Philip ſhould marry Blanch, daughter to Alphonſo, king of Caſtile, and niece to John. That the latter ſhould give up with her the earldom and city of Evreux, together with his claim to all the places poſſeſſed by Philip in Normandy at the time of Richard's death, and a pecuniary compliment of thirty thouſand marks of ſilver. John agreed to theſe articles, and the definitive treaty was ſoon after concluded. Nine barons of the king of France, and the ſame number of the king of England, were appointed guarantees. Theſe ſwore on each ſide, that if their ſovereign violated any article of the treaty they would declare themſelves againſt him, and embrace the cauſe of the injured monarch.

A. D. 1200. During the time this treaty was in agitation, John became a captive to the charms of Iſabella, daughter and heireſs of Aymar, count of Angouleſme, one of the moſt celebrated beauties of the age. John's queen was ſtill alive; and Iſabella was betrothed to Hugh earl of Marche. The nuptials, on account of her tender age, had never been conſummated; but ſhe had been ſome time delivered into the hands of her betrothed huſband. Theſe were difficulties which ſeemed to form an unſurmountable barrier to the wiſhes of the Engliſh monarch; but, in order to obtain his ends, he made no heſitation at violating the laws of his country, and committing an act at once diſgraceful to a king or a ſubject. Under pretence of conſanguinity, he artfully procured a divorce from his wife Alice, and perſuaded Aymar to carry off his daughter, whom he ſoon after married. The pope was highly exaſperated at theſe unjuſtifiable proceedings; but John neither regarded the diſpleaſure of the pontiff, or the reſentment of the earl, whom he had ſo materially injured.

A. D. 1201-2. After ſtaying ſome time on the continent John returned with his new conſort to England, and they were both ſolemnly crowned at Weſtminſter by the archbiſhop of Canterbury; ſoon after which the king accompanied by his young queen, ſet out on a progreſs through England. In the courſe of his tour he held ſeveral courts, at which great numbers, who had treſpaſſed againſt the foreſt laws, were ſummoned, and rigorouſly puniſhed. The people thought themſelves exempted from the arbitrary foreſt laws introduced by the Normans in conſequence of the charter granted by Henry II. and therefore the king's conduct in puniſhing thoſe who had treſpaſſed againſt thoſe laws produced an univerſal diſcontent throughout the kingdom.

The earl of Marche was no ſtranger to the miſunderſtanding between John and his Engliſh ſubjects; and thinking this a ſeaſonable opportunity for reſenting the unjuſtifiable conduct of John in robbing him of his betrothed wife, formed a confederacy with his brother the count d'Eu, who, with him, aſſiduouſly applied themſelves to excite commotions in Poictou and Normandy.

As ſoon as John was informed of this, he ſummoned an aſſembly of his barons, when great numbers met, who unanimouſly refuſed attending him to Normandy unleſs he would firſt confirm their privileges. But the aſſociation was not yet ſufficiently eſtabliſhed for them to ſupport their noble reſolution. The threatenings and power of royality engaged the greater part to ſubmit, and John paſſed over into Normandy at the head of an army more than ſufficient to reduce the inſurgents; but he purſued no prudent methods: he advanced claims that gave univerſal diſcontent, and added daily to the public grievances. The barons complained to the king of France, as ſuperior lord; and that prince inſiſted upon John's doing them juſtice. He promiſed to redreſs all the grievances that were founded on juſtice; but as the juriſprudence of the times permitted that cauſes in the lord's court might be decided by ſingle combat, John carried with him a number of perſons whom he retained as champions to fight with his diſappointed barons. His vaſſals, deſpiſed, offended, and reduced to deſpair, once more applied to Philip; he received their appeal, and began to exert his authority, in order to prevent their oppreſſion. John again promiſed to do them juſtice, and again broke his engagements; ſo that his conduct rendered him at once both odious and contemptible.

Young prince Arthur, alarmed at the conſequences that were likely to enſue from the miſconduct of his uncle, determined to ſecure himſelf by forming an alliance with Philip and the diſcontented barons. He accordingly joined the French army, which had already begun hoſtilities. Philip was ſo pleaſed at this that he gave him his daughter in marriage, and promiſed to ſupport him againſt the Engliſh monarch.

A. D. 1203. The ſucceſs of the French forces had been ſo great for ſome time, that John was deſirous of putting an end to all military operations; but Philip was ſo exaſperated, that he openly declared he would not ſheathe the ſword of war, unleſs John would ſubmit to reſign all his tranſmarine dominions to his nephew prince Arthur, whom he conſidered as the lawful and undoubted heir. But John would not ſubmit to ſuch humiliating conditions. He was determined to defend his territories to the laſt extremity; but at the ſame time was deſirous, if poſſible, of coming to an accommodation with Philip, provided the terms could be admitted as reaſonable, ſtances of his courage and intrepidity; but he wanted prudence to conduct military expeditions with ſucceſs. He knew queen Eleanor was a ſworn enemy to his intereſt, and was therefore deſirous of ſecuring her perſon. She reſided in the town of Mirabel, the fortifications of which were in a ruinous condition, and the garriſon too few to make any long reſiſtance. Arthur determined to embrace the firſt opportunity of attacking the town, and being placed by Philip at the head of two hundred knights, precipitately led his ſmall body of forces againſt Mirabel. The place was taken at the firſt aſſault, but the queen, with the greater part of the garriſon, retired into the tower, and made a gallant defence. The danger of his mother rouſed John from the couch of indolence: he marched at the head of an army of Engliſh and Brabanders, attacked the camp of Arthur, put his army to flight, and took the young prince, together with the earl of Marche, and moſt of the revolted barons, priſoners. The greater part of the captives were ſent over to England, but Arthur was ſhut up in the caſtle of Falaiſe, and afterwards removed to the citadel of Rouen in Normandy.

John was a ſtranger to the gentle feelings of compaſſion, and poſſeſſed not the virtue of magnanimity. He conſidered young Arthur as a fixed bar to his ambition; and imagined he could never be truly happy till that prince was effectually removed. This he determined to accompliſh with his own hands, and accordingly took Arthur from Rouen to Cherburg, that the infernal deed might be executed with the greater privacy. There, late in the evening, he mounted his horſe, and accompanied only by a few friends, ordered the prince to ride on before. In this manner they went ſome way, when John ordered his attendants to ſtop and wait his return. He then proceeded with young Arthur along the ſea-ſide, till at length they came to an high cliff hanging over the ſea, which John conſidered as a proper place for executing his bloody deſign. He accordingly ſpurred his horſe cloſe to the ſide of that on which Arthur rode, and ſuddenly ſeizing the rein of the bridle, ſtabbed the young prince ſeveral times through the body, while the wretched victim cried in vain for mercy. At length the prince fainting with loſs of blood fell to the ground and expired; upon which the baſe aſſaſſin diſmounted his horſe, and, to finiſh the infernal deed, threw the body over the precipice into the ſea.

As ſoon as the death of Arthur was known (and no one doubted who was the aſſaſſin) the wretched Conſtantia, mother to that unfortunate prince, preſented to the court of peers in France a petition ſigned by all the barons in Britany, requeſting that ſome puniſhment might be inflicted on the inhuman tyrant for the murder of her ſon. In conſequence of this, Philip ordered John to be ſummoned before his court; but when the day of hearing came, inſtead of appearing himſelf, John ſent two deputies, the biſhop of Ely and Hubert de Burgh, to demand a ſafe-conduct for their maſter. "He may come in peace," ſaid the French monarch, with a ſtern and ſevere countenance. "But "may he return in peace?" aſked the biſhop of Ely. "Yes," anſwered Philip, "if the ſentence "of his peers will permit." The deputies clearly perceived the inſidious tendency of this expreſſion, and inſiſted on an explanation, and his granting the ſafe-conduct required. But Philip gave a peremptory denial, and ſwore by all the Saints of France, "That he ſhould return no otherwiſe than accord-"ing to the ſentence of the court." The biſhop then told Philip, "That John was to be conſi-"dered as king of England, as well as duke of "Normandy; and the barons of England would "not permit their king to riſque his life, or, at "leaſt his liberty, at the French court, even "though he ſhould agree to it himſelf." Philip's anſwer to this was both ready and juſt. "If, my "lord," ſaid he, "the duke of Normandy's am-"bition led him to acquire a higher title, ought "I, who am his lord, to loſe his allegiance as my "vaſſal? What is it to me that he has acquired the "crown of England?" The ambaſſadors did not attempt to anſwer Philip; and the court proceeded to paſs ſentence, which was as follows: "That "John, duke of Normandy, not regarding the "oath he had taken to Philip his lord, and being "an homager of the crown of France, had, within "the ſigniory of that crown, murdered his elder "brother's ſon, who was alſo an homager of the "ſame; therefore the ſaid John is declared a trai-"tor; and, as an enemy to the crown of France, "is adjudged to forfeit all his ſigniories which he "held by homage, and re-entry into the ſame is "ordered to be made by force."

Philip made immediate preparations for putting the ſentence of the court in execution: a more favourable event could not have happened for annexing to the crown of France ſo many conſiderable fiefs, which, during ſeveral centuries, had been diſmembered from it. His vaſſals were no ways inclined to oppoſe his deſigns: the inhuman action of John ſilenced all oppoſition, and Philip marched with his forces into Normandy. Nor was the hatred which the inhabitants of that duchy bore to the French of any great conſequence: it formed but a feeble obſtacle to the rapidity of Philip's conqueſts. The count of Alençon, who had been one of John's moſt ſtrenuous advocates, deſerted him, and delivered up all the places under his command to the French monarch, who now divided his army into different bodies, each commanded by an able and experienced officer.

Exaſperated at the deſertion of ſo powerful a man as the count, John determined to retake Alençon, and immediately inveſted the place. Philip ſaw himſelf expoſed to the diſgrace of ſuffering the capital of his new ally to be wreſted from him. Fortunately a tournament was now held at Gatinois, and the fertile genius of Philip furniſhed him with an expedient for obtaining a powerful aſſiſtance. He repaired to the tournament, and pointed out the plains of Alençon, as the proper field for diſplaying their military talents, and inflicting on a baſe parricide the puniſhment due to his crimes. The knights vowed to chaſtiſe the aſſaſſin, and marched immediately to the relief of the beſieged. John fled at their approach; and never more made any attempt to defend his dominions. He even affected to be unconcerned at the ſucceſs of Philip. "Let him go on," ſaid the puſillanimous monarch, "I ſhall retake in one day what has coſt him ſo long a time to acquire."

A. D. 1204. The principal perſon ſincerely attached to John was Richard de Lacy, conſtable of Cheſter, one of the moſt able and courageous generals of his age. This brave and faithful officer defended Chapeau Galliard a whole year with the greateſt firmneſs and magnanimity. The fortreſs was remarkable for its ſtrength, and Philip was obliged to ſubdue it by famine. The intrepid governor, after having repulſed every attack, and and ſupported, with remarkable patience, all the miſeries of famine, was at laſt ſubdued by a ſudden attack in the night and taken priſoner with his whole garriſon. Philip, who knew how to reſpect valour even in an enemy, treated him with the utmoſt civility, and confined him no farther than within the capital of his dominions.

The French monarch found but little difficulty in poſſeſſing himſelf of the other towns and fortreſſes in Normandy. The inhabitants of Rouen, indeed, at firſt determined to defend the capital; but finding all reſiſtance would be in vain, they gave it up, and Philip took poſſeſſion of the city. The other towns followed the example of the capital, and thus was Normandy, one of the fineſt provinces in the kingdom, re-annexed to the crown of France.

A. D. 1206. The puſillanimous John, finding it needleſs to make any farther efforts in oppoſing Philip returned to England covered with diſgrace. He pretended to impute his ill ſucceſs on the continent to the defects of his Engliſh barons, who refuſed to join his ſtandard. But his conduct which was at once tyrannical and puſillanimous, ſoon convinced the people that the loſſes he had ſuſtained were the natural conſequences of his perſonal cowardice. He was therefore looked upon with contempt; and his barons began to form conſpiracies for reducing within proper limits the exorbitant prerogatives of the crown.

A. D. 1207-9. But the deſigns of the barons were interrupted, for the preſent, by an event which engaged the attention of the whole nation, and ſhook the very pillars of the ſtate. It took place from the imprudence of the monks of Canterbury, and was continued by the perverſeneſs and tyrannical obſtinacy of the king. Theſe monks enjoyed the privilege, on the death of a primate, to name a ſucceſſor; but it was uſual, before they filled an office of ſuch importance, to obtain the king's conſent; and it was alſo generally allowed, that the ſuffragan biſhops had voices in the election.

On the death of Hubert, archbiſhop of Canterbury (who paid the debt of nature about the cloſe of the preceding year) the junior monks met clandeſtinely in the night, elected Reginald, their ſubprior, to the vacant dignity, and placed him on the archiepiſcopal throne. Knowing this election was not valid, unleſs the pope's conſent could be obtained, they enjoined him ſecrecy, and ſent him immediately to Rome, to be confirmed by Innocent III. the then pontiff. Elated with his elevation, Reginald ſuffered his vanity to get the better of his prudence, and endeavoured not to conceal the intention of his journey; ſo that the ſecret was known in England long before he croſſed the Alps. John was highly exaſperated; the ſenior monks proteſted againſt the election; and the ſuffragan biſhops aſſerted their privilege. The juniors themſelves, aſhamed of their conduct, and diſguſted at the levity of Reginald, were very deſirous of annulling the election. The chapter was accordingly aſſembled, and John de Gray, biſhop of Norwich, choſen primate, without one diſſenting voice. Twelve monks were immediately diſpatched to Rome, to ſollicit his confirmation, where they found Reginald, whom the pope had refuſed to confirm, till he received more ſatisfactory intelligence of the election.

The opportunity now offered which Innocent had ſo long deſired, namely, that of extending his authority over the eccleſiaſtical power in England, and he determined to embrace it. He annulled both elections; and inſiſted, that the monks ſent to his holineſs ſhould elect cardinal Langton into the archiepiſcopal ſee of Canterbury. The monks then repreſented, that they had no authority from their convent to make ſuch election; and that it would not only be contrary to all the laws of equity, but alſo to the canons of the church.

But the pontiff was determined to be obeyed; he liſtened not to the voice of reaſon, and the remonſtrances of the monks were urged in vain. He even threatened them with the terrors of excommunication, if they refuſed to obey his orders, and uſed every menace in his power to terrify them into obedience. One of their number, indeed, had the courage to perſevere in oppoſing the pontiff, but the reſt were intimidated, and elected cardinal Langton to the archiepiſcopal ſee.

The Roman pontiff was not inſenſible that this flagrant uſurpation muſt, of courſe, excite the reſentment of the Engliſh court. He therefore wrote a very mollifying letter to John, and encloſed four gold rings ſet with precious ſtones, the value of which he endeavoured to enhance, by explaining the many myſteries they implied. He deſired him to obſerve, with the moſt ſerious attention, the form, matter, and colour of the rings. "The "form, ſaid he, is round, repreſenting eternity, "which has neither beginning nor end; and "hence you ought to learn your duty of aſpiring "from earthly to heavenly objects, from things "temporal to things eternal. The number Four "being a ſquare, denotes ſteadineſs of mind, which "neither proſperity nor adverſity can ſubvert, "fixed for ever on the ſolid baſis of the four cardinal virtues. The matter, which is gold, the "moſt precious of metals, ſhadows out wiſdom, "the moſt precious of all accompliſhments, and "juſtly preferred by Solomon to riches, power, "and all exterior attainments. The blue colour "of the emerald repreſents Faith; the verdure of "the ſapphire, Hope; the redneſs of the ruby, "Charity; and the ſplendor of the topaz, Good "Works."

This curious explanation, however, was far from producing the effect expected by the pontiff. John was enflamed with the utmoſt rage, and threatened the moſt exemplary vengeance againſt all who had been concerned in the late colluſive election. But when he heard that the monks of Canterbury, dreading the vengeance of the court of Rome, were inclined to ſupport the choice, his paſſion knew no bounds. He immediately diſpatched two reſolute knights, whoſe violent tempers were equal to the ferocity of their manners, to expel the monks from their convent. They performed their orders with the greateſt punctuality, and the fathers were obliged to ſeek their ſafety in a precipitate flight.

The Roman pontiff received advice of their violent proceedings with the utmoſt ſatisfaction, being convinced, in his own mind, that ſhould John perſiſt in his oppoſition he muſt infallibly ſink in the conteſt, and that his own purpoſes would be moſt amply anſwered. But inſtead of following the raſh example of John, he had recourſe to the ſofter arts of perſuaſion. He wrote a very conciliating letter to the king, beſeeching him not to oppoſe the determination of his ſpiritual father, who was continually labouring for his future happineſs; and deſired him to reflect ſeriouſly on the conſequences that had attended a ſimilar oppoſition in his father Henry.

But John, instead of paying any regard to this letter, remained firm to his purpose, and determined, if possible, to attain his ends, though at the expence of his life and kingdom. This being made known to the pope, he commanded the bishops of London, Ely and Worcester, to expostulate with him, and, if he continued to persevere in his disobedience, to threaten the kingdom with an interdict.

These threats, instead of having any effect on John, only exasperated him the more; and he swore, that if the pope presumed to pronounce the sentence, he would put out the eyes, and cut off the noses, of all the Roman clergy in his dominions. In vain were all the persuasions of the bishops to mitigate his fury. He wrote a letter to the pope, telling him, that he looked upon his proceedings as an insult upon royalty: that his own kingdom furnished a sufficient number of clergymen, eminent at once for their learning and piety, without suffering those of a foreign seminary to be intruded upon him: that he was determined to maintain the election of the bishop of Norwich to the utmost extremity: and that if he refused to do him justice in this particular, he would prohibit all commerce between his subjects, and those belonging to the see of Rome.

The pontiff paid not the least regard to these threats from the English monarch. He knew the animosity that subsisted between the king and his people, and therefore, without any hesitation, issued out the dreadful sentence of interdiction against the kingdom.

This was the most fatal stroke that could happen to England. The ruin of the people was involved in the punishment of the king. The exterior parts of religion immediately ceased: the altars were stripped of their ornaments; the images, the crosses, the statues of saints, and all the holy relicks were laid upon the ground. The churches were shut against the laity, and divine service was suppressed. Even sacraments were no longer administered but to dying persons; nor were the dead suffered to be buried in consecrated ground. The severest penances were commanded, and every kind of entertainment strictly prohibited.

But notwithstanding these dreadful calamities, the obstinate John (though solicited by his people with tears and supplications) remained inflexible. He opposed, with the most obstinate resolution, every attempt to remove the scourge, and restore tranquillity to his dominions. He punished, with the utmost rigour, all who submitted to the orders of the pope, whether bishops, monks, or secular clergy. Some of the ecclesiastics, indeed, disregarded the censure of the Roman pontiff. The Cistercian order continued to perform divine service publicly; the bishops of Winchester and Norwich followed their examples, and several of the most eminent divines openly preached against those proceedings, which they called unjust and unwarrantable. An exertion of prudent vigor therefore might have dissipated the tempest: but John listened not to the voice of reason; he followed the dictates of his headstrong passions, which led him to the brink of a precipice that at once threatened the destruction both of him and his kingdom.

A. D. 1210. As John could not wreak his vengeance on the pope, he determined on having the horrid satisfaction of adding to the calamities of his subjects, by persecuting them in a manner that would have disgraced the most ferocious tyrant. The clergy were the particular objects of his fury. He seized upon their temporalities, drove them from their monasteries, and inflicted on them every kind of indignity. But his despotism was not confined to the clergy, the laiety also felt the weight of his oppression. He not only enforced the forest laws, which had always excited troubles and distress, but likewise ordered all the mounds of his forest to be levelled, that his deer might range at large, to the inexpressible distress of the husbandmen. In short, so inconsistent were the measures of this infatuated prince, that even while the crown tottered on his head, he had recourse to the most extraordinary stretch of power to enforce the obedience of his barons. He compelled them to give him hostages for their good behaviour and fidelity. The greater number complied with his demand; but when the king's messengers came to the castle of William de Barouse, a nobleman of great power in the Marches of Wales, his lady replied, "That she would never trust her son to the care of a prince who had embrued his hands in the blood of his own nephew." Barouse, who knew the cruel temper of John, and that the sarcasm of his wife would never be pardoned, fled, with his family, into Ireland. But the place of their retreat was soon known, and John gave a loose to his cruelty. He shut up the lady and her son in prison, where, by his orders, they were starved to death; but Barouse luckily made his escape, and fled to the continent.

A. D. 1211. From these violent and tyrannical proceedings John, had been some time in expectation of receiving the dreadful sentence of excommunication from the pontiff; and was therefore desirous of averting so tremendous an edict. He therefore dispatched the abbot of Beaulieu on an embassy to Rome, to effect, if possible, a reconciliation with the pontiff. Cardinal Langton was immediately ordered to repair to England; but John's proposals not being equal to what the pope demanded, he broke off the conference abruptly, and returned to the continent.

The pope, irritated at the ill success of his legate, immeidately denounced the dreadful sentence of excommunication against John, and absolved all his subjects from their oaths of allegiance. He gave the kingdom of England to Philip of France, a prince who wanted neither power nor inclination to assert his claim. Nay, he even promised him the remission of all his sins, if he succeeded in the reduction of England; and granted the same indulgences on account of this expedition, as had been given to those who went into Asia to recover the Holy Land from the Infidels. The facinating lustre of the English diadem shone bright in the eyes of Philip, who employed his whole time in fitting out a numerous fleet, and in raising and disciplining the finest army ever seen in France.

Though John's subjects had reason to look on him with detestation, yet from the natural enmity they bore the French, and the hatred they had conceived against the pope for his arbitrary proceedings, John was enabled to raise, and keep together, an army of sixty thousand men, at the head of whom he marched towards Dover, to meet the prince, who had tried and condemned him in France, and was then coming to dethrone him in England.

In the mean time the pope was determined once more to try lenitives with John, and accordingly sent over Pandolf, his legate, to whom he gave private inſtructions how to behave, in caſe John ſhould repent, and deſire to make ample ſatisfaction. The legate, having procured an interview with the king at Dover, repreſented to him all the dangers of his ſituation. "The French fleet, "ſaid he, is ready to ſail; and your troops will "certainly deſert you in the day of battle. The "only reſource, therefore, left is, that of ſub-"mitting yourſelf abſolutely to the protection of "the Holy See."

Theſe remonſtrances had the deſired effect. The puſillanimous John, fearful of the power of Philip, and dreading the deſertion of the barons, readily ſubmitted, and ſubſcribed to all the conditions ſtipulated by Pandolf. Among other articles he promiſed that he would ſubmit himſelf entirely to the will of the pope: that he would acknowledge Langton for primate, and reſtore all the exiled clergy and laity, who had been baniſhed on account of the conteſt; that he would make them full reſtitution for all damages they had received, and immediately conſign eight thouſand pounds in part for that purpoſe; and that every one impriſoned, on account of their adherence to the pope, ſhould be releaſed, and received into grace and favour.

Pandolf, having procured this humiliating treaty from John with ſo much eaſe, thought he might venture to go one ſtep farther; and accordingly propoſed, that he ſhould reſign his kingdom to the pontiff. He perſuaded the king, that there was no other way by which he could ſo effectually diſappoint the French invaſion, as by putting himſelf under the immediate protection of the holy ſee. The wretched and now truly abject John made no ſcruple to comply with every propoſition made by the artful legate. He accordingly (on the 15th of May, A. D. 1213) repaired to the houſe of the Knights Templars at Dover, where he formally reſigned the two kingdoms of England and Ireland to the holy ſee, acknowledged himſelf the vaſſal of the pope, and engaged to pay him an annual tribute of a thouſand marks. It was alſo ſtipulated, that if either he, or any of his ſucceſſors, ſhould ever violate theſe engagements, he or they ſhould forfeit all right to the two crowns.

This diſgraceful treaty was followed by the truly humiliating ceremony of homage. The king, unarmed, and on his knees, appeared before Pandolf, ſeated on a throne, and in that degrading poſture ſwore fealty to the pope. A ſum of money was then put into the legate's hands, as the firſt payment of this tribute; and John himſelf preſented him with the crown and ſceptre. The imperious prieſt, to ſhew his triumph over the fallen monarch, had the inſolence to trample the money under his foot. He, indeed, returned the regalia to the king, but not without declaring, in an audible voice, that he muſt conſider it as a particular favour of the Roman ſee. Nor would he take off the interdict and excommunication, till the exiled clergy had received full ſatisfaction for their loſſes.

The haughty legate having thus amply executed his commiſſion in England, paſſed over to the continent, where he found the powerful armament prepared by Philp ready to put to ſea. He immediately repaired to the king, and informed him, that he was no longer permitted to make a deſcent upon England, now become a fief of the Roman church; and that John was under the protection of the holy ſee.

Philip, at once ſurpriſed and incenſed at this declaration, treated the legate as an impoſtor. He told him, that he had made theſe preparations at an immenſe expence, at the preſſing inſtances of the pope; and therefore, that no contrary orders, nor even the threats of the Vatican, ſhould now deter him from proſecuting his deſign. He immediately ſummoned a general council, wherein he painted the pope's inſidious proceedings in the moſt glaring colours, and deſired their advice with regard to proſecuting the deſign againſt England. They all expreſſed their abhorrence of the pope's duplicity, and the greater part declared for making the intended deſcent. The earl of Flanders not only diſſented from the general opinion, but declared ſtrongly againſt it. He boldly told Philip, that his expedition againſt England was inconſiſtent with juſtice, and the law of nations, as none of his anceſtors ever pretended any claim to that kingdom. Exaſperated at this remonſtrance, Philip ordered the earl to quit his dominions, and immediately turned the armament he had raiſed for an expedition into England, againſt Flanders. But William earl of Saliſbury, at the head of an Engliſh fleet fitted out to guard the channel, fell with ſuch fury on the French tranſports, that one hundred of them were ſunk, and three hundred taken. Philip perceiving that the total deſtruction of his ſhips was inevitable, ſet fire to the reſt, as the only method to prevent their falling into the hands of the Engliſh.

This fatal overthrow blaſted all the ambitious projects of Philip, and at the ſame time greatly exhilirated the ſpirits of the Engliſh monarch. Being aſſured of the pope's aſſiſtance, John reſolved to purſue the advantage he had obtained over Philip, and endeavour to recover his loſt dominions. He accordingly ſummoned all his barons, knights and vaſſals, to attend him at Portſmouth: but the barons ſent him word they could not comply with his ſummons ſo long as he continued under a ſtate of excommunication. To remove this obſtacle, John wrote a very preſſing letter to Langton, beſeeching him to come, with all expedition, and give him abſolution; aſſuring him that he would, to the utmoſt of his power, defend and maintain the church and clergy againſt all their adverſaries: that he would re-eſtabliſh the wholeſome laws of his predeceſſors, particularly thoſe of king Edward; and that he would annul all oppreſſive edicts, and judge every man according to juſtice and equity. The prelate liſtened to John's requeſt, and on the above conditions, gave him abſolution before the principal nobility and clergy, in the cathedral church of Wincheſter; ſoon after which a bull arrived from the pope, empowering Langton to take off the interdict which had ſo long been laid on the kingdom.

A. D. 1214. Having thus removed all obſtacles that impeded the execution of his deſign, John now determined to carry on the war againſt Philip with the utmoſt vigor; but when he came to the teſt, it was evident he wanted both courage and prudence to lead an army againſt ſo powerful an enemy. He, however, went over to the continent at the head of his army, and beſieged a caſtle near Angiers; but the approach of a large body of forces under the command of prince Lewis, excited all his natural timidity. He raiſed the ſiege with the utmoſt precipitation, leaving behind him all his tents, machines and baggage. A few days after, advice arrived, that Philip had defeated, at Bovines, the emperor Otho, who had entered France at the head of one hundred and and fifty thouſand Germans. This victory eſtabliſhed the reputation of Philip, and put a final period to all John's hopes of a conqueſt: he therefore relinquiſhed every farther attempt, and returned home with diſgrace.

The Engliſh nobility now looked upon their king with the moſt diſtinguiſhed contempt, and renewed their deſigns of curtailing the exorbitant prerogatives of the crown, from which they had been prevented by the great diſturbances that had taken place on account of the diſpute between John and the Roman pontiff.

The charter paſſed by Henry I. renewed by Stephen, and confirmed by Henry II. had flattered the people with liberty, without communicating to them any real advantages. The articles had never been executed on the part of the crown, and the whole was now nearly forgotten. The barons were rouſed from the couch of indolence by the meanneſs, violence, and tyranny of John. Both clergy and laity joined in oppoſing the tyrant of their country; and archbiſhop Langton became the head of a faction. The promiſe the king had made at the time he received abſolution furniſhed the primate with pretences for a revolt. He aſſembled the barons; produced a charter of Henry I. which he had fortunately found in the library of a monaſtery, and exhorted them to join firmly in inſiſting on a renewal and ſolemn confirmation of that contract of privileges.

The barons (pleaſed with the opportunity of ſetting bounds to the royal authority, and of procuring a poſitive declaration of the rights of Engliſhmen) took an oath to adhere firmly to each other: planned meaſures for forcing the king to grant their requeſt, ſhould he be diſpoſed to refuſe it; and agreed to meet at London ſoon after Chriſtmas, to put their deſigns into execution.

A. D. 1215. At the time appointed the barons, headed by archbiſhop Langton, repaired to London, and peremptorily demanded of John a renewal of Henry's charter, and a confirmation of the laws of Edward the Confeſſor; upon which the king, alarmed at their number, zeal, and apparent unanimity, promiſed to give them a poſitive anſwer at Eaſter.

In the mean time John laboured with the utmoſt aſſiduity, to gain the clergy over to his intereſt, by making them the moſt laviſh conceſſions. But this did not anſwer his purpoſe. They were weary with the deſpotiſm of the Roman court, and, regretting the loſs of thoſe privileges which had been taken from them by the power of the pontiff, openly profeſſed their zeal for the liberty of the people. This encouraged the barons to proceed with alacrity, and they determined either to procure a charter of liberties, or periſh in the glorious attempt.

The time being now near at hand when John was to give a poſitive anſwer to the demands of the barons, he ſent a meſſenger, deſiring to have a ſchedule of the different articles of their pretenſions. The barons (having prepared the articles requeſted) advanced in a body to Brackley, within fifteen miles of Oxford (where the court then reſided) and ſent the ſchedule by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the earl of Pembroke. The king, after reading the articles, flew into the moſt furious paſſion, and ſwore that he would never grant them liberties which muſt reduce a monarch to the character of a ſlave. "Why, ſaid he, did they not alſo demand my crown?"

The primate and earl immediately left the court, and communicated the king's anſwer to the barons, who immediately elected Robert Fitz-Walter their general, under the title of "The Mareſchal of the army of God, and of the Holy Church." Having done this, they began their proceedings by publiſhing a proclamation, inviting the reſt of the nobility to join them in this national cauſe; after which they advanced towards London, and entered the capital without the leaſt oppoſition.

Almoſt all the nobility now joined the ſtandard of the barons, and the puſillanimous king retired to Odiham in Surry, with the poor retinue of only ſeven knights. He made ſeveral attempts to elude the efforts of the barons. He offered to refer the diſpute to the pope, and ſign any charter that ſhould be approved by his holineſs: but this was peremptorily refuſed. He then propoſed to empower eight barons to ſettle the conteſt, four to be choſen by himſelf, and four by the barons. But this offer was rejected in an equal peremptory manner with the former.

Finding all oppoſition would be in vain, and that he was abandoned by his ſubjects, John was obliged to conſent to the demands of his barons. Accordingly, Runnemede (a place between Windſor and Staines) was appointed for holding a conference, where, after a debate which laſted a few days, the king ſigned, on the 19th of June, the celebrated charter known by the name of Magna Charta, and, to this day, juſtly conſidered as the great bulwark of Engliſh liberty. At the ſame time the king ſigned another charter called Charta de Foreſta or Charter of Foreſts; the ſubſtance of both of which is as follows:

"Magna Charta, or the great charter, confirmed what was lately granted to the clergy, relative to the freedom of elections; allowed perſons to leave the kingdom without ſpecial licence, except in time of war; ordained that no clergyman ſhould be amerced in proportion to his benefice, but according to his lay tenement; ſecured to the lay nobility the cuſtody of vacant abbies and convents, which were under their patronage; aſcertained the reliefs for earldoms, baronies, and knights's fees, which before were arbitrary; decreed that barons ſhould recover the lands of their vaſſals, forfeited for felony, after they ſhould have been a year and a day in the poſſeſſion of the crown; that they ſhould enjoy the wardſhips of their military tenants, who held no other lands of the crown by a different tenure; that a perſon knighted by the king, though a minor, ſhould enjoy the privileges of an adult at law, provided he was a ward of the crown; but ſuch knighthood conferred on a ward of a baron, ſhould not deprive that baron of his wardſhip; that widows ſhould not be forced to marry againſt their inclination, or to pay any fine for their dower; that the wardſhips of minors ſhould not be ſold; that guardians ſhould not take unreaſonable profits from the lands of their wards, or commit waſte, but keep the houſes in good repair, leave the farms well ſtocked, and diſpoſe of their wards in marriage, without diſparagement; that no ſcuttage ſhould be levied in the kingdom without the conſent of the common-council of the realm, except in the caſes of ranſoming the kings perſon, knighting his eldeſt ſon, or marrying his eldeſt daughter; that no freeman

"ſhould

" ſhould be taken, impriſoned, or diſſeized of " his freehold, liberties, or free cuſtoms, but by " the lawful judgment of his peers, or by legal " proceſs; that ſheriffs ſhould not hold county " courts above once a month; that they, as well " as caſtellans, coroners, and kings bailiffs, " ſhould be reſtrained from holding pleas of the " crown; that ſheriffs who had the management " of the crown revenues within their ſeveral " diſtricts, ſhould not raiſe the farms of counties, " hundreds, and tythes according to their plea- " ſure, except in the king's demeſne manors; " that the people ſhould not be unjuſtly proſe- " cuted, and put to canonical purgation, with- " out legal proof, in regard to carriages, pur- " veyance of victuals and other ſervices; that " amerciaments ſhould be proportioned to the " offence, and circumſtances of the offenders, " ſo as not to affect his landed eſtate, or diſable " him from following his vocation, but be rated " by the verdict of twelve creditable men in the " neighbourhood."

" The Charta de Foreſta was intended to pre- " vent the extortion of foreſters; to allow free- " holders to improve their lands and woods within " the limits of the foreſts: to diſforeſt all lands " taken in ſince the coronation of Henry I. ex- " cept the crown demeſnes: to exempt thoſe who " lived without the foreſts, from the trouble of " attending theſe courts, except when ſummoned " for ſome tranſgreſſion: to annul all outlawries " for ſuch tranſgreſſions; and to convert the pe- " nalty for killing veniſon, from a capital puniſh- " ment to a fine, or, in caſe of inſolvency, to a " year's impriſonment."

Such is the ſubſtance of the two famous charters ſigned by king John at Runnemede. But the barons were ſenſible the merely procuring theſe charters was not ſufficient fully to anſwer their ends. They were too well acquainted with the ſanguinary diſpoſition of John, and knew that every precaution in their power would be neceſſary for their ſupport againſt his anger, and to oblige him to obſerve the articles of the two inſtruments of liberty. They therefore inſiſted on his conſenting that twenty-five of their own number ſhould be choſen to ſee the charters duly obſerved. Theſe were to be diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of Conſervators of the Liberties of the people; and four of them were empowered to demand reparation, within forty days, from him or his juſticiary, in caſe of an infringement on any article in either charter; and if ſuch reparation ſhould be neglected, then the committee of four were to give notice of the ſame to the reſt, who, with the council of the nation, were empowered to take up arms, and ſeize his caſtles, lands and poſſeſſions, until ſatisfaction ſhould be obtained.

The puſillanimous king made not the leaſt oppoſition to theſe terms; but ſubmitted with great apparent tranquillity, to every thing propoſed by the barons. He even ſent writs to his ſheriffs, ordering them to oblige every perſon to ſwear obedience to the conſervators, on pain of having all their eſtates ſeized, and their chattels ſold within a fortnight after refuſal.

But notwithſtanding this ſeeming deſire of acting in conformity to the articles of the great charter, John never intended to obſerve that treaty any longer than the neceſſity of the times obliged him. He only bowed beneath the ſtorm that then blew around him; but he determined as ſoon as the threatning blaſt was over, to reſume the power he had loſt.

John was principally encouraged in this deſign by the foreign mercenaries he kept about his perſon. They inſinuated, that it was ſhameful for a king to make any conceſſions to his ſubjects, and that no compact, extorted by the force of rebellion, could be binding. Theſe inſinuations coincided exactly with the king's opinion, and determined him to make one attempt to ſhake off the yoke of compulſion, ſo galling to his mind. He became ſullen and melancholy, ſeparated himſelf from the company of his courtiers, and at laſt retired privately by night, attended only by ſeven of his friends, into the iſle of Wight, where he meditated ſevere vengeance againſt his enemies. He ſolicited the pope to abſolve him from all the engagements he had entered into with his barons; and ſent ſeveral emiſſaries into France, Germany, and Flanders, to engage a number of Brabanders in his ſervice.

The pope, conſidering himſelf as feudal lord of the kingdom, was highly incenſed at the behaviour of the barons; and therefore iſſued a bull, by which the great charter was condemned and annulled, as derogatory to the holy ſee. Both the king and barons were prohibited from paying any regard to the articles contained in it: the oaths which had been adminiſtered were annulled, and the ſentence of excommunication denounced againſt every one who perſevered in maintaining the authority of the charter of liberties.

But the power of the pope, in temporal affairs, had now loſt great part of its force; and Innocent III. had the mortification to find even Langton, whom himſelf had placed on the archiepiſcopal throne of Canterbury, refuſe to promulgate his cenſures. Exaſperated to the higheſt degree at this oppoſition in a prelate he expected would have exerted his utmoſt power to promote the intereſt of the holy ſee, the pope ſuſpended Langton from the exerciſe of his functions. But this did not produce the deſired effect; the clergy, with the primate at their head, as well as the nobility and people, diſcovered a noble ardour for preſerving that liberty and independence, they had with ſo much difficulty obtained.

In the mean time John's emiſſaries on the continent engaged a powerful army in the ſervice of their maſter. They were all veteran troops, and ready to venture their lives in any cauſe to gain independent fortunes; beſides which they were farther encouraged by the promiſes of John, who had engaged to give them all the eſtates of his turbulent barons.

No ſooner was the king aſſured that his foreign troops were embarked, than he immediately threw off the maſk, by recalling all the liberties he had granted to his ſubjects; declaring the great charter null and void, and the barons who had extorted that inſtrument from him, rebels and traitors.

The foreign forces landed at Dover, immediately on which, John, putting himſelf at their head, marched to Northampton, reducing the whole country through which he paſſed to a ſmoaking deſart. The ravenous and barbarous mercenaries, urged on by a cruel and enraged prince, were let looſe againſt the eſtates and tenants of the barons. Every thing was levelled with the ground; and cruelties, ſuch as would ſhock even ſavages themſelves, were practiſed on the innocent inhabitants.

The greater part of the northern barons, unable to to reſiſt the force of the mercenaries, and having little reaſon to expect mercy ſhould they fall into the hands of the king, fled with their wives and families and ſolicited the protection of Alexander king of Scotland. John followed them into that kingdom, and in his way burnt ſeveral towns, particularly Haddington and Dunbar: but receiving advice that Alexander had raiſed a numerous army, and was advancing to give him battle, he thought proper to retreat, well knowing that ſhould he be defeated, it would be attended with the moſt fatal conſequences.

A. D. 1216. John had made himſelf maſter of the principal caſtles in England, and he now determined to lay ſiege to London, the only place of conſequence that held out in ſupport of independence. The barons were alarmed at the king's declaration, and, driven to deſpair, had recourſe to moſt deſperate expedient for their ſafety. They applied to the court of France for protection, and offered to acknowledge Lewis, eldeſt ſon to Philip, as their ſovereign, if he would aſſiſt him with a body of forces againſt their enraged monarch.

The ambitious Philip could not reſiſt ſo advantageous an offer, but he determined to act with caution. He had his ſcruples with reſpect to the fidelity of the Engliſh barons, and the danger of truſting his ſon and heir in the hands of perſons, who might, either from caprice, or neceſſity, make peace with their native ſovereign. He therefore exacted twenty-five hoſtages from the barons as a ſecurity for his ſon's ſafety; and, on their being delivered, ſent over his ſon at the head of a formidable army.

The arrival of Lewis produced very diſagreeable conſequences to the Engliſh monarch. The greater part of his foreign troops (who were chiefly natives of France) immediately deſerted him, declaring they would not fight againſt the heir of their lawful ſovereign John was encamped near Dover when Lewis landed in the Iſle of Thanet; but inſtead of endeavouring to attack the enemy before the French forces could be joined by the barons, he retreated to Wincheſter.

In conſequence of this puſillanimous conduct, Lewis marched to London without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition. He entered the city amidſt the univerſal acclamations of the people, and the barons and citizens immediately ſwore fealty to him; while the prince, in return, ſolemnly promiſed to reſtore all their eſtates, and confirm the antient privileges of the kingdom.

But though Lewis was maſter of the capital, and at the head of a numerous army, yet he had many difficulties to furmount before he could make himſelf maſter of England. Moſt of the maritime places were in the intereſt of John, who had favoured the ſea-ports with many valuable privileges, and made many excellent regulations with regard to the marine. This was a diſagreeable circumſtance to Lewis, who conſidered his being maſter of ſome convenient harbour as a matter of the laſt importance. Deſtitute of that advantage, his receiving reinforcements from the continent would be rendered very precarious; nor would even his own retreat, in caſe of a reverſe of fortune, be ſecure. He therefore attempted to make himſelf maſter of Dover; but his enterprize was rendered abortive by the great reſolution of the garriſon. In conſequence of this he carried his arms into the inland parts of Kent and Suſſex, which he reduced with great facility; but William de Coldingham, at the head of a thouſand archers, retiring into the wilds and faſtneſſes of that country, ſupported himſelf againſt all the power of the French army.

During theſe tranſactions John was far from being idle. He fortified and furniſhed with proviſions ſeveral ſea-port towns; and flattered himſelf, that, from the interference of the pope (whom he had acquainted with Philip's proceedings) all the ſchemes of that monarch and his ſon would be defeated, and that he ſhould be reſtored to the quiet poſſeſſion of the Engliſh throne.

But in this John was miſtaken. The pope, indeed, fulminated the ſentence of excommunication againſt both Philip and Lewis, but the effect fell ſhort of John's expectations. The French biſhops declared the excommunication of Philip void, and Lewis paid little regard to the papal cenſure. He was more deſirous of procuring a proper ſea-port, than of guarding againſt the effects of the pope's ſentence. He therefore once more led his army to Dover, and inveſted that important fortreſs; but Hubert de Burgh, the governor, at the head of his brave forces, made ſuch furious ſallies upon the French army, that Lewis was obliged to remove his camp to a conſiderable diſtance, and turn the ſiege into a blockade.

Lewis was greatly alarmed at this miſcarriage, and his fears were conſiderably increaſed on finding the barons leſs active than he expected. But he was too haughty to conciliate their affections by a familiar deportment, and wanted diſcernment to foreſee the conſequences of his negligence. He did not even endeavour to conceal his diſguſt; but, on the contrary, excluded them from his councils and confidence, and, and, inſtead of reſtoring the nobility to their honours and eſtates, beſtowed all his favours on his own countrymen.

The barons now ſaw their error in calling upon a foreign force for aſſiſtance: the people complained of the oppreſſions exerciſed by their new maſters; and every thing wore the appearance of more complicated diſturbances. At the ſame time a report prevailed, that viſcount Melun, one of Lewis's courtiers, was taken dnagerouſly ill, and, finding his end approaching, ſent for ſome of his friends among the Engliſh barons, informing them that it was Lewis's deſign to extirminate them and their families, and beſtow their eſtates and titles on his foreign favourites. This report, whether true or falſe, acted powerfully on many of the Engliſh barons, and was of infinite prejudice to Lewis. The earl of Saliſbury, and ſeveral others of the principal nobility, determined, if poſſible, to elude the force of the ſtorm which threatened their deſtruction. They accordingly ſent private information to John of their deſigns of joining his army, and uſing their utmoſt efforts to aſſiſt him in oppoſing the invader of their country.

This information greatly enlivened the ſpirits of John, who immediately exerted himſelf in collecting a powerful army, in order to bring on a deciſive battle with Lewis. He marched at the head of theſe to Lynn in Norfolk, and from thence into Lincolnſhire, in order to join thoſe barons who had declared in his favour; but in marching over the waſhes of the latter county at an improper time of the tide, the ſea ruſhed in upon him with ſuch violence and rapidity, that he loſt the greater part of his forces, together with all his treaſure, baggage, and regalia. With ſome difficulty he reached Swineſhead-abbey; but the great fatigues he had undergone, and the conſtant hurry and perturbation of his ſpirits, added to the affliction he felt at his late irreparable misfortune, threw him into a violent fever. The next day, being unable to ride, he was carried in a litter to the caſtle of Sleaford, and from thence to Newark, where, finding his end approaching, he ordered his will to be drawn up, by which he appointed his ſon Henry, then a child, to ſucceed him on the throne. The ſame night (the 18th of October, A. D. 1216) he paid the debt of nature, in the 50th year of his age and 18th of his reign. His remains were carried to Worceſter according to his own order, and interred, with little funeral pomp, in the cathedral of that city.

The character of this prince, when painted with the pencil of truth, will, perhaps, appear more odious than when drawn even by the pen of envy. He was deeply practiſed in almoſt every vice, and a ſtranger to almoſt every virtue. The murder of his nephew, the infringement of public property, and the violation of private honour and domeſtic peace, have conſigned his memory to perpetual ignomy. Inſolent in proſperity, and raſh in adverſity; puſillanimous in war, and tyrannical in peace, this prince was never beloved by his people; nor could he boaſt of having procured a real friend. But his reign, however inglorious, gave occaſion to thoſe excellent charters which form the baſis of the Engliſh conſtitution. His tyranny firſt prompted the barons to aſſert, and his ſloth and indolence enabled them to obtain, thoſe ineſtimable privileges, which are at once the glory and ſecurity of Engliſhmen.

BOOK VIII.

From the Acceſſion of Henry III. to the Death of Edward II.

CHAP. I.

HENRY III. ſurnamed of WINCHESTER.

Acceſſion and coronation of Henry III. The earl of Pembroke is conſtituted regent, He warmly oppoſes Lewis the French prince, and at length obliges him to abandon the kingdom. Henry takes upon himſelf the reins of government, and diſavows the charters granted by his predeceſſor. Ill treats Hubert de Burgh, the chief juſticiary. Shews great partiality to foreigners; but, at the inſtigation of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, they are baniſhed the kingdom. Marries Eleanor daughter to the count of Provence, and commits the affairs of government to her uncle the biſhop of Valence. Encourages foreigners, and gains the ill-will of his ſubjects. Goes over to the continent to aſſiſt the count de la Marche, againſt Lewis king of France; but is defeated, and returns to England with diſgrace. The pope's nuncio, by order of his maſter, exacts money from the clergy, and behaves with ſuch oppreſſive inſolence, that he is compelled to leave the kingdom. The Engliſh lay their complaints before the council of Lyons, and the pope grants them redreſs; but ſoon after renews his exactions. Henry countenances the pope's nuncio in oppreſſing his ſubjects. Richard, earl of Cornwall, the king's brother, made king of the Romans. The parliament oblige Henry to ratify the great charter granted by king John. The king breaks his engagements; upon which the barons form themſelves into an aſſociation, and oblige him to ſign a ſet of articles, called the Statutes, or Proviſions of Oxford. The barons take the power of government into their own hands. The pope abſolves Henry from his oath relative to the Oxford Proviſions. Wars between the king and barons. The rebellion totally quelled, and tranquillity reſtored to the kingdom. Prince Edward and his brother Edmund engage in the cruſades, and go over to the Holy Land. Edward narrowly eſcapes being aſſaſſinated. Death and character of Henry.

A. D. 1216. AT the time of the late king's death, England was involved in civil diſcord, and confuſion univerſally prevailed throughout the kingdom. Lewis, the French prince, was already in poſſeſſion of the metropolis, and ſupported in his deſigns of making himſelf maſter of England by the whole power of France; while Henry, the heir and eldeſt ſon of John, was young, inexperienced, incapable of holding the reins of government, or judging which of his ſubjects was beſt qualified for that important office.

In this critical ſituation of affairs, the wiſe and gallant earl of Pembroke, then marſhal of England, boldly ſeized the helm of ſtate, with a reſolution, if poſſible, of delivering his country from foreign uſurpation. He well knew that the majority of the barons were diſpoſed to renounce the intereſt of Lewis, and that the death of John had obviated all pretence for any farther oppoſition. He therefore ſummoned a council of the barons at Glouceſter, at which all who adhered to the royal family attended. As ſoon as the members were ſeated, the earl entered the aſſembly leading young Henry by the hand, and calling out "Behold your king!" This was ſucceeded by a ſhort pauſe, after which the earl addreſſed the aſſembly in words to this effect:

"My dear friends and countrymen,

"Though we expreſſed a juſt reſentment againſt "the father of this prince, becauſe his conduct "was iniquitous, this little child is free from the "imputation of his father's guilt. Puniſhment "can be inflicted with juſtice only on the offender, "and reaſon tells us, that the ſon ſhould not ſuf-"fer for the iniquities of the father. We ought, "therefore, to compaſſionate the caſe of this in-"fant king, and zealouſly unite in driving Lewis, "ſon to the king of France, out of our land. "Thus ſhall we revive the antient glory of our "country, and break the reproachful chains of "ſervile bondage."

This ſpeech produced the wiſhed-for effect. The earl of Cheſter, indeed, ſtated an objection relative to their having called over Lewis; but it was ſoon over-ruled by recapitulating that prince's conduct ſince his arrival in England; and it was generally agreed that his arbitrary and tyrannical behaviour had diſſolved all ties that might have otherwiſe bound thoſe who had invited him to their aſſiſtance. The whole aſſembly, therefore, unanimouſly called out, "Let young Henry be "made king of England."

In conſequence of this general approbation of the barons, the young king was crowned on the 28th of October in the church of St. Peter at Glouceſter. The ceremony was performed by Gualo, the pope's legate, aſſiſted by the biſhops of Wincheſter, Bath and Worceſter. But before the crown was placed on Henry's head, he took the accuſtomed oath; after which it was thought neceſſary that he ſhould ſwear fealty to the pope, and renew that homage to which his father had ſubjected the kingdom. The prelates, earls, barons, and all who were preſent, next ſwore fealty and allegiance to the new king; and the earl of Pembroke was conſtituted his guardian, and regent of the kingdom.

This honourable and important office could not have been conferred on a perſon of greater abilities, or more inviolable honour; and, perhaps, none but himſelf could have healed the wounds of his then bleeding country. The firſt public ſtep he took was, to ſend circular letters, notifying Henry's coronation to all the barons and principal people of the kingdom, promiſing a general amneſty to all who ſhould return to their obedience, and peaceably acknowledge Henry III. for their lawful ſovereign. This prudent meaſure had the deſired effect. Many of the barons, who ſtill adhered to Lewis, reflected, that the cauſe, which induced them to take up arms, no longer exiſted: that oppoſition would be then unnatural rebellion; and that the only method they could purſue with propriety was that of making their peace with their lawful ſovereign. The pope's legate greatly aſſiſted in bringing about this deſirable effect, by iſſuing out the ſentence of excommunication againſt Lewis and his adherents.

In the mean time Lewis was employed in carrying on the ſiege of Dover, having made a vow not to abandon the undertaking till he became maſter of the place. But he knew not the abilities of Hubert de Burgh, the governor, who, by his courage and fidelity, rendered all the deſigns of Lewis abortive. No means had been left untried by that prince to corrupt the integrity of the gallant Hubert. He tempted him with all the honours a ſubject could wiſh to enjoy; but all his offers were rejected with diſdain, Hubert declaring, he would defend the caſtle as long as one of the garriſon was left alive. Lewis, finding his fidelity incorruptible, and that he was equally proof againſt his threats and promiſes, abandoned the enterprize, and returned with his army to London.

A. D. 1217. From the prudent meaſures taken by the Protector, Lewis began to find his intereſt daily decline. Pembroke's grand aim was, to gain leiſure from the tumults of war, in order to give the Engliſh time to reflect. He knew they were naturally averſe to the French, and that if he could inſpire them with a confidence in the government, his maſter's authority would ſoon be eſtabliſhed throughout the kingdom. The pope likewiſe exerted all his power in favour of the young king; ſo that Lewis found it neceſſary to paſs over to the continent, not only to procure a freſh ſupply of men and money, but alſo to avert the vengeance of the pope, who had propoſed to excommunicate him in full conſiſtory.

During the abſence of Lewis, the Protector uſed his utmoſt efforts to prevail on the barons to return to their duty. Nor did he labour in vain: many of the moſt powerful among them joined the royal ſtandard, and their examples were followed by ſuch numbers, that all the forces Lewis could raiſe in France were not equal to the deſertion from his army in England during his abſence.

The cinque ports likewiſe declared in favour of Henry, and fitted out a ſquadron of ſhips, with which they attacked Lewis on his return; but after a ſmart engagement he got ſafe with the loſs only of a few ſhips, to Sandwich. He was, however, ſo highly incenſed at this inſtance of diſaffection, that, in revenge, he reduced the town of Sandwich to aſhes; after which he made another unſucceſsful attack on Dover-Caſtle, and then marched with his army to London.

The Protector now thought it high time to commence hoſtilities againſt the invaders of his country. He accordingly detached a body of forces, under the command of the earls of Lincoln and Albemarle, to inveſt Mount Sorrel in Leiceſterſhire, the garriſon having committed the moſt horrid ravages in the neighbourhood of the caſtle. Lewis, knowing the importance of that fortreſs, detached an army of ſix hundred knights, and twenty thouſand infantry, under the command of the count de la Perche, marſhal of France, to raiſe the ſiege. On the approach of this formidable army, the Engliſh who were too weak to venture a battle, retired to Nottingham; and the count, confident of ſucceſs from ſuperiority of numbers, marched to Lincoln, with a reſolution of laying ſiege to that city.

As ſoon as the Protector was informed of the deſigns of the count, he immediately iſſued out ſummonſes to all the king's tenants ordering them, with all expedition, to join the royal army at Newark upon Trent. The pope's legate likewiſe exerciſed his authority to ſuppreſs the deſigns of the enemy. He not only excommunicated Lewis by name, but alſo declared, that all who engaged themſelves themſelves in favour of Henry, ſhould be entitled to the ſame privileges as thoſe who undertook a cruſade. He himſelf aſſumed the croſs, and the biſhops and barons drew the temporal ſword. This diſtinguiſhed zeal of the clergy was of the utmoſt ſervice to the royal cauſe: the people flocked with the utmoſt alacrity to the ſtandard of the protector, who ſoon found himſelf at the head of a powerful and reſolute army, inflamed with the deſire of being led againſt the invaders of their country.

As ſoon as Lewis was informed of the great increaſe of the Protector's army, he reſolved to make a deciſive aſſault upon the caſtle of Lincoln, the garriſon of which was, by this time, reduced to the utmoſt diſtreſs; but he was diſappointed in this deſign by the unexpected arrival of the Engliſh forces. One Fulk de Briant, a ſtrong partizan for the king, found means to enter the caſtle at the head of a choſen body of archers, and made ſeveral ſallies to amuſe the beſiegers; while the royal army vigorouſly fell on the main body, whom they totally routed, and the count of Perche fell among the ſlain.

The news of this defeat greatly alarmed Lewis, who immediately ſhut himſelf up in the capital, and diſpatched a courier to his father for aſſiſtance. Philip, being deſirous of averting the cenſure of the pope from his own kingdom, refuſed to engage openly in defence of his ſon; but permitted Blanche his daughter-in-law, to raiſe a powerful body of troops, and to provide a fleet of ſhips for tranſporting them to England. They accordingly embarked, and ſet ſail, but being met by the Engliſh fleet on the coaſt of Kent, an engagement enſued, when the greater part were taken, and the reſt ſunk.

In conſequence of this ſucceſs the Engliſh repaired from all parts to the royal ſtandard; upon which Lewis, giving up all hopes of ſucceeding in his deſign, and even thinking his own perſon in danger, offered to conclude a peace with the Protector, by which he promiſed to leave the kingdom, on condition of his Engliſh adherents being reſtored to their honours and fortunes. Theſe terms were readily accepted by the Protector, and the articles of the treaty being properly ratified on both ſides, Lewis embarked his forces, and returned to the continent.

Among all the adherents of Lewis, the clergy were the greateſt ſufferers. There was not any thing ſtipulated for them in the treaty: they were left to the mercy of the pope, who ſeized with eagerneſs this favourable opportunity of wreaking his vengeance on them for their diſobedience. Many were depoſed, and others ſuſpended: ſome were baniſhed, and all who eſcaped puniſhment were obliged to purchaſe their pardon by paying large ſums of money to the legate: ſo that his maſter became poſſeſſed of immenſe treaſure. But the pontiff did not live to enjoy theſe riches, being ſuddenly ſnatched off ſoon after the departure of Lewis from England.

A. D. 1218. Being now no longer under diſagreeable apprehenſions from a foreign enemy, the Protector applied himſelf, with great diligence, to ſuch meaſures as were moſt likely to promote the good of his country, and reconcile the minds of the people to their legal ſovereign. He procured a new charter of liberties, which, in ſome reſpects, differed from that granted by the late king. The full privilege of elections among the clergy, and the liberty of going out of the kingdom without firſt obtaining the royal covenant, were not confirmed in the charter of Henry, becauſe the ſtate had already experienced the inconveniencies ariſing from them. The obligation by which John had reſtrained himſelf from buying aids and ſcutages, without the conſent of the great council of the nation, was alſo omitted in this inſtrument. The barons perceived that no aids, unleſs they were evidently reaſonable, could be levied upon men who had arms in their hands, and who were able to repel any acts of violence. Nor did the Protector content himſelf with granting anew the privileges that had been enjoyed in the preceding reign; he cauſed writs, in the king's name, to be iſſued to the ſheriffs of the different counties, commanding them to lay open all foreſts, agreeable to the intention of the charter granted for that purpoſe by king John; and, ſome time after, ſent the chief juſticiary of the foreſts on a circuit through the kingdom, to ſee the orders fully executed, and the bounds of the foreſts diſtinctly marked. At the ſame time, orders were given to demoliſh all the new caſtles that had been erected ſince the beginning of the diſputes between the late king and his barons.

A. D. 1219. But while the Protector was thus exerting all his abilities to reſtore happineſs and tranquillity to the kingdom, death put a final period to his labours and his life. The nation ſuffered an irreparable loſs in the death of this great and good man, whoſe valour, integrity and prudence had broke the yoke of foreign ſlavery, and reſtored the liberties of Engliſhmen. He died about the middle of March, and his remains were interred in the church of the Knights Templars (now the Temple church) in London.

The earl of Pembroke was ſucceeded in the important office of regent by William de Roches, biſhop of Wincheſter; and Hubert de Burgh, the gallant defender of Dover Caſtle was made chief juſticiary of the kingdom. The counſels of the latter were conformable to his character, namely, that of a great, prudent, and virtuous man. They were for ſome time followed; and had he poſſeſſed the authority of Pembroke, the nation would not have ſo greatly regretted the loſs of that eminent patriot. But his power was not ſufficient to repreſs the licentiouſneſs of the barons, who were too ſtrong to be reſtrained by laws under a minority; and whoſe rapacity induced them to uſurp the demeſnes of the crown, as well as the poſſeſſions of their weaker neighbours. Hence revolts were multiplied; and the government was, for a courſe of time, perpetually employed in reducing inſurrections in various parts of the kingdom.

A. D. 1222. In the beginning of this year a great diſturbance took place in conſequence of a wreſtling match between the citizens of London, and thoſe of Weſtminſter. The conteſt was ſharp and obſtinate on both ſides, but at length the Londoners were victorious. This ſo exaſperated the ſteward of Weſtminſter, that he determined to obtain revenge, and for that purpoſe concerted meaſures of the moſt unjuſt and illegal nature. He propoſed a ſecond trial, which being readily accepted by the Londoners, they came to the field to decide the conteſt; but inſtead of a fair trial, they were attacked by the ſteward and his followers, armed with clubs and other offenſive weapons, and obliged to retreat into the city. Exaſperated at this treatment, the Londoners, headed by one Conſtantine Fitz Arnulph, a bold, factious factious citizen, repaired to Weſtminſter, where they committed many dreadful outrages, and demoliſhed ſeveral houſes belonging to the abbot and ſteward. Hubert, in order to put a ſtop to ſuch riotous proceedings, ventured to puniſh the leaders, without bringing them to trial. This ſtep, which was a direct infringement of the great charter, excited the clamours of the populace, who, with juſtice, conceived themſelves injured, and demanded a new confirmation of the great charter. In conſequence of this a general council was called, and the demand of the people taken into conſideration. During the debates, one of the council of the regency aſſerted, that no regard ought to be paid to the great charter, becauſe it was extorted by violence. But Langton, archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſeverely reprimanded the ſpeaker for his indiſcretion, as his aſſertion had a direct tendency to raiſe a rebellion in the nation; affirming, at the ſame time, that the demand of the people was founded on juſtice; and that the government could not, without the moſt palpable injuſtice, diſpenſe with any article in the charter. His opinion was adopted; and the parliament having granted a ſubſidy, the king iſſued orders for a new charter of confirmation.

No material circumſtance took place in England from this time till the year 1226, when a parliament was convened at Weſtminſter, in order to deliberate on an extraordinary demand made by the court of Rome. Pope Honorius III. the ſucceſſor of Innocent, had ſent over a legate, under pretence of removing a reproach that had been long thrown upon the court of the Vatican. The pontiff obſerved, that the holy ſee having been accuſed of ſelling her favours for money, it was the duty of all good Chriſtians to aſſiſt in removing the cauſe of ſuch a ſcandalous imputation, as what had been collected aroſe from the extreme indigence of the Roman church. He therefore demanded, that two prebends in every cathedral, and two cells in every convent in England ſhould be granted to the church of Rome, by an authentic deed, confirmed by an act of the great council of the nation. But the Engliſh parliament treated this demand with ſuch contempt that no anſwer was returned to Rome. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, however, who was more immediately intereſted in the affair, wrote a letter to his holineſs. the ſubſtance of which was to this effect. "That "when the Roman ſee had procured the required "aſſiſtance from other nations, England would "follow their example; but would never eſtabliſh the precedent."

A. D. 1227. Henry, having now arrived at the age of maturity, ſummoned a parliament ot Oxford, to whom he declared his intention of taking into his own hands the reins of government; but at the ſame time gave them reaſon to imagine that little happineſs could be expected from his adminiſtration. He told them that as the great charter, and that of the foreſts, had been obtained by an act of rebellion, and confirmed in his minority, he could not conſider himſelf as legally bound by any acts or promiſes during his infancy. This unexpected declaration greatly aſtoniſhed the members, who immediately aroſe from their ſeats, and retired in diſguſt.

A ſhort time after this an event happened that evinced the natural diſpoſition of the king, and clearly ſhewed his being more deſirous of ruling by arbitrary power, than gaining the love and affection of his ſubjects. Richard, earl of Cornwall, the king's brother, returning from France (where he had ſome time headed an army in Guienne) found one of his manors poſſeſſed by a German officer, who claimed it as a gift from king John. Richard inſiſted, that his pretended right ſhould be determined by his peers, and immediately diſpoſſeſſed the German. But the latter inſtead of having recourſe to the laws of England, poſted to court, and complained to the king of the injuſtice done him by the earl of Cornwall. Henry, without giving himſelf any trouble to examine into the truth of his allegations, ordered him a writ under the royal ſign manual, commanding a reſtitution of the eſtate. Exaſperated at ſuch treatment, the earl refuſed obedience, and repaired to court to defend his property. The king, highly offended at Richard's obſtinacy, told him, he ſhould either reſtore the manor in queſtion within a limited time, or depart the kingdom. This manifeſt exertion of arbitrary power rouſed the paſſions of Richard, who boldly told the king he would appeal to the laws of his country, and that the judgment of his peers only ſhould oblige him either to part with his property, or quit the kingdom.

Henry, well knowing the great power of Richard, and that he was univerſally beloved by the principal people in the kingdom, thought proper to drop the diſpute, and in order to form a reconciliation with his brother, offered to ſettle upon him the dowry of the late queen, and augment his poſſeſſions with the lands of Boulogne. Theſe terms were accepted, and both the cauſe and offence buried in oblivion.

A. D. 1228. This year died Stephen Langton, archbiſhop of Canterbury, a prelate who may be juſtly conſidered as one of the reſtorers of Engliſh liberty. About the ſame time died alſo pope Honorius III. who was ſucceeded in the pontificate by Gregory IX.

A. D. 1229. In the beginning of this year Henry demanded ſubſidies from his parliament, in order to carry on a war with Lewis, the young king of France, who had made various depredations in different parts of the continent. The ſubſidies were accordingly granted, and a powerful army ſoon raiſed; but the expedition was fruſtrated by the neglect of the miniſter, who neither iſſued the proper writs to the Cinque Ports, nor took the uſual methods for aſſembling a ſufficient number of tranſports.

But Henry was determined not to be diſappointed in his deſigns, and accordingly, in the ſpring of the following year (A. D. 1230) having collected a powerful army, with a proper number of tranſports, he embarked for the continent, attended by the earl of Britany, who had, ſome time before, paid a viſit to England. The king landed at St. Malo's, where the earl not only paid him homage, but ordered all the fortified places in his poſſeſſion to be delivered up to the Engliſh.

Henry marched with his forces from St. Malo's to Nantz, where he continued ſome time, in a ſtate of inaction. Encouraged by this puſillanimous conduct in the Engliſh monarch, Lewis advanced, at the head of his army, within four leagues of Nantz, and laid ſiege to Ancennes, which the cowardly Henry ſuffered him to take without making one effort for its relief. The French army continued approaching towards Nantz, took ſeveral caſtles in ſight of the Engliſh army, and proceeded within a ſmall diſtance of the gates of the city.

But neither the inſults of the French, nor the entreaties of his friends, could rouſe Henry; and Lewis, ſeeing no likelihood of an action, returned to Paris, in order to form a reconciliation with his diſcontented nobility, at whoſe deſire the Engliſh monarch had invaded his dominions.

After the departure of Lewis, the king drew his troops out of Nantz, and marched into Gaſcony by way of Poictou. Here he received homage from moſt of the principal nobility; and after ſtaying a ſhort time returned to Nantz, from whence he embarked for England, leaving his army under the command of the earls of Cheſter and Albemarle.

Theſe able generals were poſſeſſed of that courage and magnaminity to which Henry was a ſtranger. No ſooner was the king gone than they immediately took the field, and made an irruption into Anjou, where they poſſeſſed themſelves of the caſtle of Gautier, and laid the town in aſhes. They then marched into Normandy, where they took and razed the caſtle of Pontarſu, and burnt the town; but the ſeaſon being too far advanced to make any farther progreſs, they returned loaded with booty to Britany, and there took up their winter quarters.

A. D. 1231. Early in the ſpring the French monarch took the field at the head of a powerful army, and marched towards Britany, with a deſign of making himſelf maſter of that part of the country: but the Engliſh generals defeated his intentions by intercepting all his carriages loaded with proviſions and military ſtores. Lewis, finding he had a powerful and reſolute enemy to contend with, and knowing a reſpite from war was the deſire of the French court, propoſed a truce for three years, which being agreed on and concluded, he marched with his army back to Paris, and the Engliſh generals returned to England.

A. D. 1232. On the 17th of March the king ſummoned a parliament at Weſtminſter, of whom he demanded an aid to enable him to diſcharge the debts contracted by his late expedition to France; but the barons were ſo highly exaſperated at his puſillanimous and tyrannical conduct, that they peremptorily refuſed complying with his requeſt.

Among other acts which procured Henry the hatred of his barons, as well as the clergy at large was, his implicit obedience to the commands of the Roman pontiff. The greater part of the principal benefices in England were poſſeſſed by Italian prieſts; and the prelates and lay patrons were prohibited from preſenting natives till all the foreign clergy were ſufficiently provided for. It is, therefore, little to be wondered that theſe partial and arbitrary proceedings ſhould excite a general clamour throughout the kingdom. It was conſidered as a national inſult, and ſeveral aſſociations were formed for delivering the realm from ſuch ſhameful oppreſſions. The principal leader of the confederates was Robert de Twenge, a knight in the north of England. He had long beheld the tyrannical proceeedings of the king and pontiff with deteſtation, but on being deprived of the patronage of a church, he determined to take ample revenge on the foreign prieſts. He accordingly aſſumed the name of William Witham, and encouraged his followers to ſtrip the houſes of the Italian clergy, and diſpoſe of their effects. They continued this practice for ſome time without oppoſition, and the foreign eccleſiaſtics, not daring to appear, took refuge in the convents. Being informed of theſe violent proceedings, the pope wrote in a very lofty ſtile to Henry, commanding him, under pain of excommunication, to chaſtiſe the inſolence of his ſubjects, and reſtore the Italian clergy to their benefices. The puſillanimous Henry was alarmed at theſe menaces of the pontiff, and dreaded the effects of a papal cenſure. He ordered a ſtrict inquiſition to be made in the principal parts of the kingdom, where thoſe riots had prevailed; and had the mortification to find, that they had been ſupported and encouraged by men of all ranks; even Hubert de Burgh, the chief juſticiary, did not eſcape ſuſpicion. At length, Robert de Twenge, (who ſcorned to diſown an action, which he thought juſtifiable, or let any innocent perſon ſuffer on his account) appeared in the royal preſence, attended by five knights, and boldly declared himſelf the leader of the confederates, who had ſtripped the houſes of the foreign prieſts; alledging, that the injuries he had received were the ſole motives for his proceedings. Pleaſed with this ingenuous confeſſion, the king granted him a free pardon, and procured a reſtitution of his right to the patronage in queſtion.

The voluntary and ingenuous confeſſion of Twenge clearly removed the ſuſpicion that had been entertained of Hubert; but notwithſtanding this, the inconſtancy of Henry furniſhed the enemies of that ſtateſman with an opportunity of procuring his ruin. Excited by the remonſtrances of Peter de Roches, biſhop of Wincheſter (who hated Hubert, becauſe he had been active in oppoſing his deſtructive councils) the weak king, inſenſible to all his ſervices, perſecuted him with ſuch fury, that he was obliged to take ſanctuary in a church, and at laſt ſave himſelf by flying to the continent.

A. D. 1233. After the departure of Hubert, the biſhop of Wincheſter, a Poictevin by birth, ſo powerfully ingratiated himſelf in the king's favour, that he was permitted to direct all public affairs at his own diſcretion. In conſequence of this the court was filled with his own countrymen, on whom he conferred every important and advantageous office in the diſpoſal of the crown. Theſe proceedings ſoon produced a general diſcontent throughout the kingdom, which the weak king conſidered only as a confirmation of that rebellious ſpirit the biſhop repreſented to be the characteriſtic of the Engliſh nobility, who, on that account, were denied all acceſs to the king, and treated by the miniſter with the moſt diſtinguiſhed contempt.

It is little to be wondered at that ſuch conduct in the king and his miniſter ſhould increaſe the flame of diſcontent already ſufficiently kindled. But at length the patience of the Engliſh nobility was exhauſted by the inſults and injuries they received from theſe inſolent ſtrangers; in conſequence of which they formed themſelves into a body, and deputed the earl marſhal to lay their grievances before the king. In conformity to their requeſt the earl demanded an audience, which being granted, he informed Henry of the complaints of the people, and beſought him not to continue laviſhing his favours on foreigners, to the great neglect and injury of his natural ſubjects; adding, that if he treated their remonſtrance with neglect, both himſelf and the reſt of the Engliſh nobility ſhould think it their duties to withdraw themſelves from his councils.

The haughty and imperious biſhop of Wincheſter cheſter, who was preſent at this audience, prevented the king from making any reply, by tyrannically and preſumptuouſly telling the earl, "it was the higheſt degree of inſolence in him, "or any other ſubject, to pretend to dictate to "his majeſty on whom he ought to confer his favours: that both the king and his father had "been ſo ill treated by the Engliſh, that the only "expedient of procuring his own ſafety was that "of truſting to foreigners; and that if their "number in the kingdom was not already ſufficient to reduce his rebellious ſubjects to their "duty, large reinforcements ſhould be procured "from the continent."

Aſtoniſhed at this ſuperlative arrogance, the earl retired without returning any anſwer, and immediately joined the confederacy in order to concert meaſures for checking that deſpotic power, which the king, by the violent counſels of his worthleſs miniſter, ſeemed deſirous of aſſuming. Henry was alarmed at the confederacy of the barons, and the biſhop, to gain time, adviſed him to call a parliament at London. But the barons refuſed to attend, and even threatened to deprive Henry of his crown if the Poictevins were not baniſhed the kingdom. In conſequence of this another parliament was called, when the barons obeyed the ſummons, but they all appeared in armour, and were attended by a prodigious number of followers.

A. D. 1234. Henry now ſaw his danger, and was deſirous of coming to a reconciliation with his enraged barons; but the artful prelate found means to remove his fears, and encouraged him to oppoſe them by bringing over the earls of Cornwall and Cheſter to the royal party. In conſequence of this the eſtates of ſeveral of the confederates were confiſcated, without any trial by their peers, and given to the Poictevins, who were already become ſo odious to the Engliſh.

A. D. 1235. The king and his infamous miniſter continued their violent proceedings for ſome time, till at length Edmund, archbiſhop of Canterbury determined to interpoſe, and, if poſſible, remove the grievances of the people. He accordingly, attended by his ſuffragans, went to the palace, and demanded an audience of the king; which being granted, he deſcribed, in the moſt pethetic manner, the dreadful effects of thoſe ruinous meaſures which he had purſued at the inſtigation of his miniſters. Having ſaid this, he formally accuſed the biſhop of Wincheſter, as the author of thoſe pernicious councils, which had diffuſed a ſpirit of diſcontent throughout the nation; and, after giving a long detail of the grievances of the people, inſiſted that the king ſhould remove from his councils a miniſter ſo odious to all his ſubjects; adding, that if ſo reaſonable a requeſt was refuſed, he would excommunicate both him, and all who oppoſed ſo neceſſary a reformation. This ſpirited remonſtrance, and the threat at the cloſe of it, produced the deſired effect; the biſhop of Wincheſter being immediately removed from all his employments, and the inſolent Poictevins baniſhed the kingdom.

A. D. 1236. The remonſtrance of the archbiſhop of Canterbury had, to all appearance, convinced Henry of his error in preferring foreigners to his Engliſh ſubjects. But this conviction was of ſhort duration. Henry ſoon after married Eleanor, daughter of the count of Provence, and again threw himſelf into the arms of foreigners. William de Savoy, biſhop of Valence, and uncle to the new queen, became his principal favourite, and to him he committed the ſole adminiſtration of all public affairs.

This indiſcreet conduct of the king greatly alarmed the Engliſh nobility, who dreaded a reival of the late times of miniſterial inſolence and oppreſſion, and determined to exert all their power to put ſtop to the career of this foreign minion. They began with preſenting dutiful addreſſes to the king, at the ſame time remonſtrating, with becoming ſpirit, againſt thoſe meaſures, which they apprehended to be deſtructive of the public intereſt, and that union which ſhould always ſubſiſt between an Engliſh king and his ſubjects. But they did not ſucceed in their attempts. Valence ſupported his power, and foreign influence grew every day more prevalent at court. The miniſter, who was offended with the Engliſh barons for their late ſpirited remonſtrances, ſpared no pains to render them ſuſpected by the king, and to remove the moſt active among them from his perſon and government. The ſeals were demanded from the biſhop of Chicheſter, who had filled the high office of chancellor with the moſt unblemiſhed integrity; but the prelate, on receiving the king's meſſage, nobly replied, "That having received the ſeals by order of parliament, he would reſign them by order of that aſſembly only."

A. D. 1237. The wants of Henry's foreign and needy courtiers had now exhauſted his treaſury, and he was obliged to call a parliament in order to obtain a ſupply. The members being aſſembled, they were told, "that the chief reaſon "of their being called together was, to deſire them "to grant an aid, which ſhould be collected and "diſpoſed of, for the neceſſary uſes of the ſtate, "by ſuch perſons as themſelves ſhould think pro"per to commiſſion for that purpoſe." But Henry had ſo often broke his promiſes, that the parliament were no longer to be deceived. They therefore returned for anſwer, "That they had "often granted the king aids, without receiving "any marks of his affection: that ſince his ac"ceſſion to the throne very large ſums had been "exacted from his ſubjects, which were wholly "laviſhed on foreign favourites, to the great im"poveriſhment of the ſtate, and diſgrace of his "own character." In anſwer to this reply, Henry pleaded the expences of his late marriage, which, he ſaid, had principally exhauſted his treaſury; and then promiſed, upon his honour, that if they would grant him only a thirtieth part of their moveables, he would never again injure or oppreſs any baron in his kingdom.

From theſe aſſurances, together with Henry's farther promiſe of obſerving inviolate the articles of the Great Charter, the parliament were induced to comply with his demand. But they ordered the money ariſing from the tax to be depoſited in certain abbies, churches and caſtles, as a fund adapted to the neceſſities of the ſtate; and annexed to the grant for levying it the following condition: "That the king ſhould no longer hearken to the "ſuggeſtions of foreigners, who had already op"preſſed and impoveriſhed the nation, but be go"verned, for the future, by his own natural-born "ſubjects."

But the faithleſs Henry no ſooner obtained the ſupply requeſted, than he immediately returned to his former meaſures, by ſhewing as much fondneſs for foreigners as ever; and, to ſecure himſelf a party ſufficient to oppoſe the power of his barons, made application to the pope for a legate to be ſent into England, under whoſe protection he might ſecurely violate his recent engagements, which neceſſity had compelled him to enter into with his people.

A. D. 1238. The arrival of the legate greatly alarmed the Engliſh, and the archbiſhop of Canterbury warmly expoſtulated with Henry for ſuffering him to come into the kingdom without any apparent neceſſity, and without the knowledge of the parliament and clergy. But Henry, knowing the authority of the pope to be ſuperior to that of the archbiſhop, paid no regard to his remonſtrances. He ſeized the monies that had been depoſited in the curches and convents by the parliament for the ſtate, and ſquandered it, with the utmoſt profuſion, on ſtrangers and favourites. His brother the earl of Cornwall, at the head of the nobility upbraided him for this ſhameful breach of faith and honour; but this had no more effect than the remonſtrances of the archbiſhop: Henry treated them with contempt and ſeemed determined in ſpite of every oppoſition, to continue his illegal and unjuſtifiable proceedings.

A. D. 1239. But though Henry relied entirely on the power of the pope for ſupport againſt the reſentment of his barons and clergy, the inconſiſtence of his conduct was ſo amazing, that he ſent a body of troops to the aſſiſtance of the emperor Frederic II. then at open war with the court of Rome. Gregory IX. who then filled the papal chair, was highly offended at what he termed the inſolence of his vaſſal, and ordered the legate to make the moſt ſevere remonſtrances. The puſillanimous monarch was alarmed, and, to avert the cenſure of the vatican, ſuffered the ſentence of excommunication againſt Frederic to be publiſhed in all the churches of England; though that prince had married the princeſs Iſabella, ſiſter to Henry.

A. D. 1240. This year Edmund, archbiſhop of Canterbury, finding it impoſſible to obtain any redreſs from the king for the grievances of the people, left his ſee, and retired to Burgundy, where he ſoon after paid the debt of nature, and was interred in the abby of Pontigny.

About this time alſo died, in a very advanced age. Llewellyn, prince of Wales, leaving his principality to his ſon David.

A. D. 1241. The great encouragement which Henry continued to give to foreigners induced Peter de Savoy, one of the queen's uncles, to pay a viſit to England. On his arrival he received the honour of knighthood in Weſtminſter-abbey, and was ſoon after created earl of Richmond. But Peter, perceiving how diſguſtful his preferment was to the Engliſh nobility, behaved with great moderation, and took all poſſible care to avoid giving them offence. However, through his intereſt his brother Boniface was raiſed to the ſee of Canterbury, which had continued vacant ever ſince the departure of the late archbiſhop.

A. D. 1242. The weak, but yet tyrannical Henry, had now, from the ſtrange inconſiſtency of his conduct, entirely loſt the affections of his ſubjects. The barons were juſtly incenſed againſt the rapacious foreigners who waſted the royal treaſure, governed the kingdom, and treated the laws of England with contempt. The parliament, therefore, refuſed to grant their monarch any ſupplies, upon which the tyrannical king had recourſe to the moſt illegal methods for ſupplying his neceſſities. He exacted loans, demanded benevolences, and uſurped the power of diſpenſing with the laws, becauſe the pope ſcrupled not to diſpenſe with the canons of the church whenever the intereſts of the holy ſee required it. Theſe violent proceedings occaſioned univerſal murmurs among the people: the barons formed aſſociations; and the judges were alarmed at the conduct of the king. "Alas! exclaimed one of them on the "bench, in what a corrupt age do we live! The "civil court is vitiated in imitation of the eccle- "ſiaſtical; and the river is poiſoned from that "fountain."

A. D. 1243. Henry was now deſirous of aſſiſting the count de la Marche, who had married his mother Iſabella, againſt Lewis IX. of France. The count had given Henry the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of ſucceſs; telling him that all the old tenants of his family in France would immediately join his ſtandard, together with the king of Arragon, and the count of Thouloufe. Pleaſed with the proſpect of recovering his old dominions on the continent, and wreſting from Lewis the territories which Philip had taken from his father, Henry ſummoned a parliament, in order to procure the ſupplies neceſſary for carrying his arms into France. But he had the mortification to find his requeſt denied, the parliament abſolutely refuſing to grant him any aſſiſtance for carrying on the war. Henry, however, found means to raiſe the neceſſary ſums at exorbitant intereſt, and paſſed over to the continent at the head of a conſiderable body of troops. But he was equally deſtitute of military and civil talents. His army was defeated at Tillebourg; after which he abandoned Poictou, and returned with diſgrace to England.

A. D. 1244. In the beginning of this year arrived one Martin, nuncio from the pope, with orders to demand from the clergy a thouſand marks, in order to aſſiſt him in carrying on the war with the emperor of Germany. Martin was inveſted with more ample powers than had been given to any legate before, and his oppreſſion and inſolence exceeded every thing yet experienced from the court of Rome. Theſe proceedings ſpread an univerſal alarm throughout the kingdom; and the barons reſolved to lay before the general council (then aſſembled at Lyons) the intolerable opreſſions of the holy ſee.

In the mean time Martin purſued ſuch arbitrary and unjuſt methods to extort money from the clergy, that the whole nation was exaſperated to the higheſt degree; and it was reſolved, in an aſſembly of the barons, that if he would not depart the kingdom peaceably, he ſhould be driven from it by force. In conſequence of this reſolution, the barons aſſembled in arms, under pretence of holding a tournament; and choſe Fulk Fitz-Warren to carry their reſolutions to the nuncio. They could not, indeed have fixed upon a more proper perſon, Fulk himſelf having ſuffered ſeverely by papal exactions.

Thus commiſſioned Fulk immediately repaired to the houſe of the nuncio, and being introduced into his preſence, told him, with a ſtern and reſolute air, that he muſt inſtantly prepare for his departure from England. The nuncio, little accuſtomed to ſuch diſreſpectful addreſſes, aſked him by whoſe authority he dared to ſpeak to him in ſo inſolent a manner? "By the authority of a "body of Engliſh knights now in arms," anſwered Fulk, "who ordered me to tell you, that "if either you yourſelf, or any of your follow- "ers, remain in England more than three days,

"every one of you ſhall be cut to pieces. Act "as you pleaſe; but remember it is an Engliſh "knight that delivers you this meſſage." Martin was too well acquainted with the character of the Engliſh to contemn a menace ſo peremptorily delivered. He immediately complained to Henry, and deſired his protection. But the king, who had for ſome time beheld the exactions of the pope with concern, told him his robberies and oppreſſions had raiſed ſuch a ſpirit of reſentment in every part of the kingdom, that he was hardly able to protect himſelf againſt his own ſubjects, who were thoroughly incenſed againſt him for having countenanced his rapacious proceedings.

This reply convinced the nuncio of his dangerous ſituation, and he determined to abandon a kingdom where his life was in the utmoſt danger. He accordingly got a paſſport from Henry, and embarked with all poſſible expedition for the continent; but it was thought neceſſary to ſend a proper guard with him to the ſea-ſide, to protect him from the reſentment of the juſtly incenſed populace.

During theſe tranſactions the Engliſh ambaſſadors arrived at Lyons, and laid their complaints before the council, where the pope himſelf preſided in perſon. They repreſented, that the benefices enjoyed by the Italian clergy in England amounted to ſixty thouſand marks a year, a ſum that exceeded the annual revenue of the crown. They accuſed the pope of frequently cancelling his own acts, by clauſes of non obſtante inſerted in his bulls; a clauſe abſolutely deſtructive of all the rights of patrons, and all the liberties of the Engliſh church. They expatiated on the perpetual extortions of the nuncios and legates, and various other oppreſſions to which the Britiſh clergy had been ſo long expoſed. The pope was confounded at theſe allegations, and gave an evaſive anſwer. He feared the power of the council, and was willing to ſooth the Engliſh ambaſſadors. He accordingly promiſed them redreſs, and cauſed two bulls to be iſſued out for that purpoſe. Mention was made in the council of the ſuperior right of ſovereignty, which the late king had granted to the holy ſee. In conſequence of this, the earl of Norfolk inſiſted, that neither that prince, nor any other, had the leaſt right, without the conſent of his barons, to ſubject the kingdom to a foreign ſervitude. This noble oppoſition had a powerful effect, the court of Rome not inſiſting afterwards on this unprofitable claim, which the diſtance of the place, and the national character of the Engliſh, rendered impoſſible to ſupport.

A. D. 1246. But the pontiff was far from diſcharging the promiſes he had made to the Engliſh ambaſſadors; for ſome time after the council of Lyons broke up, he renewed all his exactions. This perfidious conduct exaſperated the Engliſh; and a parliament was ſummoned at London, in order to take into conſideration the moſt proper meaſures for removing the grievances of the people. Accordingly, a ſtate of the hardſhips ſuffered by the nation from papal tyranny was drawn up, and after being ſigned by the king, biſhops, and temporal lords, ſent to the court of Rome, and ſatisfaction demanded from the pontiff. But inſtead of meeting with any redreſs, the ambaſſadors were treated with contempt; in conſequence of which, on their return to England, the king immediately prohibited any farther payment being made to the pontiff. This was a meaſure highly agreeable to his ſubjects: but Henry, wanting firmneſs to ſupport it, ſoon relapſed into his former indolence, and ſuffered the pope to continue his extortions.

A. D. 1248. Henry now gave a freſh inſtance of his unhappy attachment and partiality to foreigners, by propoſing the marriages of ſome young ladies of Provence with ſeveral of his nobility. This propoſition was made at a time when his finances would hardly defray the ordinary expences of his houſhold, ſo that he was obliged to convoke a parliament in order to obtain a ſupply, but the barons were ſo irritated at his perſevering in countenancing foreigners, that they peremptorily refuſed complying with his requeſt.

No circumſtance worthy of notice occured from this time till the year 1251, when Henry was alarmed at the proceedings of Alexander II. king of Scotland, who, though a minor, had made depredations on the Engliſh territories. He therefore advanced into the north at the head of a numerous army; but before he could proceed to hoſtilities, an embaſſy arrived with propoſals for an accommodation. Theſe propoſals were accepted, and a match concluded between princeſs Margaret, eldeſt daughter to Henry, and the young king of Scotland. The next day the marriage ceremony was performed at York in preſence of Henry and the queen-mother of Scotland, attended by many of the principal nobility of both kingdoms. Alexander received a bond from Henry for five thouſand marks as a marriage portion, after which the two kings took a friendly leave of each other, Henry returning to London, and Alexander to his own country.

A. D. 1253. Pope Innocent IV. was one of the moſt implacable pontiffs that ever filled the papal chair. The inveterate hatred he conceived againſt Frederic, emperor of Germany (with whom he had been ſome time at war, and who was now no more) did not ſubſide with the death of that monarch; it devolved on his grandſon Conrade, the lawful heir of the crown of Sicily, but whoſe ſucceſſion was ſet aſide by the perfidious arts of his uncle Mainfroy.

The pope was convinced his own forces were inſufficient to oppoſe Mainfroy, and therefore, in order to gratify his thirſt for revenge, as well as repleniſh his coffers, ſent a nuncio into England, to offer the crown of Sicily to Richard earl of of Cornwall. But that nobleman, though exceeding fond of power, had prudence ſufficient to perceive, that the ſole deſign of the court of Rome was nothing more than the acquiſition of a large ſum of money, and therefore declined the offer. But Henry had not the ſagacity of his brother: he accepted it for his ſecond ſon Edmund, and gave the pope unlimited credit for expending the ſums neceſſary for the reduction of Sicily. Edmund was accordingly treated with the honours of royalty; and no means of extortion or oppreſſion omitted by the pope, in conjunction with Henry, to obtain money from the Engliſh, under pretence of eſtabliſhing prince Edmund on the throne of Sicily.

The papal army began the war with ſome ſucceſs; but Mainfroy, determined to riſk his fate on the event of one deciſive action, boldly advanced againſt the Roman forces. In conſequence of this a deſperate battle enſued, which was ſupported, for ſome time, with great obſtinacy on both ſides, till at length the pope's army was totally defeated, and himſelf threatened with being beſieged in his capital. The haughty pontiff could not brook this reverſe of fortune: the violence of his paſſion threw him into a fever, which, in a ſhort time, put a period to his exiſtence. He was ſucceeded in the papal chair by Alexander IV. who purſued the ſame meaſures with his predeceſſor, and undertook to place Edmund on the Sicilian throne.

A. D. 1254. The weak but ambitious Henry had ſubjected himſelf to all the demands of the pontiff in order to graſp this phantom of ſovereignty for his ſon Edmund; but he now found himſelf more embarraſſed than ever. The parliament refuſed to grant the neceſſary ſupplies for carrying this ridiculous project into execution; and the whole weight fell upon the clergy. This was not, however, effected, without a noble ſtruggle from the eccleſiaſtics; for when Ruſtan, the pope's nuncio, aſſembled the prelates, and propoſed their ſigning obligatory notes porportioned to the benefices of each individual, the biſhop of London declared, he would ſooner loſe his head than ſubmit to ſo ſhameful an act of tyranny. He was ſeconded by the biſhop of Worceſter; and the whole aſſembly unanimouſly declared, that the clergy of England would not ſubmit to be enſlaved by the pope. The nuncio complained of this refuſal to Henry, who threatened the biſhop of London with his reſentment; but the prelate, far from being intimidated replied, with a noble intrepidity, "That he knew the king and the pope "were his ſuperiors; but if they deprived him "of his mitre, he would ſupply its place with a "helmet." This generous ſtand in ſupport of the liberties of the Engliſh church, exaſperated the haughty Ruſtan; who finding it would be impoſſible to prevail on them in a body, determined to wreak his vengeance on each in particular. He accordingly commenced proſecutions againſt individuals for pretended faults, and obliged them to make an atonement, by paying very conſiderable ſums. The prelates appealed to the pope; and Alexander, dreading the conſequences of driving the Engliſh clergy to deſpair, ordered his nuncio to deſiſt from his proſecutions.

A. D. 1255. Henry now determined to make another attempt for procuring a ſubſidy from his barons. He accordingly convened the parliament for that purpoſe, when the archbiſhop of Meſſina arrived with letters from the pope, preſſing the nobility, in the moſt earneſt manner, to comply with the requeſt of their ſovereign. But all attempts were in vain: the parliament, after mature deliberation, unanimouſly refuſed to grant the ſubſidy.

In conſequence of this Ruſtan, the pope's nuncio, declared, in an aſſembly of the prelates, that the demands of the pope upon Henry amounted to above one hundred and fifty thouſand marks; and that if the clergy ſtill refuſed to comply with his requeſt, he would immediately make a demand of the whole debt, and lay the kingdom under an interdict till it was paid. The barons knew if this threat was carried into execution, it would expoſe both the church and ſtate to the moſt imminent danger; in conſequence of which they aſſented to ſupply the exorbitant ſum demanded.

During theſe tranſactions the conqueſt of Sicily advanced ſo ſlowly that Henry, finding it would be impoſſible to raiſe the ſums neceſſary to ſatisfy the demands of the pontiff, renounced all pretenſions to the crown of Sicily, and Manifroy preſerved the royal dignity without any farther oppoſition.

A. D. 1257. Though Richard, earl of Cornwall, had wiſely refuſed the offer made by the pope with regard to the crown of Sicily, he was far from being proof againſt ambition. He had amaſſed immenſe riches by his frugality, and was conſidered as the moſt wealthy prince in Europe. The German electors, deſirous of ſharing in the treaſures of this powerful Engliſhman, offered to elect him king of the Romans. Pleaſed with the thoughts of this addition of dignity and power, Richard went over to Germany, attended by a number of the Engliſh nobility, and was ſoon after crowned with great pomp at Aix-la-Chapelle.

A. D. 1258. In the beginning of this year Henry ſummoned a parliament to meet at London, when Harlat (the new nuncio) produced a bull from the pope, enjoining the biſhops to pay the tenths granted to the king by his holineſs, under pain of excommunication. The king ſeconded the demand of the nuncio, and preſſed the members to aſſiſt them with a ſupply. But the barons were far from granting his requeſt: they reproached him with his acts of rapine and injuſtice, and with his hatred of the Engliſh nation, from whom, they ſaid, he ought to bluſh to require any aid or ſubſidies, while he preferred ſtrangers, and made his native ſubjects groan under the moſt dreadful oppreſſions. Four of their brethren were deputed by the biſhops to make warm remonſtrances with regard to his conduct in general, and the uncanonical elections which had been made to vacant dignities in particular. Henry acknowledged their complaints were juſtly founded: but the remonſtrances of the barons were not to be anſwered, and they inſiſted on a ratification of the great charter. It was in vain for the king to make any oppoſition. His brother Richard, whoſe power was very extenſive, was abſent in Germany, and the barons defied all the cenſures of the Vatican. Henry therefore ſubmitted to neceſſity, and the great charter was ratified, Henry ſwearing to obſerve inviolably every article contained in it. But no oaths were binding to Henry: the ſame indolence, the ſame infatuation for foreigners again returned, and the articles of the charter were violated whenever the intereſt of the court, or the ambition of his minions, rendered it neceſſary.

A. D. 1259. The barons were ſo incenſed at the baſe and perfidious conduct of the king, that they formed themſelves into an aſſociation; and a parliament being called at Oxford, they came to the aſſembly, attended by their military tenants, properly armed, and headed by Simon de Montfort, earl of Leiceſter, who had ſome time before married the king's ſiſter, and was made governor of Guienne.

The appearance of the barons with their military attendants greatly alarmed Henry, who, on entering the aſſembly, aſked, with ſome emotion, whether he was their priſoner? The earl marſhal replied, he was not; but that it was the determined reſolution of the whole aſſembly to baniſh his foreign favourites from the kingdom, and redreſs the grievances of the nation. The earl added, that if he would agree to theſe reaſonable demands, and give authority for that purpoſe to perſons of character and capacity, they would grant the ſupplies neceſſary for giving weight and dignity to the crown.

Henry now perceived it would be in vain to oppoſe the power of the barons, and therefore agreed to submit to any regulations they ſhould think fit to propoſe. In conſequence of this the barons conſtituted a council of twenty-four, whom they inveſted with an unlimited authority for reforming the ſtate, and Simon Montfort was elected preſident. Henry took a ſolemn oath before the whole aſſembly that he would maintain and ſupport whatever ordinances they ſhould iſſue for that ſalutary purpoſe. The plan of government had been digeſted at a previous meeting of the principal barons; ſo that a ſet of regulations were immediately produced, the ſubſtance of which was to the following effect:

1. That the king ſhould confirm the great charter, which he had ſo often ſworn to obſerve, and ſo often violated.

2. The important office of chief juſticiary ſhould be beſtowed upon a perſon of talents and integrity, who ſhould adminiſter juſtice to the poor and the rich without favor or partiality.

3. That the chancellor, treaſurer, judges, and other public miniſters, ſhould be annually choſen by the council of twenty-four.

4. That the cuſtody of the king's caſtles ſhould be committed to the care of that council, who ſhould entruſt them to ſuch perſons as were well affected to the ſtate.

5. That any perſon, of what degree or order ſoever, who ſhould oppoſe, directly or indirectly, what ſhould be decreed by the council of twenty-four, ſhould be puniſhed with death.

6. That three ſeſſions of parliament ſhould be regularly held every year, to enact ſuch laws as ſhould, from time to time, be found neceſſary for the good of the people.

Theſe articles (diſtinguiſhed by the title of "The Statutes or Proviſions of Oxford") were unanimouſly approved of by the parliament, and confirmed by the king, who ſolemnly ſwore ſtrictly to obſerve, and cauſe them to be obſerved, to the utmoſt of his power.

Having ſigned theſe articles, Henry made not the leaſt doubt but the parliament would grant him a large ſubſidy. He was, however greatly miſtaken; for the conſideration of the ſupplies was poſtponed, and ſome of his principal foreign favourites (who were conſidered as the chief authors of the public calamities) were baniſhed the kingdom. Nor was this all: even the officers of the houſhold were removed, and their places filled with perſons in the intereſt of the council. At the ſame time they obliged every individual in the kingdom to take an oath to obey their mandates, telling them, it was "for "the greater glory of God, the honour of the "church, the ſervice of the king, and the ad-"vantage of the kingdom."

Thus did the barons take into their own hands the government of the nation; and the king ſoon perceived he was no more than a mere cypher in the adminiſtration. The council, however, were under diſagreeable apprehenſions from the great credit and power of the king's brother, Richard king of the Romans, whom they knew was now about paying a viſit to England. They therefore diſpatched the biſhop of Worceſter to the continent, to inform him that he would not be permitted to land in England unleſs he firſt promiſed to take an oath to obſerve the ſtatutes of Oxford. Incenſed at their inſolence, and exaſperated at the degrading treatment of his brother, Richard ſwore he would never take the oath they wanted to impoſe upon him; and that he would viſit England when, and as often as he pleaſed, without ſubmitting to give them any reaſons for his actions. But being ſoon after informed, that the barons had taken ſuch precautions, by marching troops to the ſea-coaſts, and fitting out a powerful fleet, that it would be impoſſible for him to land in England without their conſent, he thought it more prudent to ſubmit to the neceſſity of the times, than engage in a fruitleſs oppoſition. and therefore took the oath required; upon which the barons gave him permiſſion to come to England.

A. D. 1260. The barons continued to direct the affairs of government, for ſome time, with tolerable ſatisfaction to the people, till at length it was perceived that the meaſures they took were more calculated to promote their own intereſt than that of the ſtate. In conſequence of this a general murmur took place, and the knights of the ſhire implored the aſſiſtance of prince Edward to undertake the defence of the rights of the crown, and the liberties of the people. The prince accordingly ſent a meſſage to the barons, inſiſting on their finiſhing, without delay, the reformation they had undertaken; otherwiſe he ſhould think himſelf obliged to exert all his power to procure redreſs for an injured people.

The barons were alarmed at this ſpirited remonſtrance, and a new code of laws was publiſhed: but it ſoon appeared that the whole was nothing more than the common laws of England, with ſome trifling alterations. So glaring an impoſition exaſperated the people; and the animoſities which now broke out between the barons themſelves, gave them hopes that the tyranny of the nobles would ſoon have an end. The earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter, the two moſt powerful barons in the whole confederacy, became profeſſed enemies to each other. Theſe diviſions greatly weakened the ſtrength of the barons; and Leiceſter retired into France, under pretence of being no longer able to act with ſuch an adminiſtration.

Leiceſter, however, had views little ſuſpected by the barons at the time of his relinquiſhing the adminiſtration. He was in hopes of increaſing the power of his party by gaining over the French monarch to his intereſt. But in this he was greatly miſtaken. The throne of France was then filled by Lewis IX. (generally called St. Lewis) a prince who delighted not in the diſtreſſes of other nations; but was deſirous of healing, rather than increaſing the wounds which the Engliſh conſtitution had received. He was endowed with all the piety of an anchorite, as well as the virtues of a king. His liberality was not in the leaſt inconſiſtent with the wiſeſt œconomy. He knew how to reconcile a profound policy with an exact juſtice. He was prudent and firm in council, intrepid but cool in war, and as compaſſionate as if he had always been unhappy. From a prince of this character England had nothing to fear; he deſired not to uſurp the territories of his neighbours, and was ſo far from taking advantage of the troubles of England, that he laboured to eſtabliſh peace and harmony among the contending parties, whoſe diviſions threatened the kingdom with deſtruction. He even entertained a doubt with regard to the juſtice of the ſentence paſſed againſt John in the court of peers in France; and had formed a deſign of reſtoring to Henry all the provinces that had been wreſted from his father.

A. D. 1261. The quarrel between two ſuch powerful noblemen as the earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter gave Henry great hopes that his misfortunes beſieged in his capital. The haughty pontiff could not brook this reverſe of fortune: the violence of his paſſion threw him into a fever, which, in a ſhort time, put a period to his exiſtence. He was ſucceeded in the papal chair by Alexander IV. who purſued the ſame meaſures with his predeceſſor, and undertook to place Edmund on the Sicilian throne.

A. D. 1254. The weak but ambitious Henry had ſubjected himſelf to all the demands of the pontiff in order to graſp this phantom of ſovereignty for his ſon Edmund; but he now found himſelf more embarraſſed than ever. The parliament refuſed to grant the neceſſary ſupplies for carrying this ridiculous project into execution; and the whole weight fell upon the clergy. This was not, however, effected, without a noble ſtruggle from the eccleſiaſtics; for when Ruſtan, the pope's nuncio, aſſembled the prelates, and propoſed their ſigning obligatory notes porportioned to the benefices of each individual, the biſhop of London declared, he would ſooner loſe his head than ſubmit to ſo ſhameful an act of tyranny. He was ſeconded by the biſhop of Worceſter; and the whole aſſembly unanimouſly declared, that the clergy of England would not ſubmit to be enſlaved by the pope. The nuncio complained of this refuſal to Henry, who threatened the biſhop of London with his reſentment; but the prelate, far from being intimidated replied, with a noble intrepidity, "That he knew the king and the pope "were his ſuperiors; but if they deprived him "of his mitre, he would ſupply its place with a "helmet." This generous ſtand in ſupport of the liberties of the Engliſh church, exaſperated the haughty Ruſtan; who finding it would be impoſſible to prevail on them in a body, determined to wreak his vengeance on each in particular. He accordingly commenced proſecutions againſt individuals for pretended faults, and obliged them to make an atonement, by paying very conſiderable ſums. The prelates appealed to the pope; and Alexander, dreading the conſequences of driving the Engliſh clergy to deſpair, ordered his nuncio to deſiſt from his proſecutions.

A. D. 1255. Henry now determined to make another attempt for procuring a ſubſidy from his barons. He accordingly convened the parliament for that purpoſe, when the archbiſhop of Meſſina arrived with letters from the pope, preſſing the nobility, in the moſt earneſt manner, to comply with the requeſt of their ſovereign. But all attempts were in vain: the parliament, after mature deliberation, unanimouſly refuſed to grant the ſubſidy.

In conſequence of this Ruſtan, the pope's nuncio, declared, in an aſſembly of the prelates, that the demands of the pope upon Henry amounted to above one hundred and fifty thouſand marks; and that if the clergy ſtill refuſed to comply with his requeſt, he would immediately make a demand of the whole debt, and lay the kingdom under an interdict till it was paid. The barons knew if this threat was carried into execution, it would expoſe both the church and ſtate to the moſt imminent danger; in conſequence of which they aſſented to ſupply the exorbitant ſum demanded.

During theſe tranſactions the conqueſt of Sicily advanced ſo ſlowly that Henry, finding it would be impoſſible to raiſe the ſums neceſſary to ſatisfy the demands of the pontiff, renounced all pretenſions to the crown of Sicily, and Manifroy preſerved the royal dignity without any farther oppoſition.

A. D. 1257. Though Richard, earl of Cornwall, had wiſely refuſed the offer made by the pope with regard to the crown of Sicily, he was far from being proof againſt ambition. He had amaſſed immenſe riches by his frugality, and was conſidered as the moſt wealthy prince in Europe. The German electors, deſirous of ſharing in the treaſures of this powerful Engliſhman, offered to elect him king of the Romans. Pleaſed with the thoughts of this addition of dignity and power, Richard went over to Germany, attended by a number of the Engliſh nobility, and was ſoon after crowned with great pomp at Aix-la-Chapelle.

A. D. 1258. In the beginning of this year Henry ſummoned a parliament to meet at London, when Harlat (the new nuncio) produced a bull from the pope, enjoining the biſhops to pay the tenths granted to the king by his holineſs, under pain of excommunication. The king ſeconded the demand of the nuncio, and preſſed the members to aſſiſt them with a ſupply. But the barons were far from granting his requeſt: they reproached him with his acts of rapine and injuſtice, and with his hatred of the Engliſh nation, from whom, they ſaid, he ought to bluſh to require any aid or ſubſidies, while he preferred ſtrangers, and made his native ſubjects groan under the moſt dreadful oppreſſions. Four of their brethren were deputed by the biſhops to make warm remonſtrances with regard to his conduct in general, and the uncanonical elections which had been made to vacant dignities in particular. Henry acknowledged their complaints were juſtly founded: but the remonſtrances of the barons were not to be anſwered, and they inſiſted on a ratification of the great charter. It was in vain for the king to make any oppoſition. His brother Richard, whoſe power was very extenſive, was abſent in Germany, and the barons defied all the cenſures of the Vatican. Henry therefore ſubmitted to neceſſity, and the great charter was ratified, Henry ſwearing to obſerve inviolably every article contained in it. But no oaths were binding to Henry: the ſame indolence, the ſame infatuation for foreigners again returned, and the articles of the charter were violated whenever the intereſt of the court, or the ambition of his minions, rendered it neceſſary.

A. D. 1259. The barons were ſo incenſed at the baſe and perfidious conduct of the king, that they formed themſelves into an aſſociation; and a parliament being called at Oxford, they came to the aſſembly, attended by their military tenants, properly armed, and headed by Simon de Montfort, earl of Leiceſter, who had ſome time before married the king's ſiſter, and was made governor of Guienne.

The appearance of the barons with their military attendants greatly alarmed Henry, who, on entering the aſſembly, aſked, with ſome emotion, whether he was their priſoner? The earl marſhal replied, he was not; but that it was the determined reſolution of the whole aſſembly to baniſh his foreign favourites from the kingdom, and redreſs the grievances of the nation. The earl added, that if he would agree to theſe reaſonable demands, and give authority for that purpoſe to perſons of character and capacity, they would grant the ſupplies neceſſary for giving weight and dignity to the crown.

Henry now perceived it would be in vain to oppoſe the power of the barons, and therefore agreed agreed to ſubmit to any regulations they ſhould think fit to propoſe. In conſequence of this the barons conſtituted a council of twenty-four, whom they inveſted with an unlimited authority for reforming the ſtate, and Simon Montfort was elected preſident. Henry took a ſolemn oath before the whole aſſembly that he would maintain and ſupport whatever ordinances they ſhould iſſue for that ſalutary purpoſe. The plan of government had been digeſted at a previous meeting of the principal barons; ſo that a ſet of regulations were immediately produced, the ſubſtance of which was to the following effect:

1. That the king ſhould confirm the great charter, which he had ſo often ſworn to obſerve, and ſo often violated.

2. The important office of chief juſticiary ſhould be beſtowed upon a perſon of talents and integrity, who ſhould adminiſter juſtice to the poor and the rich without favor or partiality.

3. That the chancellor, treaſurer, judges, and other public miniſters, ſhould be annually choſen by the council of twenty-four.

4. That the cuſtody of the king's caſtles ſhould be committed to the care of that council, who ſhould entruſt them to ſuch perſons as were well affected to the ſtate.

5. That any perſon, of what degree or order ſoever, who ſhould oppoſe, directly or indirectly, what ſhould be decreed by the council of twenty-four, ſhould be puniſhed with death.

6. That three ſeſſions of parliament ſhould be regularly held every year, to enact ſuch laws as ſhould, from time to time, be found neceſſary for the good of the people.

Theſe articles (diſtinguiſhed by the title of "The Statutes or Proviſions of Oxford") were unanimouſly approved of by the parliament, and confirmed by the king, who ſolemnly ſwore ſtrictly to obſerve, and cauſe them to be obſerved, to the utmoſt of his power.

Having ſigned theſe articles, Henry made not the leaſt doubt but the parliament would grant him a large ſubſidy. He was, however greatly miſtaken; for the conſideration of the ſupplies was poſtponed, and ſome of his principal foreign favourites (who were conſidered as the chief authors of the public calamities) were baniſhed the kingdom. Nor was this all: even the officers of the houſhold were removed, and their places filled with perſons in the intereſt of the council. At the ſame time they obliged every individual in the kingdom to take an oath to obey their mandates, telling them, it was "for "the greater glory of God, the honour of the "church, the ſervice of the king, and the ad-"vantage of the kingdom."

Thus did the barons take into their own hands the government of the nation; and the king ſoon perceived he was no more than a mere cypher in the adminiſtration. The council, however, were under diſagreeable apprehenſions from the great credit and power of the king's brother, Richard king of the Romans, whom they knew was now about paying a viſit to England. They therefore diſpatched the biſhop of Worceſter to the continent, to inform him that he would not be permitted to land in England unleſs he firſt promiſed to take an oath to obſerve the ſtatutes of Oxford. Incenſed at their inſolence, and exaſperated at the degrading treatment of his brother, Richard ſwore he would never take the oath they wanted to impoſe upon him; and that he would viſit England when, and as often as he pleaſed, without ſubmitting to give them any reaſons for his actions. But being ſoon after informed, that the barons had taken ſuch precautions, by marching troops to the ſea-coaſts, and fitting out a powerful fleet, that it would be impoſſible for him to land in England without their conſent, he thought it more prudent to ſubmit to the neceſſity of the times, than engage in a fruitleſs oppoſition. and therefore took the oath required; upon which the barons gave him permiſſion to come to England.

A. D. 1260. The barons continued to direct the affairs of government, for ſome time, with tolerable ſatisfaction to the people, till at length it was perceived that the meaſures they took were more calculated to promote their own intereſt than that of the ſtate. In conſequence of this a general murmur took place, and the knights of the ſhire implored the aſſiſtance of prince Edward to undertake the defence of the rights of the crown, and the liberties of the people. The prince accordingly ſent a meſſage to the barons, inſiſting on their finiſhing, without delay, the reformation they had undertaken; otherwiſe he ſhould think himſelf obliged to exert all his power to procure redreſs for an injured people.

The barons were alarmed at this ſpirited remonſtrance, and a new code of laws was publiſhed: but it ſoon appeared that the whole was nothing more than the common laws of England, with ſome trifling alterations. So glaring an impoſition exaſperated the people; and the animoſities which now broke out between the barons themſelves, gave them hopes that the tyranny of the nobles would ſoon have an end. The earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter, the two moſt powerful barons in the whole confederacy, became profeſſed enemies to each other. Theſe diviſions greatly weakened the ſtrength of the barons; and Leiceſter retired into France, under pretence of being no longer able to act with ſuch an adminiſtration.

Leiceſter, however, had views little ſuſpected by the barons at the time of his relinquiſhing the adminiſtration. He was in hopes of increaſing the power of his party by gaining over the French monarch to his intereſt. But in this he was greatly miſtaken. The throne of France was then filled by Lewis IX. (generally called St. Lewis) a prince who delighted not in the diſtreſſes of other nations; but was deſirous of healing, rather than increaſing the wounds which the Engliſh conſtitution had received. He was endowed with all the piety of an anchorite, as well as the virtues of a king. His liberality was not in the leaſt inconſiſtent with the wiſeſt œconomy. He knew how to reconcile a profound policy with an exact juſtice. He was prudent and firm in council, intrepid but cool in war, and as compaſſionate as if he had always been unhappy. From a prince of this character England had nothing to fear; he deſired not to uſurp the territories of his neighbours, and was ſo far from taking advantage of the troubles of England, that he laboured to eſtabliſh peace and harmony among the contending parties, whoſe diviſions threatened the kingdom with deſtruction. He even entertained a doubt with regard to the juſtice of the ſentence paſſed againſt John in the court of peers in France; and had formed a deſign of reſtoring to Henry all the provinces that had been wreſted from his father.

A. D. 1261. The quarrel between two ſuch powerful noblemen as the earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter gave Henry great hopes that his misfortunes fortunes were drawing to a close; and, perceiving that the diſpoſitions of his people had taken a turn in his favour, he determined to make one effort for recovering his authority. To effect this he applied to the pope, requeſting that he might be abſolved from the oath he had taken with regard to the Oxford Proviſions. The pope readily complied with his requeſt, in conſequence of which Henry determined to declare publickly the reſolutions he had formed, and for that purpoſe ſummoned a parliment to be held at London.

The aſſembly being met, Henry boldly told them, "That as they had not, on their parts, perſormed their promiſes, with regard to paying his debts, and augmenting his revenues, when he ſigned the Proviſions of Oxford, he did not think himſelf obliged to keep the oath he had taken on that occaſion: that he was determined no longer to remain in the hands of a faction who had treated him more like a ſlave than their king, but he would immediately free himſelf from ſuch inglorious fetters, and aſſert the dignity of his own prerogative."

After having made this bold and unexpected declaration, the king, without giving the members time to make any reply, immediately quitted the aſſembly, repaired to the tower, and ſeized all the money in the mint. He likewiſe publiſhed a proclamation for removing the ſheriffs and other officers appointed by the council of twenty-four, and acted with ſuch vigour as ſeemed to be the effect of a fixed reſolution to ſupport his own independence. He informed his ſubjects that he had reſumed the reins of government, and would inviolably obſerve the two charters, notwithſtanding any falſe reports to the contrary. He then nominated a chancellor, chief juſticiary, and officers of his houſhold, in the room of thoſe who had been appointed by the council.

A. D. 1262. The reſolute conduct of the king irritated the barons, who having raiſed a conſiderable army under the command of the earl of Leiceſter, determined to purſue their claims to the government by force of arms. In conſequence of this, prince Edward, who had hitherto ſcrupled to break the oath he had taken to ſubmit to the council, reſolved to undertake the cauſe of his father, and, if poſſible, again eſtabliſh him in the ſovereignty. He was ſoon at the head of a powerful army, and joined by ſeveral of the barons, who thought they could not, as true Engliſhmen, continue any longer with Leiceſter and his party.

The two armies were in ſight of each other, and a deciſive battle was ſoon expected, when ſeveral of the moſt prudent perſons interpoſed their good offices to prevent the effuſion of human blood. But it ſoon appeared that the claims of the contending parties were not to be adjuſted; in conſequence of which it was agreed to refer the deciſion to St. Lewis, in whoſe wiſdom and equity both parties placed an equal confidence; and the reference was confirmed by the oaths of the king, the prince and the barons.

In conſequence of this determination meſſengers were immediately diſpatched to the continent; and both parties waited with anxious expectations for their return. Lewis accepted the office of arbitrator, and having heard, with the utmoſt attention, the whole matter fairly debated, together with the allegations of both parties in an aſſembly of the ſtates at Amiens, delivered the following award: "That the ſtatutes of Oxford with all the proceedings that followed in conſequence of thoſe acts, ſhould be annulled: That the king ſhould enjoy all the rights and prerogatives, which were inveſted in the crown, before thoſe ſtatutes were enacted: That all the caſtles which they king had ceded to the barons as a ſecurity for the performance of his promiſe, ſhould be reſtored; and that he ſhould enjoy the privilege of appointing his great officers of ſtate and government, equally from foreigners or natives." The barons were highly exaſperated at an award ſo contrary to what they expected; the conſequence of which was, that the negotiation was entirely broke off, and each party made preparations for deciding the conteſt by the ſword.

The royal army was divided into three bodies, one of which was commanded by the king in perſon, the ſecond by Richard king of the Romans, and the third by prince Edward. The earl of Leiceſter, being reinforced by a body of fifteen thouſand Londoners, marched immediately to Lewes, (where the royal army was encamped) with a full reſolution of hazarding a deciſive engagement. The battle was begun by prince Edward, who charged the van of the rebel army with ſuch impetuoſity, that the troops gave way, and a dreadful carnage enſued. He then fell upon the Londoners, routed them with great ſlaughter, and purſued them near four miles with the utmoſt fury. The abſence of the prince afforded Leiceſter an opportunity of changing the fortune of the day. He attacked the ſecond body of the king's forces, cut the greateſt part to pieces, and took the king of the Romans priſoner. The third body, commanded by Henry in perſon, made ſo noble a ſtand, that it was not broke till the evening; but the king's horſe being killed under him, and himſelf ſlightly wounded, he retired to the priory of Lewes with part of his followers, while others took refuge in the caſtle.

When young Edward returned from purſuing the Londoners, he was ſurprized to ſee the field of battle covered with dead bodies; and ſeveral of his principal followers were ſo intimidated, that they fled, with ſeven hundred of their beſt troops, to Pevenſey, and from thence paſſed over to France. The prince, however, who was a ſtranger to fear, thought only of retrieving the misfortune, and therefore immediately attacked the barons; but night coming on prevented a freſh engagement. Anxious for the fate of his father, the prince ſought for him both about the town and caſtle without effect; but at length underſtood he was in the priory, which was then attacked by a conſiderable body of the rebel army. The royaliſts, however, made a noble defence, and the earl of Leiceſter's forces were at length obliged to abandon the enterprize.

Prince Edward, having ſtill the advantage of ſome excellent officers about his perſon, determined to try the fortune of another battle. Leiceſter had loſt near half his army, and was therefore deſirous of avoiding a freſh battle with a body of reſolute troops more experienced than his own. He knew a defeat muſt be fatal, and that no mercy could be expected ſhould he fall into the hands of the enraged monarch. Under pretence, therefore, of preventing the farther effuſion of human blood, he ſent mediators next morning to the prince, to propoſe a ceſſation of arms, offering to ſubmit his demands to ſuch arbitrators as the king ſhould approve; but, at the ſame time, inſiſted, that prince Edward, and young Henry, ſon to the king of the Romans, ſhould be delivered as hoſtages for the king's king's performance of the conditions. This demand was abſolutely rejected by the king as inſolent and unreaſonable; it concealed, under the maſk of a deſire of peace, a treacherous deſign of making himſelf abſolute maſter of the kingdom.

Thus diſappointed, the earl, fearful of another engagement, had recourſe to menaces, and threatened to ſtrike off the heads of the king of the Romans, together with thoſe of all the priſoners of note in his hands, if the prince made any attack on his army. Edward, knowing the natural reſolution of Leiceſter, and fearful he might carry his threats into execution, was deſirous of coming to an accommodation, which being made known to the earl, he drew up the following articles:

"1. That prince Edward, and Henry, ſon to the king of the Romans, ſhould ſurrender themſelves priſoners, as pledges in the place of king Henry and Richard king of the Romans.

2. That all other priſoners on both ſides ſhould be releaſed; and

3. That, in order to ſettle the terms of agreement, application ſhould be made to the king of France, who ſhould name ſix Frenchmen, namely, three prelates, and three barons. Theſe ſix to chuſe two others of their own countrymen; and theſe two to chuſe one Engliſhman, who, in conjunction with themſelves, were to be inveſted by both parties with full powers to make what regulations they thought proper for the ſettlement of the kingdom."

Theſe articles were ſigned by Henry, prince Edward, and all the chiefs of both parties; after which the king ſent orders for all the priſoners taken by his forces to be ſet at liberty. But the artful and ambitious earl never intended to perform his part of the agreement. After ſending the prince and young Henry to Dover Caſtle, he refuſed ſetting his priſoners at liberty, retained Richard in cuſtody, and ſhut up the king in the priory of Lewes.

A. D. 1263. Leiceſter now took the whole power of the government into his own hands. He diſpoſed of offices at his own pleaſure, and had recourſe to every method he could project for raiſing money to ſtrengthen his party. He ſummoned a parliament of his own partizans, in which aſſembly it was enacted, that every act of royal power ſhould be exerciſed by nine perſons, who were to be choſen and removed by the ſuperior authority of three others; namely, himſelf, the earl of Glouceſter, and the biſhop of Chicheſter.

By this eſtabliſhment the ſceptre was, in reality put into Leiceſter's hands, as he had the entire direction of the biſhop of Chicheſter, and conſequently commanded all the reſolutions of the council of three. But it was not likely that ſuch a plan of government could be of any long continuance. The queen who had been ſome time in France, hearing of the tyrannical proceedings of Leiceſter, raiſed a conſiderable army to oppoſe him; and Lewis himſelf, who beheld with deteſtation, the perjuries of the earl, favoured her enterprize. The ambitious Leiceſter was alarmed at receiving intelligence of the queen's intentions, and diſpatched a number of troops to guard the coaſt, and prevent her forces landing. The troops were embarked, and ſet ſail for England, but the winds were ſo contrary, and the ſea ſo tempeſtuous, that they were all diſperſed, and the whole deſigns of the queen rendered abortive.

The Roman pontiff, who ſtill favoured Henry, and was highly exaſperated at the behaviour of the barons, ſent cardinal Guido to England as legate, with orders to pronounce the ſentence of excommunication againſt the earls of Leiceſter, Glouceſter and Norfolk, by name, and all others in general who joined in the oppreſſion and captivity of their ſovereign. But Leiceſter took effectual methods to prevent the conſequences of the papal cenſures. On the arrival of the legate, knowing his buſineſs, he threatened him with immediate death ſhould he dare to pronounce the ſentence; in conſequence of which the legate was ſo intimidated that he immediately quitted England, and returned to the continent.

A. D. 1265. The conduct of the earl of Leiceſter was now become ſo tyrannical and arbitrary, that he was generally deſpiſed by the people, and even the earl of Glouceſter, who had remonſtrated with him on the impropriety of his behaviour, but without effect, deſerted his cauſe. The nobles, who were ſtill in the intereſt of Henry, put themſelves under the protection of Glouceſter. The people complained loudly of the ſhameful breach of the convention made at Lewes; and demanded that prince Edward, and the other priſoners, ſhould be ſet at liberty, in conformity to the articles of that treaty.

The imperious and tyrannical Leiceſter now found it would be impoſſible to divert the gathering ſtorm, without having recourſe to ſome artifice to deceive the Engliſh. He accordingly ordered a parliament to meet at London, but fixed that aſſembly on a more republican baſis than any that had ever been ſummoned ſince the foundation of the Engliſh monarchy. Beſides many barons and eccleſiaſtics, who were not immediate tenants of the crown, he ordered the ſheriffs to return two knights from every ſhire, and the ſame number of deputies from every borough. The meeting of this aſſembly, which happened on the twentieth of January (A. D. 1266.) is generally eſteemed the epocha of the houſe of Commons in England. It is indeed, certain that this is the firſt time any mention is made of repreſentatives being ſent by the boroughs to parliament.

In this aſſembly, which was exceeding numerous, the gallant prince Edward, who had languiſhed in priſon ever ſince the fatal battle of Lewes, was declared free and at full liberty, after ſtipulating to deliver up all the caſtles poſſeſſed by the barons in the intereſt of the royal party, and neither to depart the kingdom during three years, nor introduce any foreign troops. But Leiceſter never intended to ſet the prince at liberty; he was ſtrictly guarded by the emiſſaries of that nobleman, and continued only a priſoner at large.

The barons now ſaw there were no hopes of reſtoring tranquillity to the nation. The tyranny of Leiceſter was more dreaded than that of Henry had been formerly. The earl of Glouceſter perceived his own danger; for every thing that oppoſed the deſpotiſm of Leiceſter was ſacrificed at the altar of his ambition. Glouceſter therefore retired for ſafety to his eſtates on the borders of Wales; and Leiceſter followed him to Hereford at the head of an army, carrying with him both the king and the prince.

While the earl of Leiceſter was at Hereford, Glouceſter found means to open a negotiation with young Edward, and a plan was formed for the prince's eſcape. A horſe of extraordinary ſwiftneſs was procured by Glouceſter, and conveyed to Edward by means of a truſty ſervant, and Edward Mortimer, at the head of a ſmall party, waited in a wood not far from Leiceſter's camp, in order to receive the prince, and convey him to a place of ſafety. Every thing being thus prepared, the prince, pretending to take the air with ſome of Leiceſter's retinue, made matches between their horſes, and rode ſeveral of them himſelf; till at length having ſufficiently tired and blown their horſes, he mounted the ſteed ſent him by Glouceſter, effected his eſcape, and fled to Mortimer.

The people were no ſooner informed of the prince's eſcape, then they flocked to his ſtandard from all parts, ſo that Edward ſoon found himſelf at the head of a powerful army. He immediately took the field, and in order to prevent Leiceſter from retreating back to the capital, broke down all the bridges on the Severn.

Leiceſter, being informed of the proceedings of prince Edward, began to think himſelf in great danger, and therefore diſpatched an expreſs to his ſon, deſiring him to haſten from London with an army to his relief. But Edward was too vigilant, and too well informed of young Montfort's motions to ſuffer him to join his father. Knowing he had advanced at the head of his forces to Kenilworth, the prince marched to meet him, and a ſmart battle enſued, which terminated in favour of Edward, the greater part of the rebel army being cut to pieces, and the reſt obliged to ſave themſelves by a precipitate flight.

In the mean time the earl of Leiceſter with his forces, took the opportunity of croſſing the Severn in boats; and being entirely ignorant of his ſon's misfortune, advanced to Eveſham, expecting every hour to be joined by the forces from London.

After the defeat of young Montfort, the prince divided his army into three bodies, one of which advanced along the road to Kenilworth, carrying before them the banners that had been taken from young Montfort's army; while himſelf, at the head of the ſecond diviſion, made a circuit, in order to attack Leiceſter's army in another quarter. This ſtratagem, for ſome time, deceived Leiceſter; he took the firſt diviſion for his friends; but perceiving his miſtake, and obſerving the excellent diſpoſition of Edward's troops, exclaimed, "They have learned from me their military order." The greater part of the army of Leiceſter made but a feeble reſiſtance; the Welſh, who formed the van, unable to ſupport the furious attack of Edward, fled with the utmoſt precipitation, while Glouceſter at the head of another diviſion, charged the main body with equal fury. Leiceſter, however, maintained the battle with amazing intrepidity, till his horſe being killed under him, he demanded quarter, which was refuſed, and he, with his ſon Henry, fell among the ſlain. The troops, finding themſelves deprived of their leaders, were ſo diſpirited, that they made no farther reſiſtance, but immediately threw down their arms, and ſubmitted to the conquerors.

After this victory the gallant prince Edward eaſily ſubdued the remains of the rebel party; and the far greater part of the caſtles garriſoned by the rebels readily ſubmitted, and opened their gates to the king. Adam Gourdon, a courageous baron, maintained himſelf for ſome time in the foreſt of Hampſhire, and committed depredations in that neighbourhood. Edward led a body of forces againſt him, and attacked the camp of the rebels with the utmoſt fury. The valiant leaders met, and a ſingle combat enſued between them. The victory was long doubtful; but at laſt ended in favour of Edward, Gourdon being wounded, thrown from his horſe and taken priſoner. But Edward knew how to eſtimate valour, even in an enemy: he procured his pardon, granted him his friendſhip, and Gourdon ſerved him faithfully the remainder of his life.

A. D. 1268. The rebellion being now totally ſuppreſſed, and tranquillity reſtored to the kingdom, Henry ſummoned a parliament, at which was preſent the pope's legate, who informed the aſſembly that the pontiff had reſolved to publiſh a cruſade in every ſtate that profeſſed the Chriſtian religion; and exhorting the Engliſh to ſupport an enterprize calculated to promote the honour and glory of the church.

In conſequence of this declaration from the legate, Prince Edward, his brother Edmund, and their couſin Henry, received the croſs from the hands of the legate; and their examples were followed by the earls of Glouceſter, Warrenne and Pembroke, together with many others of the principal nobility in the kingdom.

A. D. 1270. While prince Edward was making the neceſſary preparations for his expedition to the Holy Land, Lewis the French king (who had alſo engaged in the cruſade, and ſtrongly ſolicited Edward to haſten his departure from England) embarked his forces, and landed near the ruins of Carthage, with a deſign of reducing the city of Tunis. Edward reached the camp of Lewis, but had the misfortune to find that great prince, a ſhort time before, had paid the debt of nature, from the intemperance of the climate, and the great fatigues he had undergone. He was ſucceeded on the throne of France by Philip, ſurnamed the Hardy, a prince who poſſeſſed great merit, though much inferior to that of his father.

But the death of Lewis did not intimidate Edward, who continued his courſe to Paleſtine, where he ſignalized himſelf by the moſt aſtoniſhing acts of valour. He revived the honour of the Engliſh name in thoſe parts, and ſtruck the Saracens with ſuch terror, that they had recourſe to the infamous deſign of taking him off by aſſaſſination. The villain employed to execute this inhuman deſign, was admitted ſeveral times into the prince's preſence, under pretence of negotiating a treaty between Edward and the governor of Joppa. One day, finding the prince alone ſitting on a couch unarmed, he approached him, and offering him ſome letters, took the opportunity of drawing a concealed dagger, which he endeavoured to ſheathe in the prince's breaſt; but Edward fortunately warded off the blow. He received, indeed, a conſiderable wound in the arm, but that misfortune did not prevent him from ſeizing the villain, and, having wreſted the dagger from his hand, plunged it into his heart. The wound was however dangerous, being made with a poiſoned inſtrument, and the prince's life was in the moſt imminent danger; but by the great ſkill and care of an Engliſh ſurgeon, a cure was happily effected in a very ſhort time.

A. D. 1271. The abſence of prince Edward was attended with thoſe pernicious conſequences which had been dreaded from the time of his departure from England. The king was now grown old and infirm, and the barons, not having a proper perſon to controul them, oppreſſed the common people with impunity, and gave ſhelter to bands of robbers, whom they employed to commit ravages on the eſtates of their neighbours. The populace of London likewiſe returned to their uſual licentiouſneſs; and Henry, unable to ſupport the weight of government, ſent a meſſenger to his ſon, requeſting his immediate return to aſſiſt him in ſwaying that ſceptre which was ready to fall from his enfeebled hands.

A. D. 1272. The cares and fears of Henry were now greatly increaſed by the death of his brother Richard, king of the Romans, who paid the debt of nature at Berkhamſtead on the ſecond of April. He was ſucceeded, as earl of Cornwall, by his ſon Edmund, who married Margaret, ſiſter to the earl of Glouceſter.

Soon after the death of Richard, the king ſummoned a general council at Northampton, whither he went himſelf, though at that time in a very weak ſtate of health. The cauſe of this meeting was, to enquire into the particulars of a riot that had happened at Norwich, between the inhabitants of that city and the monks, in which the cathedral with the monaſtery adjoining, was reduced to aſhes. After a full inveſtigation of the affair, it appeared that the citizens were the aggreſſors, in conſequence of which they were fined 3000 marks, and ſeveral of the moſt active among the rioters were ſentenced to be hanged.

The king was ſo irritated at theſe violent and outrageous proceedings, that he determined to ſee the ſentence which had been paſſed on the rioters put into execution. He accordingly went from Northampton to Norwich, and, after ſtaying twelve days in that city, came to St. Edmundſbury in his way to London, where he was ſeized with a diſorder that ſoon put an end to his life. His diſtemper increaſing daily, he was removed, by eaſy journies, to Weſtminſter, when, finding his end approaching, he ſent for the earl of Glouceſter, and exacted from him an oath, that he would preſerve the peace of the kingdom, and, to the utmoſt of his power, maintain the intereſt of his ſon Edward. He then ſent for ſome of the principal nobility, of whom he took a ſolemn farewell, and ſoon after expired, on the 16th of November, in the 65th year of his age, and 57th of his reign. His remains were, by his own deſire, interred near the ſhrine of Edward the Confeſſor, in the abbey-church of Weſtminſter, where his tomb (with his ſtatue in braſs) is ſtill to be ſeen.

The character of this prince is ſo fully diſplayed from the hiſtory of his life, that it is almoſt needleſs to deſcend to particulars. His genius was narrow, his temper capricious, his principles arbitary, and his meaſures oppreſſive; which, together with his attachment to foreigners, were the real cauſes of the troubles that diſturbed his reign, and proved deſtructive to the tranquillity of his ſubjects. He evinced two principles that are undeniable demonſtrations of meanneſs of ſoul: the former was a moſt preſumptive arrogance in proſperity, and the latter a moſt abject deſpondence in adverſity. But with all theſe vices and foibles, he had ſome virtues; he was noted for his piety and devotion, and his regular attendance on public worſhip. He was alſo an affectionate huſband, and an indulgent parent.

Henry left iſſue two ſons, namely, Edward, who ſucceeded him, and Edmund earl of Lancaſter. He had alſo two daughters, Margaret queen of Scotland, and Beatrix, ducheſs of Britany. Beſides theſe he had five other children, all of whom died in their infancy.

EDWARD I*. furnamed LONGSHANKS.

Acceſſion and coronation of Edward I. He marches againſt the Welch, and makes a treaty of peace with Llewellyn their prince. The Jews ſeverely puniſhed for adulterating the coin of the kingdom. Edward again marches againſt the Welſh, and totally reduces their country. Goes over to the continent, and, on his return, puniſhes the judges for having acted corruptly during his abſence. The Jews plundered of their property, and baniſhed the kingdom. Death of Queen Eleanor. The ſucceſſion to the throne of Scotland being diſputed, reference is made to Edward, who declares in favour of Baliol, a deſcendant of William. Baliol, having a complaint exhibited againſt him by the earl of Fife, is obliged to plead his own cauſe at Weſtminſter. Edward marches againſt the Scots, and obtains a complete victory; upon which Baliol reſigns his crown to Edward, who ſends him priſoner to the Tower. Quarrel between the king and clergy. Edward goes over to the continent to recover Guienne, which had been taken from him by Philip king of France. The two kings come to an accommodation, and Edward marries the ſiſter of Philip. Inſurrection in Scotland. Battle of Falkirk, and reduction of the Scots. Robert Bruce claims the ſovereignty of Scotland, and is crowned king. Edward ſends a body of forces againſt him, under the command of the earl of Pembroke, who obtains a complete victory, and Bruce is obliged to ſave himſelf by flight. The king marches with an army into Scotland, takes lady Mary Bruce, ſiſter to the fugitive king, priſoner, whom he orders to be ſhut up in a wooden cage, and publicly expoſed on the walls of Roxburgh caſtle. Bruce again takes up arms, and defeats the Engliſh forces commanded by the earl of Pembroke. Death and character of Edward.

A. D. 1272. ON the death of Henry III. the crown of England devolved on his elder ſon Edward, who, at the time of his father's demiſe, was diſplaying his natural courage and military proweſs in the fields of Paleſtine. The abſence of Edward at ſo critical a time might have been productive of diſagreeable conſequences had not the general eſteem due to his uncommon merits in ſome degree ſupplied the place of his preſence. Immediately after the deceaſe of Henry the council of ſtate proclaimed him king, and the nobility and principal people of the kingdom ſwore fealty to his perſon and government.

While Edward was in Paleſtine he obtained ſeveral ſignal victories over the Saracens; but finding his forces too few in number to make a complete conqueſt over ſuch numerous armies, he liſtened to offers of peace made by the ſultan of Babylon, with whom he concluded a truce for ten years, ten months, and ten days. Having ſigned this treaty, he embarked his forces, and paſſed over to Sicily, where he received advice of the death of his father, and ſoon after that of his eldeſt ſon, who died at Acre in Paleſtine. Edward expreſſed much leſs grief for the loſs of the latter than the former; upon which the king of Sicily appearing aſtoniſhed, he told him "the loſs of a ſon might be repaired, but that of a father was irreparable."

A. D. 1273. After ſtaying a ſhort time at the Sicilian court, Edward took his leave, and ſet out for England. In his way he paſſed through Chalons, where he was invited, by the prince of that province to a tournament. Edward, who was ever ambitious of glory, and happy in having the opportunity of ſignalizing his courage and addreſs in arms, readily accepted the invitation: but the honour he acquired excited envy, and what was intended only to give proof of military ſkill, had like to have been productive of the moſt fatal conſequences. The French knights, finding themſelves foiled in every attempt, made a furious attack upon the Engliſh: but fortune ſtill favoured Edward: the French were repulſed and the Engliſh obtained the palm of victory. This, however, was not determined without a conſiderable effuſion of blood, from whence ſome hiſtorians have called it "The petty Battle of Chalons."

As Edward was ſufficiently ſatisfied in his mind that the peace of England was firmly eſtabliſhed, he reſolved, before his departure from the continent, to ſettle his affairs in that quarter in ſuch a manner as to prevent being diſturbed when he ſhould take upon him the government of his Engliſh dominions. To effect this he repaired to the court of France, and was received by Philip with every mark of politeneſs and reſpect; after which he did homage to that prince for the territories he poſſeſſed in France. From Paris Edward repaired to Guienne, and put an end to the troubles which had, for ſome time, diſturbed the peace of that province. He continued much longer here than he intended, in compliance with the earneſt requeſt of pope Gregory IX. who, having ſummoned a general council to meet at Lyons, was apprehenſive that Edward's return to England might prevent the attendance of many of the biſhops of that kingdom.

A. D. 1274. Edward, having ſettled his affairs on the continent, embarked for England, and landed at Dover on the 2d of Auguſt, from whence he proceeded to London, amidſt the univerſal acclamations of the people. On the 19th of the ſame month he was crowned at Weſtminſter by Robert, archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the preſence of Alexander III. king of Scotland, the duke of Britany, and all the principal nobility of the kingdom.

Being thus fully eſtabliſhed on the throne, Edward directed his attention to the purſuit of thoſe meaſures which were moſt likely to produce honour to himſelf as a king, and happineſs to his people as ſubjects. He made the great charter the rule rule of his conduct, and obliged the barons to obſerve it with regard to their vaſſals. The licentiouſneſs of the nobles had long been the ſource of various calamities, both with reſpect to the crown and people. Edward, therefore, took care to curtail their power, and, without invading their real privileges, made them obedient to the laws of their country.

A. D. 1275. The kingdom had, for ſome time, been greatly infeſted with robbers, who defied the power of the civil magiſtrates. To remedy this evil, Edward appointed commiſſioners to make regular circuits through different parts of the kingdom, in order to take cognizance of crimes, and puniſh offenders. But theſe itinerant diſpenſers of juſtice executed their commiſſion with the moſt unjuſtifiable ſeverity, making no proper diſtinction between the innocent and the guilty. This ſpread an univerſal terror among the people, which being made known to the king he immediately recalled the commiſſioners, chaſtiſed them for their conduct, and diſmiſſed them from their employment.

A. D. 1276. The firſt military expedition in which Edward engaged after his acceſſion to the throne was againſt Llewellyn, prince of Wales, who had been cloſely connected with the Montfort family, and now refuſed to repair to the court of Edward, and do him homage. This ſo exaſperated Edward that he determined, at all events to reduce his haughty vaſſal to obedience. Llewellyn was no ſtranger to the great power and abilities of Edward, and therefore thought it adviſeable, in order to ſtrengthen himſelf, to form a binding alliance with the remains of the Montfort family. He accordingly demanded Eleanor, daughter to the late earl of Leiceſter (who was at the court of France) in marriage. Philip readily complied with his requeſt, and Eleanor embarked for Wales, under the care of her brother Aumeri; but the veſſel being taken at ſea, the betrothed princeſs was ſent to the court of Edward, where ſhe was detained as a priſoner of ſtate; and her brother committed to Corf-Caſtle. Deputies ſoon after arrived from Llewellyn, offering to ranſom the princeſs, whom he aſſerted to be detained againſt the law of nations. But Edward refuſed to ſet Eleanor at liberty, unleſs Llewellyn would engage to make good the devaſtations that had been committed on the borders of England, and reſtore all the caſtles he had taken during the wars in the late reign. Llewellyn refuſed the conditions, in conſequence of which both parties made preparations for determining the diſpute by the ſword.

Early in the ſpring of the enſuing year Edward marched at the head of his army into Wales; and Llewellyn, perceiving it would be madneſs to meet the Engliſh in the open field, retreated to his woods and inacceſſable mountains, in order to harraſs the Engliſh troops. But Edward was not to be ſurprized: he cut a capacious road for his forces through a track of woods extending from the marches on the borders of Cheſhire to Caernarvonſhire, by which means his forces penetrated with eaſe into the heart of the country. Llewellyn retreated to Snowden, the uſual place of refuge when attacked by the Engliſh: but their faſtneſſes now were of very little conſequence. Edward ſeized all the paſſes, and prevented any proviſions from being carried to Llewellyn's army. Famine ſoon reduced the Welch prince to ſue for peace, and a treaty was concluded at Aberconway, on the following conditions; "That Llewellyn ſhould pay fifty thouſand pounds ſterling, as a ſatisfaction for damages; that he ſhould quit for ever a track of land containing the whole country between Cheſter and the river Conway; and that he ſhould repair to the court of Edward and perform his homage." Edward, however, thought proper to remit the payment of the fifty thouſand pounds, and brought Llewellyn with him to London, where he did homage and ſwore fealty in the preſence of a great number of the prelates and nobility of England. The ceremony being over, Edward delivered up Eleanor, and the ceremony of the nuptials between that lady and the Welſh prince was celebrated with great magnificence, in the preſence of Edward, and many of the principal nobility of the kingdom.

A. D. 1278. This year there happened a circumſtance which ſhewed the ſeverity of Edwards's diſpoſition, and at the ſame time diſplayed the common prejudices of the times. Among other diſorders that had, for ſome time, prevailed in the kingdom, no one was more univerſally complained of than the adulteration of the coin, which had produced ſuch injurious effects, that foreign commerce was almoſt ruined. The Jews were ſuſpected of being the authors of this deſtructive practice, and little proof was neceſſary to convict them of the offence. Edward himſelf was ſtrongly prepoſſed againſt thoſe people, and, with an ill-judged zeal for chriſtianity (naturally augmented by an expedition to Paleſtine) determined to puniſh them with the utmoſt ſeverity. Accordingly, no leſs than 280 Jews were hanged in one day at London, beſides great numbers, who ſuffered in different parts of the kingdom. Many of the moſt wealthy were ruined by the confiſcation of their houſes and property; and though Edward ordered one half of the money which was raiſed in this cruel manner to be ſet apart for thoſe who would renounce their religion, very few accepted the offer: they could not think of embracing a religion, which they conſidered as the ſource of thoſe barbarities that had been exerciſed on them by its profeſſors.

No material circumſtances occurred from this period till the year 1281, when freſh diſturbances took place between Llewellyn, prince of Wales, and the king. The former ſtrictly obſerved the conditions made in the late treaty with the Engliſh monarch, but the officers of Edward had committed ſo many acts of violence and oppreſſion on the Welſh, that they applied to their prince for protection. Llewellyn made repeated remonſtrances to Edward; but without effect. In conſequence of this the Welſh, exaſperated at ſuch unjuſt treatment, determined either to obtain relief by force of arms, or periſh in the glorious attempt.

David, brother to Llewellyn, had long ſerved the crown of England with the utmoſt fidelity; but being juſtly exaſperated at the oppreſſions of his countrymen, joined his brother, offering to head the army, and venture his life in defence of thoſe liberties of which they had been ſo unjuſtly deprived by the tyrannical Engliſh. This offer was joyfully accepted, and the two brothers ſoon found themſelves at the head of a conſiderable army; the iſſue of which was that they made themſelves maſters of ſeveral ſtrong caſtles, and ſeverely retaliated that ſeverity on the Engliſh which had been ſo cruelly exerciſed on their countrymen.

As ſoon as Edward was informed of theſe proceedings he determined to march into Wales, at the head of a powerful army, and lay the whole country waſte with fire and ſword. In the mean time the archbiſhop of Canterbury, deſirous of preventing the effuſion of human blood, exerted all his intereſt to bring about an accommodation, and made ſeveral equitable propoſals at the requeſt of Llewellyn and his brother, for ſheathing the ſword of deſtruction, and preventing the horrid devaſtation that muſt enſue, if the bloody ſtandard of war ſhould be carried into the country of thoſe diſtreſſed and injured people. But all his labours were in vain. Edward was determined to put a final period to the government of Wales, and exterminate all the remains of its ancient independence.

A. D. 1282. This reſolution being taken, Edward, in the beginning of the ſpring, marched into Wales at the head of his forces, which he had no ſooner entered than Llewellyn and his brother retired to their faſtneſſes in Snowden, where they waited for the opportunity of falling on the Engliſh when embarraſſed among the woods. But this ſcheme inſtead of anſwering their expectations turned out to their diſadvantage; for Edward, who had learned experience from his former expedition, ſecured all the avenues through which it was poſſible for them to eſcape, and threw a bridge of boats over the river Menay, oppoſite to Bangor. Before the work was entirely compleated three hundred men at arms, under the command of lord Latimer and Lucas de Thany, a Gaſcon, paſſed the river to amuſe the enemy, while the main body of the army croſſed the bridge. The Welſh, who were well acquainted with the nature of the river, and knew the water would ſoon ſwell and cut off their retreat, did not for ſome time offer to moleſt the Engliſh in their paſſage; but when about fifteen hundred were landed, they ruſhed down from the mountains with the moſt horrid ſhrieks, and fell upon the Engliſh with ſuch fury and reſolution, that they were immediately routed, and the greater part put to the ſword. Fluſhed with ſucceſs at this conqueſt, the Welſh began to think themſelves invincible, more eſpecially as they had been told by their bards that the period was arrived for the accompliſhment of the prophecy of the great Merlin, who had foretold, that one of the race of Llewellyn ſhould ride through the ſtreets of London with a crown on his head. But this ridiculous notion (though well adapted to the ignorance and ſuperſtition of the times) proved deſtructive to the Welſh.

The Welſh now divided themſelves into two bodies, one of which was to continue in Snowden under the direction of David, while the other, under Llewellyn, was to march againſt the main body of the Engliſh. This reſolution being taken, the prince advanced into Radnorſhire; but being unexpectedly met by a detachment of the Engliſh, his army was totally defeated, and himſelf killed by the hand of one Adam de Frampton, who cut off his head, and carried it to Edward, then encamped at Conway.* Thus fell the famous Llewellyn, a prince deſcended from one of the moſt antient royal families in Europe, and with him expired the ſmall remains of Welſh independence.

The Welſh were no ſooner informed that their prince was dead than a general conſternation prevailed throughout the whole army. They made no farther efforts to ſupport the falling ſtate of their country, the greater part throwing down their arms, and ſubmitting themſelves to the Engliſh. David retired to the woods and faſtneſſes of the mountains, where he continued ſome time in the greateſt diſtreſs; but was at laſt ſeized by his own countrymen in one of his retreats, and conveyed a priſoner to Edward, who ordered him to be ſent in chains to Shrewſbury. The captivity of David put an end to all oppoſition: the Welſh nobility immediately delivered up their caſtles, and the whole country ſubmitted to the conqueror.

A. D. 1283. Edward now ſummoned a parliament to meet at Shrewſbury, in order to determine the fate of the captive David. The iſſue of this trial was, that the unfortunate prince, inſtead of being conſidered as the defender of the liberties of his country, was condemned as a traitor to be hanged and quartered; a ſentence which was executed with many circumſtances of diſtinguiſhed cruelty.

But the death of David was not the only act of cruelty that took place at this time: the bards, or Welſh poets, were alſo devoted to deſtruction. Edward well knew that nothing had a more powerful influence to keep alive the ideas of military valour, and antient glory among the people than the traditional poetry of the bards, more eſpecially when aſſiſted by the power of muſic, and jollity of feſtivals. He therefore got together all the Welſh poets, and, from a policy equally cruel and unjuſt, ordered them all to be put to death.

After taking theſe unjuſtifiable meaſures, Edward, in order farther to ſecure his new conqueſt, built two caſtles, one at Aberconway, and another at Caernarvon; and having ſettled the civil government of Wales, it was ever after annexed to the crown of England.

A. D. 1284. In the beginning of this year queen Eleanor was delivered of a prince at Caernarvon (afterwards Edward II.) on whom the king immediately beſtowed the inveſtiture of that principality; and ſince which time the principality of Wales has given title to the eldeſt ſons of the kings of England.

Having ſettled all affairs to his ſatisfaction in Wales, Edward, about the middle of December, went to Briſtol, where he kept his Chriſtmas, and held a parliament. He ſtaid in that city till the middle of February following, when he repaired to London, from whence he had now been abſent near three years.

A. D. 1285. Edward now directed his attention towards removing many abuſes which had been practiſed in London during his abſence. George Brockſley the then mayor, was turned out of his office for having taken bribes from the bakers, to connive at their ſelling bread ſhort of weight: beſides which he took away the charter of the city, and put in another mayor by his own authority. At the ſame time licence was given to merchant-ſtrangers to rent houſes and keep ſhops; whereas before they were only importers of goods, and the Engliſh with whom they lodged, acted as brokers to ſell the goods for them.

A. D.

* Edward immediately ſent the head of Llewellyn to London, where it was conveyed through the ſtreets upon the point of a lance in a cart, crowned with a ſilver circle, in contempt of Merlin's prophecy. It was afterwards placed on a pillory in Cheapſide, from whence it was conveyed to the Tower of London, crowned by way of deriſion, with a wreath of ivy, and, by order of the king, fixed on the point of a high ſtaff erected for the purpoſe on the top of that fortreſs.

A. D. 1286. These abuses being removed, and tranquillity firmly established throughout the kingdom, Edward passed over to the continent, in order to mediate a peace between Alphonso, king of Arragon, and Philip the Fair, who had lately succeeded his father, Philip the Hardy, in the crown of France. He continued there near three years; and during the greater part of the time was employed in this intricate negotiation, which was at last happily terminated by the labours of the English monarch, whose power was dreaded, and whose abilities were revered in most parts of Europe.

A D. 1290. While Edward was on the continent great disorders had taken place in England, owing to the mal-practices of the judges. In consequence of this the king, on his return, determined to examine very strictly into their conduct, and, for that purpose, summoned a parliament to meet at London. Before this assembly the judges were tried, when only two (viz. John de Martingham and Elias de Bokingham, both clergymen) were found innocent. The proofs brought against the rest were so clear that they made no defence, in consequence of which they were all removed from their office, and heavily fined.

Among other acts passed during the sitting of this parliament, was one for banishing all the Jews, who had rendered themselves odious to the nation by their usury and extortion. They were ordered to depart the kingdom before the first of November on pain of death, and all their wealth, except such sums as were necessary to defray the expence of their voyage, confiscated to the king's use. But many were not suffered to escape even with so small a pittance of their fortune; some being murdered by the seamen in their passage; while others, after being plundered of what little they possessed, were inhumanely left destitute on some inhospitable shore.

This year Edward sustained a considerable loss in the death of his beloved queen Eleanor, the fond partner in all his dangers and distress in Palestine. She paid the debt of nature at Holmsby in Lincolnshire, on the 29th of November, leaving the king overwhelmed with the most poignant grief. Her remains were carried to Westminster, and interred in the abbey with great funeral pomp; and at every place where her body rested in the way to London (and where solemn dirges were sung for the repose of her soul) Edward caused grand crosses, on which her arms were engraven, to be erected to her memory. The most perfect of these now remaining is that at Waltham, which though greatly injured by time, is exceeding noble, and gives a sufficient idea of the taste of architecture at the time it was erected.

Soon after the death of Queen Eleanor, an event happened which attracted the attention of the whole kingdom, and was productive of circumstances that particularly distinguished the remainder of Edward's reign. Alexander III. king of Scotland, had been unfortunately killed by a fall from his horse in the year 1286, leaving no male issue. Margaret, daughter to Eric king of Norway, and grand-daughter to Alexander, was the only lineal descendant from the royal family of Scotland. This princess, then an infant, and known by the name of The Maid of Norway, was recognized successor by the states of Scotland. Edward, who was great-uncle to the Norwegian princess, now flattered himself that an opportunity offered for uniting the two kingdoms; and accordingly proposed a marriage between his son, the prince of Wales, and the Maid of Norway. The friendship which had for some time prevailed between the two nations greatly facilitated this project, so favourable to the grandeur and welfare of both kingdoms. The estates of Scotland were pleased with the offers of Edward, and the marriage articles were drawn up, agreed to, and ratified. In consequence of this the bishop of Durham was appointed queen's lieutenant in Scotland, and two of the Scottish commissioners (the earl of Warrenne and the dean of York) embarked for Norway, to settle every thing relative to the marriage: but in their return with the young princess, they were unfortunately overtaken by a storm, and driven into one of the Orkney Islands, where she died in the month of October, A. D. 1290. Thus were all the hopes formed on this coalition suddenly destroyed, and Scotland involved in all those calamities that consequently attend a disputed succession.

A. D. 1291. The principal competitors for the Scottish crown were Robert Bruce and John Baliol, both descended in the female line from the brother of that William who had been taken prisoner by Henry II. The Scots were, at this time, little qualified to discuss the claims of these two competitors; in consequence of which the Scottish parliament resolved to refer the dispute to the king of England, who had already shewn himself an able and impartial arbitrator in several contentions between different princes of Europe, and who was sufficiently powerful to compel the unsuccessful claimant to submit to his decision.

Edward was highly pleased at being appointed arbitrator to the dispute between the two contending parties for the crown of Scotland, as it furnished him with an opportunity of attempting to effect a project he had long formed, namely, of establishing a right of superiority over that kingdom. He sought with the utmost diligence for proofs of his intended claim in all the antient histories; but the only circumstance that was substantial, and which had the least appearance of plausibility, was the homage paid by William to Henry II. though Richard I. had renounced his homage.

Furnished with this proof, Edward advanced to Norham, a town on the northern banks of the Tweed, at the head of a powerful army to give weight to the unexpected claim he intended to make. On his arrival, he invited the parliament of Scotland, and the competitors for the crown, to his camp; where the chief justiciary told the assembly, "that the king had taken the greatest "pain to collect proofs from all the antient re- "cords and chronicles, to determine this impor- "tant truth, namely, that the kings of Scotland "had been dependent on the English monarchs "from time immemorial, and had accordingly "done them homage, except when they had ta- "ken advantage of the intestine commotions of "the nation, or the reign of some weak prince, to "withdraw their allegiance. The king was there- "fore intitled to decide this dispute, not in virtue "of the reference made to him, but in the quali- "ty of liege lord of the kingdom."

The whole assembly were astonished at this unexpected declaration: but it was in vain to make any resistance. They therefore begged to have some time allowed them to give in their answer, as many of the prelates and nobility of Scotland were absent, whose advice was necessary in a point of such importance. Edward consented to indulge them with three weeks for this purpose; and issued ſafe conducts for all the nobility of Scotland to repair to Norham on the day appointed for giving in their anſwer. No objection being made by the barons to Edward's claim, the king addreſſed himſelf to the two competitors, requiring their acknowledgment of his ſuperiority. Bruce was the firſt to acknowledge it; while Baliol, afraid of giving offence to the Scottiſh nation, conſented with ſome reluctance.

Edward, having thus far obtained his ends, demanded that the principal caſtles in Scotland ſhould be immediately put into his poſſeſſion; telling them it would be in vain for him to pronounce any determination between the contending parties for the crown, without having it in his power to enforce it. This demand was complied with; and Edward after naming commiſſioners to enquire into the claims of the competitors, and promiſing to make his deciſion the enſuing year, returned to England.

A. D. 1292. The moſt celebrated lawyers and learned men in Europe were now conſulted on the important queſtion relative to the perſon who ſhould ſucceed to the Scottiſh throne. After long debates and ſeveral adjournments, they unanimouſly gave their anſwer in favour of Baliol; in conſequence of which Edward pronounced him the proper claimant to the Scottiſh throne, and he was immediately put in put in poſſeſſion of that kingdom. All the Engliſh garriſons were withdrawn, and Baliol did homage and ſwore fealty to Edward at Norham. After this Baliol ſet out to take poſſeſſion of his new dignity, and, in the middle of December was crowned at Scone with the uſual formalities, and all the nobility of Scotland ſwore allegiance to him. After the ceremony was over Baliol went to Newcaſtle upon Tyne, where he repeated his homage to Edward as ſuperior lord of his kingdom.

A. D. 1294. In this year an event happened which fully convinced the Scots of that ſtate of vaſſalage into which they had fallen by the policy and artifices of the Engliſh monarch. A burgher of Berwick, complaining of an injury he had received from ſome Engliſh commiſſioners ſent into Scotland, Edward ordered the cauſe to be tried in England by his judges. The council of Scotland, conſidering this order as a breach of promiſe in Edward, who had aſſured them that any offences committed in their kingdom ſhould be cognizable only to their own courts, ſent a remonſtrance to the Engliſh monarch. But, inſtead of receiving that ſatisfaction they expected, Edward told them, "the "cauſe ſhould be tried in England, as it did not "belong to vaſſals to puniſh thoſe who repreſented "the perſon of their ſovereign."

This authoritative and peremptory anſwer was exceeding diſagreeable to the Scots; but they were much more mortified at the indignity ſoon after ſhewn to their new king, who was obliged to appear perſonally before Edward, in his court at Weſtminſter, to anſwer a complaint exhibited againſt him by the earl of Fife, for ſeizing certain eſtates with which he had been inveſted by Edward's particular order. At this trial Baliol was obliged to relinquiſhed the ſeat of honour before filled by the kings of Scotland in the Engliſh courts, and to plead his own cauſe at the bar as a common defendant. This compulſive ſubmiſſion was highly diſagreeable to Baliol, who, notwithſtanding his natural ſupineneſs of his temper, determined, if poſſible, to ſhake off ſo ignominious a dependence. He therefore left the court of London without taking leave, after which Edward ſeized all the eſtates he poſſeſſed in England.

A. D. 1295. The deſigns of Edward in treating Baliol with ſuch indignity, was to engage him in rebellion, that he might have a pretence for making an entire conqueſt of Scotland. Nor was it long before an opportunity offered for accompliſhing his wiſhes. Baliol, irritated at the treatment he had received from Edward, ſecretly concluded a treaty of alliance with Philip the Fair, then king of France, which being made known to Edward, he ſummoned Baliol to perform the duty of a vaſſal, and cited him to appear before the Engliſh parliament. But Baliol refuſed the citation, and having procured a diſpenſation from his oath of fealty, he renounced his homage and bid defiance to the Engliſh monarch.

Exaſperated at the conduct of Baliol, Edward immediately raiſed an army of 30,000 foot, and 4000 horſe, at the head of whom he marched to the northward, in order to chaſtiſe the Scottiſh monarch for his diſobedience and preſumption. The Scots army was more numerous than the Engliſh, being compoſed of 40,000 infantry, and 500 horſe; but they wanted both diſcipline and experience, and, what was ſtill of more conſequence, diſſentions prevailed among the leaders. From theſe alarming appearances ſeveral of the Scottiſh nobility (among whom were Robert Bruce and his ſon, the earls of Marche and Angus) prognoſticated the ruin of their country, and made their ſubmiſſion to Edward.

The Engliſh army paſſed the Tweed at Coldſteam without oppoſition: ſoon after which Berwick was taken by aſſault, and about ſeven thouſand of the garriſon put to the ſword. The earl of Warrenne was then diſpatched at the head of 10,000 men, to beſiege the caſtle of Dunbar, defended by the flower of the Scottiſh army. Baliol, knowing the importance of this fortreſs, determined to venture a battle for its relief; and Warrenne, being informed of his intention, marched to meet him. The Scots, being badly armed and diſciplined, could not ſupport the furious charge of the Engliſh: they were, in a ſhort time, routed with great ſlaughter, no leſs than 20,000 being left dead on the field of battle. The next day the caſtle ſurrendered to Edward, who then joined his army, and purſued his conqueſts without any farther oppoſition from Baliol's forces. The caſtles of Roxburgh, Edinburgh, and Sterling ſubmitted after a feeble reſiſtance; and all the ſouthern parts of the kingdom were ſoon ſubdued by the Engliſh.

The puſillanimous Baliol, finding himſelf unable to reſiſt the great power of Edward, reſolved to make his ſubmiſſion. He accordingly appeared before the king at Brechin (a town about 40 miles from Edinburgh) mounted on a very ſorry ſteed, holding a white rod in his left hand, and his ſword in the right, the latter of which he preſented, in the moſt humiliating manner, to the Engliſh monarch. The next day (July 10, A. D. 1296) his ſubmiſſion was drawn up in form, as alſo an inſtrument, by which he reſigned his kingdom to Edward, to be diſpoſed of according to his pleaſure; and which inſtrument was not only ſigned by himſelf, but alſo the principal barons of Scotland.

After making this mean ſubmiſſion, and formally reſigning his crown into the hands of the conqueror, Baliol was ſent priſoner to the tower of London, and two years after ſubmitted to a voluntary baniſh-baniſhment to France, where, without making any attempts for the recovery of his throne, he died in a private ſtation.

Having thus ſubdued Scotland, Edward, in order to ſecure his acquiſition, ordered the ſtates to aſſemble at Berwick, where the principal noblemen and governors of caſtles ſwore fealty to him, and delivered up all their fortreſſes into his hands. The great ſeal of Scotland was now broken, and another, with the Engliſh arms, made in its ſtead, which was delivered to the care of Walter de Agmondeſham. At the ſame time the king appointed Hugh de Creſſingham treaſurer, W. de Ormeſby juſticiary, and John, earl of Warrenne, guardian of the Scottiſh realm: and that he might not leave theſe vanquiſhed people the leaſt particle of the liberty they had hitherto enjoyed, Edward ordered the crown and ſceptre of Scotland, with all the reſt of the regalia, to be carried to England; as alſo the famous marble ſtone, on which the kings of Scotland had, for many ages, been ſeated, when they received inauguration.*

Having adjuſted all affairs to his ſatisfaction in Scotland, Edward returned with his army to London; and ſoon after ſummoned a parliament from whom he requeſted a ſupply for enabling him to wreſt Guienne out of the hands of Philip of France, who had perfidiouſly made himſelf maſter of that province. The barons and burgeſſes very readily complied with his requeſt, but he met with a ſtrong oppoſition from the clergy. The archbiſhop of Canterbury had procured a bull from pope Boniface VIII. (who had lately ſucceeded Celeſtine in the papal chair) prohibiting the princes of Chriſtendom, under the penalty of excommunication, from levying, without his conſent, any tax on the clergy; and reſtraining, under the ſame penalty, all eccleſiaſtics from ſubmitting to ſuch impoſitions.

Being unacquainted with the meaſures taken by the archbiſhop, Edward was aſtoniſhed at the clergy refuſing their aſſiſtance towards the ſupply, but his aſtoniſhment was greatly increaſed on their publiſhing the pope's bull as a reaſon for their conduct. Edward, however, not chuſing to purſue haſty and raſh meaſures, adjourned the parliament to the 14th of January, hoping that a little reflection would render the clergy more conformable to his demands.

A. D. 1297. The parliament re-aſſembled on the day appointed, and the archbiſhop of Canterbury, with the moſt dignified eccleſiaſtics of the kingdom, attended. Edward renewed his demand, but inſtead of his requeſt being complied with, the archbiſhop, in the name of the whole body, told him, "That the clergy owed obedience to two ſovereigns, namely, their ſpiritual and temporal; but their duty bound them to a much ſtricter attachment to the former than the latter." Irritated at this ſpeech, Edward told them, "that as they refuſed to aſſiſt the civil power, it was unreaſonable for them to expect any protection from the laws;" and with this anſwer they were diſmiſſed.

Edward now reſolved ſeverely to puniſh the clergy for their refractorineſs and diſobedience. He accordingly iſſued out orders to all his judges, to receive no cauſe brought before them by any eccleſiaſtic; but to hear and decide all cauſes in which they were defendants. He likewiſe locked up all their granaries and barns, and prohibited any rents being paid them by their tenants.

Theſe proceedings greatly alarmed the clergy in general, ſeveral of whom complied with the king's requeſt, and received the royal protection; but the archbiſhop of Canterbury grew more obſtinate from perſecution. He ordered the pope's bull to be publiſhed in all the churches of his dioceſe, and convened a ſynod of his ſuffragans at St. Paul's cathedral. But Edward, aware of his deſign, iſſued out a writ, prohibiting him, under pain of impriſonment, from denouncing any eccleſiaſtical cenſure either againſt himſelf, his miniſters, or his ſubjects.

The violent proceedings of the king produced the moſt fatal conſequences to the clergy. Their houſes and convents might, indeed, have afforded them ſafe retreats, but they were in want of ſubſiſtence; and whenever they ventured abroad, were robbed and abuſed by every ruffian. The people, who had hitherto beheld them with a kind of religious awe, now looked upon them with contempt, and laughed at their ſufferings. The archbiſhop himſelf was robbed of his equipage and furniture, and at laſt reduced to board himſelf with a ſingle ſervant, in the houſe of a poor clergyman. This ſituation was not to be endured: experience convinced them, that a deprivation of the advantages of citizens was the greateſt calamity; and they accordingly became ſolicitous to ſatisfy both the king and the ſtate. But in order to avoid an open diſobedience to the poſitive injunctions of Boniface, inſtead of granting the king a fifth of their moveables, they agreed to depoſit an equivalent ſum of money in ſome church or convent; from whence he might draw it at his own diſcretion.

Thus was this violent conteſt between the king and his clergy happily terminated. But the ſupplies obtained were far from ſufficient to anſwer the deſigns formed by Edward of taking ample vengeance on Philip for his perfidy; in conſequence of which (ſo bent was he to execute his deſign) that he had recourſe to meaſures very oppreſſive to his people. He impoſed a tax of 40s. on every ſack of wool exported; ſeized cattle and other commodities for the ſupply of his army; and required the attendance of every proprietor of land poſſeſſed of twenty pounds a year, even though he was not a tenant of the crown.

Theſe unjuſtifiable proceedings occaſioned a general murmur throughout the kingdom, and was injurious to the intended expedition of Edward. The forces he had raiſed were now aſſembled on the ſea coaſt ready for embarkation, under the command of Humphrey, earl of Hereford, the conſtable, and Roger Bigod, earl of Norfolk, the mareſchal of England. Theſe two noblemen (who had countenanced the complaints of the people) now

* The Scots paid the higheſt veneration to this ſtone, which they conſidered as the true palladium of their power. They, therefore, conſidered the loſs of it as an indubitable proof of the utter extinction of their monarchy, agreeable to a Latin diſtich engraven on it, the tranſlation of which runs thus:

Or fate's deceiv'd, and Heav'n decrees in vain,
Or where they find this ſtone, the Scots ſhall reign.

This ſtone, which was incloſed in a wooden chair, had been placed at Scone by Kenneth II. as a monument of the victory which he obtained over the Picts near the monaſtery of that place. It was firſt brought out of Spain into Ireland by Simon Breccus; from Ireland into Argyle, and from thence to Scone, from which place Edward cauſed it to be conveyed to Weſtminſter, where it ſtill remains.

now took the opportunity of ſhewing their reſentment at the arbitrary meaſures purſued by the king. They affirmed that their offices obliged them only to attend his perſon in the wars, and therefore refuſed to lead the army he had directed. A violent altercation enſued; and the king, turning himſelf to the conſtable, exclaimed, "By God, Sir earl, you ſhall either go, or hang." "By God, Sir king," replied the conſtable, "I will neither go nor hang." Having ſaid this he immediately left the army, together with the mareſchal, and about thirty others of the moſt principal barons.

The conduct of theſe noblemen convinced Edward of the improper meaſures he had purſued for obtaining his ends; in conſequence of which he endeavoured, by purſuing conciliative methods, to regain the affections of his people. He careſſed his nobility, reconciled himſelf to the clergy, and made a public apology for his conduct, which he told them had ariſen from the urgent neceſſities of the ſtate.

But the barons, in general, were far from being ſatisfied with this condeſcenſion in the king, who had no ſooner landed on the continent with his forces, than the conſtable and mareſchal ſent meſſengers to him, inſiſting on an authentic confirmation both of the Great Charter, and the charter of Foreſts. Edward was very deſirous of putting it off till his return; but the parliament (which had been aſſembled at London by his order) joining with the two earls, and the charters being ſent over, he confirmed them in the preſence of all the prelates and nobility that accompanied him in his expedition.

A. D. 1298. The earl of Flanders had joined in league with Edward againſt Philip; but he woefully experienced the power and reſentment of that monarch, who had already taken Liſle, St. Omer's, Courtray and Ypres, and many more of the principal places in his dominions were threatened with the ſame fate. But the arrival of Edward, at the head of a powerful army put a ſtop to the farther conqueſts of Philip. Inſtead of attempting to come to action, the two kings concluded a truce for two years; and agreed to ſubmit their differences to the arbitration of pope Boniface. The ſentence given by the pontiff was entirely in favour of Edward and his ally, as he not only commanded a reſtitution of Guienne, but alſo the places which had been taken from the earl of Flanders. Philip (who had formed an alliance with Baliol previous to his being defeated by the Engliſh monarch) was deſirous of including him and the Scots in the treaty; but this was abſolutely refuſed by Edward. At length the two monarchs adjuſted their differences by abandoning their reſpective allies, Edward detaching himſelf from the earl of Flanders, and Philip from the Scots. The ſentence of Boniface was, however, regarded, and the treaty cemented by contracts of a double marriage; that of Edward himſelf with Margaret, the ſiſter of Philip; and that of the prince of Wales with Iſabella, the daughter of that monarch.

During theſe tranſactions on the continent the Scots made an attempt to recover their antient liberties, to which they were induced by the ſevere treatment of thoſe whom Edward had appointed to the government of that kingdom. Warrenne, earl of Surry (to whom the chief authority had been delegated) was, indeed, a man of prudence, virtue, and abilities; but his ill ſtate of health obliged him to return to England. At his departure, the reins of government were intruſted to William de Ormeſby, chief juſticiary, and Creſſingham, the treaſurer. The former was diſtinguiſhed by the rigour and ſeverity of his temper, and the latter by his avarice. Inſtead, therefore, of making uſe of moderate and lenient meaſures, they treated the Scots as a conquered people, and made them feelingly ſenſible of the ſervitude into which they were fallen. This exaſperated the whole nation, and they determined either to ſhake off the yoke or periſh in the attempt.

The Scots were encouraged in their deſign by one William Wallace, a perſon of good fortune, and deſcended from a noble family, who, ſeeing the diſtreſſes of his countrymen, engaged to undertake the recovery of their liberty, or periſh in the attempt. He was of a gigantic ſtature, had prodigious ſtrength, and was poſſeſſed both of courage and diſintereſted magnanimity. This hero had retired to the woods to avoid the vengeance of the government, and put himſelf at the head of a ſmall body of men, who, like himſelf, had fled from the tyranny of the Engliſh. With theſe partizans (who had equal courage with himſelf) he planned his enterprizes with ſo much prudence, that he was always ſucceſsful, and the fame of his exploits ſoon increaſed the number of his followers.

Wallace now determined to make an attack upon the governors, and accordingly advanced, at the head of his followers, towards Scone, where they then reſided. But Ormeſby and Creſſingham, being informed of their deſigns, and dreading the conſequences, fled to England, and were followed by all the principal officers who had been appointed as aſſiſtants in the government of Scotland.

The departure of the Engliſh governors greatly elated the Scots, who immediately flew to arms, and repaired in prodigious numbers to the ſtandard of Wallace; and ſome of the principal barons (among whom was Sir William Douglas) openly countenanced his party.

Theſe proceedings greatly alarmed the earl of Surry, who, at the head of a conſiderable army, marched againſt the Scottiſh forces, and came up with them at Irvine, before they were ſufficiently formed. On the appearance of the Engliſh, the Scottiſh nobility, thinking it would be in vain to oppoſe them, made their ſubmiſſion, and obtained a pardon. This, however, did not intimidate Wallace, who retired with his forces, and took poſt on a hill in the neighbourhood of Stirling. The earl of Surry continued his march, and diſcovered the enemy on the oppoſite bank of the Forth; but, at the ſame time, perceived the danger of attacking them in this advantageous ſituation, eſpecially as the bridge over the Forth was ſo narrow, as hardly to admit two men a-breaſt. Sir Richard Lundy, a Scotſman of birth and family, but a firm adherent to the Engliſh, deſired a party of five hundred horſe, and a proportional body of foot, might be put under his command; promiſing to paſs the river at a ford a few miles above, and to fall on the rear of the enemy, in order to divert their attention while the main body of the army paſſed the bridge. This prudent deſign was, however, rendered abortive by the impatience of Creſſingham, who being irritated both by perſonal and national animoſity againſt the Scots, urged the general to attack them immediately; exclaiming loudly againſt all delays, as expenſive, and diſhonourable to the king.

The earl of Surry conſidering theſe reflections as as cenſures upon his own conduct, ordered the army to paſs the bridge immediately. But he paid dearly for his raſhneſs. Wallace let as many of them paſs as he was confident he could conquer; and then attacked them with ſuch fury, that they were all cut to pieces or puſhed into the river, where they periſhed. Near five thouſand men fell in the action, and among the reſt Creſſingham himſelf, who being found among the ſlain, the Scots flayed his dead body, and made ſaddles and girths of his ſkin. The remainder of the Engliſh army were ſo diſpirited at the deſtruction of their countrymen, whom they could not aſſiſt, that the earl of Surry thought it adviſeable not to make any farther attemps againſt the enemy; and accordingly returned, with the remains of his army, to London.

Elated with this ſucceſs, the Scots flocked from all parts of the kingdom to join the ſtandard of Wallace, who was immediately declared regent of the kingdom, Baliol being then an exile in France. He immediately led his forces towards the borders of England, where he was ſure of finding ſubſiſtence, the diſorders of war, added to unfavourable ſeaſons, having occaſioned a famine in Scotland. The caſtles of Berwick and Roxburgh made but a feeble reſiſtance, and opened the Scots a free paſſage into Northumberland. Wallace firſt led his victorious troops againſt Carliſle; but not being able to take that city, he ravaged the country as far as Durham, and then returned loaded with ſpoils and honours.

During theſe tranſactions in the north Edward returned from the continent, and determined to puniſh the Scots for their diſobedience during his abſence. But as a neceſſary and prudent ſtep, previous to the carrying his deſign into execution, he thought it adviſeable, by conceſſions and promiſes, to gain the general affection of his ſubjects. For this purpoſe he aſſembled a parliament at York, and ordered the two charters, together with the additional ſtatutes in favour of public liberty, to be read and publiſhed for the ſatisfaction of the common people. This was accordingly performed with great formality; and the biſhop of Carliſle ſolemnly denounced the ſentence of excommunication againſt all violators of theſe charters. The king likewiſe returned to the citizens of London the privilege of chuſing their own chief magiſtrates, which had been taken from them in the latter part of the reign of the late king.

A. D. 1299. Edward ſoon found the good effects of theſe popular proceedings. The people flocked to his ſtandard from all quarters, and in a ſhort time he found himſelf at the head of an army abundantly ſufficient to repel the inſurgents, and reduce them to ſubjection. On the other hand, that union, which alone can render an army powerful, was wanting among the Scots, and diviſions and envy took place. The noblemen deſcended from the royal family of Scotland, inſtead of looking upon the patriotic virtues of Wallace with admiration, and joining in the ſervice of their country, threw the moſt ungenerous reflections upon his conduct, and even charged him with having formed a deſign of ſeizing the crown. Wallace ſaw the fatal conſequences that muſt attend theſe diviſions, and generouſly reſigned his authority, retaining only the command of a body of men who refuſed to follow any other leader. The liberty of his country, not a deſire of power, had called him from his retreat, and he willingly ſacrificed the latter to preſerve the former.

On the reſignation of Wallace, the command of the army was given to the ſteward of Scotland, and Cummin of Badenock, both eminent for their birth and fortune. Theſe two generals marched at the head of their forces to Falkirk, where they determined to wait the attack of the Engliſh. They drew up their army in three bodies, the front of which were compoſed of pikemen, and the intervals filled with archers. But, dreading the great ſuperiority of the Engliſh cavalry, they endeavoured to ſecure their front with paliſadoes tied together with ropes.

In the mean time Edward had marched, at the head of his forces, into the enemy's country, and coming within ſight of the Scottiſh army, determined to finiſh the war by one deciſive action. He accordingly divided his army into three bodies, conformable to that of the enemy, and led them to the charge. The attack was begun by the Engliſh archers, who poured a dreadful ſhower of arrows upon the enemy. The Scottiſh bowmen, unable to ſupport the fury of the Engliſh, were driven from the field of battle with great ſlaughter. The Engliſh archers purſued their advantage; and pouring in their arrows among the pikemen, threw them into diſorder, which was improved by the cavalry, and a general rout enſued, attended with the moſt dreadful carnage. Some hiſtorians tell us that no leſs than fifty or ſixty thouſand periſhed, while others have reduced the number to twenty thouſand. But however this be, it is certain the Scots never ſuffered a greater loſs, nor ever experienced a defeat more pregnant with deſtructive conſequences.

The only general among the Scots that kept his troops together was Wallace, who retiring behind the Carron, marched leiſurely along the banks of that ſmall river, which protected him from the enemy. Robert Bruce (who was with Edward) appeared on the oppoſite bank, and requeſted a ſhort conference. He began with reproaching Wallace for taking up arms againſt Edward, one of the moſt powerful princes, and the beſt general of the age: at the ſame time inſinuating, that Wallace himſelf had formed a deſign of ſeizing the crown. Wallace warmly diſclaimed every ambitious intention; declaring, that the miſeries of his country alone rouſed him to arms. Adding, that he had neither any right to expect, nor any inclination to ſeize the ſcepter of Scotland. "To you," added he, "your country owes her afflictions. You left her overwhelmed with miſeries, and I undertook the cauſe you ſo baſely betrayed; a cauſe I mean to ſupport while I have ſtrength to weild a ſword; nor ſhall I envy you a life of eaſe and pleaſure in the court of a foreign tyrant. You may, my lord, have, indeed, a juſt title to the crown, and might wear it with honor to yourſelf, and advantage to your country; but you ſeem to prefer the chains of ſervitude to freedom, and the ſmiles of deſpotiſm to the calls of honor."

Struck with the noble ſentiments of Wallace, Bruce repented having joined Edward. He ſaw his own conduct in a very different point of view, and determined to ſeize the firſt opportunity of joining thoſe patriotic chiefs, who had ſo nobly ſupported the cauſe of their country. Bruce now returned to the Engliſh army, which was ſoon after diſbanded; and Wallace at the head of the poor remains of his forces, retired into the northern parts of the kingdom.

A. D. 1300. Unable to face the Engliſh, and deſirous, if poſſible, of ſupporting the liberties of of their country, the Scots implored in vain the protection of Philip, that monarch having, in the late treaty with Edward, abandoned them to the fury of the conqueror. Thus diſappointed they made application to pope Boniface, which produced a contention between his holineſs and Edward relative to the ſuperior right of ſovereignty over the Scottiſh dominions. This diſpute laſted two years, and the claims of each were attended with equal abſurdities. At length Edward ſummoned a parliament at Lincoln in order to give a final anſwer to his holineſs. After ſome debates a letter was written to the pope, in the name of the barons of England, in which it was obſerved, that the right of ſovereignty over Scotland had always been annexed to the crown of England, and that Scotland had never depended, with reſpect to temporals, on the ſee of Rome: that the parliament would never ſuffer the king to put his right in litigation, or ſend ambaſſadors to Rome on that ſubject, though himſelf might be diſpoſed to pay ſuch a compliment to his holineſs; and therefore they deſired he would deſiſt from all attempts to infringe on the prerogatives of the kingdom. This letter which was ſigned by no leſs than one hundred and five barons, had ſuch an effect with the pope that he not only relinquiſhed his claim, but even ordered the clergy of England to give a tenth of their revenues for three years to Edward for carrying on the Scottiſh war, on condition of his receiving a part of the money himſelf.

A. D. 1303. Though the Scottiſh forces had met with ſo dreadful a defeat at the battle of Falkirk, yet they were far from being totally ſubdued. The remains of that army were joined by freſh forces in the mountainous parts of the kingdom, and they again attacked the territories of the Engliſh. An army of ten thouſand men was likewiſe formed under Cummin (appointed regent on the reſignation of Wallace) who advanced as far as Biggar, in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh.

In conſequence of theſe proceedings, John de Segrave (whom Edward had left guardian of Scotland) aſſembled all the Engliſh forces in that kingdom to oppoſe the Scots; but perceiving it would be difficult to procure the neceſſary quantity of proviſions for their ſubſiſtence in a body, he ſeparated them into three diviſions: the firſt of which was commanded by himſelf in perſon, the ſecond by his brother, and the third by Sir Robert Neville.

Cummin, knowing of this diſpoſition, determined to take advantage of it, and advanced under covert of the night, to attack Segrave's diviſion, which lay at Roſlin, about ſixteen miles from the Scottiſh camp. As ſoon as the dawn appeared, the Engliſh diſcovered Cummin's army marching to attack them, but it was too late to make the neceſſary preparations againſt them; the Scots fell on before they could form themſelves in order of battle and obtained an eaſy victory: a few only eſcaped, by flying to their ſecond diviſion, whom they informed at once of their misfortune, and the approach of the enemy. The brother of Segrave immediately drew up his men, led them on to revenge the deaths of their countrymen, and a bloody battle enſued. The Scots, elated with ſucceſs, charged with the utmoſt fury; while the Engliſh, fired with reſentment, made a noble reſiſtance. The battle continued for ſome time doubtful, but at laſt terminated in favour of the Scots, and the Engliſh were obliged to retreat with conſiderable loſs.

By this time the third diviſion, under the command of Sir Robert Neville, appeared; and the Scots, already exhauſted with fatigue, and their ranks conſiderably thinned by the two former actions, would willingly have declined the engagement. They pleaded the exceſſive labours they had already undergone; pointed to their wounds, and deſired to retire while it was yet in their power. But Cummin, who knew a retreat was now impoſſible, reminded them of the cauſe for which they were fighting, the tyranny of the Engliſh, the glory of their anceſtors, and the diſgrace of ſlavery. His arguments prevailed, and having furniſhed the followers of his camp with the arms of the vanquiſhed, they mounted the horſes they had taken, ſtood the ſhock of a third engagement, and with the utmoſt difficulty obtained the victory. This event, however, was not wholly inglorious to Neville: he reſcued Segrave, who had been taken priſoner in the firſt engagement, and retreated in excellent order. After this victory, the Scots made themſelves maſters of Stirling caſtle, and appointed one Oliphant (an officer celebrated both for his courage and military abilities) commander of that fortreſs.

A. D. 1304. The ſucceſs of the Scots now ſufficiently alarmed Edward, who determined ſeverely to revenge the diſgrace of his forces, and for that purpoſe appointed Roxburgh as the place of rendezvous for his army. Every precaution was taken to enſure the ſucceſs of this expedition, and to prevent any want of proviſions, a numerous fleet was fitted out with orders to ſail along the coaſt, and attend the march of the army with proper ſupplies.

The Engliſh forces being aſſembled at Roxburgh, Edward advanced into the heart of Scotland, at the head of an army that would have rendered all oppoſition in the open field, a mere ſpecies of madneſs: ſo that the Scots had no other reſource than to fly for ſafety to the woods and faſtneſſes of their country. The only oppoſition Edward met with was from two or three caſtles; but all the reſt opened their gates on the firſt ſummons. In this ſucceſsful manner he led his army from one extremity of Scotland to the other: his vigilance preſerved his troops from ſurpriſe, and his fleet ſupplied them with plenty of proviſions. Even the intrepid Wallace, though he followed the Engliſh armies, found few opportunities for diſplaying his valour. The conduct of Edward, rendered all oppoſition abortive, and he ſoon made a total ſubduction of the whole country.

A. D. 1305. The conqueſt of Scotland being now compleatly obtained, Edward directed his attention towards ſettling the government; and, in order to render the Scots more ſubmiſſive, conferred on ſeveral of the nobility particular marks of his favour. Ten perſons, two from each order of biſhops, abbots, earls and barons, and two for the community of the gentry, were choſen as deputies to the parliament ſummoned to meet at London, in order to ſettle the adminiſtration in a manner at once both permanent and advantageous to all parties. The conferences were accordingly opened, and after a conſultation of twenty days, the civil eſtabliſhment of Scotland was fixed in the following manner: "eight juſtices to be appointed to regulate the affairs of government; and the natives of both kingdoms rendered equally capable of filling the poſts of power and truſt in Scotland. John, earl of Britany, was appointed guardian of that kingdom, and the officers of chancellor, chamberlain, berlain, and judges, were filled partly by Engliſh and partly by Scots." It was alſo agreed. "That the Scottiſh laws ſhould be aboliſhed; and that a parliament ſhould be ſummoned, on the guardian's arrival in Scotland, in which the laws of king David ſhould be revived, together with the amendments and additions made to them by ſucceeding kings: that the guardian, with the concurrence of his council, ſhould have full power to make ſuch alterations and amendments, as ſhould ſeem moſt conſiſtent with the good of the kingdom, and the ſafety of the ſubject, without conſulting the king: but if any difficulty ſhould ariſe, which required a more mature deliberation to remove, the whole ſhould be properly ſtated, and ſent by the deputies from the ſtates of Scotland to the Engliſh parliament, where the queſtion ſhould be finally determined."

The government of Scotland being thus eſtabliſhed, and the parliament diſſolved, Edward iſſued out a general pardon to all the Scottiſh nobility, who had carried arms againſt him, the brave Wallace excepted, whom the king inſiſted ſhould ſurrender at diſcretion. This diſtinguiſhed warrior ſtill continued in arms at the head of a few followers, and ſtill cheriſhed the expiring ſparks of Scottiſh liberty. But the publication of Edward's pardon cauſed a very conſiderable deſertion in his little party, and he was obliged to wander from one part of the country to another, in order to keep himſelf concealed from the vigilant eyes of his enemies. He continued this wandering courſe of life ſome time; but was at laſt betrayed by Sir John Monteith, his former friend, and ſent priſoner to London. Edward (whoſe natural bravery ſhould have induced him to cheriſh ſimilar qualities in an enemy) was ſo enraged at ſome violences committed by Wallace during the fury of the war, that he ordered him to be tried as a rebel and traitor, and being found guilty and condemned, was carried to Tower-hilll, and there ſuffered death by decapitation.

A. D. 1306. The Scots were greatly irritated at the ſevere puniſhment inflicted on the brave Wallace, and meditated revenge. They were already diſguſted at the many innovations introduced into their country by the ſword of a conqueror, and only wanted a chief of determined reſolution, to aſſiſt them in the execution of their deſign to ſhake off the ſhackles of ſlavery and dependence. Nor was it long before a general of the greateſt merit appeared. Robert Bruce, deſcended from the royal family of Scotland, determined if poſſible, to obtain that ſovereignty, which had been ſo long poſſeſſed by his anceſtors. He well knew that after his ſubmiſſion to Edward, he ſhould never be able to appear with any advantage, while the illuſtrious Wallace (then the idol of the common people) ſurvived; but the death of that chief removed the only obſtacle to his ambition. John Baliol, the competitor with Bruce's father for the Scottiſh crown, died alſo about the ſame time. This incident united the two parties, which had before divided Scotland, and greatly encouraged Bruce to attempt the deliverance of his country from the yoke of ſlavery. Bruce was now at the court of Edward, and opened his mind to Cummin then in Scotland, who approved of his deſign, and promiſed his aſſiſtance; but reflecting coolly on the enterprize, he changed his opinion, and informed Edward of Bruce's intentions. The king, however, ſuſpecting the diſcovery of Cummin proceeded from envy, omitted to ſecure the perſon of Bruce, till, by concurring circumſtances, he ſhould be convinced of the truth of his aſſertions.

In the mean time the earl of Glouceſter knowing what had paſſed between Cummin and the king, thought it would be imprudent either to converſe with Bruce, or give him the neceſſary information he could wiſh in a letter; he therefore ſent him, by a ſervant, a pair of gilt ſpurs and a purſe of gold, which he pretended to have borrowed for him. Bruce readily perceived the meaning of this ænigmatical preſent, upon which he immediately quitted the court, and effected his eſcape.

Bruce repaired with all haſte to his native country, and ſoon after his arrival preſented himſelf at a meeting of the Scottiſh nobles, whom he informed of his deſigns, and exhorted to join in the noble attempt, to break the chains of ſervitude, and revenge the inſulted rights of their countrymen. The nobles liſtened to his remonſtrances, and declared their reſolution of ſeconding his patriotic deſigns, and aſſerting the undoubted rights of the nation, againſt their common oppreſſors. Cummin, who alone oppoſed this general determination, repreſented the attempt as pregnant with deſtruction; telling them it was madneſs in them to oppoſe the power of the Engliſh, while that power was in the hands of a prince of ſuch uncommon vigour and abilities. He added, that nothing but the moſt rigorous puniſhments could be expected, if they again broke their oaths of fealty, and ſhook off their allegiance to the victorious Edward. Bruce, who plainly foreſaw the probable failure of all his ambitious projects from the oppoſition of Cummin, followed him, on the diſſolution of the aſſembly, to the cloyſters of the Grey Friars, and, giving him a violent blow, ſtruck him to the ground. Sir Thomas Kirkpatric, one of Bruce's friends, who was by, aſked him if the traitor was ſlain. "I believe ſo," replied Bruce. "And is that a mat-" ter, (cried Kirkpatric) to be left to conjecture? I " will ſecure him." He immediately ran to Cummin, and drawing his dagger, ſtabbed him to the heart.

Bruce had now gone too far to recede. No pardon could be expected from Edward; ſo that both he and his party had no other alternative than either to conquer, or periſh in the attempt. Bruce improved every moment, by haſtening into different parts of the kingdom to rouze his countrymen to arms, and perſuade them to ſhake off the galling yoke of ſlavery. The Scots embraced with ardour the pleaſing hopes of recovering their liberty. Their courage was ſtimulated by oppreſſion, and thy determined to conquer or die. In conſequence of this the Engliſh were again driven out of that kingdom, except thoſe who had taken refuge in places of ſtrength; and Bruce was crowned king of Scotland, with the uſual ceremonies, in the abbey of Scone.

As ſoon as Edward was informed of theſe proceedings, he immediately diſpatched the earl of Pembroke, at the head of a conſiderable body of forces, into Scotland, to check the progreſs of the inſurgents. Bruce had collected a conſiderable number of forces, but they were raw and undiſciplined, and conſequently unable to withſtand the attacks of veteran troops. They were encamped at Methven near Perth, without ſuſpecting the approach of an enemy. While they were in this ſtate of ſuppoſed ſecurity, the earl of Pembroke ſuddenly attacked them in the night, and a deſperate battle enſued. Bruce behaved with great magnanimity: he was thrice diſmounted from his horſe, and as often recovered himſelf: but all his efforts were in vain, being obliged to ſubmit to ſuperior fortune, and ſeek his ſafety by flight. This diſaſter ſtruck the Scots with terror, and the greater part deſerting their leader, Bruce retired to the Weſtern Iſles, in hopes ſome future period would be more propitious to him in the attempt of reſtoring the antient liberty of his country.

A ſhort time after this defeat, Edward himſelf arrived in Scotland at the head of a powerful army, and, dividing his forces into two bodies, ſent one to the northward under the command of the prince of Wales, aſſiſted by the earls of Lancaſter and Hereford. The prince made himſelf maſter of the caſtle of Kildrummey, and ſoon after took the counteſs of Buchan, and the lady Mary Bruce, ſiſter to the fugitive king, priſoners. Theſe two ladies Edward, from a diſingenuous motive of revenge, ordered to be ſhut up in wooden cages, and expoſed as public ſpectacles to the inſulting populace; in conſequence of which lady Bruce was put into a cage and hung over the battlements of Roxburgh caſtle, while the counteſs of Buchan was put into another, and hung over the caſtle of Berwick. The brothers of Bruce with other Scottiſh noblemen, were put to death. After the prince had perfor ned this expedition, he met his father at Perth, and they both proceeded with their forces to the city of Carliſle.

A. D. 1307. It was generally ſuppoſed that Bruce had fallen among the ſlain at the battle of Methven: but the Engliſh were in this miſtaken; for he now appeared at the head of a ſmall body of men, and committed the moſt dreadful ravages upon thoſe inhabitants who were in the intereſt of the Engliſh. Edward, equally alarmed and exaſperated, immediately diſpatched the earl of Pembroke at the head of a conſiderable body of forces, to attack the inſurgents in their retreat; but Bruce, who was well acquainted with the nature of the country, led the earl into an ambuſcade and totally defeated his forces.

This gleam of ſucceſs greatly animated the Scots, inſomuch that Bruce, ſoon found his army increaſed to ſeveral thouſands, by which he became a dangerous, becauſe a deſperate enemy.

Edward now determined to take a moſt ſevere revenge on the Scots, even, if poſſible, to the very extirpation of their name; but death cut ſhort all his deſigns, and ſaved the Scottiſh nation from the precipice of deſtruction. The king had, for ſome time, been afflicted with a dyſentery, which greatly weakened him; but notwithſtanding this he marched at the head of his forces from Carliſle, on the 3d of July, and proceeded as far as a place called Burgh on the Sands in Cumberland, where his diſeaſe having greatly increaſed from the fatigues of his march, he was obliged to halt. He continued to grow worſe and worſe every day, till at length, finding his end approaching, he ſent for his eldeſt ſon prince Edward, and delivered to him the following among other injunctions: 1. That he ſhould purſue the war againſt Scotland with the utmoſt vigour, till the whole country was ſubdued; "Carry my aſhes "before you, (ſaid he) the rebels will never be able to ſupport the ſight of them." 2. That he ſhould never recall Piers Gaveſton *. 3. That he ſhould bury his body in Scotland; and, 4. That he ſhould ſend his heart to the Holy Land, with 30,000l. ſterling, which he had long reſerved for the ſupport of the Holy Sepulchre at Jeruſalem.

Having given theſe directions to his eldeſt ſon, he called for the reſt of his children, and after taking a ſolemn leave of them, together with the principal officers then about him, ſoon after paid the debt of nature, on the 7th of July, in the 69th year of his age, and 35th of his reign.

Edward was in perſon tall and comely, his features regular and elegant, with eyes keen and piercing, and had an aſpect that equally commanded reverence and eſteem. Though tall he was yet robuſt, and excelled moſt of his cotemporaries in bodily ſtrength and activity. His ſhape was ſomewhat diſproportioned on account of the too great length of his legs, from whence he received the name of Longſhanks; but this blemiſh was attended with ſome advantage, as it gave him ſuch a ſeat on horſeback, that he could not eaſily be diſmounted.

With reſpect to the character of this prince, he was certainly poſſeſſed of many virtues, though, at the ſame time, it muſt be acknowledged he had ſome vices. His ambition, and a deſire of increaſing the power of his kingdom, ſeem to have been his ruling paſſion. In purſuit of theſe he ſcrupled not to purſue meaſures inconſiſtent with the liberties of his people. The equity of his enterprize againſt Scotland has been juſtly queſtioned; but when it is remembered, that the union of the two kingdoms muſt have been attended with the moſt ſolid advantages to both, we ſhall, perhaps, be more inclined to praiſe than cenſure his conduct. At the ſame time, it muſt be confeſſed, that if his character ſhould be thought exceptionable in this particular, his country obtained the moſt permanent advantages from his activity, his courage, his policy and his prudence. He reſtored authority to the government, maintained the laws againſt all the efforts of his turbulent barons, and executed juſtice with ſeverity on all who diſturbed the domeſtic peace of the kingdom. His merit as a legiſlator was ſo great, that he is often called, "The Engliſh Juſtinian;" becauſe, in his reign, the laws acquired a great perfection, and juſtly deſerved the name of Eſtabliſhments. He ſettled the juriſdiction of the ſeveral courts; and he firſt eſtabliſhed the office of juſtice of peace. His conduct with regard to the clergy was more politic; he ſaw their power, and was deſirous of preventing its increaſe. Their poſſeſſions were unalienable, and perpetually augmenting: he therefore prohibited them from making new acquiſitions, by paſſing the ſtatute of mortmain. But the undertaking that will always render render the name of this great legiſlator dear to the Engliſh, was his eſtabliſhing the Houſe of Commons, by ſummoning two deputies from every borough, conformable to the example of the earl of Leiceſter. By this means the boroughs became of importance in the ſtate; and the mechanics and tradeſmen, whom the feudal ſyſtem had placed in a deſpicable point of light, acquired the honor of being one of the branches of the legiſlature; trade was encouraged, and men of property thought it no diſgrace to engage in the commerce of their country.

* Piers Gaveſton was a native of Guienne, and poſſeſſed few talents; but ſtill he was capable of attracting the regard of weak and inferior minds. His great addreſs in all the genteel exerciſes conſtituted his chief merit, while his vices were numerous, and of the moſt deſtructive nature. This foreigner obtained the particular favour and friendſhip of young Edward, over whom he gained ſuch an aſcendency, that the prince was totally directed by his maxims, and purſued ſuch of his vices as forbode deſtruction to the ſtate. This was too obvious to the king, who, to prevent future bad conſequences, a ſhort time before his death, baniſhed Gaveſton the kingdom, and, with his dying breath, made his ſon promiſe never to recall him.

Edward had, by his firſt wife, Eleanor of Caſtile, four ſons, but Edward, his heir and ſucceſſor, was the only one that ſurvived him. By his ſecond wife, Margaret of France, he had two ſons, namely, Thomas, created earl of Norfolk, and mareſchal of England; and Edmund, who was created earl of Kent by his brother after he aſcended the throne.

Remarkable Occurrences during the Reign of Edward I.

A. D.

1275 An earthquake happened in England, which affected moſt parts of the iſland; and, among other accidents, the church of St. Michael on the Hill, near Glaſtonbury in Somerſetſhire, was entirely thrown down.

1276 An act was made whereby all Jews were compelled to wear a badge.

1279 Two hundred and eighty Jews hanged in London, for adulterating the coin of the kingdom.

1288 As the king and queen were together in an apartment of the palace, a flaſh of lightning ſtruck in at the window, and killed two of the ſervants in waiting, but their majeſties received no other injury than being greatly frightened.

1299 The palace at Weſtminſter entirely deſtroyed by an accidental fire.

1300 This year an act was made by the common-council of London for preventing impoſition in the ſale of different kinds of proviſions, when the reſpective articles of poultry to be ſold in the city were fixed at the following prices:

CHAP. III.

EDWARD II. ſurnamed of CAERNARVON.

Edward recalls his favourite Gaveſton, and confers on him diſtinguiſhed favours. Goes over to the continent, and marries Iſabella, daughter of Philip of France. Returns to England, and is crowned with his new queen at Weſtminſter. Gaveſton behaves with great inſolence, upon which the barons inſiſt on his being baniſhed the kingdom. The king ſeems to comply, but inſtead of ſending him to a foreign country, appoints him lord-lieutenant of Ireland. Edward is compelled to delegate his power to the nobility, who make an ordinance for the abſolute baniſhment of Gaveſton. The king oppoſes his barons, and reinſtates his favourite. The nobles beſiege Gaveſton in Scarborough Caſtle, and cauſe him to be put to death. An accommodation takes place between the king and his barons. Edward marches againſt the Scots. Battle of Bannock-burn, and conſequences thereof. The king attaches himſelf to the two Spencers, who, at the inſtigation of the barons, are baniſhed the kingdom; but ſoon after recalled by Edward. The barons take up arms, but are ſubdued, and the earl of Lancaſter, with ſome others of the confederates, put to death. Edward concludes a truce with the Scots. The queen, diſguſted at Edward's partiality to the two Spencers, goes over to France with the young prince her ſon, and joins ſome of the Engliſh barons againſt her huſband. She returns to England at the head of a powerful army. The king goes to Briſtol, and from thence embarks for Ireland. The two Spencers put to death. Edward is driven by contrary winds into Wales, where he for ſome time conceals himſelf, but is at length betrayed, taken priſoner, and confined in Kenelworth Caſtle. The queen convokes a parliament in order to dethrone her huſband, which accordingly takes place. Edward delivers up the enſigns of royalty, and the nobility renounce their allegiance, upon which young Edward is appointed ſucceſſor to the throne. The queen and Mortimer conſpire againſt the life of the depoſed king, and cauſe him to be moſt cruelly murdered. Character of Edward II.

A. D. 1307. AT the time of the late king's death, the face of public affairs wore a pleaſing aſpect, and from the mild diſpoſition of his ſucceſſor, the people had formed the moſt pleaſing ideas of enjoying both happineſs and tranquillity under his government. But they ſoon found that all their expectations were built on a chimerical foundation, and that their prince was born to obey minions and favourites, not to govern a great kingdom, and ſupport the authority of that crown and dignity with which he was inveſted.

Scarce had the late king paid the debt of nature, when the impolitic and weak Edward purſued meaſures in direct violation of the promiſes made to his expiring parent. The firſt thing he did was, to recall his deteſted favourite Gaveſton, whom he created earl of Cornwall, and to whom he committed the government of the kingdom. Not ſatisfied with this he beſtowed upon him as a gift, the very ſum which the deceaſed prince had, by his laſt will, appropriated to the ſupport of the Holy Sepulchre at Jeruſalem, and to crown all, gave him his neice Margaret in marriage.

In the mean time a parliament was ſummoned at Northampton, in order to regulate the late king's funeral, together with the marriage and coronation of young Edward. At this meeting a ſum was granted to defray the expences of theſe ceremonies, and an ordinance was paſſed that the baſe coin, which was ſuppreſſed in the late reign, ſhould be again current throughout the kingdom.

The late king had requeſted that his remains ſhould be depoſited in Scotland, and young Edward ſolemnly promiſed that his requeſt ſhould be complied with; but he made no farther heſitation to violate this promiſe than he had done the other engagements made with his dying parent. The body was removed from Carliſle to Waltham, from whence whence it was conveyed to Weſtminſter, and there interred with great ſolemnity, on the 18th of October.*

During theſe tranſactions the war in Scotland was totally neglected. Bruce, who had retired to his faſtneſſes on the approach of the late king, now appeared boldly in the plains, fell upon the county of Galloway, and reduced it to his obedience. In conſequence of this the earl of Britany was ſent, at the head of a powerful army, to ſtop his career; upon which Bruce, finding it would be in vain to contend with a force ſo ſuperior to his own, once more retired to the mountains and moraſſes of that country.

A. D. 1308. In the beginning of this year Edward went over to the continent, in order to conſummate his marriage with Iſabella, daughter to Philip of France, to whom he had long been betrothed. Edward landed at Boulogne, where he did homage to Philip for Guienne and the next day his marriage was ſolemnized with great ſplendor. After ſpending ſome days with the kings of France, Navarre, Germany and Sicily, (who were preſent at the marriage) Edward returned with his conſort to England, and on the 25th of February, they were both crowned at Weſtminſter.

Previous to the performance of this ceremony, a circumſtance occurred which greatly alarmed Edward. The barons, exaſperated at the inſolence of Gaveſton, who affected to treat them with contempt, refuſed to aſſiſt at the coronation, unleſs Gaveſton was baniſhed the kingdom. Edward promiſed to redreſs all their grievances provided they would not force him to delay the ceremony; and the barons, in return, agreed to ſuſpend their reſentment. But to what a pitch of indignation was they raiſed, when, on the day of the coronation, they beheld the inſolent favourite, with the moſt faſtidious pomp, carrying the crown of St. Edward before the king. This was an aggravation ſcarce to be borne, and it was with ſome difficulty that one of the barons was prevented from ſacrificing the inſulting minion to his reſentment.

A powerful party was now formed againſt the inſolent Gaveſton, at the head of whom was Thomas earl of Lancaſter, couſin-german to the king, and at once the moſt opulent and powerful ſubject in the kingdom. The confederate barons continued daily to increaſe till the meeting of the parliament, when they appeared with a numerous armed retinue, inſiſted upon the baniſhment of Gaveſton, and prevailed on the biſhops to threaten him with excommunication if he did not immediately quit the kingdom.

Edward was now ſenſibly alarmed, and thinking all oppoſition would be in vain, ſeemed to comply with their demands; but, inſtead of ſending him to a foreign country, as the barons expected, he appointed him lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and even accompanied him as far as Briſtol on the way to his new government.

A. D. 1309. The weak Edward could not reſt quiet without the company of his favourite; and therefore, fearleſs of the conſequences, recalled Gaveſton, who on his return, reſumed all the ſame inſolence and oſtentation which had procured him the univerſal deteſtation of the people. The barons were now more provoked than ever; and they determined to put it out of the power of the king himſelf to protect ſo hated a minion.

It was not long before an opportunity offered for carrying their deſign into execution. The king ſummoned a parliament at Weſtminſter, when the barons aſſembled, attended by an army of their retainers, and after remonſtrating with Edward on his abſurd attachment to the infamous Gaveſton, compelled him to ſurrender his authority into the hands of twelve perſons, whom they appointed to direct the affairs of government.

A. D. 1311. Under the direction of theſe twelve the kingdom was governed near a year and a half, when a parliament being ſummoned on the 8th of Auguſt, a ſet of ordinances were produced by the barons, which were to have the force of ſtatutes, and which were readily ſigned by the king. Theſe ordinances were twenty-ſix in number, the moſt material of which were the following: That all evil counſellors ſhould be removed from the king's perſon, particularly Henry de Beaumont, and his ſiſter the lady de Veſay, who had obtained grants from the king diſhonourable to the dignity and prejudicial to the prerogatives of the crown. That whereas Piers Gaveſton had given evil council to his majeſty, removed all perſons of integrity and abilities from the public offices, and ſupplied their places with his own weak and worthleſs creatures, embezzled the king's treaſure, impoveriſhed the realm, by obtaining unreaſonable grants, and procuring blank charters, which he filled up according to his own pleaſure, protected robbers, arrogated to himſelf the royal power and dignity, and formed aſſociations inconſiſtent with the laws of the land; he ſhould, for theſe miſdemeanors, abjure the kingdom for ever before the firſt of November; and if found in any part of his majeſty's dominions after that day, ſhould be treated as a public enemy. That the king ſhould not leave the realm, nor declare war againſt any prince or potentate, without the conſent of the barons. That on his quitting the kingdom with their conſent, a guardian of the realm ſhould be appointed by the parliament, who ſhould alſo nominate the chief officers of the ſtate, of the houſhold, of the revenue, and of juſtice, as well as the keepers of foreſts, the eſcheators on both ſides the Trent, and, in a word, all perſons employed under the crown in any part of his Majeſty's dominions. That all perſons in office ſhould take an oath to obſerve theſe

* It was depoſited on the north ſide of the ſhrine of St. Edward, under a tomb of grey marble, with the following inſcription: Edwardus Primus, Scotorum malleus, hic eſt, 1307, Pactum Serva. That is, "Here lies Edward I. the Scourge of the Scots. 1307. Obſerve Engagements."

It is remarkable that the tomb of this king was opened ſo lately as in the month of May 1774, the cauſe of which was as follows: the Society of Antiquarians having found it mentioned in a book called Rymer's Fœdera, that Edward I. ſurnamed Long-ſhanks, was interred in a ſtone coffin, incloſed in a ſtone tomb, in Edward the Confeſſor's Chapel, and that a ſum of money was allowed to preſerve the tomb, determined to gratify their curioſity by endeavouring to diſcover the truth of it. Accordingly they applied to the dean of Weſtminſter for leave to open the tomb, who readily complied with their requeſt. At the time appointed for opening the tomb, the dean, with about fifteen of the ſociety, attended, when, to their great aſtoniſhment, they found the royal corpſe to appear as repreſented by the hiſtorian. He had on a gold and ſilver riſſe robe, over which was a very handſome one of crimſon velvet, both of them quite freſh; and the jewels that were about him appeared exceeding bright. He had in one hand a ſceptre and dove, and in the other a ſceptre and croſs, which meaſured near five feet in length. The crown on his head being raiſed, the ſkull appeared bare, but the face and hands ſeemed perfectly entire. He meaſured in length ſix feet two inches.

these ordinances; and that one bishop, two earls and as many barons, should be chosen in every parliament, to receive the complaints against the king's ministers, and others who should violate these ordinances, and to punish offenders at discretion.

Though Edward had signed these ordinances with great readiness, yet he secretly determined not to observe them. No sooner was the parliament dissolved, than he repaired to York, and issued out a proclamation, repealing the article relative to the exile of Piers Gaveston, "as being unjust, and contrary to the oath taken by the king at his coronation." In consequence of this Gaveston was reinstated, in direct opposition to the very article which had been signed by the king for his banishment.

A. D. 1312. Exasperated at the conduct of Edward, and dreading the resentment of the powerful minion, the barons flew to arms, and besieged Gaveston in Scarborough-castle. The king used his utmost efforts to raise an army for the relief of his favourite; but he was held in such universal detestation, that the people refused joining the royal standard. In the mean time Gaveston, sensible of the bad condition of his garrison and the want of provisions, thought proper to capitulate. In consequence of this it was agreed that he should surrender himself a prisoner for two months, during which time means should be used for bringing about an accommodation; but if the terms proposed by the barons should not be accepted, the castle should be restored to him in the same condition as when he surrendered. The earl of Pembroke, being now master of the person of the favourite, conducted him to the castle of Dedington, near Banbury, where he left him (probably by consent of the rest of the barons) under pretence of having some business of importance to discharge in London. But before he returned, Gaveston was carried off by the earl of Warwick, who, in conjunction with the earls of Lancaster, Arundel and Hereford, caused him to be beheaded by the hands of the common executioner.

As soon as Edward was informed of the death of his favourite, he vowed revenge against the perpetrators of so unjustifiable and inhuman an act; and even threatened to exterminate the whole body of his nobles, whom he considered as being accessary to the horrid deed. But, on cool reflection, he altered his mind, and agreed to come to terms of accommodation with them on condition of their publickly asking him pardon on their knees. This was readily consented to, and performed, and with these vain appearances of exterior submission the king was so well pleased, that he forgave them their past offences, which, with his favourite Gaveston, were now buried in oblivion.

A. D. 1314. The attention of Edward was now directed towards the Scots, who, taking advantage of the disputes between the king and his barons, had made inroads into the northern counties, and committed the most horrid ravages on the innocent inhabitants. Edward, determined to suppress these violences, raised a powerful army, at the head of whom he marched with all expedition into the north. The Scottish forces under the command of Bruce were very inferior in numbers to those of Edward, in consequence of which he endeavoured to supply by art what was wanting in strength. Persuaded that this important contest was to decide the fate of his kingdom, he chose the field of battle with the utmost prudence, and made the most judicious preparations he could project for receiving the English. He posted himself at a place called Bannock-burn, in the neighbourhood of Stirling, having on his right flank an hill, and on his left a morass. In the front of his camp ran a small rivulet, the banks of which, as well as the bed of the stream, he filled with sharp stakes; and caused deep pits to be dug a little beyond the opposite bank, into which sharp stakes were also stuck, and the whole covered over with turf. The van of the English army reached the neighbourhood of the Scottish camp in the evening of the twenty-fourth of June, and a smart skirmish ensued between two parties of cavalry. The English were led by Henry de Bohun, a younger brother to the earl of Hereford, and the Scots by Bruce in person. The contest was very bloody; but at last decided in favour of the Scots, by the valour of Bruce, who rode up to Bohun, and cleaving his head with a battle-axe, in sight of both armies, he fell dead to the ground.

The English were so dispirited at the loss of their leader, that they retreated to the main army, and night coming on the general attack was postponed till the next morning, when the English troops prepared for the dreadful conflict. The wings, composed of cavalry, were commanded by the earls of Gloucester and Hereford, and the king himself led the center, or main body. Bruce drew up his forces, which consisted chiefly of foot, in three lines, with a body of reserve. The center was commanded by himself, the right wing by his brother Edward, the left by Randolph, and the body of reserve by Sir James Douglas.

Thus were preparations made on each side for coming to action; but just as both parties were ready to engage, a dispute took place between the earls of Gloucester and Hereford, with regard to beginning the attack upon the enemy. The first claimed it by custom and the latter as constable of England. The earl of Gloucester, therefore, (determined not to submit to his opponent) broke the rank, and, impelled by all the ardour of youth, rushed on to the attack, and fell among the covered pits, by which means his whole body of forces was thrown into the utmost confusion, and himself fell a victim to his own temerity.

This imprudent sally of the earl of Gloucester proved fatal to the English army. Several of the pits made by the Scots had been discovered during the skirmish the preceding evening; and the king, in order to prevent a similar misfortune, gave orders for a body of infantry to take a circuit round the morass, and attack the main body of the Scottish army in flank; and during the confusion it was natural to expect from so sudden an attack, the cavalry were to have forced the passage of the rivulet, and fallen sword in hand on the embarrassed enemy.

The fate of Gloucester was hardly determined, when the body of infantry, having made the prescribed circuit, fell with the utmost fury on the wing commanded by Randolph, and galled them so severely with repeated showers of arrows, that they were thrown into disorder. Sir James Douglas perceived the confusion, and fell suddenly upon the rear of the English with such impetuosity, that they were routed with great slaughter. The main body of the English, however, marched up with great resolution to attack the enemy; when they observed on the heights towards their left the appearance of another army marching leisurely to surround them. This was nothing more than a number of waggoners and ſumpter boys, whom Bruce had ſupplied with military ſtandards, which at a diſtance gave them the appearance of a numerous body of forces. The Engliſh, not diſcovering the deception, were ſtruck with a panic, and fled with the utmoſt precipitation, in conſequence of which Bruce obtained a complete victory. The booty acquired by the Scots was prodigious; beſides which they took ſeveral perſons of diſtinction priſoners, who paid dearly for their ranſom. Edward himſelf had ſcarce time to reach Dunbar caſtle, before Sir James Douglas appeared at the head of four hundred horſe, hoping to intercept him if he attempted to eſcape to Berwick by land; but the king eluded his vigilance by going to that town by water.

The victorious Bruce diſtinguiſhed himſelf as much by his humanity and generoſity after having conquered his enemies as he had done in the battle by his bravery and prudence. He treated all his priſoners with the greateſt tenderneſs; ſent the bodies of the earl of Glouceſter and lord Clifford to the Engliſh monarch at Berwick; diſmiſſed ſome perſons, for whom he had formerly a particular regard, without ranſom; exchanged the earl of Hereford, and other noblemen, for his wife, daughter and ſiſter, the earl of Mar, and the biſhop of Glaſgow, who had remained priſoners ever ſince the battle of Methven; and, laſtly, cauſed the dead bodies left on the field of battle to be decently interred.

A. D. 1315. The defeat of the king's forces at the battle of Bannock-burn gave no concern to the barons, who, on the contrary, founded hopes of their own future grandeur from that diſaſtrous event. No ſooner did the king return, than they inſiſted on a renewal of their ordinances, and the earl of Lancaſter was placed at the head of the miniſtry.

The weak and infatuated Edward, ſenſible of his own incapacity for holding the reins of government, now attached himſelf to a new favourite. This was Hugh Deſpenſer, or Spencer, a young man of high rank, deſcended from a noble family, and an Engliſhman by birth. He poſſeſſed all the exterior accompliſhments of perſon and addreſs neceſſary to engage the affections of Edward; but wanted that prudence and moderation which could alone have ſupported him in the pre-eminence to which he was advanced. Had the oppoſition of the barons, however, been founded on virtue, and directed only to ſupport the honour of their country, theſe defects would have been conſidered as abundantly ſupplied by the talents and experience of the father of this new favourite, and who had alſo acquired a conſiderable ſhare in the adminiſtration. He was a nobleman venerable for his age, and during his whole life had been reſpected for his wiſdom, valour and intrepidity. But envy now obſcured all his merits; his paſt ſervices were forgotten; and he was, together with his ſon, devoted to deſtruction.

A. D. 1316. The turbulent barons firſt indicated their diſſatisfaction at the king's new favourites by abſenting themſelves from parliament; but this not producing the deſired effect, they determined to have recourſe to more powerful methods for completing their deſigns. It was not long before an opportunity offered, which gave them a pretence for attacking the miniſters. Edward, among other favours beſtowed on the younger Spencer, gave him a barony, which it was pretended had reverted to the crown. This tranſaction was conſidered by the barons as a proper ſubject to work on, the conſequence of which was that the whole kingdom was thrown into a general ſtate of commotion. Theſe diſturbances continued near five years, when the earl of Lancaſter, and ſeveral other barons, flew to arms, and peremptorily demanded the baniſhment of the two Spencers. The king refuſed to comply; upon which they marched to London, and preſented to the parliament an accuſation againſt the favourites. In conſequence of this they were both condemned to baniſhment, and, ſubmitting to their ſentence, all diſturbances ſeemed happily to ſubſide.

A. D. 1321. In the beginning of this year a circumſtance happened which rouſed Edward from his natural ſtate of indolence. The queen having occaſion to paſs by the caſtle of Leeds belonging to lord Badleſmere, one of the confederate barons diſpatched ſome of her ſervants to deſire a night's lodging in the caſtle; upon which the requeſt was not only denied, but they were even refuſed admittance, and ſome of them killed by the ſervants of the governor. This outrageous behaviour was reſented by all parties, and the king levying an army, made himſelf maſter of the caſtle, and put the governor, with ſeveral of the garriſon to death. The conduct of the king on this occaſion was approved even by the turbulent barons themſelves; in conſequence of which Edward (who was too apt to be over elated at the moſt trifling ſucceſs) thought it a proper opportunity of attempting the recovery of his prerogative. He accordingly ventured to recall the two Spencers, whoſe ſentence he declared to be illegal and unjuſt, as being paſſed without the conſent of the prelates, and extorted by violence from him and the barons aſſembled in parliament. Adding, "that he was bound by the Great Charter to receive the petitions of the Spencers, becauſe he was obliged to do juſtice to all his ſubjects."

A. D. 1322. The aſſociated barons were highly enraged at this proceeding of Edward, and, being ſtill in arms, determined to preſerve their power by the force of the ſword; in conſequence of which the king marched againſt them at the head of a powerful army, and continued his rout as far as the borders of Wales. But the forces of the barons were not ſufficient to meet thoſe of the king in the open field. They therefore had recourſe to the Scottiſh monarch, with whom they concluded a treaty, promiſing to recognize his title to the crown of Scotland; and that prince in return, ſtipulated to aſſiſt them with a body of forces.

The earl of Lancaſter, encouraged by the hopes of a powerful aſſiſtance from Scotland, and joined by the earl of Hereford at the head of his retainers, determined to oppoſe the king's forces, and accordingly poſted himſelf at Burton upon Trent, in order to diſpute the paſſage of that river. But no ſooner did the royal army appear than Lancaſter was intimidated, and retreated towards Borough-bridge, in order, if poſſible, to reach the borders of Scotland. Unfortunately for the earl, Sir Andrew Harcla, governor of Carliſle, ſuſpecting his deſign, poſted himſelf, at the head of a body of troops, to oppoſe his paſſage over a ſtream, ſo that Lancaſter found himſelf reduced to the wretched alternative of venturing an engagement, or ſurrendering himſelf a priſoner to Harcla. He choſe the former; but the earl of Hereford being ſlain in the firſt attack, the barons troops fled with with great precipitation, and Lancaſter (with ſeveral of the principal barons) was taken priſoner. Harcla conducted the earl to the king at Pomfret, where he was tried by a court martial, and being condemned to death, was carried in an ignominious manner to an eminence in the neighbourhood, and there beheaded. Thus fell Thomas earl of Lancaſter, a prince of the blood, and one of the moſt powerful barons ever known in England; but whoſe turbulent temper hurried him into meaſures at once ſubverſive to the peace of ſociety, and the welfare of his country.

The earl of Lancaſter was not the only perſon who ſuffered death on this occaſion; about twenty other barons being afterwards tried and executed, ſome of whom were hanged, and others beheaded. Many made their eſcape into France, and others were thrown into priſon. Harcla was rewarded for his ſervices with a large eſtate and the earldom of Carliſle. But he did not long enjoy the royal bounty; for entering into a treaſonable correſpondence with the king of Scotland, he paid the forfeit of his life as an atonement for his perfidy.

A. D. 1323. Elated with the ſucceſs of Edward over his turbulent barons, and giddy with power, the younger Spencer committed ſuch acts of violence as ſtill farther inflamed the hatred of the public againſt him. Freſh complaints were every day made to the king on his conduct; and Edward, deſpairing of making a ſucceſsful campaign againſt Scotland, while the nation was divided, concluded a truce with the Scottiſh monarch for thirteen years. By the articles of this truce it was agreed, that a free commerce ſhould be open between the two kingdoms: that no new caſtles ſhould be built, nor any old fortreſſes repaired: and, laſtly, that the truce ſhould remain in force, though the king of England, or lord Robert Bruce, ſhould die in the interim.

A. D. 1324. But though Edward had totally ſubdued his turbulent barons, and made a peace with the Scots, he did not remain long in a ſtate of quietude. Freſh troubles aroſe, and from a quarter he little expected. Charles the Fair of France (ſon and ſucceſſor of Philip) ſummoned Edward to do him homage for his province of Guienne. In conſequence of this the younger Spencer, who ſaw the conſequences that might attend his own authority during the king's abſence, would not conſent to his leaving the kingdom. The parliament therefore was conſulted, and it was the unanimous opinion of the whole aſſembly, that it was improper for the king to go abroad in perſon, but that ambaſſadors ſhould be ſent to the court of France, requeſting that the homage might be delayed till a more convenient opportunity. This was accordingly done; but Charles refuſed to poſtpone the ceremony and ſent a body of forces to attack Guienne.

It was now thought proper that queen Iſabella ſhould go to her brother's court, in order, if poſſible, to bring about an accommodation. She accordingly repaired thither with all expedition, and uſed her utmoſt influence to execute the buſineſs on which ſhe was ſent; but all her endeavours proved fruitleſs: Charles was peremptory, and inſiſted that Edward ſhould repair to Paris in perſon to perform his homage.

During the contention between Charles and Edward, queen Iſabella, who continued at her brother's court, projected a ſcheme for removing all difficulties, and at the ſame time putting it in her power to be amply revenged on the younger Spencer from whom ſhe had received ſome diſtinguiſhed inſults, and on that account long beheld him with the utmoſt deteſtation. She ſent meſſengers over to Edward, propoſing that he ſhould reſign the ſovereignty of Guienne to his ſon, and that the prince ſhould be ſent to Paris to perform the duty of a vaſſal.

Edward and Spencer highly approved of the queen's propoſal, in conſequence of which the young prince was immediately ſent to the French court. But the king and his favourite ſoon perceived the blunder they had made, in truſting the perſon of the heir apparent to the crown in the hands of an ambitious woman, and at the court of a foreign monarch.

Iſabella, on her arrival in France, had found a great number of fugitives, the remains of the Lancaſtrian party; and their common hatred to the younger Spencer ſoon cemented a ſecret friendſhip between them. Among the reſt was Roger Mortimer, a powerful baron of the Welſh marches, and one of the leaders of the late rebellion. This young noblemen ſoon inſinuated himſelf into the affections of the queen, who made no heſitation at ſacrificing to a vicious paſſion all the ſentiments of honour and fidelity ſhe owed to her huſband. It was in vain that Edward ordered her to return to England: he ſent repeated meſſengers to her for this purpoſe, but ſhe ſent for anſwer that ſhe was reſolved to continue in France, till the two Spencers ſhould be baniſhed the kingdom.

A. D. 1325. Finding all lenient meaſures ineffectual, and that no arguments, however perſuaſive, would bring Iſabella to a ſenſe of her duty, Edward had recourſe to the pope, who wrote a very preſſing letter to the king of France, inſiſting, on pain of excommunication, that the queen of England ſhould be ſent back to her huſband. Charles was ſo affected at this menace of the pontiff, together with the ſhameful connection between Mortimer and his ſiſter, that he determined to ſupport her no longer. He accordingly ſhewed her the pope's letter, telling her he could not, either with honour or ſafety to himſelf, afford her protection, and that ſhe muſt immediately quit his dominions.

The artful Iſabella had, for ſome time, been apprehenſive of this event, and therefore took proper care to guard againſt its conſequences. She had affianced her ſon, the prince of Wales, to the daughter of William, count of Hainault and Holland; who, in return, promiſed her an aſylum in his dominions, and to aſſiſt her with a body of troops againſt her enemies. She therefore retired into Hainault, where ſhe was received with the greateſt marks of kindneſs and reſpect.

A. D. 1326. Every method was now uſed for raiſing an army to attend the queen and the young prince on an expedition to England; and about 3000 men in arms were collected for the purpoſe, under the command of John de Hainault, the count's brother. Iſabella however, did not build her hopes of ſucceſs on the number and valor of her troops in the intended invaſion of her huſband's dominions, but in the connections ſhe had formed with the diſcontented nobles. All the old Lancaſtrian faction were ready to join her; and the families of about twenty of the nobility, who had ſuffered with the late earl of Lancaſter, were the more zealous in their attachment, as they hoped, in conſequence of her ſucceſs, to be reſtored to the eſtates which had been forfeited in conſequence of the late rebellion. At the ſame time many of the principal people people in England had joined the queen's party. The king's brothers, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, with other prelates, and ſeveral of the moſt powerful barons, approved of her meaſures; ſo that nothing was wanting but the appearance of the queen and prince, at the head of their foreign troops, to turn the whole force of the tempeſt againſt the unfortunate Edward.

The baſe and perfidious Iſabella, having collected her forces at Dort, embarked with her ſon for England, and landed in Suffolk on the twenty-fourth of September. She was immediately joined by the princes of the blood, with other factious nobles; and, to give her hoſtile appearance a favourable aſpect, iſſued out a proclamation, declaring that the ſole motive of her proceedings was, to deliver the nation from the tyranny of the Spencers, and of chancellor Baldock, their creature. This proclamation had the deſired effect; the ardour of the Engliſh was aſtoniſhing, and they flocked from all quarters to the queen's ſtandard.

Edward, who was then in London, applied to the citizens for aſſiſtance againſt the invaders of his country; but ſoon perceived that no reliance could be placed on them. He therefore ſet out for the weſtern parts of England, hoping that his ſubjects in that quarter of the kingdom would commiſerate majeſty in diſtreſs, and ſupport him againſt the unnatural rebellion of an implacable woman. But he ſoon found himſelf miſtaken: the people were unwilling to come to his ſtandard, and he formed the reſolution of paſſing over to Ireland, in hopes of meeting with that aſſiſtance there which was refuſed him in England.

No ſooner had Edward left London than the populace committed the moſt dreadful diſorders. They plundered the houſes and murdered the perſons of all who were obnoxious to them. Even the acknowledged virtues of the biſhop of Exeter could not protect him from their rage. He was dragged, like a felon, to the great croſs of Cheapſide, where his head was ſevered from his body. Moſt of the other cities followed the example of the capital, and, taking advantage of the national confuſion, committed every ſpecies of outrage with wantonneſs and impunity.

As ſoon as the queen was informed of the flight of Edward, ſhe diſpatched the earl of Kent, with John de Hainault, at the head of his mercenaries, in purſuit of him. They accordingly marched as far as Briſtol, but on their arrival at that city found the king had quitted it ſome days, leaving the elder Spencer in poſſeſſion of the caſtle. The earl of Kent immediately inveſted the place, and Spencer would certainly have defended himſelf to the laſt extremity had the garriſon been faithful to him; but they were infected with the diſloyalty of the times, mutinied againſt their commander, and delivered him up to the enemy. No reſpect was paid to this venerable old man, who had nearly reached his ninetieth year. All his former ſervices were forgot; and though they could alledge nothing againſt him but his loyalty to his maſter, he was condemned to death by the rebellious barons, and hanged on a gibbet like a common malefactor.

In the mean time the king, purſuant to his reſolution, had embarked for Ireland; but being driven back by contrary winds, endeavoured to conceal himſelf among the mountains of Wales. Iſabella was alarmed when ſhe heard her huſband was ſtill in his own dominions. She was fearful that his diſtreſſed ſituation might turn the tide of popular favour againſt her party; and it was therefore determined to ſeize the royal perſon. The difficulty of diſcovering his retreat was ſoon removed, by bribing the Welſh; and the king was taken at Caerfilly, in Glamorganſhire, with the younger Spencer, Baldock the chancellor, and a few domeſtics; all the reſt of his courtiers having deſerted him in his misfortunes. The king was committed to the care of the earl of Lancaſter, and confined in Kenelworth caſtle. The younger Spencer, without any form of trial, was executed, with the moſt ſhocking circumſtances of barbarity and inſult. Baldock, the chancellor, being a prieſt, could not, with ſafety, be ſo ſuddenly and illegally diſpatched. He was therefore conducted to London, and aſſaulted by the populace, who uſed him with the utmoſt cruelty, and threw him into Newgate, where he ſoon after expired.

Iſabella was now inveſted with the actual government of the nation; and the firſt uſe ſhe made of it was, to convoke, in the name of her huſband, a parliament, who were to dethrone him, and which was appointed to aſſemble on the 7th of January following. This buſineſs being done, ſhe went to keep her Chriſtmas at Wallingford caſtle, where, in the adulterous embraces of the infamous Mortimer, ſhe forgot every call of nature; loſt every ſenſe of ſhame; and ſeemed to forget that there exiſted ſuch a perſon as the then wretched Edward.

A. D. 1327. The parliament, according to appointment, met on the 7th of January; and on the 10th an impeachment was exhibited againſt the king; in which, though it was drawn by his moſt inveterate enemies, nothing but his confined genius or his misfortunes were alledged againſt him; malice itſelf not being able to find any particular crime that could be alledged againſt him. But this was of little weight in an aſſembly convoked for his deſtruction. The ſpirit of faction had annihilated juſtice. The impeachment being read in the preſence of the prince, ſeated on the throne, it was reſolved that young Edward ſhould aſſume the reins of government, and that Edward II. ſhould no longer be ſtiled king of England, but only Edward of Caernarvon.

This buſineſs being done, commiſſioners were appointed for carrying to Edward the reſolution of the parliament with regard to his depoſition. This deputation conſiſted of three biſhops, three earls, two abbots, and two knights for each county, together with Sir William Truſſel, one of the judges, who was nominated the nation's particular procurator. Theſe were inſtructed to uſe every argument they could deviſe to prevail upon Edward to make a voluntary reſignation of that power they were determined he ſhould no longer hold.

The biſhops of Hereford and Lincoln, two of the king's moſt inveterate enemies, were ſent to converſe with him before the commiſſioners arrived, in order to prepare him for the approaching change of his condition. Edward was ſufficiently convinced that his fate was determined when theſe two prelates appeared; and the manner in which they diſcharged their commiſſion was perfectly ſimilar to the reſt of their conduct. Inſtead of pouring the balm of conſolation into the breaſt of wounded royalty, they aggravated the pungent ſmart by a thouſand malicious inſinuations: and when they perceived Edward made the leaſt ſtruggle to maintain his dignity, by refuſing to confer with the deputies; they told him, "that if he continued obſtinate in refuſing to reſign, the parliament would involve his whole family in his guilt, exclude all his his children from the ſucceſſion, and place another perſon on the throne of his anceſtors."

This menace awakened all the fondneſs of a father in the ſoul of the unfortunate Edward: he paused, dropped a tear to the remembrance of his fallen ſtate; conſented to admit the deputies to an audience, and retired to his chamber. As ſoon as he could collect his ſpirits, he entered the chamber of audience dreſſed in a mourning habit; but after the articles of impeachment againſt him were read, and the commiſſioners had demanded his immediate reſignation, he was unable to ſtand the ſhock; his ſpirits forſook him, and he had fallen to the ground, had not the biſhop of Lincoln ſupported him in this dreadful moment of conflicting paſſions. As ſoon as he recovered, he proceeded to the ceremony of reſignation, by delivering, with his own hands, to the commiſſioners, the crown, ſceptre, and other enſigns of royalty, which had been brought thither for that purpoſe. And Sir William Truſſel renounced, in the name of the parliament and people, all future allegiance.

This melancholy ceremony being finiſhed, the commiſſioners returned to London, and young Edward was placed on his father's throne. But it was impoſſible to prevent theſe atrocious acts of violence from opening the eyes of a deluded people. The cruelty, perfidy and infidelity of the queen, joined to her impudent hypocriſy, in publickly bewailing with tears the misfortunes of the king, who owed them all to her execrable conduct, could not fail of exciting the indignation of the Engliſh. Her infamous commerce with Mortimer increaſed the public odium, and ſhe was looked upon with deteſtation by every friend to truth, virtue and fidelity.

The current of popular favour was now changed: the queen was conſidered as an object of horror, while the fate of the unfortunate Edward was univerſally deplored. A ſcene of majeſty in diſtreſs attracted the pity, compaſſion, and tears of the people. Even the earl of Lancaſter himſelf was touched with theſe generous ſentiments, and treated his royal priſoner with the greateſt kindneſs and reſpect.

But the meaſure of Iſabella's wickedneſs was not yet full. It was not ſufficient to have dethroned and impriſoned her huſband, but ſhe alſo determined that his life ſhould fall a ſacrifice to her ſafety. Both ſhe and Mortimer well knew what would be the conſequence if Edward ſhould be again placed in the ſeat of power, and a reſolution was formed to add to their catalogue of crimes the guilt of murder. They therefore removed him from Kenelworth to Berkley-caſtle in Glouceſterſhire, where he was committed to the care of Sir John Gournay, and John de Maltravers, by whom he was alternately guarded.

Theſe two inhuman wretches treated the unfortunate king with every inſtance of indignity and cruelty they could invent. They hurried him about from one caſtle to another in order to elude the endeavours of his friends for his releaſe, and harraſſed him with every weight of grief they could poſſibly impoſe. Having by theſe means eluded the reſearches, and defeated the attempts of his friends, they brought him back to Berkeley-Caſtle, where they inflicted on him the moſt ſevere cruelties. But the natural ſtrength of Edward's conſtitution ſupported him under all theſe afflictions, till at length an order* was ſent from the queen and Mortimer to put an end to his life.

No ſooner did the two execrable monſters in human ſhape receive the horrid order, than they immediately proceeded to carry it into execution. They accordingly entered the king's apartment while he was aſleep, and ordering ſeveral ruffians, who attended them, to hold him faſt down on the bed, they thruſt a red-hot iron into his body, through a horn tube, in order to prevent any external marks of violence on his perſon; and in this manner ſoon put a period to his exiſtence.

The next day the cruel perpetrators of this horrid deed, willing to avoid ſuſpicion, and depending on the precautions they had taken, expoſed the body to the inſpection of the public; but though no wound or blemiſh appeared on any part of the body, yet the muſcles of his face were ſo diſtorted, as plainly to ſhew the dreadful agonies he had undergone; and many people, at a conſiderable diſtance heard the cries and groans he uttered, while undergoing thoſe excruciating torments which produced his death. The body, however, was interred (without any enquiry being made into the cauſe of the king's deceaſe) in the abbey of St. Peter at Glouceſter; but the regicides, inſtead of procuring thoſe rewards they expected for their diabolical cruelty, were obliged to conſult their own ſafety by flight.

Thus fell, by the hands of inhuman aſſaſſins, Edward II. king of England, in the 43d year of his age, and 20th of his reign.

Though this unfortunate monarch experienced the fate of a tyrant, yet, perhaps, it will be difficult to find, in the annals of hiſtory, a prince more innocent or more inoffenſive. But he was wholly diſqualified for the arduous taſk of government; and the troubles which fell on himſelf, and diſturbed the peace of the kingdom, during the greater part of his reign, aroſe from his making himſelf a dupe to baſe and ambitious miniſters. In ſhort, Edward was more weak than wicked, and fully atoned for the errors of his conduct by the length and ſeverity of his afflictions.

Edward II. left four children, namely, Edward, his eldeſt ſon, and ſucceſſor on the throne: John, afterwards created earl of Cornwall, who died at Perth; Jane, afterwards married to Edward Bruce, king of Scotland; and Eleanor, married to Reginald, count of Gueldres.

Remark-

---

* This order was contained in a letter directed to his keepers, Maltravers and Gournay, and couched in ſuch artful and ambiguous terms, that though the perſons to whom it was directed ſhould take it in the literal ſenſe, yet it furniſhed them with an opportunity of exculpating themſelves, in caſe they ſhould be called to account for the horrid deed. The words contained in the letter were theſe:

Edwardum occidere nolite timere bonum eſt:

The tranſlation of which is as follows:

To ſhed king Edward's blood
Refuſe to fear I count it good.

Theſe fallacious and artful lines admit of either a good or bad, a peaceable or ſanguinary conſtruction; for if a comma is placed after the Latin word nolite, or the Engliſh word refuſe, the lines imply the criminality of entertaining any idea of the king's death; but if on the contrary the comma is placed after the Latin word timere, or the Engliſh word fear, the command to commit the murder appears poſitive.

Remarkable Occurrences during the reign of Edward II.

A. D.

1315 A dreadful ſickneſs and famine happened in England, which carried off great numbers of the inhabitants.

1320 The greateſt earthquake happened that had ever been known in England, by which many buildings, in different parts of the kingdom were levelled with the ground.

During this reign the order of the Knights Templars was diſſolved, by pope Clement V. who was inſtigated thereto by the cruel and vindictive diſpoſition of Philip the Fair, king of France. An ample teſtimony of the great piety and morals of theſe people was ſent from England to the pope; but without producing any good effect. The order was annihilated, the knights diſtributed into ſeveral convents, and their poſſeſſions transferred to the order of St. John of Jeruſalem.

THE late king ſubmitted to the neceſſity of reſigning the enſigns of royalty on the 20th of January, which was no ſooner made known to the perfidious Iſabella and her infamous paramour, than they immediately cauſed young Edward to be proclaimed king, and on the 26th of the ſame month he was crowned at Weſtminſter by the archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Young Edward poſſeſſed by nature all thoſe ſhining qualities which predict the glory of a reign, and the happineſs of a ſtate. But at the time he was advanced to that ſeat of power from which his father had been removed by the artifices of an ambitious woman, he was only fourteen years of age, and conſequently incapable of guiding the helm of government. A council of regency (conſiſting of twelve perſons, viz. five prelates and ſeven lay peers) was therefore appointed by the parliament to direct the adminiſtration of public affairs; and the earl of Lancaſter was choſen guardian and protector of the young king during his minority.

A. D. 1327. A truce had been concluded between the late king of England and Robert Bruce king of Scotland, but from the unſettled ſtate of the nation in conſequence of the depoſition of the former, Bruce made an attempt upon the caſtle of Norham. The governor, however, Sir Robert Manners, having received intelligence of his deſign, ſallied out with ſuch fury on the Scottiſh forces, that they were put to flight with great ſlaughter, and obliged to retire with precipitation into their own country. But this did not intimidate Bruce, who ſoon after collected an army of ten thouſand men, which he placed under the command of the earl of Murray and lord Douglas, with a deſign of making himſelf maſter of the northern counties of England.

Theſe were diſagreeable circumſtances to the Engliſh miniſtry, who were determined not to ſuffer ſuch inſults to paſs with impunity. Young Edward expreſſed the moſt earneſt deſire of leading his troops againſt the enemy, and chaſtiſing them for their inſolence. In conſequence of which, no objection being made to his requeſt, he marched to the northward at the head of 60,000 men, and found found the enemy encamped on the declivity of a hill, at the foot of which was the river Were. This was a ſituation ſo very advantageous to the Scots, that Edward could not bring them to an engagement, in conſequence of which he diſpatched a meſſenger, challenging them to meet him in the open field, and terminate the diſpute by a deciſive battle. Douglas, highly exaſperated at this challenge, was deſirous of accepting it; but the motion was over-ruled by Murray, who thought ſuch a meaſure would be incompatible with their then ſtate of ſecurity.

Douglas uſed all the force of argument he could in order to bring on a general engagement with the Engliſh; but this proving ineffectual, he reſolved no longer to remain idle in his camp. He accordingly put himſelf at the head of two hundred horſe, paſſed the river in the night, and entering the Engliſh camp unperceived, advanced as far as the royal tent, with a deſign to ſurprize and carry off the king. But the attempt was rendered abortive by ſome of Edward's ſervants, who awaking in the critical moment, made a noble reſiſtance, and ſacrificed their lives in his defence. The king himſelf cut his way through the Scots, who had entered his camp, and eſcaped; and the Engliſh falling with great violence on the enemy, the greater part were ſlain; but Douglas himſelf, with a few followers, found means to retreat to his own army. The next night the Scots decamped and marched with ſuch expedition, that Edward, finding it would be impoſſible to overtake them, marched with his army to Durham, and from thence to York.

Edward had been long contracted in marriage to Philippa of Hainault, and he now determined to celebrate his nuptials with that lady. Accordingly ambaſſadors were diſpatched to the continent to bring over his intended bride, who arrived in London, (attended by her uncle John de Hainault, and a pompous retinue) on the 23d of December. She immediately proceeded to York, where the nuptials were ſolemnized with great pomp on the 24th of January; but the ceremony of her coronation was not performed till ſome time after her arrival in England.

A. D. 1328. When Edward returned to London with his new conſort, he found great diſturbances had taken place owing to the conduct of Mortimer, who had uſurped the whole authority of government, and from his imperious proceedings, grew daily more obnoxious to the people. The king himſelf was highly incenſed, and determined to free himſelf from the power of a miniſter who ſeemed totally regardleſs of the honour and welfare of his country.

Mortimer, finding a material alteration in the behaviour of the king, was apprehenſive of danger; and therefore, while in his power, thought it neceſſary, at all events, to make peace with the Scots, to which he was induced by the advice of the perfidious Iſabella. He accordingly, in the name of the king, entered into a negociation with Bruce, whom he acknowledged as king of Scotland, and renounced the Engliſh claim of ſuperiority, on condition of his paying the ſum of thirty thouſand marks. But this peace was no ſooner made public than it excited an univerſal clamour throughout the kingdom, and the people expreſſed their reſentment in the moſt ſevere terms. They declared openly that it was neither honourable or neceſſary; that thoſe who concluded it had baſely ſacrificed both the blood and treaſure of the nation to private views; that the queen-mother (who, under pretence of her huſband's incapacity, had uſurped his authority) now ſufficiently diſcovered how unable herſelf was to have any direction in the affairs of government; and that the errors of the depoſed king had been inferior to thoſe committed ſince her being concerned in the public adminiſtration.

Mortimer was no ſtranger to his having incurred the general hatred of the people, and therefore began to dread the conſequences, more eſpecially when he was informed, that the earls of Kent, Norfolk and Lancaſter, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the biſhops of London and Winchester, with ſeveral powerful barons, had determined to impeach him before the parliament. He was ſenſible of the conſequences that muſt take place if a majority in that aſſembly ſhould favour the complainants, and exerted all his power to bring about a reconciliation. Nor did he endeavour in vain; the parties who meant to accuſe him appeared ſatisfied, on his promiſing that all grievances ſhould be removed during the enſuing parliament.

A. D. 1329. Though the ambitious and baſe Mortimer was obliged to temporize with the diſcontented barons, yet he was determined to be revenged on them for the treatment he had received; to effect which he ſingled out an object that might ſtrike his enemies with terror. The weakneſs of Edmund earl of Kent (brother to the late king) promoted his criminal intentions. A report had been ſpread, at the inſtigation of Mortimer, that Edward II. was yet alive, and confined in Corfe-Caſtle. The earl, who had always retained an affection for his brother (though he had joined the queen's party to drive the two Spencers from the kingdom) believed the report, and publicly declared his deſign of replacing him on the throne. But the treacherous Mortimer had no ſooner procured ſufficient proofs of his deſign than he cauſed him to be ſeized, and committed to that priſon where he had flattered himſelf he ſhould meet with his unhappy brother, whom he now diſcovered was no more, and that the report of his exiſtence was totally groundleſs.

A. D. 1330. As ſoon as the parliament met, which was on the 13th of March, the unfortunate earl of Kent was formally accuſed of high-treaſon, and, being found guilty, was ſentenced to be beheaded. Iſabella and Mortimer, apprehenſive of young Edward's lenity towards his uncle, hurried the execution, and the earl ſuffered the next day after his ſentence was pronounced. So beloved, however, was he by the people, that when brought on the ſcaffold the common executioner refuſed to perform his office; nor could any one be found to ſupply his place till late in the evening, when the ſentence was executed by a felon from the Marſhalſea, who, as a reward for his ſervice, received a free pardon for all the robberies he had committed.

This cruel and perfidious act of Mortimer rendered him more univerſally deteſted than ever. All parties, forgetting their former animoſities, now conſpired the deſtruction of this inſolent and baſe miniſter. Edward himſelf, then in his eighteenth year, was deſirous of taking into his own hands the reins of government, and bringing to exemplary puniſhment a man who made no ſcruple of ſacrificing the honour of his country, and the lives of the nobility, to his inſatiable thirſt of power. But it was abſolutely neceſſary to uſe the utmoſt precaution. Mortimer had ſo entirely engroſſed the adminiſtration of affairs, moſt of the principal people were at his devotion. He was continually attended by a great number of armed knights and their followers, and had even ſurrounded the throne itſelf with his emiſſaries, who acted as ſpies on the behaviour of the king and his friends.

Theſe were difficulties that might have deterred a prince of leſs fortitude than Edward; but he was a ſtranger to fear, and determined, at all events, to carry his deſign into execution. He communicated his intentions to William Lord Montacute, and ſeveral other noblemen, all of whom promiſed their aſſiſtance, and it was determined to ſeize Mortimer during the ſeſſion of parliament, which was ſummoned to meet in a few days at Nottingham. In order to this, it was agreed, that Edward ſhould occupy the caſtle of Nottingham, which would enable them to carry on their deſigns with more ſafety and ſucceſs; but on their arrival, they found it already occupied by Mortimer, Iſabella and their attendants, one or two apartments only being left for the king. It was now ſufficiently evident, that it would be impoſſible to execute their deſign without the aſſiſtance of Sir William Eland, the governor of the caſtle. Lord Montacute was therefore ſent to gain him over to their party, which was effected with great facility, that gentleman joyfully embracing an opportunity of ſhewing at once his affection for the perſon of his ſovereign, and his deteſtation of thoſe, who by their infamous conduct, had brought their country to the brink of deſtruction. But at the ſame time, he informed Montacute that it would be impracticable for him to admit any aſſiſtance by the common entry, the caſtle being ſtrictly guarded, the gates locked every evening, and the keys carried to the queen. He, however, recollected that there was a ſubterraneous paſſage formerly contrived as a ſecret outlet to the fortreſs, but then concealed by an heap of rubbiſh. Through this cavern therefore he undertook to conduct the confederates to Mortimer's apartment. The rubbiſh was accordingly removed, and the paſſage being clear, they proceeded till they came to the apartment of Mortimer, which they immediately entered, and having forcibly ſeized his perſon, ſent him under a ſtrong guard to the Tower of London.

The next day the parliament was broke up at Nottingham, and the members ordered to aſſemble at Weſtminſter in order to try the tyrannical Mortimer. At the ſame time a proclamation was iſſued out for all perſons who had any complaints to prefer againſt him, to appear before that aſſembly, in order to obtain redreſs for all their grievances. Nor was juſtice long deferred. The firſt buſineſs that engaged the attention of the national aſſembly was the impeachment of the tyrannical Mortimer. The accuſation was immediately drawn up, and conſiſted of nine articles, which contained many high crimes and miſdemeanors. Among others, he was accuſed of having uſurped the regal power from the council of regency appointed by the parliament; of having procured the death of the late king; of having deceived the earl of Kent into a conſpiracy to reſtore that prince; of having ſolicited and obtained exorbitant grants of the royal demeſnes; of having diſſipated the public treaſure; of ſecreting for his own uſe twenty thouſand marks of the money paid by the king of Scotland; and of having repaired to the parliament with an armed force, diſturbed their deliberations, and threatened ſeveral of the members with death. Theſe facts being all notorious, it was thought unneceſſary to call witneſſes; and Mortimer was condemned to ſuffer as a traitor, without being admitted to make his defence. The ſentence was executed on the twenty-ninth of November, at a place called the Elms, about a mile from London, where this once powerful nobleman was hanged on a gibbet like a common malefactor. The queen was confined to her houſe in the neighbourhood of London, and her revenue reduced to four thouſand pounds per annum. The king conſtantly viſited her once or twice a year, during the remainder of her life; but ſhe never recovered the leaſt degree of power or authority in the ſtate.

A. D. 1331. Edward, having now taken the reins of government into his own hands, determined to purſue ſuch meaſures as might reſtore happineſs and tranquillity to his kingdom. The people had long formed the moſt pleaſing ideas of his great abilities for government; and the firſt acts of his adminiſtration convinced them their hopes were not formed on a chimerical baſis. He reſumed all the grants that had been made of the royal demeſnes during his minority, and rewarded thoſe who had aſſiſted him in ſeizing the ambitious Mortimer. He remitted the fines and confiſcations that had been awarded againſt thoſe barons who oppoſed the deſtructive meaſures of that miniſter; reverſed the ſentence of attainder that had been paſſed againſt the earl of Kent, reſtored his ſon to the family eſtate and honours, and his widow to the enjoyment of her jointure. He removed the ſheriffs that had been appointed by Mortimer, and placed others in their ſtead; diſpatched orders to the judges to adminiſter ſtrict juſtice to all perſons without delay, notwithſtanding any letters that might have been procured from the crown to the contrary, and purſued every other meaſure that appeared moſt conducive towards the well-governing of the nation.

But there were many other diſorders, beſides thoſe which had crept into the adminiſtration of public affairs, and which equally required the abilities and firmneſs of Edward to remove. The kingdom was infeſted with numerous bands of robbers, who, taking advantage of the late commotions, had ſet the power of the magiſtrates at defiance, and exerciſed, with impunity, their lawleſs depredations. They were even openly protected by the great barons, who employed them againſt their enemies. It was therefore previouſly neceſſary to deſtroy this alarming connection before the evil could be removed. Accordingly Edward exacted a ſolemn promiſe from his barons, aſſembled in parliament, to break off all connections with ſuch malefactors, as a diſgrace to nobility. He iſſued a proclamation, forbidding all juſts and tournaments, which ſerved as a plauſible pretence for aſſembling great numbers of armed men, to the diſturbance of the public tranquillity, and the terror of the peaceable inhabitants. After taking theſe neceſſary meaſures, he marched in perſon againſt the robbers; and by his courage and activity, the more powerful troops were broken and diſperſed; many were taken and executed, and great numbers flew for ſafety to the continent.

The example of the king was followed by all thoſe appointed to adminiſter juſtice. Theſe were indefatigable in diſcovering and purſuing criminals, whom they ſeverely puniſhed accordingly to their reſpective crimes. Thus was the great evil, which had ſo long ſubſiſted in a ſhort time removed, moved, the ſafety of travellers ſecured, and peace and tranquillity reſtored to the kingdom.

A. D. 1332. In the beginning of this year a confederacy was formed by ſome of the Engliſh barons for placing Edward Baliol on the throne of Scotland, the cauſe of which, with the particulars attending it, are as follows. Robert Bruce died ſoon after the peace made between the Engliſh and Scots by Mortimer, leaving his ſon David, then a minor, under the guardianſhip of the earl of Murray. Among other articles in that treaty, it was ſtipulated, that both the Scottiſh nobility, who enjoyed lands in England before the commencement of the war, and the Engliſh, who enjoyed eſtates in Scotland, ſhould be reſtored to their reſpective poſſeſſions. Edward ſtrictly performed his part of the treaty; but Robert had refuſed to follow the example of the Engliſh monarch. It would have been in vain for the Engliſh barons to have attempted any other method for redreſs but that of petition, while Robert ſwayed the Scottiſh ſceptre; but the feeble ſtate of the kingdom under a minority induced them to enter into an aſſociation for recovering their rights. Lord Beaumont, who was at the head of this confederacy, claimed the earldom of Buchan in Scotland; and propoſed, as the moſt effectual method of obtaining juſtice, to invite Edward Baliol, ſon to John Baliol then in England, to make an attempt for recovering his father's throne.

Young Baliol, who, ever ſince the death of his father, had lived on his patrimonial eſtate in Normandy, little thought of ever attempting to revive the claims of his family to the crown of Scotland; but the propoſal was too flattering to be refuſed. He therefore readily engaged in the enterprize, and joining the diſcontented barons, they applied themſelves to ſuch meaſures as were moſt likely to facilitate their deſigns.

As ſoon as the Scots were informed of theſe proceedings, they immediately made application to Edward for aſſiſtance; but the Engliſh monarch was too prudent to engage openly in the deſign, though he ſecretly encouraged the undertaking of Baliol, and blew the ſparks of civil diſcord into a flame. At this time Scotland was in a very feeble condition. Murray, the late regent, had ſome time paid the debt of nature; and lord Douglas (who, as well as Murray often led the Scots to victory) diſdaining a life of indolence and eaſe, had paſſed over to the continent, where he periſhed in a battle againſt the Moors.

Baliol and the diſcontented barons having raiſed a body of forces, embarked near Ravenſpur in Yorkſhire, and in a few days reached the coaſt of Fife. On their approaching the ſhore, they perceived a body of the militia, commanded by Sir Alexander Seaton, drawn up on the beach to oppoſe their landing; but this, however, they effected by dint of reſolution, and fell on the Scottiſh forces with ſuch fury that they were totally defeated, and their general himſelf, with near a thouſand of his men, ſlain on the ſpot.

Elated at this firſt ſucceſs of their enterprize, the Engliſh marched to Dumfermling, where they ſeized a magazine of arms and proviſions. Here Baliol took a review of his little army, which he found fell ſhort of three thouſand men. But this did not intimidate him: he wanted neither valour nor activity; and therefore, leaving Dumfermling, marched at the head of his forces into the heart of the country, flattering himſelf with receiving aſſiſtance from the old partizans of his family.

In the mean time Donald earl of Marre, who had ſucceeded Murray in the regency, collected an army of near 40,000 men, and advanced to meet the enemy. But he was greatly inferior in military abilities to his predeceſſor, having neither prudence nor intrepidity; ſo that all his motions were ill-judged, and he obſerved no order in the encampment of his army.

Baliol being informed that the earl of Marre was encamped with his forces at a place called Gladſmuir, on the bank of the river Earn, determined to attack him, and hazard the fate of his enterprize in a ſingle battle. He accordingly marched with all expedition at the head of his forces and paſſing the ſtream of the ſmall river Duplin, fell ſo unexpectedly on the Scottiſh forces during the night, that they were thrown into the utmoſt confuſion, and driven from their camp with great ſlaughter.

From this ſucceſs the Engliſh flattered themſelves with having obtained a complete victory; but they ſoon found themſelves miſtaken, for early the next morning ſome of Baliol's officers aſcending an eminence to ſurvey the country, perceived the Scottiſh army (who had recovered from the panic into which they were thrown the preceding night) advancing towards them in three diviſions. In conſequence of this intelligence, the Engliſh immediately flew to arms, and, poſting themſelves in a narrow defile, reſolutely waited the approach of the enemy.

The Scots, exaſperated at their late defeat by ſo ſmall a body of forces in compariſon with their own, advanced to the attack with the utmoſt precipitation, without regarding ſome broken ground which lay between them and the Engliſh. But they were ſoon convinced of their folly; their ranks were diſordered, and the ſecond diviſion preſſing upon the firſt, threw the whole into ſuch confuſion, that they became an eaſy prey to the Engliſh. Above twelve thouſand of the Scots fell in the battle: and among them the flower of their nobility, particularly the regent himſelf, Robert Bruce, a natural ſon of the late king; the earls of Athole and Montieth; and the lords Hay, Keith, and Lindſey.

Theſe repeated ſucceſſes ſo animated Baliol that he advanced with his army to Perth, which he entered without oppoſition, and immediately repaired the fortifications. But he had hardly compleated this buſineſs, when the earl of Marche, and Sir Archibald Douglas, at the head of 40,000 men, inveſted the place by land, reſolving, if they could not reduce the place by any other means, to effect it by ſtarving the enemy. For this purpoſe they had collected a few veſſels, under the command of one John Crabbe, a Flemiſh ſailor, in order to block up the place by water. But this ſcheme was ſoon rendered abortive; for the Engliſh ſquadron, then lying at the mouth of the Tay to ſupply Baliol's army with proviſions, drove Crabbe from his ſtation, and poſſeſſed themſelves of the greater part of his ſhips.

From this overthrow the Scottiſh generals perceived it would be in vain to continue the blockade of Perth: they therefore abandoned the enterprize, made a retreat, and diſbanded their forces. In conſequence of this the greater part of the nobility and gentry of Scotland repaired to Perth, in order to make their ſubmiſſion to Baliol. The young king David and his queen were ſent to France, and, on the 27th of September, Baliol was crowned king of Scotland.

But Baliol did not long enjoy the crown he had ſo eaſily obtained; for having imprudently diſmiſſed the greater part of his Engliſh followers, he was driven out of the kingdom, and obliged to ſeek protection in England.

A. D. 1333. Baliol had not long been in England, when the conduct of the Scots gave Edward juſt reaſon to break the peace which had been made with them by Mortimer, and to exert himſelf in favour of Baliol. Elated with their late ſucceſs againſt their new king, and allured by the hopes of plunder, the Scots broke into Cumberland, and laid great part of the country waſte with fire and ſword. In conſequence of this Edward immediately ſent Sir Anthony Lacy, with a conſiderable body of forces, to repel the inſurgents. This buſineſs he effected with great ſucceſs, the invaders being defeated, and obliged to make a precipitate retreat to their own country.

Douglas, the regent, was alarmed at the proceedings of Edward, and ſpared neither entreaties, excuſes nor ſubmiſſions, to divert the gathering ſtorm that threatened the deſtruction of his country. But all his efforts were in vain: Edward liſtened only to the voice of ambition.

Having raiſed a conſiderable body of forces, Edward marched into Scotland, and opened the campaign with the ſiege of Berwick. That place was conſidered by the Scots as the moſt important in their country, and the regent had accordingly furniſhed it with a ſtrong garriſon under the command of Sir William Keith; while himſelf headed a numerous army on the frontiers, in order to penetrate into England, as ſoon as the caſtle of Berwick ſhould be inveſted by Edward. The ſiege continued near two months, when great part of the fortifications being demoliſhed, the garriſon agreed to capitulate, if not relieved in five days. Theſe terms were accepted, and a meſſenger diſpatched to Sir Archibald Douglas, informing him of the conditions, and preſſing him to march immediately to their relief, without which they muſt be compelled to give up the town, and ſurrender themſelves priſoners to the enemy.

The great importance of Berwick, and the impatience of his forces to be led againſt the Engliſh, determined Douglas to comply with the requeſt of the garriſon. He accordingly marched to their relief, and drew up his forces at the foot of Halidown hill, in ſight of the Engliſh camp. Douglas divided his army into four bodies, each of which was headed by one of the principal nobility of Scotland. The Engliſh were alſo drawn up in four ſeparate bodies, and both wings flanked with archers; and in this diſpoſition Edward waited the attack of the enemy, who began to aſcend the hill with great impetuoſity about five in the afternoon; but the ſteepneſs of the aſcent, the weight of their armour, the inceſſant ſhowers of arrows diſcharged from the bows of the Engliſh, and the large ſtones rolled down after them, ſoon checked their career. They ſuddenly made a halt; and their general, being that inſtant tranſfixed with an arrow, fell lifeleſs to the ground.

This incident threw the Scottiſh forces into the utmoſt confuſion, which being perceived by Edward, he determined to take advantage of it, and accordingly ordered lord D'Arcy, at the head of a body of light-armed infantry, to charge them in flank, while himſelf attacked their front with a detachment of veterans. The Scottiſh knights, in order to render the action more ſteady and deſperate, had diſmounted from their horſes, but they could not ſtand the ſhock of the Engliſh. A compleat victory was ſoon obtained by Edward, and ſuch of the Scots as eſcaped the ſword, were obliged to ſave themſelves by a precipitate flight. Near thirty thouſand of the Scots fell in the action, and all their knights were either ſlain or taken priſoners. The town and caſtle of Berwick immediately ſurrendered; and Edward, after leaving a conſiderable part of his army with Baliol, returned to England.

It was now impoſſible for the Scots to oppoſe the power of Baliol: the principal part of their nobility were loſt, their army greatly reduced, their king in France, and their regent ſlain. Submiſſion, therefore, was their only reſource. Baliol, after leaving a ſtrong garriſon in Berwick, marched with his forces through the principal parts of the country; and all the caſtles, except thoſe of Dumbarton, Urquhart, and two or three others, which were deemed impregnable, opened their gates at the firſt ſummons.

A. D. 1334. In conſequence of theſe ſucceſſes Baliol, in order to place himſelf ſubſtantially in the ſeat of power, ſummoned a parliament to meet at Edinburgh on the 10th of February. In this aſſembly Baliol was acknowledged king, and the Scottiſh nobility ſwore fealty to him: the ſuperiority of England was again recognized: Berwick, Dunbar, Roxburgh, Edinburgh, and all the ſouth-eaſt counties of Scotland were declared to be for ever annexed to the crown of England; and the diſcontented Engliſh barons were put into immediate poſſeſſion of the eſtates they claimed in Scotland.

The proceedings of this aſſembly greatly irritated the Scots, who determined, as ſoon as poſſible, to purſue ſuch meaſures as might render them abortive. Nor was it long before an opportunity offered which encouraged them to attempt their deſign. Baliol, thinking himſelf ſufficiently ſecure on the throne, diſmiſſed his Engliſh troops, and ſent them to their own country; in conſequence of which the Scots immediately flew to arms, renounced their fealty to Baliol, ſwore allegiance to Bruce, and elected Sir Andrew Murray regent of the kingdom.

A. D. 1335. Several ſkirmiſhes took place between the forces under the command of Murray, and thoſe of Baliol, in moſt of which the former was victorious; and Baliol, finding his intereſt greatly decline, applied for aſſiſtance to the Engliſh monarch, who accordingly made preparations for again invading Scotland.

Having raiſed a conſiderable body of forces, Edward proceeded to Berwick, from whence he purſued his march, without oppoſition, into the very heart of the country, the Scots having abandoned all the plains on his approach, and retired to their mountains and faſtneſſes. Knowing it would be in vain to purſue them, Edward marched to Perth, from whence he ſent a detachment of his forces, under the command of his brother John of Eltham and Sir Anthony Lacy, to ravage the weſtern counties, which were principally inhabited by the adherents of Bruce.

In the mean time the Scots who had retired to their mountains, having greatly increaſed in numbers, determined to hazard a battle, and leaving their faſtneſſes, marched with all expedition againſt the Engliſh. The two armies no ſooner met than a bloody engagement took place, which was maintained, for ſome time, with great obſtinacy on both ſides; but at length victory declared in favour of the Engliſh, prodigious numbers of the Scots were ſlain on the field of battle, and the reſt reſt obliged to ſave themſelves by a precipitate flight.

This defeat ſtruck ſuch a damp on the ſpirits of Bruce's adherents, that they determined not to make any farther oppoſition, but immediately ſubmit themſelves, and ſolicit the Engliſh monarch for a peace. Accordingly application was made to Edward, who, as the ſeaſon was then far advanced, liſtened to their requeſt, and a treaty of peace was concluded on the following conditions: "That the Scottiſh noblemen ſhould receive a free pardon for all former offences; that they ſhould enjoy their lands, honours and offices in Scotland, and be reſtored to their Engliſh poſſeſſions which had been forfeited: That all the privileges and franchiſes of the kirk and boroughs of Scotland ſhould continue unaltered and inviolable: That none but natives ſhould be put into the offices of that crown and kingdom, excepting in ſome particular caſes where their king, Edward Baliol, ſhould make uſe of his prerogative in favour of perſons of another nation." It was alſo agreed, "That Edward Baliol ſhould enjoy the crown of Scotland during his natural life; and that, at his death, it ſhould deſcend to David Bruce, who, in the mean time, ſhould reſide in London, and be maintained at the expence of the Engliſh monarch, in a manner conſiſtent with his dignity as heir to the Scottiſh throne."

Hoſtilities being thus terminated, Edward ordered the fortifications at Perth to be repaired, and the caſtles of Edinburgh and Stirling to be rebuilt. He alſo appointed the earl of Athol guardian of the northern parts of the kingdom; and, leaving a part of his forces for the protection of Baliol, returned with the remainder to England.

But the peace thus made with the Scots was of ſhort duration. They had, indeed, ſubmitted to Edward, but were far from being reconciled to their condition, and only watched for a favourable opportunity of ſhaking off a yoke to which neceſſity alone had compelled them to ſubmit. Nor was it long before this opportunity offered. The earl of Athol, inſtead of ſoothing the Scots, and applying lenients to heal the wounds of their country, treated them with rigour; and the caſtle of Kildrummy, in which the regent's wife had ſhut herſelf up, having ſtill refuſed to open its gates to the Engliſh, the guardian imprudently beſieged the fortreſs. This action awakened all the pride and anger of the Scots: the earl of Marche and Sir William Douglas haſtened immediately to the relief of the fortreſs, attacked the beſiegers with the utmoſt impetuoſity, routed them with great ſlaughter, and the earl of Athol himſelf fell among the ſlain.

Animated with this ſucceſs, the Scots inveſted ſeveral other caſtles; the ſtandard of war was again diſplayed, and forces were collected in every part of the kingdom. But before Edward could again march againſt them, the king of France interpoſed, and a truce was concluded till the ninth of May, in the enſuing year.

A. D. 1336. This truce was conſidered both by the Engliſh and Scots, as a prelude to a final peace, and accordingly conferences were opened in the beginning of the ſpring at Newcaſtle; but Philip de Valois (who then filled the throne of France, and had found the diſſentions between the Scots and Engliſh to his own intereſt) gave ſuch inſtructions to his envoys, that though they appeared as mediators between the contending parties, they omitted no opportunity of embarraſſing the parties concerned in the negociation, and rendering the intended treaty abortive. At length the French envoys told them, that their maſter would never abandon the cauſe of the unfortunate and injured David Bruce, but would ſupport him to the utmoſt of his power. Theſe promiſes ſo elated the Scottiſh deputies, that they inſiſted on terms which could not be accepted by Edward, who immediately broke off the treaty in great rage, and both parties made great preparations for deciding the conteſt by the ſword.

Edward had acquired ſuch popularity by having enacted ſeveral excellent laws for the promotion of commerce, and general welfare of his people, that the parliament readily granted him ſuch ſupplies as were neceſſary for carrying on the war againſt the Scots. Accordingly, having raiſed a powerful army, and given the command to Henry, ſon of the old earl of Lancaſter, he ordered them to aſſemble at Berwick, a ſhort time before the expiration of the truce lately made with the Scots.

Having given theſe orders Edward ſummoned a parliament to meet at Northampton, in order to take into conſideration the neceſſary meaſures to be purſued for oppoſing the deſigns of the French monarch, who had not only ſent a body of forces to the aſſiſtance of the Scots, but had likewiſe threatened to invade England. During their deliberations Edward received advice that Murray, the regent, had taken the field, reduced the caſtle of St. Andrew's, and proceeded with his forces to inveſt that of Stirling. Alarmed at this intelligence, he immediately repaired to Berwick, where he was joined by his troops, and the next day marched to Perth.

As ſoon as Edward's arrival was known, the Scots made a vigorous aſſault upon the caſtle of Stirling, in which Sir William Keith the governor was ſlain; but being repulſed in this attempt with great loſs, and hearing that Edward was advancing to the relief of the place, they abandoned the enterprize, and retired to their faſtneſſes to avoid a general engagement.

Edward now took his rout through Athol to Inverneſs, and from thence to the ſhire of Murray, which he laid deſolate. The town of Aberdeen was reduced to aſhes, and Edward, after deſtroying the principal places in the northern parts of Scotland, returned with his army to Perth, where, after ſtaying a ſhort time, he left a part of his forces with Baliol, and returned to England.

A. D. 1337. Edward had, for ſome time, entertained notions of engaging in an enterprize of much greater importance than that of ſubduing the Scots, and was now determined, if poſſible, to carry his deſign into execution. He accordingly ſummoned a parliament to meet at Weſtminſter on the 3d of March, when he declared his reſolution of invading France, and endeavouring to wreſt from Philip de Valois that crown of which he conceived himſelf to be the true heir as next in blood to the late king *.

Edward

* Charles the Fair, who died in 1328, having left no male children, Philip de Valois, his couſin-german, and firſt prince of the blood, was unanimouſly acknowledged his ſucceſſor. As Charles left ſeveral daughters great diſputes had taken place relative to the ſucceſſion, but it was at length decided, according to the Salic Law, that all females ſhould be excluded the Edward was greatly encouraged in this reſolution by Robert d'Artois, a prince of the blood of France, who having been condemned in conſequence of a forgery he had committed, took refuge in England. This prince bore the moſt implacable hatred to Philip, and therefore uſed the moſt forcible arguments to prevail on Edward to declare war againſt France, in order to ſupport his title to that crown.

Philip, being informed of the advice given by Robert d'Artois to the Engliſh monarch, immediately iſſued out a proclamation, offering a reward for his perſon, and at the ſame time confiſcating all his poſſeſſions in France. He likewiſe declared that every vaſſal of the crown, whether within or without the kingdom, who gave countenance to that traitor, ſhould, if apprehended, be put to death. The meaning of this menace was eaſily conceived by Edward, who immediately made preparations for invading France, and removing Philip, whom he conſidered as an uſurper, from the throne of that kingdom.

In order to ſecure ſucceſs in the intended enterprize, Edward determined to form alliances with the princes of the Low Countries, and on the frontiers of Germany; and therefore engaged in his ſervice the earl of Hainault, the duke of Brabant, the archbiſhop of Cologne, the duke of Guelders, and the princes of ſeveral other provinces. He, however, did not think this confederacy ſufficiently formidable: he was deſirous of obtaining the aſſiſtance of the Flemings, but ſome difficulties attended this acquiſition. The Flemings, who, by their arts and manufactures, had acquired riches and ſome ſhare of independence, had riſen in tumults, inſulted the nobility, driven their earl into France, and determined to free themſelves from every ſpecies of tyranny. The leader of theſe popular inſurrections was one Jacob Van Ardevelt, a rich brewer of Ghent, who governed the people in a more arbitrary manner than any of their lawful ſovereigns. He never appeared in the ſtreets without a guard of fourſcore perſons, who, from the leaſt ſignal given by their leader murdered any perſon who happened to fall under his diſpleaſure. Whatever he thought proper to propoſe in the aſſembly of the ſtates was never contradicted, becauſe every member feared his power. Edward courted the aſſiſtance of this ferocious leader, who refuſed to join in the alliance, unleſs he would aſſume the title of king of France, in order to remove the ſcruples of the Flemings, who made ſome heſitation on account of their doubts relative to the legal ſucceſſor to the French diadem.

Edward agreed to the propoſal made by Ardevelt, who, in conſequence thereof, politely invited him to come over to Flanders. About the ſame time Edward received from the emperor Lewis of Bavaria the title of "Vicar of the Empire," that he might appear to have a right of command over the German princes.

Every thing now portended an immediate rupture between the crowns of France and England. Philip invaded Guienne, and Edward ordered the duke of Brabant to demand, in his name, the crown of France, conſtituted him his lieutenant-general of that kingdom, and iſſued a proclamation, commanding the French, whom he called his ſubjects, to pay him obedience. Philip, having raiſed a conſiderable army, determined firſt to direct his arms againſt the Flemings, and to reinſtate the earl of Flanders in the poſſeſſion of that country. But Edward ſent a large body of forces to join his new allies, under the command of the earls of Derby and Suffolk, in order to render the deſigns of Philip abortive. The Engliſh, on their arrival on the coaſt, were informed that Guy de Rickenbourgh, natural brother to the earl of Flanders, had taken poſſeſſion of the iſle of Cadſant, in order to cut off all communication by ſea to Bruges and Ghent. It was therefore reſolved to drive him from that advantageous poſt. Guy, who was prepared for the attack, gave them a very warm reception; but the Engliſh, after an obſtinate diſpute, made good their landing, when a bloody battle enſued, in which the earl of Derby was thrown from his horſe, and would, in all probability, have been killed or taken priſoner, had he not been reſcued by Sir Walter Manny, a valiant knight of Hainault, who, at the head of a body of horſe, charged the enemy with the utmoſt fury, and took Guy de Rickenbourgh priſoner. The loſs of their leader ſtruck the French with conſternation; they immediately fell into confuſion, and were routed with prodigious ſlaughter. This victory filled Ardevelt and his party with joy; and the Flemings ſent a meſſage to Edward, preſſing him to come over without delay, and head the allied army in perſon.

A. D. 1338. Edward, having raiſed a conſiderable body of forces, and taken every prudent meaſure he could for the ſafety of his kingdom during his abſence, embarked for the continent with a fleet of 300 ſhips, accompanied by many of the chief nobility of England; and, after a quick and eaſy paſſage, landed at Antwerp, the capital city belonging to John duke of Brabant. But the ſeaſon being too far advanced, Edward did not take the field till the enſuing ſpring, when he marched at the head of 40,000 men, and encamped between Marchiennes and Douay. He had not, however, been long in this ſituation before he received advice that Philip was advancing, with a formidable army, to give him battle, in conſequence of which he immediately broke up his camp, and marched with all expedition to meet the enemy.

The two armies ſoon came within ſight of each other, and having formed their reſpective encampments, remained in that ſtate for ſix days, neither party ſeeming deſirous to come to action. At length Edward ſent an herald to Philip offering him battle, which being accepted, the following Friday was the day appointed for deciding the quarrel. But while both parties were preparing with equal ardor for the engagement, Philip received a letter from Robert king of Naples (who was eſteemed a great aſtrologer) foretelling him ill ſucceſs whenever he ſhould fight the Engliſh. This ſo operated on the mind of Philip, that though Edward, on the day appointed, drew out his the ſovereignty. Edward, as ſon to Iſabella, ſiſter to the late king, claimed his right to the crown of France, notwithſtanding he had done homage for Guienne to Philip de Valois, and by that act acknowledged him as ſuperior lord. But an unjuſt cauſe ceaſes to appear ſuch when there is reaſon to hope for ſucceſs. Opportunity determines the conduct of the greater part of mankind; and that now offering Edward was determined to embrace it, and, if poſſible, make himſelf maſter of the throne of France; to which it is to be obſerved, he was more ſtrongly induced, in order to puniſh Philip for having taken part with the Scots.

his forces early in the morning in order of battle, the former declined coming to an engagement. In conſequence of which Edward, the next day, wheeled off towards Aviſnes for the ſake of a more convenient ſituation, and ſent word to Philip that he would wait for him all Sunday in order of battle. This, however, was a challenge the French king did not think proper to accept. On the contrary, he broke up his camp, and after fortifying his frontier towns with ſtrong garriſons, returned with his forces to Paris; in conſequence of which Edward retreated, put his German troops into winter quarters, and marched with his own forces to Bruſſels.

Edward had entered into engagements with the duke of Brabant to ſtay in the Low Countries till the war ſhould be ended; but he found it impoſſible to fulfil his promiſe. His abſence had occaſioned many diſorders in England, where bands of robbers diſturbed the peace of the nation; and the adherents of Bruce had not only recovered what they had loſt in Scotland, but alſo invaded the northern counties of England. Theſe were ſufficient reaſons for Edward's leaving the continent; but, in order to ſatisfy the duke of Brabant, who ſtrongly objected to his departure, he left him four Engliſh lords (beſides his queen, who was at Antwerp) as pledges for his return.

A. D. 1340. Having thus ſettled matters for the preſent on the continent, Edward embarked for England, and, on the 21ſt of February landed at Harwich. He immediately proceeded to London, and the next day iſſued out writs for aſſembling a parliament at Weſtminſter on the 29th of March. The members, at this meeting, ſhewed an uncommon alacrity in aſſiſting their monarch, and providing for the ſecurity of the realm againſt all invaders. They granted the king a large ſupply for carrying on the war with France; and orders were iſſued for fortifying Southampton and the Iſle of Wight; for fitting out a fleet of one hundred and fifty ſail to protect the coaſts; for ſending ſupplies of proviſions to the caſtles of Edinburgh and Stirling, and for raiſing bodies of foot and horſe to defend the marches of Scotland. In grateful return for theſe ſingular marks of affection Edward granted a full remiſſion of all debts due to the crown, and of all proſecutions on foreſt-treſpaſſes ſince his acceſſion to the throne; to which he likewiſe added a confirmation of the two great charters.

While Edward was making the neceſſary preparations for returning to the continent, he received advice from the duke of Gueldres, that the French had got together a powerful fleet to intercept him in his paſſage. In conſequence of this upwards of forty ſail of large ſhips were immediately fitted out for his convoy, and furniſhed with every article neceſſary to withſtand the attack of an enemy.

All things being ready, Edward embarked with his forces early in the morning of the 23th of June, attended by the principal nobility of his kingdom. The next day they eſpied the French fleet in the harbour of Sluys upon which Edward, after giving orders for making preparations to engage, ſent ſome knights on ſhore to bring him an account of their numbers; but they returned with their intelligence ſo late, that he could not begin the engagement that evening, and his fleet was obliged to lay all night at anchor.

Early the next morning Edward ſaw the enemy's fleet lying about a mile from the harbour, and ranged in three diviſions, each under the command of an admiral. In conſequence of this he immediately drew up his ſhips in like order, placing the largeſt in the firſt line, well provided with archers and men at arms. The ſecond diviſion was ordered to keep at ſome diſtance to windward, and prevent the firſt from being encloſed by the enemy; and the third was reſerved for the protection of the tranſports, which were loaded with baggage and military ſtores.

Having thus formed the line of battle, and obtained the weather-gage, Edward bore down upon the enemy, and a deſperate engagement enſued, which laſted from ten in the morning till ſeven at night. The ſhips engaged yard-arm and yard-arm with incredible fury, and the Engliſh noblemen and knights exerted all their power in ſignalizing themſelves under the eye of their ſovereign, who animated them by his own example. The Engliſh archers made a terrible ſlaughter among the French and Genoeſe, and the men at arms attacked them at ſo cloſe quarters that multitudes, in deſpair, leaped over-board, and periſhed in the ſea. The firſt diviſion of the French was totally defeated, and the ſecond greatly diſordered, when admiral Morley arriving with ſome Flemiſh ſhips joined the Engliſh, and falling on the ſhattered ſquadrons of the enemy, bore down all oppoſition, ſo that Edward obtained a compleat victory.* Two of the French admirals, with upwards of 20,000 men, were ſlain, and the greater part of their largeſt ſhips taken; while the loſs on the part of the Engliſh amounted to about four thouſand. Edward received a ſlight wound in the thigh, and on that account remained all night on board his ſhip. The next day he landed with all his forces at Sluys, and immediately ſet out on his march to Ghent, where he found his queen had, a ſhort time before, been delivered of a ſon named John, and who was afterwards duke of Lancaſter.

The naval victory obtained by Edward over the French, added a luſtre to his power among the different allies; and he ſoon marched from Ghent at the head of an army of 150,000 men, compoſed of Engliſh, Germans, Flemings and Gaſcons. The firſt attempt was the ſiege of Tournay, which Edward had no ſooner inveſted than he detached 50,000 men, under the command of Robert D'Artois, with orders to poſt himſelf near St. Omer's to prevent any aſſiſtance from that garriſon in behalf of the beſieged. Robert's troops were chiefly compoſed of tradeſmen, who had never faced an enemy, and were wholly ſtrangers to military diſcipline. From ſuch troops very little could be expected; and accordingly they were totally routed by a ſally from the garriſon, notwithſtanding the great abilities of their general.

This defeat, however, did not intimidate Edward, who puſhed the ſiege of Tournay with the utmoſt

* This defeat was conſidered in France as having given ſuch a fatal blow to the naval force of that kingdom, that none of Philip's courtiers durſt acquaint him with the loſs, till his buffoon diſcovered it to him by the following artful jeſt: Coming into the royal preſence, he cried out ſeveral times, "Cowardly Engliſhmen! Daſtardly Engliſhmen! Faint-hearted Engliſhmen!" The king aſked him what he meant by that exclamation? "Becauſe, ſaid he, they durſt not leap into the ſea as our gallant Frenchmen did."

utmoſt vigour, though the oppoſition he met with might have diſcouraged any other commander from continuing the attack*. At the end of ten weeks the city was reduced to great diſtreſs; and Philip, having collected a powerful army, advanced within a few miles of the Engliſh camp, not with a deſign to bring on a general engagement, but of being ready to aſſiſt the garriſon whenever an opportunity ſhould offer. Edward, exaſperated at the length of the ſiege, ſent an herald to Philip, challenging him to decide their claims to the crown of France by ſingle combat, by an action of an hundred againſt an hundred, or by a general engagement. Philip ſent for anſwer that a vaſſal was not entitled to challenge his liege lord; and that the propoſal was made on very unequal terms; but if he would put alſo the kingdom of England on the iſſue of the combat, he would willingly accept the challenge.

But theſe diſputes were terminated by the interference of the counteſs dowager of Hainault, mother-in-law to Edward, and ſiſter to Philip, who employed her good offices for bringing about a peace between two perſons ſo nearly related to her. Her zeal produced a ſhort ceſſation of hoſtilities, and which the pope in vain endeavoured to convert into a peace; but the demands of Edward were too exorbitant to be admitted. He required that Philip ſhould free Guienne from all claims of ſuperiority, and entirely abandon any farther protection to the Scots. Theſe conditions were accordingly rejected by Philip; and a prolongation of the truce only was agreed to for one year.

Edward had not yet received any ſupplies from England, and being, therefore, unable to pay his allied forces, they abandoned the confederacy; ſo that finding nothing of moment could be tranſacted on the continent, he embarked with his queen for England, and after a dangerous paſſage, landed on the laſt day of November, about midnight, at the Tower of London.

The real cauſe of the monies not being ſent to Edward while on the continent, aroſe from the nature of the ſubſidy granted for that purpoſe by the parliament. It conſiſted of corn and wool, on account of the great ſcarcity of money, and theſe articles could not be collected and diſpoſed of ſoon enough to anſwer his exigencies. But Edward attributed the defect to the negligence of his miniſters, and therefore determined to make them examples of his reſentment. Accordingly the biſhop of Chicheſter, chancellor, and the biſhop of Litchfield, treaſurer, were deprived of their offices, and committed to priſon. The archbiſhop, who was prime-miniſter, dreading the like fate, retired immediately to Canterbury, and determined to defend himſelf by the weapons of the prelacy.

He accordingly convened a meeting of the clergy in that cathedral, and pronounced ſentence of excommunication againſt all who ſhould ſeize the perſons, lands, or goods of the clergy, or inform againſt a biſhop for any offence whatever.

A. D. 1341. The parliament met at Weſtminſter on the 23d of April, when the primate, who had received no ſummons to attend, preſented himſelf at the door of the houſe in his pontifical ornaments, and demanded admittance to his ſeat as the firſt peer of the realm. His requeſt was, however, denied for two ſucceſſive days, when Edward, fearful of the dangerous conſequences that might attend a quarrel with the clergy, prudently accepted ſome conceſſions made by the primate, who, in conſequence thereof, was again received into favour, and all animoſities buried in oblivion.

Soon after this an event happened which occaſioned the truce lately made between the kings of England and France to be broken, and hoſtilities again commenced. John III. duke of Britany, dying without iſſue, left his dominions to his neice Jane, married to Charles de Blois, nephew to the king of France; but John de Montfort, brother to the late duke, laid claim to the duchy, and being determined, if poſſible, to ſupport his cauſe by ſome powerful alliance, applied to the king of England, offering to do him homage and acknowledge his title to the crown of France, if he would engage to aſſiſt him againſt Charles de Blois. This propoſal was readily embraced by Edward, in conſequence of which Montfort came over to the Engliſh court, and a formal alliance was concluded between him and Edward. As ſoon as this buſineſs was adjuſted Montfort returned to Nantes, where he ſoon after received a citation to attend the court of peers in France, in order to prove his title to Britany.

Montfort, ſuppoſing the treaty he had made with Edward was a profound ſecret, made no heſitation at obeying the ſummons, and accordingly repaired to Paris. But he was ſoon convinced of his error. Philip, at his firſt audience, plainly told him he had no right to Britany, and at the ſame time reproached him for having done homage to Edward, and entered into an alliance with a prince who was the profeſſed enemy of France. Montfort acknowledged his having paſſed over to England, but denied the charge of having done homage to Edward; adding, that he was ſatisfied of the goodneſs of his claim, and was ready to ſubmit to the judgment of his peers with regard to Britany. Philip told him his title ſhould be diſcuſſed within fourteen days, and enjoined him not to quit Paris, till the affair was adjuſted.

From this injunction Montfort was convinced he had every thing to fear, and therefore reſolved to make his eſcape. He accordingly left Paris during the night in the diſguiſe of a merchant, and reached Britany in ſafety. Philip was no ſooner informed of his eſcape, than, in a tranſport of rage and indignation, he inſtantly confiſcated the earldom of Montfort commanded the parliament of Paris, by his ſole authority, even without ſummoning the peers of France, or exhibiting any formal proceſs, to adjudge Britany to Charles de Blois; and the more effectually to carry the ſentence into execution, he ſupplied his nephew with a numerous army, under the command of his eldeſt ſon John duke of Normandy. Montfort, who was unable to face the French army in the field, ſhut himſelf up in Nantes, which was ſoon beſieged by the duke of Normandy. The city was ſtrongly fortified, and capable of holding out a conſiderable time againſt the enemy; but by the treachery of the inhabitants the city was delivered up, and Montfort being taken priſoner, was ſent to

* Tournay was, at that time, one of the nobleſt cities in Flanders, and contained above ſixty thouſand inhabitants. It was defended by a garriſon of fifteen thouſand men, commanded by Robert Butraud and Matthew de la Trie, marſhals of France; aſſiſted by the counts of Eu, Guiſnes, Foix, Narbonne, and other gallant noblemen, who were reſolved to periſh under the ruins of the city, rather than open their gates to the enemy.

to Paris, and confined in the great tower of the Louvre.

The captivity of Montfort ſeemed to put an end to all his pretenſions to Britany; but the heroic abilities and conjugal fidelity of his wife revived his drooping ſpirits, and animated his party with freſh life and vigour. Jane of Flanders, counteſs of Montfort, who then reſided at Rennes, no ſooner heard of the impriſonment of her huſband, than ſhe immediately convened an aſſembly of the inhabitants, appeared in the midſt of them with her infant ſon in her arms, and conjured them to preſerve from deſtruction the only remaining heir of that illuſtrious family who had ſo long held the ſceptre of Britany. Moved by the affecting appearance, and animated at the noble conduct of the princeſs, the whole aſſembly vowed to live and die with her in defending the rights of her family. The inhabitants of all the other fortified towns in Britany embraced the ſame reſolution. The counteſs went from place to place, encouraging the garriſons, providing them with every thing neceſſary for ſubſiſtence, and concerting their plans of defence, having done which ſhe ſhut herſelf up in Hennebonne, where ſhe waited with impatience the arrival of thoſe ſuccours promiſed by Edward. In the mean time ſhe ſent over her ſon to England, in order at once to provide him a place of ſafety, and engage the king more ſtrongly by ſuch a pledge, to embrace with zeal the intereſt of her family.

Perſuaded that the reduction of Hennebonne, together with the captivity of the counteſs, would put a final period to all oppoſition, Charles de Blois inveſted the place with a large army, compoſed of French, Spaniards and Genoeſe. The ſiege was carried on with the utmoſt vigour, and the place defended with a bravery that would have done honour to the beſt general of the age. The French were repulſed in every attack, and perpetually harraſſed with ſoldiers from the garriſon. The counteſs was foremoſt in every danger, and led her troops with the utmoſt prudence and intrepidity. Perceiving that the beſiegers, in making an aſſault upon one part of the town had neglected to ſecure a diſtant quarter of their camp, ſhe ſallied out at the head of two hundred horſe, made a dreadful ſlaughter, and ſet fire to their tents, baggage and magazines.

But notwithſtanding the noble defence made by the counteſs and her brave garriſon, the town was at length reduced to the utmoſt extremity. Several breaches were made in the walls, and the enemy was preparing for a general aſſault. It was now thought neceſſary to offer terms of capitulation, and the biſhop of Leon was actually ſent for that purpoſe to the camp of Charles de Blois; but the counteſs, who had mounted one of the towers of the fortreſs, diſcovering the Engliſh fleet coming to her aſſiſtance, immediately communicated the joyful tidings to the garriſon, and the biſhop of Leon was recalled.

The French were confounded when they ſaw the Engliſh enter the harbour, and laid aſide their deſign of making a general aſſault. The Engliſh forces conſiſted of a body of men at arms, and ſix thouſand archers, commanded by Sir Walter Manny, one of the beſt captains of the age. The courage of the garriſon was now revived, they readily joined the Engliſh in a ſally, drove the beſiegers from their poſt, and obliged them to retire with precipitation.

The counteſs, however, found that this reinforcement was not ſufficient to enable her to take the field againſt the enemy, and therefore determined to paſs over to England, in order to ſolicit in perſon more effectual ſuccours from Edward. Her requeſt was readily granted, and a more numerous reinforcement was immediately embarked under the command of Robert d'Artois, and the earl of Northampton. The counteſs herſelf returned in this fleet, which was attacked in the paſſage, by a French ſquadron commanded by prince Lewis of Spain. The counteſs behaved with her uſual intrepidity, and the action continued with great obſtinacy till night put an end to the conteſt; and before the morning appeared a dreadful ſtorm ſeparated the two fleets; but the Engliſh reached the harbour of Hennebonne in ſafety.

Soon after their arrival Robert D'Artois marched with his forces againſt Vannes, which he carried by aſſault; but being dangerouſly wounded was confined to his room, during which a party of the enemy attacked and retook the place by ſurprize. Robert, however, had the good fortune to eſcape to Hennebonne, from whence he embarked for England; but ſoon after his arrival died in London of the wounds he had received during the aſſault of Vannes.

Edward was ſo irritated againſt the French for the death of D'Artois, that he vowed the moſt ſevere revenge. Accordingly, having raiſed a conſiderable body of forces, he embarked at Sandwich on the 5th of October, and, after a very good paſſage, landed at Breſt. A few days after his arrival on the continent he laid ſiege to Vannes; but the place being then well fortified, he could not take it by ſtorm, and was therefore obliged to turn the ſiege into a blockade.

While Edward lay before Vannes, the duke of Normandy appeared at the head of 40,000 men, whom he encamped in ſuch a manner as to cut off all proviſions from the Engliſh. In this dangerous ſituation Edward liſtened to the mediation of the pope's legate, and a truce was concluded for three years, which being ratified and confirmed on the 19th of January, 1343, Edward, a few days after, embarked for England.

This truce, however, was but of ſhort duration, owing to the conduct of Philip, who cruelly put to death ſome lords of Britany, under pretence of their being guilty of treaſon. Edward was ſo incenſed when he firſt heard of the fate of theſe noblemen, that he gave orders for beheading all the priſoners of Philip's party, but was prevailed on to recall the bloody ſentence by the remonſtrances of Henry, earl of Lancaſter. He, however, ſent for one of the principal captives, and told him with great emotion, that though the death of his countrymen beheaded at Paris, was a ſufficient reaſon for retailiating the ſame puniſhment on him and his fellow priſoners, yet he would not ſtain his reputation by imitating ſo bad an example; nor ſatiate his vengeance in the blood of the innocent; but would ſeverely puniſh the author of ſuch unparalleled treachery and barbarity.

A. D. 1344. Nor were theſe threats uttered in vain. Edward diſpatched the earl of Derby (ſon of Henry earl of Lancaſter, and one of the moſt accompliſhed noblemen of his time) at the head of a conſiderable body of forces, to begin hoſtilities in Guienne. For ſome time he was very ſucceſsful, and poſſeſſed himſelf of ſeveral places in the territories of the enemy. He attacked the count de Laille, the French general, who was en-encamped at Bergarac, drove him from his entrenchments, and made himself master of the place. This success animated the English, and they proceeded in their conquests with the most astonishing rapidity.

In the mean time count de Laille, having collected an army of twelve thousand men, invested Auberauche, which had some time before fallen into the hands of the English. Derby hastened to relieve the place, and arriving near the camp of the enemy in the night, Sir Walter Manny proposed to attack the French immediately. His advice was followed with such secrecy and success, that the English entered one quarter of the French camp without resistance, and fell upon the enemy with such impetuosity, that the counts de Laille, Perigord and Valentinois, were taken prisoners in their tents, before they had time to recover from their surprize; and their troops seized with such a panic, that they fled with the utmost precipitation. The confusion was not, however, general. While one quarter was filled with disorder, the other, where the count de Cominges commanded, fled to arms and advanced against the enemy. Elated with success, the English attacked them with incredible fury, and the engagement became very bloody; when the garrison, alarmed by hearing the trumpets sound a general charge, and discovering by the light of the dawn the English ensigns, sallied out, attacked the French in flank, and put them to flight. Above seven thousand were slain, and twelve hundred taken prisoners, among whom were many noblemen and persons of distinction.

The earl of Derby having defeated the main forces of the French in these parts, and possessed himself of many considerable places, marched to Bourdeaux, where, putting his troops into winter quarters, he embarked for England, in order to procure fresh succours against the ensuing campaign.

A. D. 1345. In the beginning of this year John de Montfort, after having suffered a severe imprisonment in the castle of the Louvre, found means to make his escape in the disguise of a beggar, and coming over to England, where his countess and son then resided, did homage and swore fealty to Edward, as king of France, for the duchy of Britany. He then returned to that duchy, accompanied by the earls of Northampton and Oxford, with a considerable body of forces; and, taking the field early in the spring, reduced Dian and other fortresses on the sea-coast. This success encouraged him to invest Quimper-Corentin, which had been taken by Charles de Blois; but that competitor advancing with a numerous army to the relief of the place, he was obliged to raise the siege, and retired to Hennebonne, where he soon after died of a fever.

Soon after the death of Montfort, the earl of Derby arrived from England with eight thousand men at arms, and joining his forces with those of the earl of Northampton they took the field, and, in a short time, made themselves masters of several considerable places, particularly St. Basil, and St. Roche.

Alarmed at the progress of the English, Philip collected a numerous army, the command of which he gave to his son the duke of Normandy, assisted by the duke of Burgundy. In consequence of this, the earl of Derby, knowing how impolitic it would be to meet the French in the open field, determined to act on the defensive, and endeavour only to preserve the places already conquered. He therefore furnished all those that were fortified, with good garrisons, and large quantities of provisions and military stores; having done which he passed over to England, to inform Edward of the dangerous state of the provinces, and the proceedings of the French monarch.

A. D. 1346. Edward no sooner received the earl of Derby's report, than he immediately determined to head his army in person against the enemy; and accordingly summoned all his allies on the side of Flanders to furnish their quota of troops for the intended expedition. But here a disappointment took place little expected by Edward. The allies refused to fulfil their engagements, and Jacob Ardevelt, the popular leader of Ghent, who had been so strenuous in the cause of Edward, was no more. The circumstances which occasioned his death were as follow:

Desirous of transferring the government from the earls of Flanders to the prince of Wales, Ardevelt had proposed, in a meeting of the states, to insist that their count should renounce his alliance with Philip de Valois; and in case he persisted in maintaining that connection, that they should transfer their allegiance to young Edward, adding, that they had nothing to fear from the resentment of either their own sovereign or the king of France, as the English monarch was both able and willing effectually to support them. Astonished at this unexpected proposal, and afraid of contradicting so popular a leader, the states desired time to consult their constituents, as they had no authority to determine a question of such importance without their consent. The request was too reasonable to be denied, and the assembly broke up in great confusion. Ardevelt's enemies laid hold of this attempt to ruin him: they charged him with having embezzled considerable sums of the public money; and of having made large remittances to England, whither he intended to retire, in order to enjoy in tranquillity the riches he had procured by deceiving the people. The giddy multitude eagerly swallowed the bait prepared for them. The idol they had so long worshipped was now devoted to destruction: they thirsted for the blood of a person, for whose preservation, but a few weeks before, they would willingly have shed their own. Ardevelt soon felt the effects of this fatal change in the sentiments of the people. The enraged populace surrounded his house, forced the door, and, after having killed most of his guards, dragged him into the street, where he was cruelly hacked and murdered by his enraged and ferocious countrymen.

The death of Ardevelt, and the desertion of most of the German allies destroyed all hopes of Edward's being able to attack France on the side of Flanders. He therefore embarked at Portsmouth with his forces for Guienne; but was prevented from putting to sea by contrary winds. During this interval Godfrey de Harcourt, one of the most powerful noblemen of Normandy, and who, with several of his countrymen, had joined Edward, persuaded him to change his plan of operations, and, instead of landing in Guienne, to make a descent in Normandy, the inhabitants of which he represented as disaffected, degenerate and defenceless.

The advice of Harcourt being taken by Edward, as soon as the wind would permit he set sail from St. Helen's, and in two days landed without opposition at La Hogue, where he knighted his eldest eldeſt ſon the prince Wales, a youth then only ſixteen years of age.

The firſt thing Edward did was to deſtroy the ſhips at La Hogue, Barfleur and Cherbourgh; having done which he marched at the head of his forces to Valogne, and from thence to Carentan, both of which places readily opened their gates on his approach. From hence he proceeded to St. Lo, which ſubmitted after a faint reſiſtance, and, continuing his march, arrived in the neighbourhood of Caen, the capital of Lower Normandy. This place was defended by a large body of troops under command of count d'Eu, conſtable of France, and count Tankerville, chamberlain of Normandy. Theſe generals, confiding in their valour, ſallied out with their forces againſt the Engliſh; but met with ſo warm a reception that they were ſoon defeated. The two generals, with many knights and principal officers were taken priſoners, and the greater part of their forces put to the ſword. The Engliſh then entered the city, which they plundered of all its moſt valuable treaſures. The booty was conſiderable, the whole of which, together with all the perſons of diſtinction, was embarked, and ſent to England.

Though the city of Caen was taken, yet the caſtle ſtill held out; but Edward, thinking the reduction of it would be of little conſequence, left the place, and marched towards Rouen, the capital of Normandy. In his route he took the towns of Louvre and Liſieux; but on advancing to the banks of the Seine he found the bridge already broke down, and the French monarch poſted on the oppoſite ſide of the river, at the head of a prodigious army. Edward did every thing in his power to provoke Philip to battle. He laid the whole country waſte, and burnt the ſuburbs of Port l'Arche, Vernon, and Mullien. The ſame fate attended the noble palace of St. Germain; and ſome of the light troops carried their ravages into the very heart of the country. Edward made another attempt to paſs the Seine at Poiſſy, but met with the ſame diſappointment; the bridge was broken down, and Philip's army appeared on the oppoſite bank of the river. Some ſtratagem was therefore neceſſary to elude the vigilance of Philip. Accordingly the Engliſh monarch marched with great rapidity, farther up the Seine; but by a ſudden countermarch during the night, returned to Poiſſy, repaired the bridge, routed the militia left to guard the paſſage, croſſed the river, and advanced, with quick marches, towards Flanders. In this route he burnt the ſuburbs of Beauvais; and defeated, with great ſlaughter, the inhabitants of Amiens, who were marching to reinforce their king's army. But he ſoon found himſelf in a very dangerous ſituation: all the bridges that were over the Somme were either broken down, or ſtrongly guarded; and the whole country was in a moſt deſolate ſtate. Philip was alſo advancing againſt him at the head of 100,000 men; and Godemar de Faye was ſtationed on the oppoſite ſide of the Somme, with a numerous army, to obſerve his motions.

In order to extricate himſelf from this dangerous ſituation, Edward cauſed a reward to be offered to any perſon who would lead his army to a place where he might paſs the Somme; and a peaſant of Normandy, preferring riches to the ſafety of his country, pointed out a ford below Blanchetaque, where the ſtream was not above a foot in depth at low water. This diſcovery revived the courage of the Engliſh; they decamped at midnight, and reached the ford about ſun-riſing the next morning, a little before the tide of flood made up the river. The place exactly anſwered the deſcription given of it by the peaſant; but the oppoſite bank was guarded by Godemar de Faye, at the head of twelve thouſand men. This oppoſition was not, however, ſufficient to intimidate Edward, who, plunging himſelf into the ſtream, called out, "Let all who love me follow my example." Animated by the preſence and example of their ſovereign, the ſoldiers followed with the moſt amazing intrepidity. The French made a noble ſtand; but nothing was capable of ſtopping the career of the Engliſh: they were not intimidated by any oppoſition; and after a bloody diſpute, put the enemy to flight, and gained the oppoſite bank, juſt as the van of Philip's army appeared under the command of the king of Bohemia.

It is impoſſible to expreſs the vexation of Philip at this incident. He had traced the Engliſh many miles by the ſmoaking ruins left behind them, and thought himſelf ſure of overtaking the invaders. But it was in vain to repine; the tide of flood was made up the river, and rendered a paſſage impoſſible, while the Engliſh purſued their march without farther oppoſition.

After proceeding ſome miles, Edward, thinking it would be impoſſible to purſue his march over the extenſive plains of Picardy, without expoſing his van to inevitable deſtruction from the French cavalry, determined to make a halt, and venture a general engagement. He accordingly choſe an advantageous ſpot of ground near the village of Creſſy; and to ſecure his flank from the furious attacks of the French horſe, threw up a large entrenchment, and extended it round a ſmall wood, where he depoſited his baggage. Having taken theſe neceſſary precautions, he drew up his army on a ſmall eminence, and divided it into three lines. The firſt was commanded by the prince of Wales, aſſiſted by the earls of Warwick and Oxford, Geoffrey Harcourt of Normandy, the lords Stafford, Chandois, Delaware, Holland and Cobham, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction. This line conſiſted of eight hundred men at arms, four thouſand archers, and ſix thouſand Welſhmen. The ſecond line was commanded by the earls of Arundel and Northampton, aſſiſted by the lords Willoughby, Roſs, Baſſet of Sapcote, and Malton; and conſiſted of eight hundred men at arms, two thouſand four hundred archers, and four thouſand bill men. The king himſelf commanded the third line, which conſiſted of ſeven hundred men at arms, ſix thouſand archers, and five thouſand three hundred bill-men.

In this poſition Edward waited the approach of the enemy, who in a few days appeared within ſight of the Engliſh army. Philip reſolving to give battle, immediately divided his forces into three lines, the firſt of which was led by John de Luxembourgh, king of Bohemia, and compoſed of three thouſand men at arms, twenty-nine thouſand infantry, and fifteen thouſand Genoeſe croſs-bowmen, under the command of Antonio Doria and Carolo Grimaldi. Theſe were placed oppoſite to the Engliſh archers. Charles, duke of Alencon, brother to Philip, led the ſecond diviſion, conſiſting of four thouſand men at arms, and twenty thouſand infantry. The third diviſion was headed by Philip in perſon; and formed a body of reſerve, amounting to twelve thouſand men at arms, and fifty thouſand foot.

The two armies being thus prepared for battle, Edward, in order to animate his troops, rode through every rank, and uſed the moſt forcible arguments to inſpire them with the noble reſolution of endeavouring to obtain a conqueſt, or periſh in the attempt. He told them that the great number of the enemy ſhould be ſo far from intimidating, that it ought to inſpire them with courage; that confuſion would be the inevitable conſequence of ſuch multitudes of undiſciplined forces; and that the order in which he had placed them, added to their own reſolution, would be abundantly ſufficient to repel all the attacks of the French army. Adding, "I requeſt nothing from you, but that you imitate my example, and that of the prince of Wales." The troops caught the courage and noble intrepidity of their ſovereign, and ſeemed anxious to be led againſt the enemy.

The battle was begun by the Genoeſe croſs-bow-men, but the Engliſh archers poured in ſuch a dreadful ſhower of arrows, that they were unable to ſupport the ſhock, and fell back, in great diſorder, upon the duke d'Alençon's cavalry. Another diſcharge of arrows from the Engliſh doubly encreaſed the confuſion; and the whole body ſeemed to be in a ſtate of hurry, terror and diſmay. At length the duke d'Alençon, having diſengaged himſelf from the flying Genoeſe, made a circuit with his cavalry, and fell upon the flank of the firſt battalion of Engliſh archers. The battle now became deſperate and bloody. The French opened a paſſage through the archers, and advanced againſt the prince of Wales, who received them with ſuch firmneſs and reſolution, that numbers of them were ſlain; but the prince himſelf was ſtill in the greateſt danger of being ſurrounded by the ſuperior numbers of the enemy. The earls of Arundel and Northampton perceived his ſituation, and detached a body of troops to his aſſiſtance. Philip ſeeing this ſent three ſquadrons of French and German knights to the aid of his brother the duke d'Alençon. The prince was now attacked both in front and rear; and a meſſenger was diſpatched by the earl of Warwick to the king, to inform him of the danger of his ſon, and deſire him to order a body of troops to his aſſiſtance. The king aſked the meſſenger if his ſon was ſtill alive, and being anſwered that he was, and had performed the moſt aſtoniſhing feats of valor, he bade the meſſenger depart, and tell his generals from him, "That they ſhould no more ſend to him while the prince was alive, he being determined that the honor of the day ſhould be wholly his; and that he muſt now, if ever, win his ſpurs." This anſwer being delivered to the prince in the hearing of his followers, they ſeemed to be inſpired with freſh courage: they were more than a match for the increaſing numbers of the enemy, who exerted all their efforts to break again the compacted phalanx of the Engliſh, who, in their turn, attacked the French with ſuch impetuoſity, that they were unable to ſtand the ſhock. A dreadful carnage enſued, princes, peers, generals, knights, and common ſoldiers, fell promiſcuouſly, and formed a frightful heap of ſlain.

Enraged to ſee the two firſt lines of his army totally defeated, Philip advanced at the head of the body of reſerve, which the confuſion that prevailed in the French army had hitherto prevented from engaging. Confounded at the ſight of ſeeing ſuch numbers of their countrymen ſlain, and the whole plain filled with fugitives, the troops anſwered not the courage of their leader, who gave ſignal proofs of his valor and capacity as a general, but it was too late. The French refuſed any longer to face the Engliſh, and a general flight enſued. Philip himſelf was wounded, and carried off the field of battle. The ſtandard of France was thrown down, and the whole French army diſperſed, every one providing, in the beſt manner, for his own ſafety.

As ſoon as the magnanimous Edward found the victory was compleat he moved from his ſtation, and, taking his helmet from his head, ran to the prince of Wales, whom he embraced in the moſt affectionate manner in ſight of the whole army, ſaying, "My gallant ſon, heaven grant you may perſevere in the glorious courſe you have begun! The heroic manner in which you have acquitted yourſelf to-day ſufficiently proves you deſerve that crown you are born to wear."

Such was the iſſue of the famous battle of Creſſy, which was fought on the 25th of Auguſt, 1346, when, by a moderate computation, there fell by the ſwords of the Engliſh twenty-four baronets, twelve hundred knights, fifteen hundred gentlemen, four thouſand men at arms, and thirty thouſand infantry; together with the principal nobility of France, and the kings of Bohemia and Majorca. The creſt of the former of theſe two monarchs conſiſted of three oſtrich feathers, and as he had acted in the capacity of a volunteer, he took the motto Ich Dien, which, in the German language, ſignifies I ſerve. This device young Edward aſſumed to himſelf in memory of the victory, and the princes of Wales have ever ſince retained it in their arms.

Though mercy was refuſed to the living during the battle of Creſſy, the dead were treated with the greateſt marks of humanity. Edward ſent the body of the king of Bohemia to his family; cauſed the field of battle to be conſecrated, attended in perſon the funerals of the noblemen who fell in the action, and ordered the common ſoldiers to be interred with the greateſt decency.

Having ſtaid three whole days in the performance of theſe laudable offices, Edward led his victorious army towards Calais, which he inveſted on the third of September. The garriſon made a gallant defence, under the command of John de Vienne, who repulſed the beſiegers in all their aſſaults. Edward, ſeeing there was no probability of reducing the place by ſtorm, reſolved to ſtarve the garriſon into a ſurrender, and accordingly ordered huts to be built for his army during the winter. The governor, perceiving his deſign, ſent about ſeventeen hundred uſeleſs hands out of the town, that the garriſon might ſubſiſt the longer, and Edward, with a generoſity not common in thoſe times, not only ſuffered them to paſs unmoleſted, but likewiſe gave them money to relieve their neceſſities.

While Edward was carrying on the war with France, the counteſs of Montfort was diſplaying her heroic abilities in Britany. Charles de Blois, at the head of a numerous army, inveſted the fortreſs of Roche de Reen, and puſhed the ſiege with the utmoſt vigour. The place was of too much importance for the counteſs to ſuffer it to fall into the hands of the enemy, without making one attempt for its relief. She therefore put herſelf at the head of her little army, and having received a reinforcement of Engliſh troops under the command of Sir Thomas Dagworth, attacked the French during the night, routed the whole army, and took Charles de Blois priſoner. This misfortune called another heroine from obſcurity. The counteſs of Blois, in whoſe right her huſband claimed the duchy of Britany, ſeized the reins of government, and became a powerful rival to the counteſs of Montfort. She was her equal both in the field and cabinet; and the war was carried on with the ſame vigour as before her huſband's captivity.

During theſe tranſactions on the continent the Scots had recalled David Bruce from France, who at the inſtigation of Philip, invaded England at the head of a very powerful army. As David's intention was to ravage the country, he levied the moſt oppreſſive contributions, and committed the moſt dreadful diſorders in his march, which he extended to the gates of Durham. The diſtreſs of the people animated queen Philippa to march in perſon to their defence; and having collected an army of twelve thouſand men, ſhe led them againſt the Scottiſh invaders. Her army was divided into four bodies, the firſt commanded by lord Piercy; the ſecond by the archbiſhop of York and lord Neville; the third by the biſhop of Lincoln and lord Mowbray; and the fourth by Baliol in perſon. In this order the Engliſh approached the army of Bruce encamped at Neville's-Croſs, near the city of Durham. Bruce drew up his army in three lines; the firſt, conſiſting of French auxiliaries and the flower of the Scottiſh nobility, was commanded by the king in perſon; the ſecond by Robert, high-ſteward of Scotland and the earl of Marche; and the third by the earls of Murray and Douglas.

The battle was begun by a troop of Genoeſe croſs bow-men, who ſerved in the diviſion under Robert; but they were ſoon routed by the more experienced Engliſh archers. Robert perceived the ſuperiority of the latter, and preſſed on furiouſly with his men at arms, to begin a cloſe fight with the detachment under lord Piercy. The Engliſh archers opened immediately to the right and left, to let the enemy paſs, but cloſed again immediately, and galled them dreadfully with their arrows in flank, while they were engaged in front with the Engliſh infantry. Robert, however, maintained the fight with the greateſt intrepidity; and it was for ſome time doubtful to which ſide Fortune would give the victory. Baliol ſaw the danger, and led up his diviſion to the aſſiſtance of lord Piercy. The Scots were now ſtruck with a panic, and immediately betook themſelves to flight. Baliol, who was not deficient in military abilities, inſtead of purſuing the fugitives, wheeled ſuddenly about, and fell with the utmoſt impetuoſity on the flank of the diviſion commanded by the king. David fought with great intrepidity, and, aſſiſted by his friends, made a noble ſtand againſt the attacks of the Engliſh; but the conteſt was unequal; the whole diviſion was broken and put to flight, and the king himſelf taken priſoner. The third diviſion, under the earls of Murray and Douglas, ſtill ſtood firm, but were ſoon broken when attacked by the whole force of the Engliſh. Murray was ſlain in endeavouring to rally his men, and Douglas taken priſoner. Robert rallied his men after he had given way to the attacks of the Engliſh, and retreated in excellent order, by which the other fugitives had time to join him, and form a body; but the victors did not think proper to purſue them.

Never did the Scots receive a more fatal blow than at this battle. No leſs than fifteen thouſand fell in the action; and, from a liſt of the ſlain, and thoſe who were taken priſoners, it appeared that there was ſcarcely a noble family in Scotland that did not ſhare in the public calamity.

The next day after the battle queen Philippa returned with her army to London, taking with her David Bruce and about thirty Scotch noblemen her priſoners, whom ſhe confined in the Tower. A few days after ſhe embarked at Dover, and paſſed over to the Engliſh camp before Calais, where ſhe was received with all the reſpect due to her rank and diſtinguiſhed valour.

The garriſon and inhabitants of Calais had held out againſt all the efforts of the Engliſh to take it. But they were reduced to the greateſt diſtreſs for want of proviſions. Philip was no ſtranger to their wretched condition, and reſolved to march to their relief. He accordingly aſſembled a very numerous army, and advanced towards the place; but he found the Engliſh camp ſo well ſecured by entrenchments, encompaſſed with moraſſes, that he could not attempt to force it without expoſing himſelf to the moſt imminent danger, and therefore retreated with his army.

A. D. 1347. The garriſon of Calais, deſpairing of relief, and being almoſt deſtitute of proviſions, at length deſired to capitulate; in conſequence of which John de Vienne, the governor, appearing on the walls, made the ſignal for a conference; and Edward ſent Sir Walter Manny to hear what he had to propoſe. The governor told him, that having now no farther hopes of relief, he was willing to ſurrender the place, and deſired no other conditions than that the lives and liberties of the garriſon ſhould be ſecured. Manny anſwered, that Edward was ſo exaſperated againſt the inhabitants of Calais for their pertinacious reſiſtance, that he was ſure he would receive no conditions that ſhould confine him with regard to their puniſhment. "Is this" replied Vienne, the treat-"ment to which brave men are entitled? Would not your king have expected the ſame conduct from any Engliſh knight in my condition, which I have performed for my ſovereign? The noble defence made by the inhabitants of Calais certainly merits the eſteem of every prince, much more of ſo gallant a prince as Edward. But I inform you, that if we muſt periſh, we ſhall not periſh unrevenged; and that we are not yet ſo reduced, but we can ſell our lives at a high price to the victors. It is, doubtleſs, the intereſt of both ſides to prevent theſe deſperate extremities; and I expect that you yourſelf, brave knight, will interpoſe your good offices with your prince in our behalf."

Manny, ſtruck with the juſtice of theſe remarks, exerted all his intereſt with Edward in behalf of the brave garriſon of Calais. He repreſented the dreadful conſequences that might reſult from treating them with ſeverity, which, he ſaid, could not fail of increaſing the miſeries of war, already ſufficiently calamitous. Edward felt the whole force of his obſervations, and thought proper to mitigate the ſeverity of the conditions he had demanded. He only inſiſted that ſix of the principal citizens ſhould repair to his camp with the keys of the fortreſs, bareheaded and barefooted, with ropes about their necks, to be diſpoſed of as he ſhould think proper, and on theſe conditions he promiſed to ſpare the lives of the reſt of the inhabitants.

The horror and confuſion which theſe ſevere conditions excited in the breaſts of the inhabitants may may be more eaſily conceived than deſcribed. They endeavoured to deprecate the wrath of the victor by the moſt humble ſubmiſſions and affecting remonſtrances. But Edward was inflexible; and it was reſolved by a council of the garriſon to ſubmit to the maſſacre that muſt follow from the refuſal, rather than devote ſix of their brethren to an ignominious death, for no other reaſon than that of having done their duty to their king and country. But before the council broke up, Euſtace de St. Pierre, one of the principal inhabitants, ſtept forth, and offered to lay down his life for the ſafety of his friends and companions. Affected with this uncommon inſtance of magnanimity, three of his own relations declared themſelves ready to ſhare in the glorious ſacrifice; and two others were quickly found who followed their example. Theſe willing victims marched out of the town, barefooted, in their ſhirts, with halters about their necks; and, when they came to the Engliſh camp, preſented the keys of their city, and proſtrated themſelves at the feet of Edward, who, ſtill burning with reſentment, gave orders that they ſhould be carried to immediate execution. Their backs were already turned on the remorſeleſs maſter of their fate, and they were proceeding, mournful, though determined, to meet their doom, when the queen, who was then big with child, pierced with the afflictions of virtue in diſtreſs, fell on her knees before Edward, and beſought him with tears to ſpare the lives of thoſe brave men, whoſe only crime was their attachment to their ſovereign. Edward could not withſtand the force of conjugal affection; he relented, and the heroic burghers were pardoned. But the compaſſion of Philippa did not terminate here: ſhe conducted the almoſt famiſhed victims to her tent, ordered them a noble repaſt, made them a preſent of money and clothes, and ſent them back to their friends in ſafety.

The victorious Edward being now maſter of Calais, took every precaution in his power to ſecure his conqueſt. He knew it would be impoſſible for him ever to make the inhabitants real friends to his government, and therefore obliged them all to leave the town, which he peopled with his own ſubjects from England, and, for their ſecurity placed therein a ſtrong garriſon.

Soon after Edward had obtained the acquiſition of Calais, he liſtened to the mediation of the pope, and after concluding a truce with Philip, returned with his forces to England.

A. D. 1348. But the terms of this truce were very ill obſerved; and it was not long before an attempt was made to recover Calais, by corrupting the governor. One Aimery de Pavia, an Italian knight, brave and intrepid in war, but a ſtranger to every principle of honour and fidelity, was entruſted by the Engliſh monarch with the command of this important fortreſs. Geoffrey de Charny, governor of St. Omer's, found means to open a negotiation with Aimery; who, in conſideration of twenty thouſand golden crowns, promiſed to admit a certain number of Frenchmen into the fortreſs; and the moſt proper methods were accordingly taken to inſure ſucceſs. Edward, informed of the deſign by Aimery's ſecretary, prepared to turn the contrivance to the deſtruction of the enemy. He ſent for the governor to London, and reproached him with his crime; but promiſed to ſpare his life, if he would aſſiſt him in taking vengeance for the perfidious attempt. Aimery readily agreed to this double treachery; a day was appointed for the admiſſion of the French; and Edward, having prepared a force of a thouſand men, under Sir Walter Manny, departed ſecretly from London, taking with him the prince of Wales, and, without being in the leaſt ſuſpected, arrived at Calais in the evening before the day appointed for delivering up the place. He immediately made a proper diſpoſition for the reception of the enemy and kept all his forces, as well as the garriſon, under arms. On the appearance of Charny, a choſen troop of French ſoldiers was admitted at the poſtern by the governor, who received the ſtipulated ſum. All the French who entered were immediately made priſoners, while Charny was waiting with impatience for the ſignal to enter the town in triumph. At length the great gates were thrown open, and the Engliſh ruſhed out under the banner of Sir Walter Manny, both Edward and the prince of Wales ſerving as volunteers. Charny was aſtoniſhed, but determined to diſpute the victory with the enemy. He accordingly drew up his men in a ſquare battalion, and maintained the fight with great reſolution. During the conteſt a valiant knight, named Euſtace de Ribaumont, fought in ſingle combat with Edward, whom he beat twice to the ground, and who as often recovered himſelf with the moſt ſurpriſing agility. The victory was long doubtful; but at laſt Ribaumont owned himſelf conquered, and delivered his ſword to the king. In the mean time Charny maintained the fight with great obſtinacy, till, perceiving his retreat cut off by another detachment from the town he ſurrendered at diſcretion. All the officers were conducted to Calais, where they ſpent the evening with Edward, who treated them with great reſpect, and then firſt diſcovered to them that he had been preſent in the action. The king declared Ribaumont the braveſt knight he had ever encountered, and reſtored him to his liberty without ranſom. As for Aimery he was removed from his office, and Sir John Beauchamp appointed governor of Calais in his ſtead; ſoon after which Edward, with his ſon the prince of Wales, and the Engliſh nobility, returned to England.

A. D. 1349. As Edward had been always fond of Windſor Caſtle as a country retreat, he now made it the ſeat of a military order, which he founded in honour of St. George, the patron of England. A garter of blue velvet with the inſcription Honi ſoit qui mal y penſe was the ſymbol of union and concord choſen for this noble fraternity, which, from hence, was called the order of the Garter*.

But the happineſs and tranquillity which now prevailed in the Engliſh court, and indeed throughout the kingdom in general, was ſuddenly changed into ſorrow and mourning, by a moſt deſtructive peſti-

* The Order of the Garter, which was inſtituted at this time, is ſaid to have owed its origin to the following circumſtance: Edward was greatly enamoured with the counteſs of Saliſbury, who having, at a court ball, dropped her garter, the king took it up; and obſerving that ſome of his courtiers ſmiled, as if he had not obtained that opportunity merely by accident, he called out, Honi ſoit qui mal y penſe. That is, "Evil be to him that evil thinks." Theſe words became the motto of the order. It conſiſted of twenty-ſix perſons including the ſovereign; and ſoon after became a capital object to courtiers, who ſtill conſider it as one of the moſt diſtinguiſhed honours they can receive.

peſtilence which was diſperſed into moſt parts of Europe. It firſt appeared in the northern parts of Aſia; and, after ſpreading over all that country, continued its deſtructive progreſs from one end of Europe to the other. The weſtern parts of England firſt felt this dreadful ſcourge, which ſoon after reached the capital, and raged, with unremitting fury, near two years, ſo that hardly one tenth part of the inhabitants ſurvived; and it was computed that in London only no leſs than 50,000 perſons periſhed.

The Scots took advantage of this misfortune to renew their ravages in the northern parts of England; but they paid dearly for their conduct. Above five thouſand of them were ſwept away by the plague, and the reſt returned to their own kingdom, to diſperſe the peſtiferous ſeeds of this dreadful diſeaſe among their countrymen.

A. D. 1351. Towards the latter end of this year the French monarch, having, notwithſtanding the truce with Edward, made ſome captures at ſea, was ſo elated as to fit out a powerful fleet, with a vague deſign of making a deſcent on England. But his expectations were ſoon deſtroyed by the gallant Edward, who ſtood towards them in the channel, with an Engliſh fleet, which entirely defeated the combined navy of France and Spain, and induced the latter power to ſue for a truce for twenty years, which Edward readily granted, from a view of its being advantageous to the commercial intereſts of his ſubjects.

A. D. 1352. This was the laſt warlike tranſaction in which Philip de Valois was engaged, as he ſoon after paid the debt of nature, and was ſucceeded by his ſon John duke of Normandy. Philip, in the beginning of his reign, had acquired the title of Fortunate; but the tranſactions that took place during his holding the ſovereignty were very little demonſtrative of the propriety of this epithet, though his bad ſucceſs was leſs owing to his want of courage and conduct, than to the better fortune and ſuperior proweſs of his rival Edward.

John, who ſucceeded Philip on the throne of France, was a prince poſſeſſed of many virtues, but they were rather of a private than public nature. With a heart full of the juſteſt ſentiments of honour and ſincerity, he was, of all others, the moſt improper perſon to ſway the ſceptre of France in thoſe turbulent times; he wanted that maſterly prudence and foreſight, that penetration and ſagacity, which the ſituation of his affairs required. His relation, Charles, king of Navarre, ſurnamed the Bad, threw the kingdom of France into great confuſion, in which ſtate it continued near three years, when that prince entered into a private treaty with the Engliſh, and even ſeduced the dauphin to engage in his intrigues; but the French prince, being at laſt convinced of the folly of ſuch deſtructive connections, invited the king of Navarre, and the noblemen of his party, to an entertainment at Rouen, where they were all betrayed into the hands of John, who immediately ſent them to priſon.

A. D. 1356. The ſeizing and confining the king of Navarre was highly reſented by Edward; and the prince of Wales (generally known by the name of the Black Prince from the colour of his armour) having the preceding year made a ſucceſsful expedition into Guienne, Edward now ſent him a meſſage, requeſting him to purſue his conqueſt with the utmoſt vigour. In obedience to this meſſage young Edward advanced into Quercy at the head of two thouſand men at arms, ſix thouſand archers, and four thouſand foot. The ſucceſs of this young warrior was aſtoniſhing: he waſted Quercy, the Limoſin, and Auvergne, advanced to Berry, and after ſome unſucceſsful attempts upon Bourges and Iſſodun, took Vierzon by ſtorm. Here he refreſhed his army, and received the firſt intelligence that the king of France was poſted at Chartres, on the other ſide of the Loire, all the fords of which were ſtrongly guarded.

Young Edward now perceived it was impracticable to advance farther, and therefore reſolved to retreat to Bourdeaux. John perceiving his intentions, croſſed the Loire, and marched with ſuch expedition, that he overtook him in the neighbourhood of Poictiers. Edward, knowing a retreat was now impracticable, prepared for battle with all the courage of a young hero, and all the prudence of the oldeſt and moſt experienced commander. He poſted his men in a place of difficult acceſs, full of hedges, buſhes and vineyards, where neither the enemy's cavalry could attempt to pierce, nor their infantry attack him without great diſadvantage: at the end of a narrow lane, the only avenue by which the French could advance to attack his main body, he placed a ſquare battalion of the flower of his Engliſh archers; nor could the enemy avail themſelves of their great ſuperiority of numbers, till theſe were broken.

The French army, which conſiſted of above 60,000 men, was encamped between Beauvoir and Maupertuis, and had John known how to have made a proper uſe of his numerous forces, his ſucceſs had been infallible without hazarding a battle. Prince Edward was already ſo diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, that a few days would have been ſufficient to have forced him to ſurrender at diſcretion. But the imprudent ardour of the French nobility would admit of no reſtraint; they imagined themſelves ſure of victory, and advanced immediately to attack the Engliſh. Juſt before the charge was ſounded, the cardinal of Perigord reached the French army; and at his intreaty the battle was deferred till he had viſited the Engliſh prince, and endeavoured to ſave the farther effuſion of human blood, by an advantageous peace. Edward told the cardinal he would agree to any terms conſiſtent with his own honour, and that of his country. He offered to purchaſe a retreat to Bourdeaux, by reſigning all the conqueſts he had made, and ſtipulating not to ſerve againſt France during ſeven years. Theſe offers were haughtily rejected by John, who peremptorily inſiſted, that the prince himſelf, together with an hundred of the chief nobility in his army, ſhould ſurrender themſelves priſoners; and on theſe conditions he offered a ſafe retreat to the Engliſh army. The anſwer of the prince was that of an hero, who fears death much leſs than diſhonour. He declared that neither himſelf nor his knights ſhould be taken but in battle; and that he would rather ſacrifice his life than conſent to terms of ſo infamous a nature.

The ſword was now to determine the important conteſt, and the next morning the time fixed for determining the fate of thouſands. Edward employed the whole night in ſtrengthening the poſt he had ſo judiciouſly choſen with new entrenchments; and detached a body of choſen men, under the command of an experienced officer named de Greilly, with orders to make a compaſs round the hill, and keep himſelf concealed under covert of the hedges and ditches with which it was ſurrounded, till the battle ſhould begin, and then to fall with the utmoſt fury on the French rear. He then divided his troops into three diſtinct bodies, but ranged in ſo cloſe and compact a manner, that they ſeemed to form only a ſquare battalion: the front was defended by a number of ditches and hedges; and the flanks were ſecured on one ſide by a ſteep hill, and on the other by a moraſs. The earl of Warwick was ſtationed on the ſide of the hill, with the troops which compoſed the van; the rear, commanded by the earls of Suffolk and Saliſbury, was poſted behind about a ſtone's caſt from the lane through which the French muſt march to the attack. At the end of this lane was a pretty large gap, where Edward took his poſt at the head of the main body, which extended itſelf among the vines and buſhes; the weaker part of the field being inloſed by the carriages and baggage waggons. The French army was alſo divided into three bodies, the firſt of which was commanded by the duke of Orleans, the king's brother; the ſecond by the dauphin of France, aſſiſted by his two brothers the dukes of Anjou and Berry; and the third, which conſiſted of 40,000 of the beſt troops in France, was led by the king in perſon.

Both parties having made the neceſſary preparations for engaging, the battle was begun about nine o'clock in the morning by three hundred choſen Frenchmen, who marched up the lane towards the main body of the Engliſh; but were ſo galled by the archers, who lined the hedges, that one half of them were ſlain before they reached the front of Edward's diviſion, where all the reſt were cut to pieces by an advanced party commanded by lord Audley. The marſhals Clermont and Andrehen, who with a body of choſen cavalry had advanced cloſe behind the men at arms to ſupport them, met with ſo warm a reception from the earl of Warwick, and at the ſame time ſo impetuous an attack from the earls of Suffolk and Saliſbury, at the head of a detachment from the rear, that Clermont was killed on the ſpot, and Andrehen obliged to ſurrender himſelf priſoner: moſt of the corps ſhared the fate of the former.

The firſt attack of the French being thus rendered abortive, the dauphin advanced to the charge, but not without great difficulty; his men, diſpirited at the fate of their companions, were not ready to follow their leader. In this critical moment de Greilly fell with the utmoſt impetuoſity upon their rear, and threw them into terrible diſorder: the Engliſh archers plied them with inceſſant ſhowers of arrows from every quarter; while the other infantry with ſwords and battle-axes ruſhed upon them and made the moſt dreadful ſlaughter. The French threw down their arms and betook themſelves to flight, while three principal officers, to whom the care of the dauphin and his two brothers had been particularly committed, carried them off the field of battle. The whole diviſion followed their leaders, and the duke of Orleans, ſtruck with the ſame panic, fled with the utmoſt precipitation.

But the grand diviſion, which was headed by John in perſon, aſſiſted by his principal nobility, ſtood firm and ſeemed determined to diſpute the victory with the Engliſh, who were far inferior in numbers. Edward, far from being diſmayed, mounted his horſe, and advanced at the head of his army to begin the attack. The dreadful ſtruggle for victory now commenced, and the moſt violent ſhock enſued. John exerted his utmoſt efforts to retrieve by valour what he had loſt by his imprudence. The prince of Wales fell with the moſt amazing impetuoſity on a body of German cavalry placed in the front, and a ſtubborn conteſt enſued. Nor did the Germans give ground till their three leaders, together with the conſtable of France, were ſlain, when they fled with the utmoſt precipitation from the field of battle.

The French monarch now ſaw himſelf reduced to a ſmall battalion of faithful friends, who were continually leſſening by the ſwords of the Engliſh. At laſt, wearied out with fatigue, and overwhelmed with numbers, he weilded the ſword but faintly, and might eaſily have been ſlain; but every one was emulous of ſo noble a prize, and therefore, as they approached, called out to him to ſurrender, and offered him quarter. Unwilling, however, to yield himſelf a priſoner to any perſon of inferior rank, he cried out, "Where is my couſin the prince of Wales; to him only will I yield." Being informed that Edward was in another part of the field, he ſtill perſiſted obſtinately to defend himſelf, till Sir Dennis de Morbec, a knight of Artois, made his way through the croud of aſſailants, and requeſted John to yield himſelf his priſoner. John, after being aſſured that he was a knight, threw down his gauntlet as a ſignal of ſurrender, and both he and his ſon Philip were made priſoners.

Young Edward (who was at this time in purſuit of the flying enemy) no ſooner heard of the captivity of John, than he immediately diſpatched the earl of Warwick, and the lord Cobham, at the head of a ſmall detachmment, to enquire into his ſituation, and, if poſſible, reſcue him from the hands of the ſoldiers. Warwick luckily arrived ſoon enough to ſave his life. The Engliſh had taken the royal priſoners from Morbec; the Gaſcons claimed the honour of detaining them; and ſome of the brutal ſoldiers, rather than give them up to their rivals, threatened to put both the illuſtrious captives to death. Both parties were over-awed at the preſence of Warwick, who, approaching the captive monarch with the greateſt marks of reſpect, offered, in the moſt polite manner, to conduct him to the tent of Edward.

The conduct of the victorious prince, on this occaſion, did him no leſs honour than the great abilities and valour he had diſplayed in the field of battle. Inſtead of indulging a ſupercilious pride (too commonly the attendant on youthful warriors) he came from his tent to meet the captive king with all the marks of a ſincere regard. He ſympathized with his misfortunes: comforted him in his afflictions; paid him the tribute of praiſe due to his valour; and aſcribed his own victory to capricious fortune. He ordered a magnificent repaſt to be prepared in his tent for the royal priſoner, and himſelf waited on him at table, as if he had been one of his retinue; and when preſſed by the king to ſit down, declared with the greateſt modeſty, "that it was not for a ſubject like him to ſit in the preſence of ſo great a monarch."

The noble example of the prince was imitated by all the officers throughout the Engliſh army; and the French priſoners were treated with the greateſt tenderneſs and humanity. The ſpoils taken in the French camp were ſo great that the meaneſt individual in the Engliſh army found himſelf placed beyond the reach of want during the remainder of his life. Indeed the ranſoms of the noble priſoners alone were more than ſufficient for that purpoſe; though theſe were very moderate. The extent of the fortunes of all were conſidered, and no more was exacted of them than they could eaſily ſpare; no man was that day impoveriſhed for his misfortunes; they had ſtill ſufficient to perform their military ſervice for the future in a manner ſuitable to their rank and quality.

Edward now ordered a ſolemn thankſgiving to be performed in the Engliſh camp for the late victory. This was continued for eight ſucceſſive days, at the expiration of which Edward ordered the camp to be broke up, and then marched at the head of his forces to Bourdeaux, taking with him his two royal priſoners.

A. D. 1357. While Edward was at Bourdeaux, pope Innocent VI. who then filled the papal chair, ſent the cardinals of Perigord and St. Vital to him, with orders to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to bring about a peace; but failing in their negotiation, they confined their requeſt to a truce for two years. The prince, not chuſing to act of himſelf, wrote a letter to his father, deſiring his advice in ſo critical an affair. Edward ſent him full powers to act as he thought moſt conducive to the honour of his country. Being inveſted with theſe powers, the prince made no heſitation to comply with the requeſt of the cardinals, and accordingly ſigned the truce at Bourdeaux on the 23d of March.

Young Edward ſtaid about two months on the continent after ſigning the truce, in order to ſettle the affairs of Guienne; having done which he embarked with his royal captives, and landed at Sandwich in Kent on the 25th of May. He was received by the inhabitants of every place through which he paſſed with the greateſt expreſſions of joy, but repeatedly refuſed thoſe honours which were offered, deſiring that the reſpect intended for him might be transferred, with every mark of attention and civility, to the French monarch. He was met in Southwark by a thouſand of the principal citizens of London on horſeback; and the mayor diſplayed, on this occaſion, all the pomp of the city. The entry was truly magnificent. John was dreſſed in his royal robes, and mounted on a ſtately white courſer, remarkable for its ſize and beauty, as well as for the richneſs of its furniture. Young Edward rode on the left hand of his priſoner, on a little black palfry, and in a meaner dreſs, as if ſtudious to avoid every mark of diſtinction. The ſtreets through which they paſſed were ſuperbly adorned with plate, tapeſtry, and armour. The proceſſion reached Weſtminſter-hall about noon, where king Edward, ſurrounded by a ſplendid circle of the nobles, and other great men, received his royal priſoner in all the pomp of ſtate, but at the ſame time with all the courteſy as if he had been a neighbouring prince, who had come voluntarily to pay him a friendly viſit. All the pretenſions of Edward to the crown of France ſeemed to be forgotten, and John, though in captivity, received all the honours due to majeſty. He behaved with ſuch propriety on this occaſion as to be truly deſerving the generous treatment he received; and, though conquered and a priſoner, preſerved the dignity of a king. John was provided with an apartment in the royal palace, till the Savoy could be fitted up for his reception, and the French princes and noblemen brought over with him as priſoners were permitted to have their liberty on condition of remaining in London on their parole of honour.

John was not the only royal priſoner at this time in England. David Bruce was ſtill in confinement at Odiham in Hampſhire, the Scots having refuſed to pay his ranſom; but a circumſtance ſoon happened which procured his enlargement. Some time before the arrival of the prince of Wales from the continent, Edward had obliged Baliol to relinquiſh his right to Scotland, on condition of receiving an annual penſion of 2000l. Young Edward, moved by the intreaties of his aunt, the queen-conſort of Scotland, now prevailed on his father to conſent to a negotiation for the releaſement of her huſband; the conſequence of which was, that conferences were opened at Berwick, where it was agreed and concluded, "That David ſhould be ſet at liberty, acknowledged king of Scotland, and an independent monarch, on his giving hoſtages for the payment of one hundred thouſand marks ſterling in ten years, by equal portions; and that a truce ſhould ſubſiſt, and be inviolably obſerved by both nations, till the whole ſhould be paid." This treaty being ratified, David, after a captivity of eleven years, was releaſed, returned to Scotland, and reaſſumed the throne of his kingdom.

Soon after the ratification of this treaty the two cardinal legates, who had negotiated the truce with prince Edward at Bourdeaux, arrived in London, with propoſals for a peace: but of ſo ſtrange a nature, that Edward refuſed to return them any anſwer. Baffled in this attempt, they demanded, in the name of his holineſs, the arrears of the tribute formerly paid to the ſee of Rome, amounting to a thouſand marks. Edward treated this demand as an obſolete and ridiculous claim; and bid them tell the pontiff, "That he held his kingdom of God alone, and acknowledged no other ſuperior, nor would he pay tribute to any mortal upon earth."

A. D. 1358. So great a familiarity had ſubſiſted between Edward and his royal priſoner, John king of France, that the two monarchs, in the beginning of this year, made a private treaty of peace between themſelves, the ſubſtance of which was to this effect: "that, in conſideration of Edward's quitting all claim to the duchy of Normandy, the counties of Anjou and Maine, and the crown of France, he and his heirs ſhould enjoy Guienne, the Angoumois, Xaintonge, Perigord, Quercy, the Limouſin, Poictou, Touraine, Calais, Guiſnes, the Boulonnois, and the county of Ponthieu, free and independent of the crown of France: and that John and the French nobles, who had been taken priſoners with him, ſhould pay, for their ranſom, four millions of crowns." Theſe articles were ſent over to the regent of France, who laid them before a meeting of the ſtates, by whom they were rejected with diſdain, as deſtructive at once to the honour and ſafety of the nation. Edward was highly exaſperated at this refuſal, and determined to renew the war as ſoon as the truce, which had been made by his ſon the prince of Wales, was expired.

On the 12th of November this year died Iſabella, the king's mother, whoſe ambition and unjuſtifiable paſſion for the infamous Mortimer, had proved fatal to her wretched huſband. She died at the caſtle of Riſings, in the 63d year of her age, and was buried in the choir of the Grey Friars, now called Chriſt Church in London.

A. D. 1359. Edward ſeldom formed any deſign of a public nature, but he would, if poſſible, carry it into execution. The truce with France was now expired, and he determined immediately to invade that kingdom. He accordingly ingly embarked for the continent, and landed at Calais at the head of an army of 100,000 men. The dauphin, thinking this force irreſiſtible, was too prudent to hazard a deciſive action, and therefore ſuffered the enemy to ſpend their fury in the open country, while he induſtriouſly employed himſelf in putting the moſt conſiderable towns in a proper ſtate of defence.

Edward, after waſting the province of Picardy, and entering Champagne, was deſirous of having the royal diadem of France placed on his head in the city of Rheims. He accordingly inveſted the place, where three months were ſpent in fruitleſs endeavours to take it, during which ſo many of his men died, that he thought it prudent to raiſe the ſiege.

Early the following ſpring Edward entered Burgundy, which, together with the Nivernois, were preſerved from his ravages, by paying the contributions he demanded. The Brie and the Gatinois were next plundered with the utmoſt cruelty; after which he advanced to the gates of Paris, burnt the ſuburbs of that city, and challenged the dauphin to give him battle; but not being able to make that prudent prince change his plan of operations, he ſpread his army into the different provinces of Maine, Beauſſe, and the Chartraine. In this laſt province Edward was overtaken by ſo dreadful an hurricane, that it ſeemed to threaten the diſſolution of the univerſe. The ſhock of the elements, in thunder, lightening, and hail ſtones of a prodigious ſize, ſtruck the boldeſt with terror. No leſs than ſix thouſand horſe, and a thouſand foot, were killed on the ſpot. Edward, with all his courage, was not proof againſt this dreadful ſcene: he conſidered it as a warning for him to ſheathe the deſtructive ſword of war upon equitable terms. Penetrated with theſe ſentiments, he leaped from his horſe, and proſtrating himſelf on the ground, with his arms extended towards the church of Chartres, dedicated to the Virgin, he vowed to agree inſtantly to a peace with France, if it could be obtained upon juſt and honourable terms.

Soon after this incident a negotiation for peace * was opened at Bretagne, and a treaty concluded on the following conditions: "That the king of England ſhould renounce his pretenſions to the crown of France, and to the provinces of Normandy, Maine, Tourain, and Anjou; and ſhould receive in exchange the provinces of Poictou, Xaintonge, Perigord, the Limoſin, Agenois, Quercy, Bigone, Gauze, Angoumois, and Rovergne; and enjoy theſe territories in the fulleſt manner, and without any feudal ſubjection or homage. That the diſpute between Charles de Blois and John de Montfort, with regard to the duchy of Britany, ſhould be candidly diſcuſſed, and referred to arbitration, under the ſanction of both kings; but if their good offices proved ineffectual, neither ſhould take any part in the quarrel, though the ſovereignty of Britany ſhould remain to the king of France, and John de Montfort be reſtored to the poſſeſſion of all his eſtates in that kingdom: And laſtly, that the king of France ſhould renounce alliance with the Scots, and Edward his connections with the Flemings." Forty hoſtages, (among whom were the two ſons of the French king, the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, and many of the chief nobility of France) were given as ſecurities for the performance of theſe articles.

In conſequence of this treaty, the king of France was immediately ſet at liberty, and embarked for Calais, where he was met by Edward, and the treaty was ſolemnly ratified between them. Soon after Edward embarked with his hoſtages for England, and landed at Dover on the firſt of November, from whence he immediately proceeded to London amidſt the univerſal acclamations of the people.

A. D. 1361. The concluſion of the war between France and England was productive of dreadful diſorders in the former kingdom. Great numbers of adventurers, who had enliſted under Edward's banners, being now unemployed, joined different bands of robbers, and deſolated many of the inferior provinces. Habituated to pillage, and ſtrangers to fear, they committed the moſt dreadful ravages, and were known by the name of "The Companies." At length John, marquis of Monſerrat, being at war with the Viſcontis, lords of Milan, took the Companies into his pay, and freed France from theſe formidable bands of ruffians.

A. D. 1362. In the beginning of this year a moſt dreadful peſtilence broke out in France, which carried off upwards of 30,000 inhabitants in Paris only, and ſpreading into England, raged with equal violence in London. Among others ſwept away by this contagion was Henry duke of Lancaſter, who, from his great humanity, had obtained the epithet of The Good Duke. His only ſurviving ſiſter had been ſome time married to John of Gaunt, Edward's fourth ſon, who, in right of his brother-in-law, was ſoon after created duke of Lancaſter.†

A. D. 1363. No payment having been yet made by France for the ranſom of their monarch, the nobles, who were ſtill hoſtages in London, began to grow weary of their confinement, and the duke of Anjou, the ſon of John, broke his parole, and eſcaped to Paris. This act, ſo contrary to the principles of honour and juſtice, gave great uneaſineſs to John, who determined to repair to England, and deliver himſelf up to Edward, till the conditions of the treaty ſhould be fully executed. His council in vain endeavoured to diſſuade him from his deſign: his purpoſe was fixed, and every argument loſt its force. "If (ſaid he) "juſtice and good faith were baniſhed from the "reſt of the earth, they ought yet to retain their "habi-

* It is the opinion of ſome hiſtorians that the ſtorm was the principal circumſtance that occaſioned Edward to liſten to terms of accommodation; but others are of opinion, that it aroſe from the obſervations made by the duke of Lancaſter. That nobleman repreſented to Edward, that the acquiſition of the crown of France was far from being advanced by his making ſuch deſtruction in different parts of the country: that in one day he might loſe the advantages he had been ſeveral years obtaining; and that a peace, in his then circumſtances, might be concluded, which would annex ſeveral provinces to England.

† This year was likewiſe remarkable for the marriage of Edward the Black Prince with his couſin, Joan of Kent, the beautiful daughter of the late earl of Kent, who had been beheaded in the beginning of Edward's reign by the intrigues of queen Iſabella and the infamous Mortimer; and for her exquiſite beauty, ſhe was generally known by the appellation of "The Fair Maid of Kent." The young hero, who had raiſed the honour of the Engliſh to ſo exalted a pitch, was now created prince of Aquitaine, and inveſted with the property of many of the noble poſſeſſions ceded to the Engliſh by the treaty of Bretagne. He ſoon after croſſed the ſea, and fixed his reſidence at Bourdeaux, where he kept a royal court, beloved and reſpected by all ranks of people.

"habitations in the breasts of princes." He accordingly returned to England, in order to substitute himself in the place of his son the duke of Anjou; and took up his residence in the palace of the Savoy, where he continued to reside, and was royally entertained at the expence of the king, till the 8th of April in the following year, when, having been some time ill, he paid the debt of nature His remains were carried into France, and buried at St. Dennis.

A. D. 1365. In the beginning of this year the king summoned a parliament at Westminster, when several laws were made which tended to the welfare and tranquillity of the nation. Edward also issued out a proclamation for apprehending a number of robbers and lawless banditti that infested different parts of the kingdom, consisting chiefly of soldiers that had been disbanded at the conclusion of the peace with France: and that these delinquents might be more easily andspeedily brought to trial, he enlarged the judicatory powers of the city of London. He next applied himself to the removal of another evil, namely, the corruption of the judges. The lord chief justice Sir Henry Green, and Sir William Skipwith, one of the judges, were, for their partiality and extortion, imprisoned, heavily fined, and rendered incapable of ever after holding any public employment.

A. D. 1367. While peace and tranquillity continued to remain in England, Edward the Black Prince, who had been now near four years in his principality of Aquitaine, engaged himself in assisting Peter (surnamed the Cruel, from his sanguinary and revengeful disposition) to recover his kingdom of Castile. Peter was placed in the seat of power while a minor, and in very unfavourable circumstances. His father, Alphonso XI. had seven natural children by his mistress, Eleanor of Gusman; and settled such considerable fortunes on them, that they defied the royal authority; while their mother, who enjoyed still more power, insulted the queen dowager. The people of Castile were therefore divided into two parties, one of whom joined the queen mother, and the other Eleanor.

When Peter came of age, and took the reins of government into his own hands, he was obliged to maintain a war against the faction of his natural brothers. Being victorious in a decisive battle he took Eleanor prisoner; and to gratify his mother's revenge, put her to death. Soon after, he married Blanche of Bourbon, who falling in love with the grand master of St. Jago, (one of those very bastards who was then at war with her husband) she joined the faction, for which Peter shut her up in a castle. This greatly augmented the fury of the faction, and Peter was obliged to fight against the king of Arragon and his natural brothers at the same time; but victory still followed his standards, and he made a cruel use of it. He seldom forgave a crime; so that all his relations who had appeared in arms against him, were sacrificed to his resentment, and among the rest the grand master of St. Jago. During these troubles, Blanche of Bourbon died in confinement; and it was universally reported that she was basely taken off by poison.

Henry of Transtamare, one of the natural sons of Alphonso, animated with a desire of revenging at once both the death of his mother, and that of the grand master of St. Jago, entered into a treaty with Charles V. king of France, and a powerful army was soon raised, under the command of John de Bourbon. Bertrand du Guesclin, a native of Britany, famous for his military abilities, was appointed general in this expedition; and had the address to engage the Companies, (now returned from Italy) to follow him into Castile.

This powerful confederacy so alarmed Peter, more especially as the greater part of his subjects had deserted him, that, to secure his own safety, he thought it most adviseable to quit his dominions. He accordingly repaired to the frontiers of Portugal; but being refused admittance into that kingdom, went to Bourdeaux, in order to solicit the protection and assistance of the Black Prince.

Edward readily espoused his cause, and undertook to replace him on the throne of Castile. He accordingly set out at the head of his army, and after passing the Pyrennees, divided his forces into three bodies, each consisting of ten thousand men. On his approaching the confederate troops, all the Companies immediately left du Guesclin's army, declaring they would never draw their swords against Edward, whom they considered as their native prince. But notwithstanding the desertion of the Companies, Henry de Transtamare and du Guesclin were still at the head of an hundred thousand men. Both armies now approached each other, and soon after was fought on the banks of the Ebro, near the village of Navarette, the famous battle of that name, between Peter and the Black Prince on one side, and Henry de Transtamare and du Guesclin on the other. Edward acquired more honour in this battle than at either that of Cressy or Poictiers, because the contest was much longer disputed. A compleat victory was at length obtained by Edward, and not less than twenty thousand of the enemy fell on the field of battle. Bertrand du Guesclin, and the marshal of Ardrehen were taken prisoners: Henry de Transtamare fled for safety to Arragon; and Peter was re-established on the throne of Castile.

But Edward had soon reason to repent having engaged himself in the cause of a man, who was at once a stranger to humanity, justice, and gratitude. No sooner were his ends answered, than Peter refused advancing the money which he had agreed to pay Edward for his assistance; and that prince, seeing his army daily decrease by sickness, and finding his own health greatly impaired by the excessive heat of the climate, was forced to return to Guienne, without receiving any reward for his services.

A. D. 1368. From the great expence that had attended the late enterprize in favour of Peter, and the large sums of money required to pay the troops, prince Edward was under the necessity of laying a new tax on his principality. The nobility of Guienne made strong remonstrances against this imposition, and at length appealed to the king of France, as their lord paramount. Charles, who, directed all his affairs by the principles of policy rather than of justice, admitted the appeal, and summoned the Black Prince to appear personally in his court at Paris. Exasperated at so insolent and unjust a summons, the prince, with all the spirit of a young warrior, returned for answer that he was ready to obey, but if he did, it should be at the head of an army of sixty thousand men.

This threat was far from intimidating Charles: he knew the declining years of the English monarch, the languishing state of the Prince of Wales's health, and the great animosity which the inhabitants of the conquered countries had expressed against the English. He therefore determined to take up arms, and, if poſſible, recover thoſe provinces which had been ſubdued in the reign of his father.

A. D. 1370. A numerous army being raiſed, Charles commenced hoſtilities in Ponthieu, where he met with very little oppoſition, and ſoon made himſelf maſter of the principal places in that province. In the mean time the dukes of Berry and Anjou (brothers to Charles) invaded the ſouthern provinces, and were ſo ſucceſsful that they ſoon produced a very important revolution. The ſtate of the Black Prince's health would not permit him to mount on horſeback, or exert his uſual activity. The brave Chandois, conſtable of Guienne, was ſlain in one action, and his ſucceſſor taken priſoner in another. The prince ſaw the progreſs of the French with the utmoſt regret, but it was not in his power to prevent it; and his illneſs increaſed ſo faſt, that he was at length obliged to throw up his command, and return to England.

A. D. 1371--73. The Engliſh monarch, incenſed at the injuries he had received from Charles of France, determined on a ſevere revenge; but the natural infirmities of age would not ſuffer him to attend his armies in perſon. He therefore diſpatched Sir Robert Knolles, a very courageous and experienced general, over to the continent, at the head of an army of 30,000 men. Sir Robert advanced into the heart of France, and extended his incurſions even to the very gates of Paris; but without being able to bring the enemy to a general battle. He then entered the provinces of Maine and Anjou, both of which he laid waſte; but a part of his army being defeated by a body of forces under the command of the conſtable of France, the reſt were ſcattered and diſperſed, ſo that inſtead of reaching Guienne (as was intended) they took ſhelter in Britany, whoſe prince had entered into an alliance with England.

A. D. 1374. Early in the ſpring of this year, the duke of Lancaſter, at the head of 25,000 men, went over to Calais, and proceeded on his march from thence to Bourdeaux. But the duke's efforts were far from being crowned with ſucceſs. The rear of his army was ſo dreadfully harraſſed by flying parties of the enemy, and his foraging parties ſo frequently cut off, that hardly half his army reached the place of their deſtination.

All the endeavours of the duke of Lancaſter and Sir Robert Knolles were ineffectual againſt the ſuperior power of the French. One province after another fell into the hands of the enemy, till at length Bourdeaux, Bayonne, and Calais were the only places that remained in poſſeſſion of the Engliſh. Theſe were alarming circumſtances to the once victorious Edward, who to prevent worſe conſequences, was glad to conclude a truce with (at that time) his more powerful enemy the king of France.

A. D. 1376. The paſſion for military glory that fired the breaſt of Edward during the vigour of his life was now extinguiſhed, and all his honours buried in the grave of folly and voluptuouſneſs. His virtuous queen Philippa had been ſome time dead, and he now attached himſelf to an infamous and artful woman named Alice Pierce, who gained ſuch an aſcendancy over the weak monarch as to render him an abſolute dupe to her caprice.

This lady ſoon made herſelf ſo publickly odious and contemptible by her avarice and inſolence, that the parliament at length interpoſed, and after preſenting a ſpirited remonſtrance to the king, ſhe was baniſhed the court. Edward alſo ſatisfied his parliament in another requeſt. The nation had, for ſome time, entertained a jealouſy of the great power of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaſter, and were fearful leſt he ſhould ſeize the crown on the death of the king. Edward, therefore, to remove their fears, declared, in full parliament, Richard (ſon to Edward the Black Prince) his heir and ſucceſſor to the throne of England.

Soon after this declaration, the Prince of Wales paid the debt of nature, to the great grief of his relations in particular, and the nation in general. He died at Windſor on the 8th of June, in the 46th year of his age. The character of this prince is truly amiable. His valour and military talents, which procured him the admiration of all Europe, form only a ſubordinate part of his merit. His humanity, generoſity, affability, and moderation, gained him the eſteem of all the world; even the moſt ſhining period of ancient or modern hiſtory would have received a luſtre from his virtues; they were celebrated by his greateſt enemies. Charles of France, though his kingdom had ſuffered ſo ſeverely from his valour, gave a noble mark of his high eſteem for this celebrated hero. He cauſed a ſolemn ſervice to be performed for the repoſe of his ſoul, in the church of Notre Dame, and aſſiſted himſelf in perſon, attended by the principal part of his nobility.

As ſoon as the funeral obſequies of the Black Prince were performed, the parliament teſtified their regard to his memory, by paying their reſpects to his ſon Richard, as heir apparent to the throne: they alſo petitioned the king that he might be created Prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Cheſter, and inveſted with all his father's honours and poſſeſſions, except thoſe aſſigned to his mother as her dower. This petition was readily complied with by the king, and Richard ſoon after received the honour of the Garter.

A. D. 1377. Infirm from age, and indolent through the prevalence of an unſeaſonable paſſion, Edward entirely neglected the affairs of government, while the artful and ambitious Lancaſter, by ingratiating himſelf with the princeſs of Wales and her ſon Richard, ſo increaſed his influence, that he obtained the reſtoration of Alice Pierce, the king's favourite miſtreſs, to her former power. In concurrence with this infamous woman he committed the moſt flagrant acts of injuſtice, maltreated the worthy, rewarded the moſt abandoned, and, wholly regardleſs of the public intereſt, purſued the gratification of every ſordid, ambitious, and venal principle.

It is little to be wondered at that ſuch a perverſion of authority, and violation of honour and juſtice, ſhould occaſion a general diſcontent throughout the kingdom. The citizens of London in particular remonſtrated againſt Lancaſter's proceedings; but, inſtead of meeting with any redreſs, were treated with contempt, the conſequence of which was, that he ſoon felt the effects of their reſentment.

One John Wickliff, a doctor of divinity in the univerſity of Oxford, had publiſhed his belief upon ſeveral articles of religion, wherein he differed from the common doctrine. He ſoon gained a number of followers in the kingdom, and among others the duke of Lancaſter and the lord Percy, earl-marſhal. Wickliff being ſummoned to appear before the biſhop of London at a ſynod held by that prelate in St. Paul's cathedral, the duke and marſhal accompanied him thither, thinking their preſence would be a powerful protection; and, in the courſe of the examination, the duke and marſhal inſulted the biſhop, and even proceeded to threats, upon which the ſynod broke up in great confuſion. The populace of London, who adored the biſhop, and were glad of any opportunity to be revenged on thoſe whom they knew to be their oppreſſors, aſſembled in a tumultuous manner, and, running to the Savoy (the magnificent palace of the duke of Lancaſter) rifled the houſe, and ſearched every where for his perſon, which, in all probability, they would have ſacrificed in the height of their fury; but, on advice of the danger that threatened him, he had eſcaped, with the lord Piercy, to the court of the princeſs of Wales, then at Kennington in Surry, where they remained till the tumult was ſubſided.

As the truce lately made with France was now expired, hoſtilities were again commenced on the continent between the Engliſh and French forces. The latter laid ſiege to a ſtrong fort near Calais, which was delivered up by the treachery or cowardice of the commanding officer. On the other hand, the brave Sir Hugh Calverly, governor of Calais, made an inroad into the French territories, from whence he returned to Calais loaded with ſpoils.

During theſe tranſactions Edward, who had retired to Shene (now Richmond) was ſeized with a violent fever, which, in a few days, increaſed to ſuch a height, as to leave no hopes of his recovery. In this piteous ſituation all his pretended friends deſerted him, Alice Pierce alone excepted, who watched the royal body with great care till he appeared to be in the agonies of death, when ſhe baſely ſtripped him of his rings and jewels, and then left him without a ſingle friend or domeſtic to cloſe his eyes. It happened, however, that a prieſt of his houſhold ſoon after entered the room, and finding the deſerted monarch yet alive, addreſſed to him ſome pious exhortations, to which the latter endeavoured to reply, but in words too inarticulate to be underſtood. At length, making a final effort, he pronounced the word Jeſus, and then expired, on the 21ſt of June, 1377, in the 65th year of his age, and 51ſt of his reign. His remains were interred in the abbey at Weſtminſter.

Such was the end of Edward III. one of the moſt accompliſhed princes that ever ſwayed the Engliſh ſceptre, whether conſidered as a warrior, a legiſlator, a monarch, or a man. He was tall of ſtature, but ſo juſtly proportioned, and had ſo noble and majeſtic an aſpect, as at once to engage affection, and command reſpect. Acute, penetrating, and ſagacious, he concerted the moſt prudential plans: bold, active and enterprizing, he vigorouſly executed his projects. He was a true lover of the conſtitution of his country, and ſhewed himſelf, on all occaſions, as anxious to defend the privileges of the people, as to preſerve the prerogatives of the crown. In his private character, he was humane, affable, generous and ſincere; and, in ſhort, poſſeſſed as many virtues as any monarch that had ever ſwayed the Britiſh ſceptre.

Edward had a taſte for the liberal arts much above what could be expected for the age in which he lived. The proofs we have of his taſte in architecture are, the edifices of Windſor Caſtle, King's Hall in Cambridge, and the collegiate chapel of St. Stephen (now the room where the Commons of Great-Britain aſſemble) all which he built, and the two laſt liberally endowed.

Remarkable Occurences during the reign of Edward III.

A. D.

1330 Gunpowder was this year invented by one Swarth, a monk of Cologne.

1331 The art of weaving cloth brought from Flanders to England by John Kemp, to whom the king granted his protection.

The rains were ſo violent, and continued ſo long, this year, that the harveſt did not begin till Michaelmas.

1336 A tax was laid on every bag of wool exported. Engliſh merchants paid 40*s.* per bag, and foreigners 3*l.*

A great dearth happened this year, and prodigious deſtruction was made among the cattle by a murrain.

1337 A Law was made by the parliament that no wool of Engliſh growth ſhould be exported, and that all cloth-workers, from whatever foreign parts they came, ſhould be received and encouraged. In this parliament the king created prince Edward, his eldeſt ſon, duke of Cornwall, being the firſt in England that bore the title of Duke. He was veſted with the dukedom by a wreath being placed on his head, a ring on his finger, and a ſilver verge in his hand; ſince which time the eldeſt ſon of the king of England is born Duke of Cornwall.

This year was alſo remarkable for the king's commiſſion for ſeizing the eſtates of the Lombards, or uſurers, who were grown odious on account of their extortions.

1339 It rained almoſt continually this year from the beginning of October to the beginning of December, when a froſt came on which laſted twelve weeks.

1340 Copper Money firſt uſed in Scotland and Ireland.

This year Thomas Blanket ſet up a loom at Briſtol, for weaving thoſe woolen cloths that, from him, bear that name.

1344 Gold firſt coined in England.

Among other acts of parliament paſſed this year was that called the ſtatute of proviſions, which excluded foreigners from Engliſh eccleſiaſtical preferments, and reduced the papal authority in England; which act has ſince been frequently renewed and called the ſtatute of præmunire.

This year the king gave an honourable invitation and reception to all perſons of diſtinction, whether natives or foreigners, whom he entertained with the greateſt politeneſs, magnificence and liberality. To avoid all diſtinction of rank he erected a circular hall 200 feet in diameter at Windſor, where he feaſted all the knights at one table, which was called the Round Table, in memory of the great Arthur, who, it is ſaid, firſt inſtituted an order of knighthood by that name.

1348 St. Stephen's Chapel at Weſtminſter built by order of the king.

1349 A dreadful plague in London, which carried off above 50,000 of the inhabitants.

This year alſo there was a continued rain, which laſted from Midſummer to Chriſtmas.

1352 The largeſt ſilver coin at this time in England was that to the value of four-pence.

1357 Coals firſt imported into London.

1361 This year great deſtruction was made both among men and beaſts by dreadful ſtorms of thunder and lightning; and to add to thoſe calamities, the plague again broke out with great violence, which was diſtinguiſhed from that already mentioned by being called the Second Mortality. It carried off, in London only, 57,374 perſons, among whom was Henry duke of Lancaſter.

1362 The ſtaple of wool fixed at Calais.

1364 In the month of January this year Edward III. king of England, John, king of France, Peter, king of Cyprus, and David king of Scotland, were magnificently entertained by Sir Henry Picard, then Lord-Mayor of London.

1371 The Charter-Houſe in London finiſhed by Sir Walter Manny.

1374 A tournament held in Smithfield.

1377 A tax of four pence a head levied by parliament on every perſon in the kingdom above the age of fourteen.

Several perſons, remarkable for their genius and learning, flouriſhed during the reign of Edward III. among whom the moſt remarkable were the following:

Geoffrey Chaucer (the greateſt poet of his time) a man of quality, and who made a conſiderable figure not only in the court of Edward, but likewiſe in that of his ſucceſſor Richard II. He was poſſeſſed of an admirable fund of humour, painted the manners of life with great ſtrength of colouring, and helped to improve and purify the Engliſh language. But it was the fate of this great poet (though poſſeſſed of an ample fortune, and a more ample genius) to fall into misfortunes in private life. He died in the year 1400, and was buried in Weſtminſter-Abbey, where a monument was erected to his memory, which is ſtill in good condition, and placed in that part of the abbey called the Poet's Corner.

ed

William of Wickham was conſidered as one of the moſt learned men of the age in which he lived. His great and uſeful talents, eſpecially in architecture, recommended him to the favour of Edward III. who appointed him ſurveyor to the re-building of the caſtle at Windſor, which was executed in the plain but magnificent manner it now appears. He was afterwards made ſecretary of ſtate, and, after enjoying other preferments, was at length promoted to the ſee of Canterbury. He died on the 27th of September, in the year 1404.

Thomas Wikes wrote an Hiſtory of England, beginning at the Conqueſt, and ending with the death of Edward I. He was a canon regular of Oſney, near Oxford; and that part of his work relative to the wars of the barons is clear and explicit.

Wickliffe was a divine writer, and the firſt man in Europe who ventured to bring religion to the teſt of ſcripture and eccleſiaſtical antiquity. The auſterity of his life, and the ſanctity of his manners, added great weight to his doctrine. He was indefatigable in his labours, and generally went about barefooted in the habit of a pilgrim. He tranſlated the New Teſtament from the Vulgate, and died in the year 1385, at his rectory of Lutterworth in Leiceſterſhire.

CHAP. II.

RICHARD II. ſurnamed of BOURDEAUX.

Acceſſion and coronation of Richard II. A regency appointed during the king's minority. A famine in England. Wat Tyler's rebellion. Diſputes relative to the papacy. The French make preparations for invading England, but their deſigns are rendered abortive. Richard particularly attaches himſelf to Robert de Vere earl of Oxford, and Michael de la Pole, the chancellor. The nobles enter into a confederacy againſt the king's favourites, and the parliament not only oblige him to remove the chancellor from his office, but alſo uſurp the regal authority. The confederate lords, with the duke of Glouceſter at their head, take up arms, and impeach many of the king's miniſters, ſeveral of whom are tried, condemned and executed. Richard takes the reins of government into his own hands, and makes a great change in the miniſtry. Goes over to Ireland at the head of a powerful army. Returns to England in order to ſuppreſs the Lollards. Marries Iſabella, daughter of Charles VI. king of France. Orders his uncle the duke of Glouceſter to be arreſted, and ſent priſoner to Calais, where he is ſoon after aſſaſſinated. Quarrel between the dukes of Norfolk and Hereford. Richard again goes over to Ireland. Henry, duke of Lancaſter, during his abſence, takes up arms, and being joined by a powerful confederacy, makes himſelf maſter of Briſtol. Richard returns from Ireland with a conſiderable body of forces to oppoſe him, but the greater part of his ſoldiers deſerting him, he retires, for ſafety, to Conway Caſtle in Wales. Is enſnared into the hands of the duke of Lancaſter, who conveys him to London, and commits him priſoner to the Tower. The king makes a formal reſignation of his crown, by delivering up the enſigns of royalty, and is ſoon after depoſed by the parliament.

A. D. 1377. AS Richard had been publicly declared heir to the crown by the late king, ſo no diſputes could take place relative to the ſucceſſion. He was, therefore, immediately on the death of his grand-father Edward III. proclaimed king of England, and, on the 15th of July following, ſolemnly crowned at Weſtminſter *.

As young Richard was under eleven years of age at the time of his acceſſion to the throne, ſo, of courſe, he was incapable of directing the affairs of government. In conſequence of this, a council of regency was appointed to rule the nation during his minority, at the head of whom was the duke of Lancaſter, one of the king's uncles, who had taken upon himſelf the chief direction of public affairs during the latter part of the late reign.

In the month of October the parliament aſſembled at Weſtminſter in order to conſider of proper meaſures to be taken for carrying on the war with France. The commons at firſt declined giving their opinion in a matter of ſuch importance without the advice and aſſiſtance of the duke of Lancaſter, but as that nobleman could not attend, they granted a liberal ſupply for the intended purpoſe.

In the mean time the Scots (in violation of the truce concluded in the late reign) ſurprized and took the town and caſtle of Berwick, on which the earl of Northumberland marched againſt them with an army of ten thouſand men, and ſummoning the fortreſs to ſurrender, was anſwered by the governor that the place had been taken by virtue of a commiſſion from the king of France, in whoſe name he would defend it to the laſt extremity. In conſequence of this anſwer, the earl immediately

* It is at this coronation we meet with the firſt mention in hiſtory of a champion, who appeared compleatly armed, in Weſtminſter-hall, where the king dined. He was attended by the high conſtable and marſhal of England, and preceded by the heralds. When the champion reached the middle of the hall he threw his gauntlet on the ground, and challenged all perſons whatſoever, who ſhould dare to diſpute his majeſty's title to the crown. The origin of this cuſtom, which is ſtill preſerved, is however utterly unknown: for though this is the firſt time we find it mentioned by hiſtorians, it is doubtleſs of a much earlier date; ſince Sir John Dimmock, who performed the office at the coronation of Richard II. was admitted to it by virtue of a right annexed to the manor of Scrivelſby, in Lincolnſhire, held by him in right of his wife, the daughter of Sir John Marmion.

mediately prepared for inveſting the place, which he ſoon took by aſſault, and the governor, with the whole garriſon, were put to the ſword.

A. D. 1378. During theſe tranſactions the French miniſtry were concerting meaſures for carrying on the war with the utmoſt vigour, and had concerted a ſcheme for diſpoſſeſſing the Engliſh of all the important places they held on the continent; but they received ſome check in carrying their deſigns into execution by the death of their king, who left his throne to Charles VI. then a minor under twelve years of age. This event might have been of conſiderable advantage had the duke of Britany (before in alliance with the Engliſh) continued firm to his engagements; but that prince, now thinking it moſt to his intereſt to enter into alliance with the French concluded a treaty with the new king; ſo that the Engliſh could expect no aſſiſtance from that quarter.

A. D. 1379. This year was unfortunately uſhered in by a dreadful plague, which broke out in the north of England, and greatly depopulated that part of the country. The Scots took advantage of this calamity, by making irruptions into thoſe parts, where they not only plundered many towns and villages, but likewiſe committed the moſt ſhocking barbarities; and the duke of Lancaſter, inſtead of endeavouring to puniſh them for their conduct, propoſed a treaty of peace, which being gladly embraced by the Scots, was concluded for three years.

A. D. 1380. An incident now happened of a moſt ſingular nature, and which threw the government into the utmoſt ſtate of confuſion. The monies already granted for carrying on the war with France being inſufficient, the parliament, in order to raiſe the neceſſary ſupplies, impoſed a new and extraordinary tax of three groats on every perſon, male and female, above fifteen years of age; but at the ſame time ordained, that, in levying this tax, the rich ſhould relieve the poor by an equitable compenſation. As the money was immediately wanted, and the common method of gathering it would take ſome conſiderable time, the court farmed out the grant to a ſet of rapacious collectors, who extorted it with the utmoſt rigour from the people. This impoſition, added to the cruelty and preſumptuous behaviour of the tax-gatherers, occaſioned one of the moſt ſingular inſurrections recorded in the annals of hiſtory.

The people had already acquired ſome idea of independence, and given ſeveral indications of their deſire of breaking thoſe chains which had ſo long been impoſed upon them by the haughty nobility. Enthuſiaſm alſo aſſiſted to augment this deſire, and make the populace acquainted with their own importance. One John Ball, a turbulent but popular preacher, viſited various parts of the kingdom, and every where inculcated on his audiences the maxims of equal right and liberty to all the goods of nature; and diſplayed to them the tyranny of artificial diſtinctions introduced by a few inſolent rulers, in order to aggrandize themſelves, and degrade the more conſiderable part of the ſpecies. Doctrines like theſe, ſo agreeable to the populace, were embraced with avidity, and kindled in the minds of the vulgar thoſe ſparks of rebellion which were ſoon blown into a flame by the inſolence of collectors appointed to gather the new tax.

A. D. 1381. The inſurrection began at Deptford in Kent, where one of the tax-gatherers, going to the houſe of Walter, a Tyler by profeſſion, (afterwards better known by the name of Wat Tyler) demanded three groats for one of his daughters. The peaſant refuſed to comply with the demand, urging, that ſhe was under the age preſcribed by act of parliament. The inſolent taxgather told him ſhe was not, offered to produce a very indecent proof to the contrary, and, at the ſame time laid hold of the girl. Enraged at this inſolence, Tyler beat out the fellow's brains with his hammer. The action was highly approved by the populace of the neighbourhood, who inſtantly flew to arms, and their example was ſoon followed by the peaſants of Eſſex, Surry, Suſſex, Hertfordſhire, Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, and Lincoln. The place appointed for a general rendezvous was Blackheath, where the inſurgents aſſembled to the amount of 100,000 men, under their principal leaders Wat Tyler and Jack Straw.

The number of regular troops then in the kingdom was very inconſiderable, ſo that the government was thrown into the utmoſt confuſion, and had every thing to fear from this lawleſs aſſembly. In this critical ſituation a council was called in the Tower, where a reſolution was taken to ſend a meſſenger to the inſurgents, to enquire the cauſe of their tumultuous meeting. The mutinous rabble received the meſſengers with the moſt haughty inſolence; and returned for anſwer, "That they were come to ſpeak to the king about certain important affairs; and deſired he would repair to the camp in perſon, and hear what they had to propoſe." Many of the council, particularly the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Sir Robert Hales, the treaſurer, oppoſed the king's going in perſon to treat with the rebels; thinking it at once both derogatory to his dignity, and dangerous to his life. But it being repreſented to the council, that the inſurgents were in full march for London, and that it would be impoſſible to prevent their gaining admittance into the city, the king went down the river in a barge, as far as Rotherhithe; but on approaching the ſhore, perceived ſuch ſymptoms of tumult and inſolence, that he thought his perſon in danger, and, putting back, returned to the Tower.

By this time the inſurgents approached London, where, being joined by the city rabble, they threatened to burn the ſuburbs firſt, and then the capital itſelf, if the gates were not immediately opened. Intimidated by this threat, which they were able to carry into execution, their demand was complied with. They entered the city, and immediately gave a looſe to every ſpecies of exceſs. They plundered the houſes of the moſt wealthy citizens, and abuſed their perſons, together with thoſe of their wives and daughters. A party of them ran immediately to the duke of Lancaſter's palace in the Savoy, and ſoon reduced that magnificent ſtructure, together with all its ſplendid furniture, to aſhes. Another party ſet fire to the Temple; while a third repaired to the elegant monaſtery of St. John of Jeruſalem, at Clerkenwell, near Smithfield, and burnt the whole ſtructure, together with all the books, records and papers.

The inſurgents continued their riotous proceedings, in different places, the whole night, and early the next morning divided themſelves into three bodies. The firſt diviſion, under Jack Straw, marched to Highbury-manor, about two miles to the northward of London. The ſecond retired to Mile-End; and the third, under the command of Wat Tyler himſelf, took up their ſtation in St. Katherine's, and round the Tower, to prevent the eſcape of the miniſters and noblemen who had taken ſhelter in that fortreſs, and whom the rabble had devoted to deſtruction. The king, who had alſo retired thither for ſafety, finding the fortreſs, which was but weakly garriſoned, and almoſt deſtitute of proviſions, incapable of making any long defence, found means to eſcape during the night; and hearing that the rebels at Mile-End were the moſt tractable, and had expreſſed a deſire of treating with the government, he repaired thither, and demanded to know the reaſon of their aſſembling in ſo tumultuous a manner; telling them, he was their king, and that he was come to hear and redreſs their grievances.

The rebels inſiſted upon a general amneſty; the abolition of all ſlavery; liberty of trade in all market-towns, without paying either toll or impoſt; and that a ſtated rent ſhould be laid upon lands, inſtead of the ſervice impoſed upon villanage. Theſe requeſts the king readily granted, but inſiſted on their immediately laying down their arms. They obeyed the royal requeſt, and inſtantly diſperſed, leaving only a few belonging to each pariſh to carry down with them the charters of enfranchiſements and pardon.

But the rebles under Wat Tyler were not to be ſo eaſily pacified. Being of a more ferocious diſpoſition, they were determined to revenge themſelves on the heads of the nation, and, if poſſible, carry the romantic ſcheme of government they had formed into execution. Accordingly, while the king was treating with one diviſion of the inſurgents, Wat Tyler demanded admittance into the Tower; and the garriſon were ſo intimidated at their numbers that they refuſed to defend the place, and the gates were accordingly thrown open. This puſillanimous conduct raiſed the inſolence of the rabble to the higheſt pitch; and their behaviour was at once both inſolent and barbarous. They ſeized Simon Sudbury, archbiſhop of Canterbury, then chancellor, and Sir Robert Hales, lord-treaſurer, and dragged them to Tower-hill, where they were both beheaded.

But theſe victims, inſtead of ſatiating the vengeance of the rebels, only tended to encreaſe their unwarrantable proceedings. Every perſon of any note who fell into their hands fell ſacrifices to their lawleſs barbarity. The citizens now ſaw their error in admitting ſuch a turbulent multitude into the city. Their ſavage practices rouſed them to revenge, and recovered them from their conſternation. Walworth, the lord-mayor, and Philpot, one of the aldermen, promiſed the king, that they would ſupport him againſt the rebels, provided ſome method could be found to amuſe them with propoſals. Sir John Newton was therefore ſent to acquaint them, that the Eſſex men had accepted certain conditions from the government, in conſequence of which they had retired peaceably to their habitations; and that he was impowered to offer them the ſame terms, on their making the ſame ſubmiſſion. But the ſavage plebeians, fluſhed with their late ſucceſs, had now formed the moſt chimerical deſigns; they propoſed to murder the king, together with all the whole nobility, and bury all government in general anarchy, in order to deſtroy every ſpecies of ſubordination, and render all men equal. Tyler, therefore, made no other anſwer to the king's meſſage, than that he would conſent to a peace if he liked the terms. Three different charters were ſent ſucceſſively by Richard in the ſpace of a few hours, but they were all rejected with the moſt provoking inſolence.

The miniſtry and principal men of the city were now thoroughly exaſperated, and Richard, attended by the lord-mayor, and chief officers of London, rode to Smithfield. Sir John Newton was again ſent to the ring-leader, inviting him to a conference with the king, in order that his majeſty might know his demands, and, if poſſible, give his conſent to their being granted. Tyler now ſeemed to be alarmed, and moved towards Smithfield, at the head of the rabble, with a very ſlow pace. Newton told him the king was waiting for him, and deſired he would quicken his march. "Make what haſte you pleaſe yourſelf," replied the inſolent rebel, "I ſhall take my own time." The true reaſon for this delay aroſe from his expecting a large reinforcement from Hertfordſhire and the adjacent counties, and therefore would willingly have deferred the conference till their arrival.

But the government was now in a capacity to defeat their ſchemes, and therefore unwilling to ſuffer them to exerciſe their ſavage barbarity any longer. The magiſtrates of London had aſſembled a large body of well-armed and well-affected citizens, and Sir Robert Knolles was juſt arrived at the head of a thouſand veterans. When Tyler, therefore, came into Smithfield, where the king waited for him, Sir John Newton told him, that both decency and duty required he ſhould be uncovered in the preſence of his ſovereign; but the rebellious leader, inſtead of complying, was ſo highly offended, that he would have ſheathed his dagger in Newton's heart, had not the king ſuddenly advanced, and drew off his attention, by aſking what he had to requeſt? Tyler was greatly diſconcerted; and made ſuch extravagant propoſals, and delivered himſelf in ſo incoherent a manner, that the king could make no reply. He demanded that all the antient laws ſhould be aboliſhed; that all bondmen ſhould be free; that all warrens, parks and chaces ſhould be laid open, and that every perſon, the poor as well as the rich, ſhould have free liberty to fiſh, fowl, and hunt in every part of the kingdom. He added ſeveral other particulars relative to the levelling ſcheme he had formed, but in ſo confuſed a manner that they were not underſtood.

The king not being able to comprehend the meaning of what this illiterate leader had advanced, returned no anſwer, which Tyler conſidering as a contemptuous refuſal, raiſed his dagger, and at the ſame time laid hold of the bridle of the king's horſe. Walworth, the mayor, who had with difficulty curbed his reſentment at the behaviour of this audacious rebel, was now ſo exaſperated that he rode up to him, and diſcharged ſo violent a blow on his head with the mace he carried in his hand, that Tyler fell ſenſeleſs from his horſe, when Philpot with his ſword immediately diſpatched him.

As ſoon as the Kentiſh-men ſaw their leader fall, they immediately made preparations for taking a ſevere revenge, and a dreadful ſlaughter might have enſued, had it not been for the great courage and amazing preſence of mind of Richard. He rode up alone to the incenſed multitude, whom he addreſſed with a chearful, but reſolute air in words to this effect: "My good people, what is the "meaning of this diſorder? Would you kill your "king? Give yourſelves no concern about the "death of that traitor: I will be your captain: "follow me, and you ſhall have whatever you "can reaſonably deſire." After ſaying this the king king turned his horſe, and moved towards the fields of Iſlington; and the inſurgents, confounded at the death of their leader and magnanimity of Richard, implicitly followed him, without knowing whither they were going. They had no ſooner left the city than they perceived a large body of forces marching towards them under the command of Sir Robert Knolles; in conſequence of which a panic immediately ſeized the whole multitude, who threw down their arms, and begged for quarter. Sir Robert would have perſuaded the king to put a number of them to death, in order to ſtrike a terror among thoſe who had aſſembled in other parts of the kingdom; but Richard, with equal juſtice and lenity, obſerved, that as many had joined them more from force than inclination, he was not willing to puniſh the innocent with the guilty. He therefore granted them a general pardon, and they immediately diſperſed.

Richard now returned to the city, where he conferred the honour of knighthood on Walworth the lord-mayor, John Philpot, Nicholas Brambre, and Robert Laud, aldermen, for their ſignal ſervices on this occaſion; and likewiſe beſtowed grants of land to the amount of 100l. per annum to the firſt; and 40l. to the reſt, to be enjoyed by them and their heirs for ever.

The reduction of the Kentiſh rebels ſo alarmed thoſe in the other parts of the kingdom, that they were glad to lay down their arms, and ſubmit to the king's mercy. The charters of enfranchiſements and pardon granted to the rebels of Eſſex were revoked; the common people were reduced to the ſame ſtate of ſubmiſſion in which they had formerly been placed, and ſeveral of the ringleaders were executed in different parts of the kingdom.

Soon after this tumult had ſubſided a treaty of marriage was concluded between the king, and Anne, ſiſter of Winceſlaus, king of Bohemia. The princeſs landed at Dover a few days before Chriſtmas, and immediately proceeded with her retinue to London. The nuptials were celebrated on the 14th of January following, and the young queen was crowned with great pomp in Weſtminſter-abbey.

A. D. 1382. In the beginning of this year a moſt violent diſpute took place relative to the papacy, and which threatened to involve all Europe in confuſion. On the death of Gregory X. Brigano, biſhop of Barri, was elected pontiff, and took upon him the name of Urban VI. But his paſſionate and turbulent diſpoſition rendered him a very improper perſon to be placed at the head of the church. He had not been long ſeated in the papal chair, when the cardinals, ſhocked at the cruelty of his diſpoſition, withdrew to Fondi, in the kingdom of Naples, where they declared the late election void, and choſe the count of Geneva in his ſtead, who took upon him the title of Clement VII. He was a perſon of a different character to Urban, being polite, humane, liberal, and allied to moſt of the princes in Europe.

Germany, England, Flanders and Hungary, declared for Urban: France, Scotland, Savoy and Lorraine, for Clement. All the religious orders were divided, and the univerſities alſo joined in the conteſt. The two popes beſtowed on each other the appellations of Antichriſt and Uſurper, and proceeded to mutual excommunications. Clement preached up a cruſade againſt Richard and his ſubjects; while Urban not only fulminated his excommunications againſt all the adherents of Clement, but alſo ſent over a commiſſion to Henry Spencer, biſhop of Norwich, nominating him the leader of a cruſade againſt his rival. And with this commiſſion he ſent the biſhop plenary powers, as his legate, to grant the ſame indulgences to all who engaged in the expedition as to thoſe who carried arms againſt the infidels.

A. D. 1383. The publication of this cruſade in England anſwered the moſt ſanguinary wiſhes of Urban. The nobility, gentry, clergy, and almoſt all ranks of people, engaged in it with the moſt aſtoniſhing ardour. The greateſt diſpatch was uſed in embarking the forces, and the biſhop landed at Calais on the fourth of May, at the head of 50,000 foot and 2000 horſe. His firſt attack was upon Gravelines, which he took by aſſault. This ſucceſs ſo alarmed the inhabitants of Dunkirk that they readily opened their gates to the victor, and moſt of the towns on the ſea-coaſt, as far as Sluys, followed their example.

Alarmed at the progreſs of the Engliſh, the count of Flanders reſolved to lead his forces againſt them; which was no ſooner known by the biſhop, than he marched to meet the enemy and a bloody battle enſued, in which the count was totally defeated. The king of France, at the head of an army of an hundred thouſand men, now advanced to check the progreſs of the cruſaders. The prelate, on a general muſter of his forces, found that they amounted to ninety thouſand men, occaſioned by the continual arrival of freſh reinforcements from England. But many of theſe were the very dregs of the people, and at once ignorant of diſcipline and impatient of command. It was, however, reſolved in a council of war, to fight the French army; but this was oppoſed by a large party of the troops, who inſiſted on their beſieging Ypres, where they expected to acquire an immenſe booty. It was in vain to oppoſe this ſtrange determination; and the biſhop, in order to prevent a mutiny in his army, was obliged to undertake the reduction of that place. The approaches were carried on with great intrepedity; but the biſhop was at laſt obliged to raiſe the ſiege, after loſing great numbers of his men, and retreat to Dunkirk. From hence he diſpatched a meſſenger to Richard for a reinforcement; but from the negligence of the king they were not ſent. In conſequence of this diſappointment, the biſhop gave up all hopes of being able any farther to oppoſe the enemy, and therefore, embarking with the ſmall remains of his army, returned to England.

Thus ended this mighty enterprize; and no farther attempts were made by the Engliſh for ſupporting the claim of Urban to the papacy. The other powers, however, on the continent, continued to oppoſe each other for ſome years, during which many lives were loſt, and the greateſt enormities committed by the adherents to the contending diſputants for the pontifical dignity.

A. D. 1384. The people had entertained the higheſt idea of Richard, from thoſe diſtinguiſhed accompliſhments and abilities which had been ſo repeatedly diſplayed by his father; and the remarkable inſtance he ſhewed of his intrepidity and preſence of mind in appeaſing the Kentiſh rebels, gave them the moſt pleaſing expectations of his future conduct. But it was not long before they found themſelves greatly diſappointed. As Richard advanced in years, the weakneſs of his head, and the badneſs of his heart, became the more apparent, and his want of conduct and capacity was too plainly diſcovered by the ſtupidity of every ſcheme he formed, and his abſurd method of proceeding in every enterprize he undertook.

The Scots had made great inroads in the northern counties of England, and committed the moſt violent outrages on the innocent inhabitants. In conſequence of this a large army was raiſed to chaſtiſe their inſolence. Richard headed his troops in perſon, and entered Scotland by Berwick; while the Scots, who dreaded a pitched battle, abandoned the low country, croſſed the Engliſh borders on the weſt, and plundered the counties of Weſtmoreland, Cumberland and Lancaſhire. In the mean time Richard advanced to Edinburgh, and deſtroyed all the towns and villages in his way. He reduced that city to aſhes, as alſo Perth, Dundee, and ſeveral other places in the low country. But when he was adviſed, by his moſt experienced officers, to march towards the weſtern coaſt, in order there to wait the return of the enemy, and take ſevere revenge on them for the cruel devaſtations they had made, he fooliſhly rejected their council, and returned with his forces to England, after putting the nation to great expence, and gaining no advantage by the expedition.

A. D. 1386. The French had ſome time formed the deſign of invading England, and they now determined to carry it into execution. They accordingly collected a prodigious fleet and army for that purpoſe, and all the nobility of France were engaged in the enterprize. The French army, when reviewed at Arras, conſiſted of eighty thouſand men at arms, with their followers on horſeback, beſides a prodigious number on foot. Twelve hundred and eighty-ſeven ſhips of all ſorts were ready at Sluys to carry over this numerous army; and ſeveral warlike engines of a new conſtruction were put on board the fleet. This amazing armament engaged the attention of all Europe. The Engliſh were intimidated, particularly the citizens of London. The militia of the kingdom were ordered to the ſea-coaſt; the ports and harbours were put in a poſture of defence; and all the beacons on the coaſt prepared for giving the alarm, whenever the enemy ſhould appear. A fleet was alſo fitted out to guard the channel, and every prudent meaſure which reaſon could ſuggeſt was purſued to render abortive the deſigns of the enemy.

But this grand ſcheme was in a great meaſure fruſtrated by means of the very people by whom it was concerted. Ambition and envy, ſo often the deſtruction of public undertakings, had poiſoned the French councils. The duke of Berry, a prince of a covetous and aſpiring diſpoſition, was no friend to this undertaking, in which he thought neither his dignity nor intereſt had been ſufficiently conſulted, and therefore determined to render the whole abortive. In order to this, he proceeded ſo ſlow in aſſembling the troops, that it was the middle of September before he joined the army at the head of his diviſion. The forces were, however, embarked, and the fleet ſailed out of the harbour with a fair wind. But they had not left their own coaſt above two hours before the wind changed to the oppoſite quarter, and a dreadful ſtorm ſucceeded, which, in a few hours, ſcattered the whole navy. Some of the ſhips were driven back into the harbour of Sluys; ſome were daſhed on the rocks, others foundered at ſea, and many of the ſtragglers were taken by the Engliſh. Such was the end of thoſe mighty preparations, which had, for ſome time, ſpread a general terror throughout the kingdom.

A. D. 1387. Richard had, for ſome time, regretted the reſtraint he lay under from his uncles (the dukes of Lancaſter, Glouceſter and York) and therefore was now determined to ſhake off their authority, and give a full ſcope to his own maxims. He accordingly placed his confidence in Robert de Vere, earl of Oxford, a young nobleman of an agreeable figure, but of very diſſolute manners, more calculated to corrupt the prince than to govern the kingdom. This favourite engroſſed the affection of Richard, who knew not how to ſet bounds to his liberality. He created him duke of Ireland, and conferred on him for life the ſovereignty of that iſland; even the whole authority of the government was, by degrees, lodged in his hands. Michael de la Pole, the chancellor whom he had created earl of Suffolk, was another of his favourites; but as this man was poſſeſſed of great military talents, and had ſerved in the army with applauſe, the duke of Ireland was the moſt obnoxious to the people.

From the great attachment of Richard to theſe two favourites, the princes of the blood, and chief nobility, ſaw themſelves ſtripped of their power, and in order to recover their influence, determined to attack the favourites. Accordingly, an impeachment was drawn up againſt the chancellor, and the duke of Glouceſter undertook to carry it into the houſe of lords. It was, however, thought proper to obſerve the appearance of decency at leaſt, and accordingly the commons ſent a meſſage by their ſpeaker to the king, importing, that unleſs the chancellor was removed, they could not proceed in the diſpatch of public buſineſs. Richard, little expecting a motion of this nature, received the addreſs with an indignation he could not conceal. He told the ſpeaker very ſharply, "That it would better become the parliament to attend to the buſineſs for which they were ſummoned, than to concern themſelves with his ſervants." Nor did he give them leave to renew their addreſs: he abruptly left the place, and immediately retired to Eltham in Kent.

It was no ſooner known that Richard had withdrawn himſelf from the national council, than a meſſage was ſent him by the duke of Glouceſter and the biſhop of Ely, deſiring him, in the name of the parliament, to return: declaring, in caſe of refuſal, that they would immediately diſſolve themſelves. Richard, finding himſelf unable to reſiſt, agreed to the impeachment being carried on againſt Suffolk; but at the ſame time it was ſtipulated that no attack ſhould be made againſt any other of his miniſters. The accuſation laid againſt the earl was at once both frivolous and unjuſt; but innocence was a poor defence againſt the turbulent envy of the barons. Suffolk was convicted, and adjudged to pay a fine and ranſom to the king; and in the mean time was committed to the cuſtody of the duke of Glouceſter, who, as conſtable of the kingdom, confined him in the caſtle at Windſor.

The impeachment of Suffolk, and the conſequences ariſing therefrom, were but preludes to the intentions of the barons. Glouceſter and his aſſociates indeed, obſerved their ſtipulation with the king: they attacked no more of his miniſters; but they went much farther by attacking the regal power. The king was deprived of his authority, and the exerciſe of the ſovereign power intruſted to fourteen commiſſioners, whoſe juriſdiction was limited to a twelve-month, though it was ſufficiently evident, evident, that the party of Glouceſter never meant to reinſtate their monarch in his prerogatives. But this was not all; they obliged the king not only to grant a commiſſion, under his own hand and ſeal, for veſting this committee with the neceſſary powers, but alſo to give his aſſent to a ſtatute, by which any perſon who ſhould dare to propoſe a revocation of the powers granted to this committee ſhould, for the firſt offence, forfeit his eſtate; and for the ſecond be puniſhed as a traitor.

Puſillanimous as Richard was, he, however, at the end of the ſeſſion, entered a proteſt againſt theſe violent proceedings, declaring, in full parliament, "that the prerogatives of his crown, not-"withſtanding his late conceſſion, ſhould be "deemed entire and unimpaired." But this proteſt had no effect on the commiſſioners: they proceeded to the exerciſe of their office; and the king found himſelf deſtitute of all authority.

After ſome time Richard determined to make one bold attempt for the recovery of his power. He accordingly aſſembled the judges and lawyers, who made no ſcruple of declaring, that the commiſſion was derogatory to the royal authority; that thoſe who procured it, or adviſed the king to conſent to it, were puniſhable with death; that thoſe who compelled him were guilty of treaſon; that thoſe were equally criminal who ſhould perſevere in maintaining it; that the king had the right of diſſolving parliaments when he pleaſed; that the parliament while they ſat muſt proceed firſt on the king's buſineſs; and that they could not, without the king's conſent, impeach any of his miniſters and judges.

The duke of Glouceſter and his party no ſooner heard of this ſecret conſultation between the judges and king, than they immediately had recourſe to arms, and demanded that the perſons who had ſeduced the king by their pernicious counſels, ſhould be delivered up as traitors to the ſtate. A few days after they appeared armed before the king, attended by their followers; when they accuſed the archbiſhop of York, the duke of Ireland, the earl of Suffolk, Sir Robert Treſilian, and Sir Nicholas Brambre, as public and dangerous enemies to the kingdom. The duke of Ireland ſaved himſelf by flight, but the reſt were tried, condemned, and executed; and ſeveral of the judges and lawyers, who had taken part with Richard, baniſhed the kingdom.

During theſe tranſactions the earl of Arundel, who had received a commiſſion as governor of Breſt, and conſtituted lord-high-admiral of England, ſet ſail from that port with a ſquadron, and, falling in with a French fleet, took fourſcore of their ſhips, which he brought ſafe to England, after having reduced the iſlands of Rhee and Oleron, and alarmed the whole coaſt of France.

A. D. 1388. In the beginning of Auguſt this year the Scots, taking advantage of the great commotions in the Engliſh government, entered Northumberland with an army conſiſting of three hundred horſe and two thouſand foot, commanded by the earl of Douglas and his ſon, the earls of Fife, Murray and Dunbar, the moſt celebrated commanders in the Scottiſh army. They ravaged the whole country through which they paſſed, and advanced as far as the gates of Newcaſtle, where the lord Henry Piercy (ſurnamed Hotſpur from the haſtineſs of his diſpoſition) ſon to the earl of Northumberland, firſt oppoſed them. But his troops were defeated, and himſelf unhorſed in ſingle combat by the younger Douglas, who, having ſeized his lance, declared he would carry it to Scotland as a trophy of his victory.

Inflamed with rage at this misfortune, Hotſpur vowed revenge, and ſwore that Douglas ſhould not fulfil his intention. He accordingly collected a body of ſix hundred horſe and eight thouſand foot, and putting himſelf at their head marched in purſuit of the enemy, without waiting for a reinforcement of troops that were haſtening to join him under the command of the biſhop of Durham. The Scots, elated with their late ſucceſs, had undertaken the ſiege of the caſtle of Otterborn, and were lying before that fortreſs, when Piercy, by forced marches, reached their camp. Rage had ſtifled prudence in the breaſt of Piercy: he would not delay the battle a moment, though his troops were ſo greatly fatigued with their long marches, and night was approaching when he came up with the enemy. He attacked the Scots with all the fury of a diſappointed warrior, but the darkneſs of the night rendered it impoſſible to continue the conteſt, and the two armies ſeparated without either obtaining the victory. The moon, however, riſing at midnight, occaſioned the battle to be renewed with great fury, and at laſt victory declared in favour of the Scots, but not without the loſs of their intrepid leader the earl of Douglas, who fell among the ſlain. Piercy, his brother, and about an hundred officers of diſtinction, were taken priſoners, and twelve hundred of the Engliſh left dead on the field of battle. The biſhop of Durham, who was advancing at the head of ten thouſand men to join Piercy, no ſooner heard of this diſaſter than, inſtead of marching againſt the Scots, he retired with precipitation to Newcaſtle, and thereby allowed the Scots to retreat at leiſure with their booty and priſoners.

During theſe tranſactions a commiſſion was ſent to the duke of Lancaſter, who had been abroad two years, to treat with France about an accommodation for peace; and a truce was accordingly concluded between the two kingdoms.

A. D. 1389. Richard, being now in the twenty-third year of his age, reſolved to free himſelf from that ſtate of ſlavery, in which he had hitherto been kept by his uncles, and the confederate barons. He therefore, in a full council held at Eaſter, declared his intention of directing the affairs of his kingdom and houſhold by his ſole authority, and taking into his own hands the reins of government. Strange as it may appear, no oppoſition was made to this declaration; nor was it long before he carried his deſign into execution. He removed the archbiſhop of Canterbury from the office of chancellor, and beſtowed it on William of Wickham, biſhop of Wincheſter. The duke of Glouceſter, the earl of Warwick, and ſome other lords of the oppoſition were removed from the council-board. The part of treaſurer was taken from the biſhop of Hereford, and that of high-admiral from the earl of Arundel: the keeper of the privy-ſeal, all the great officers of ſtate, and the houſhold, were changed, and every place filled with perſons in whom the king thought he could repoſe the greateſt confidence.

Theſe changes were made without the leaſt oppoſition; and Richard, by paſſing a general anneſty, and giving up ſome ſubſidies which had been granted him by parliament, acquired the affections of the people, who eaſily paſs from one extreme to another.

Soon after this great change had taken place in the government, the duke of Lancaſter, returned from the continent, and effected a reconciliation between the king and the duke of Glouceſter, who, in conſequence thereof, was again admitted as a member of the council. Lancaſter, as a recompence for his ſervices, was created duke of Aquitaine, and inveſted with the enſigns of that order.

A. D. 1390. The parliament became now as great advocates for the king as they had before been for his uncles and their aſſociates. During the ſeſſion, which was opened on the 17th of January, they gave ſeveral remarkable inſtances of their loyalty and affection. In particular they paſſed an act, by which they renewed the declaration, touching the king's enjoyment of his prerogative, with this addition, "notwithſtanding any "ſtatute and ordinance formerly made in deroga-"tion thereof, particularly in the reign of king "Edward II."

A. D. 1391. Nor was the parliament which met in the beginning of the next year leſs deficient in ſhewing their affection and loyalty than they had been the preceding. They granted the king a whole tenth and fifteenth to defray the expences of his voyage to France, whither he was invited by Charles to effect, if poſſible, a laſting accommodation with that monarch. In the mean time commiſſioners were diſpatched to treat with the French court on the buſineſs; and it was agreed that a congreſs ſhould be held at Amiens, in order that the treaty might be concluded and ratified in the preſence of the two monarchs.

A. D. 1392. In conſequence of this agreement Charles king of France, with his brother and uncles, repaired to Amiens, and Richard proceeded as far as Dover in his way to that place; but whether or no he altered his mind of his own accord, or was diverted from his purpoſe by the repreſentations of his council, is uncertain: his voyage, however, was laid aſide, and he remained at Dover Caſtle with the duke of Glouceſter, while his other two uncles, the dukes of York and Lancaſter, with the earls of Huntingdon and Derby, and other noblemen, proceeded to Amiens, in quality of ambaſſadors and plenipotentiaries. They were met on the road by the dukes of Berry and Burgundy, and, during their ſtay at Amiens, magnificently entertained at the expence of the French king. But ſo many difficulties aroſe in the courſe of the conference, that nothing more was done, than prolonging the truce till Michaelmas in the following year.

A. D. 1393. The parliament met on the 20th of January, and the buſineſs firſt deſigned to be taken in hand was, the peace with France; but this was poſtponed on account of advice being received that Charles, from a diſorder in his brains, was incapable of holding the reins of government, and that the affairs of that kingdom were in the utmoſt ſtate of confuſion. The commons, however, granted the king an additional ſupply, in caſe a war ſhould take place either with France or Spain.

A. D. 1394. In the beginning of this year conferences were again opened for concluding a treaty of peace with France; but ſo many diſputes took place relative to the ſuperiority of Guienne that they did not produce the wiſhed-for effect, and the whole terminated by prolonging the truce for five years.

A. D. 1395. This year * Richard formed the reſolution of going over to Ireland, the cauſe of which aroſe from the following circumſtances. The Engliſh noblemen, who poſſeſſed large eſtates in that kingdom choſe rather to reſide in England, ſo that Ireland was left almoſt defenceleſs, and expoſed to the ravages of many of the ferocious natives, who took care to avail themſelves of ſo favourable an opportunity of recovering their antient poſſeſſions. Theſe they took by force of arms, and plundered all the reſt of the country belonging to the Engliſh, ſo that the revenue, which was very conſiderable in the late reign, was now not ſufficient to defray the expences of keeping forces in that kingdom.

Having made the neceſſary preparations for the expedition, Richard, after appointing the duke of York guardian of the kingdom during his abſence, ſet out for Wales, accompanied by the duke of Glouceſter, and the earls of Marche, Nottingham and Rutland; and embarking at Milford-haven, landed in Ireland with an army of 50,000 men.

The arrival of Richard, at the head of ſo powerful an army, ſtruck a general panic among the Iriſh, many of whom retired to their faſtneſſes for ſafety, while the reſt immediately ſubmitted to Richard, who treated them with the greateſt clemency. He not only gave them a free pardon, but even allotted penſions to their chiefs, and, by thoſe meaſures, endeavoured to allay their natural ferocity. The earl of Nottingham was empowered to receive, in the king's name, the ſubmiſſion and homage of all the Iriſh in Leinſter, who accordingly gave bonds for their future peaceable behaviour. Many chiefs of other parts of the kingdom came in, and in particular O'Neal, lord paramount over the other princes in Ireland, who voluntarily tended allegiance to the king of England, and did homage to him at Drogheda. His example was followed by moſt of the other princes, who engaged for themſelves, and their clans, to maintain the peace of the kingdom.

Richard, in order to complete the favourable impreſſion he had made on the minds of theſe people, determined to keep his Chriſtmas in Dublin, and invited all the Iriſh chiefs to a grand entertainment in that city, where he conferred upon them the order of knighthood, and encouraged them to adopt the Engliſh cuſtoms, dreſs, and way of living. In ſhort, he conducted himſelf with ſuch moderation and prudence as to acquire the general affection and eſteem of the native Iriſh, the greater part of whom voluntarily ſubmitted to his goverment.

While Richard was in Ireland, ſome diſturbances took place in London, owing to the conduct of the followers of Wickliff, who had acquired the title of Lollards, and were become ſo preſumptuous as to preach, write, and openly declaim againſt the eſtabliſhed religion †. Protected by ſome powerful noblemen, they impeached the morals

* On the 7th of June this year Richard ſuſtained a great loſs by the death of his queen, who paid the debt of nature at Shene. From her many excellent virtues ſhe obtained the title of Good Queen Anne; ſo that it is no wonder her death was univerſally lamented by the whole nation. Richard was ſo deeply affected at this melancholy event, that he was for ſome time, quite diſconſolate; nor could he ever after bear the ſight of the place where ſhe expired.

† The Lollards denied the doctrine of the real preſence, the merit of confeſſion and monaſtic vows, and the ſupremacy of the rals and doctrines of the clergy, and a writing, containing the articles of the charge, was laid before the parliament by Sir Thomas Latimer, and other members, who had adopted their principles.

Alarmed at ſo deſperate an attack upon their order, the archbiſhop of York, and the biſhop of London, immediately repaired to the king at Dublin, and inveighed ſo ſtrongly againſt the Lollards, as being enemies to the church and ſtate, that Richard declined his deſign of ſtaying longer in that city, and therefore returned to England, in order to put a ſtop to the proceedings of thoſe diſturbers of the public peace. Accordingly, on his arrival, he iſſued out a proclamation, threatening the Lollards with death, if they continued to propagate their erroneous tenets; and the chancellor of Oxford was ordered to expel all thoſe who were ſuſpected of favouring their opinions. Theſe meaſures put a check to the proceedings of the Lollards, who thought proper for their own ſafety, to remain ſilent, and not publickly endeavour to propagate doctrines ſo repugnant to the tranquillity of the ſtate.

A. D. 1396. As the late queen had died without iſſue, it was now thought adviſeable by the council that Richard ſhould enter into a ſecond marriage, in order to prevent thoſe troubles which might ariſe ſhould he die without a legitimate offſpring. They accordingly (abſurd as it muſt appear to every thinking perſon) pitched upon Iſabella, eldeſt daughter of the French king, as the moſt ſuitable conſort for the Engliſh monarch; and the archbiſhop of Dublin, the biſhop of St. David's with ſeveral of the firſt noblemen were ſent to demand that princeſs in marriage. They were ordered to inſiſt on a conſiderable portion, and empowered to offer ten thouſand marks a year for her jointure. Theſe propoſals being laid before the council of France, ſome of the members hinted how inconſiſtent it would be to treat of a marriage previous to the concluſion of a peace; but the duke of Burgundy wiſely obſerved, that it was the moſt probable expedient to effect and conſolidate a laſting accommodation. At length, all difficulties being removed, it was unanimouſly agreed that Richard ſhould marry Iſabella, and receive with her a portion of eight thouſand franks in gold, at yearly payments: that he ſhould abſolutely renounce all claim to the crown of France, either from his own hereditary pretenſions, or by virtue of his marriage: and, laſtly, that the truce ſhould be prolonged for twenty-five years.

Theſe points being ſettled, the young princeſs, though only in the eighth year of her age, was entitled queen of England, and affianced to Richard by the earl of Nottingham as proxy. In the month of October following the king went over to Calais, where the marriage ceremony was performed in the church of St. Nicholas by the archbiſhop of Canterbury; and the young queen was ſoon after crowned with great ſolemnity in the abbey church of Weſtminſter.

A. D. 1397. This ſtrong alliance with France gave great offence to the Engliſh in general, who had contracted a violent antipathy to the people of that nation; and they were farther irritated by the indiſcretion of the king, who, ſoon after his return from the continent, delivered up Breſt and Cherbourgh into the hands of the French.

The conduct of Richard was far from being calculated to procure the reſpect of his ſubjects. Indolent in the affairs of government, and a ſlave to pleaſure; under the dominion of favourites, on whom he profuſely laviſhed the revenues of the crown, and the grants of the people; and ſullying the dignity of his rank by admitting perſons of very mean condition to his familiarity; he was looked upon with contempt by the people, who conſidered him as a perſon totally unworthy of wearing the Engliſh diadem.

Not only the people in general, but alſo many of the principal nobility, were highly incenſed againſt the king for his injudicious conduct, but none more than the duke of Glouceſter. That prince, to ſhew his diſguſt, abſented himſelf from the court; hardly ever appeared in council but to oppoſe the meaſures of adminiſtration; and threw out the moſt ſevere invectives againſt the government, the long truce concluded with Charles, and the marriage of Richard with the daughter of that monarch.

The miniſtry were greatly alarmed at the proceedings of Glouceſter, and the king, whoſe precipitate temper admitted of no deliberation, ordered him to be unexpectedly arreſted. Accordingly, a plan being laid for the purpoſe, the duke was ſeized, hurried on board a ſhip lying in the river ready to receive him, and taken over to Calais, where it was thought he could be ſafely detained in cuſtody. The duke's aſſociates, the earls of Arundel and Warwick, lord Cobham, Sir John Cheney, and other perſons of diſtinction, were alſo the next day arreſted; and, in order to prevent any popular clamour that might be made on the occaſion, a proclamtion was iſſued out, declaring, that they were arreſted on charges of treaſon, and ſhould be tried by the great council of the nation, which he ſummoned to meet on the firſt day of Auguſt at Nottingham.

The parliament met according to appointment, and ſuch was the venality of the members, that they entered with violence into the meaſures of the king and his dependents. They annulled the act of amneſty which Richard had voluntarily confirmed, and exhibited articles of impeachment againſt the duke of Glouceſter, and archbiſhop of Canterbury, the earls of Arundel and Warwick, with other noblemen, ſeveral of whom were tried, condemned and executed, for having been engaged in former attempts againſt the crown, notwithſtanding the pardon they had received.

Among thoſe who ſuffered death was the earl of Arundel, and the king himſelf was mean enough to be a ſpectator of the tragic ſcene (attended by the earls of Kent and Nottingham) which he beheld with all the ſymptoms of brutal pleaſure. When the earl came upon the ſcaffold, he turned to Nottingham, his ſon-in-law, and ſaid, "My "lord, it would ſurely have better become you "to have been abſent on this occaſion; you ſeem "to triumph in my ſufferings; but remember, "the time is coming, when your own misfortunes "may furniſh the like triumph to your enemies." The cruel treatment of this gallant nobleman excited pope. They maintained, that the numerous ceremonies the church were deſtructive of true piety; that the ſcripture the ſole rule of faith; that the church was dependent on ſtate, and ought to poſſeſs no temporal wealth; and that no taxes ought to be levied on the people till the riches of the eccleſiaſtics had been expended in the ſervice of the kingdom.

cited a general clamour among the people, who publickly declared he fell a martyr to the the liberties of his country. His life was ſpent in a ſeries of brave actions. He had boldly endeavoured to preſerve his country's liberty, in oppoſition to vice, weakneſs and venality, with ſo uniform a tenor of conduct, that he was never known to deviate, in the leaſt point, from the principles he poſſeſſed.

As for the duke of Glouceſter, it was not Richard's intention to allow him the chance of a trial. He knew that nothing of a treaſonable nature could be proved againſt him, and as he was determined, at all events, to diſpatch him, he ſent a private commiſſion to four ruffians at Calais, who ſmothered the unhappy nobleman between two feather-beds; after which they ſtripped the body, and laying it under the cloaths, pretended he died of an apoplexy. Such was the miſerable and untimely end of Thomas of Woodſtock, duke of Glouceſter, who, though not exempt from avarice and ambition, was nevertheleſs brave, open, ſincere and patriotic; and firmly attached to the conſtitution and intereſt of his country.

No ſooner were the dukes of York and Lancaſter informed of the cruel murder of their brother, than they immediately haſtened to London at the head of a numerous body of forces, threatening to take the moſt ſevere revenge on the authors of this execrable tragedy, not excepting even the king himſelf. Richard had, however, taken all the precautions neceſſary to divert the force of the expected ſtorm. He had not only gained over the parliament to his devotion; but alſo collected an army of twenty thouſand veterans, and ſtationed them in the neighbourhood of London. Nor did he depend on theſe forces; he had recourſe alſo to the milder method of negotiation, and the two brothers, finding that all oppoſition would be in vain, liſtened to an accommodation.

A. D. 1398. The parliament met at Weſtminſter on the 29th of January, and the firſt point of importance that came under their cognizance was, a charge exhibited againſt the duke of Norfolk, by the duke of Hereford, who accuſed him of having ſpoken in private many ſlanderous and ſeditious words againſt the king. Norfolk gave him the lie, and offered to prove his innocence by ſingle combat, a method of trial then authorized by the laws of the kingdom. The challenge was accepted, and the diſpute ordered to be decided according to the laws of chivalry, in preſence of the king and his whole court. Accordingly both the dukes appeared on the day appointed, the trumpets ſounded, and they were preparing to ruſh againſt each other, when the king prevented their encountering, by ordering them to wait till he ſhould conſult his council, and determine the diſpute without bloodſhed. He accordingly retired, and the two combatants returned to their reſpective chairs, which were placed on the ſpot, as was cuſtomary on thoſe occaſions. Some time after a proper officer arrived from the king, and ſilence being proclaimed, he pronounced the determination of the council, the ſubſtance of which was to this effect. That as both the appellant and defendant had honourably appeared in the liſts, their courage was ſufficiently aſcertained, and the king, with the advice of his council, had agreed, that the earl of Hereford ſhould, on pain of death; within fifteen days, depart the kingdom, and go into exile for the ſpace of ten years, and that the earl of Norfolk ſhould be baniſhed for life, becauſe he had not been able to clear himſelf of the accuſation laid to his charge.

The earl of Norfolk, knowing he had no favour to expect from Richard, retired firſt into Germany, and from thence to Venice, where he ſoon after paid the debt of nature. The duke of Hereford, who had ſome favourable expectations, waited on the king to take his leave before he quitted the kingdom, and this ſubmiſſive and reſpectful behaviour had ſuch an effect on Richard, that he remitted four years of the time aſſigned for his baniſhment; and alſo empowered him, by letters patent, to enter into immediate poſſeſſion of any eſtates that might fall to him during his exile.

A. D. 1399. The earl of Hereford had left the kingdom but a few months, when John of Gaunt duke of Lancaſter, paid the debt of nature, and Hereford, in conſequence of his rights, and the letters patent he had received, deſired to be put in poſſeſſion of the eſtates of his father. But Richard, contrary to every tie of honour and honeſty, denied his requeſt, and not only revoked the latters patent he had given to Hereford, and confiſcated all his perſonal eſtates, but likewiſe decreed that his baniſhment ſhould be perpetual.

It is little to be wondered at that a nobleman of Hereford's rank and character ſhould be highly exaſperated at ſuch complicated injuries. He was of a bold and enterprizing ſpirit; had given proofs of his courage and abilities both at home and abroad; was beloved by the people, and adored by the ſoldiers. He was always cool, ſedate and prudent; and was conſidered as the only Engliſh prince that deſerved the public confidence and eſteem. His misfortunes were lamented, and the injuries he had received complained of by all ranks of people. He was ſecretly invited to return to England, and aſſured of being ſufficiently ſupported in the recovery of his lawful inheritance.

Hereford, now duke of Lancaſter, determined to accept this generous offer; and an event ſoon happened which gave him all the advantages he could deſire. Roger Mortimer, earl of Marche, lord lieutenant of Ireland, had been lately killed in a rencounter with a ſmall party of the Iriſh; and Richard, in order to reduce the rebels to ſubjection, and revenge the death of Mortimer, reſolved to paſs over into that iſland, and head his army in perſon. He accordingly embarked at Briſtol, and after a ſhort paſſage landed at Waterford, at the head of 2000 men at arms and 10,000 archers. Struck with conſternation at ſeeing the king of England at the head of ſo powerful an army, the moſt conſiderable part of the rebels ſubmitted, and the reſt were ſoon reduced to obedience.

In the mean time the duke of Lancaſter embraced the opportunity of returning to England. He embarked at Nantes, with a retinue of ſixty perſons, and landed at Ravenſpur in Yorkſhire, where he was immediately joined by the lords Willoughby, Roſs, D'Arcy, and Beaumont, and ſeveral gentlemen of diſtinction, attended by a numerous body of vaſſals and adherents. A few days after, his party was increaſed by the arrival of the earl of Northumberland, with his ſon Hotſpur Piercy, and his brother the earl of Weſtmoreland, at the head of ſuch a numerous body of forces, that Lancaſter's ſmall retinue was encreaſed to an army of 60,000 men. The duke now took a ſolemn oath, that his ſole deſign in this invaſion was that of recovering the duchy of Lancaſter, unjuſtly detained from him. At the ſame time, he invited all his friends in England, and all lovers of equity and their country, to ſecond him in this reaſonable and moderate pretenſion. The duke of York, who was left guardian of the realm during the king's abſence, aſſembled an army of 40,000 men, and marched at their head to St. Alban's; but upon reviewing his forces, the ſoldiers declared to a man, that they would not draw a ſword againſt Henry of Lancaſter. The guardian himſelf did not, indeed, ſeem to be well affected to the cauſe he had undertaken to defend: he made no difficulty of declaring, that he would ſecond his nephew in recovering his juſt rights. It is, therefore, no wonder that he liſtened to a meſſage ſent him by Henry, who entreated him not to oppoſe a loyal and humble ſupplicant in the recovery of his legal patrimony. The guardian was ſo far from oppoſing, that he joined the party of Henry; and the ſoldiers joyfully followed the example of their leader.

Lancaſter now finding himſelf maſter of the kingdom, marched directly to Briſtol, where ſome of Richard's miniſters had ſhut themſelves up, in order to defend the fortreſs againſt the attempts of an enemy, whoſe favour they had no hopes of obtaining. The garriſon, however, made but a poor defence: they ſoon ſurrendered, and Henry, yielding to the requeſt of the people, ordered the earl of Wiltſhire, Sir John Buſſy, and Sir John Green, who were taken priſoners, to be immediately executed, without even the form of a trial.

Richard no ſooner heard of theſe proceedings than he haſtened over from Ireland, and landed at Milford-haven with an army of twenty thouſand men. But his ſoldiers like the reſt of their brethren, were ſo ſtrongly attached to the fortunes of Henry of Lancaſter, that the greater part deſerted him; and Richard ſoon perceived he was in no condition of meeting the enemy. Wavering and irreſolute, he knew not whom to truſt, or whom to fear. At length he determined to deſert the remains of his forces, and take refuge in Wales. He accordingly retired, with the dukes of Exeter and Surry, the biſhop of Carliſle, and a few other attendants, to Conway-caſtle, propoſing to take the firſt opportunity of embarking for Ireland or France, and there wait ſome favourable opportunity of recovering that crown which he was not then able to defend.

As ſoon as Henry knew the ſituation of Richard, he immediately diſpatched the earl of Northumberland to Conway-caſtle, to make his profeſſions of loyalty and ſubmiſſion to the king: but this was all a deception, and the earl of Northumberland, having made himſelf maſter of the king's perſon, immediately conducted him to Henry, who was then at Flint-caſtle. Lancaſter loſt no time in conveying his royal captive to London, where he was received with the moſt barbarous inſults by the people, and committed cloſe priſoner to the Tower.

But though Lancaſter had got poſſeſſion of the perſon of the king, he was very uneaſy with regard to the beſt method of diſpoſing of that unfortunate monarch, and ſeveral councils were held on that ſubject. At length it was reſolved that the duke of York, with ſeveral of the firſt nobility, ſhould be ſent to Richard, in order to perſuade him to make a formal reſignation of that crown they were determined he ſhould no longer wear. For ſome time Richard refuſed to ſubmit to ſo humiliating a circumſtance; but at length, finding himſelf abandoned by all his friends, and ſenſible of his incapacity to reſiſt the torrent of popular hatred, he conſented to comply with their requeſt. Accordingly, the crown, ſceptre, and other enſigns of royalty, being brought before him, Richard, in the preſence of a great number of lords aſſembled on the occaſion, ſurrendered up the whole; after which, taking the ſignet ring from his finger, he preſented it to the duke of Lancaſter; at the ſame time deſiring the archbiſhop of York, and the biſhop of Hereford, to notify to the parliament his reſignation of the crown, and to acquaint them, that he wiſhed his kinſman, the duke of Lancaſter, might ſucceed him on the throne.

Though Lacanſter had thus far gained his wiſhes, yet he was not perfectly ſatisfied. He was fearful that this reſignation would appear the reſult of force, and therefore propoſed, that Richard ſhould be ſolemnly depoſed in parliament, for his tyranny and miſconduct. Accordingly a charge was drawn up againſt him, conſiſting of thirty-three articles, and laid before the aſſembly. Though many of theſe articles were falſe in fact, and all of them turned chiefly on arbitrary acts, of which the late reign furniſhed many ſtronger examples, yet the lords unanimouſly found them juſtly laid, and, with the conſent of the commons, formally depoſed their ſovereign. The only perſon who had courage and virtue ſufficient to ſtand up, and plead in defence of his oppreſſed maſter, was the biſhop of Carliſle, who nobly ſuſtained the cauſe of fallen majeſty, amidſt the general diſloyalty and violence. But his eloquence was exerted in vain; and the duke of Lancaſter, exaſperated at the bold truths he uttered, committed him priſoner to the Tower.

As ſoon as Richard was formally depoſed by the parliament, the members immediately declared the crown vacant; upon which the duke of Lancaſter aroſe from his ſeat, and claimed his ſuperior right to it, as being the lineal deſcendant, and right heir of blood, from Henry III. Though many objections might have been made to this claim, yet no enquiry was made by the parliament, who immediately accepted it, and placed Henry on the throne of England.

Thus ended the reign of Richard II. a prince who, in the beginning of it, had filled all his ſubjects with the moſt pleaſing hopes of his future good government; but, in proceſs of time, through the prevalence of baſe and ſordid paſſions, and the force of a moſt towering ambition, forfeited a crown he might have ſupported conſiſtently with dignity, and the happineſs of his ſubjects. But, deſtitute of virtue, diſcretion, and, in ſhort, every noble qualification, he ſunk not only beneath the majeſty of a king, but the dignity of a man; and remains, among many others, and inconteſtible proof, that moral excellence tranſcends the moſt dignified title or exalted rank in human life.

Richard acceded to the throne on the 21ſt of June, 1377, and his depoſition took place on the 30th of September, 1399; ſo that he ſwayed the Engliſh ſceptre twenty-two years, three months, and nine days.

Remarkable Occurrences during the reign of Richard II.

A. D.

1378 A violent plague raged in the north of England, which, in a ſhort time, carried off great numbers of the inhabitants.

1381 This year bills of exchange were firſt uſed in England.

A violent earthquake in different parts of Europe.

In the month of December Richard's firſt queen, Anne of Bohemia, landed at Dover, ſoon after which ſuch a tempeſt aroſe, the like of which had not been known for many years. Several ſhips were daſhed to pieces in the harbour, and that in which the queen came over was ſunk. It is further obſervable, that when his ſecond wife, Iſabella of France, landed in England, a like ſtorm aroſe, in which the king's baggage was loſt, and many ſhips of his fleet deſtroyed.

1383 On the 21ſt of May this year there happened a dreadful earthquake in London, which threw down ſeveral churches, and many other public edifices.

About this time the uſe of cannon was projected, and Sir Hugh Calverly, governor of Calais, was the firſt perſon that uſed them in the Engliſh ſervice.

1386 The firſt company of linen-weavers ſettle in England.

1387 The earl of Arundel the firſt perſon appointed to the office of lord-high-admiral of England.

This year wine was ſo cheap, that the beſt ſold for 20s. a tun, and the more inferior ſort, at 13s. 4d.

1390 In the beginning of this year there happened a violent hurricane, which threw down many houſes, tore up trees by the roots, and deſtroyed numbers of cattle, in different parts of the kingdom.

1391 On the 9th of July this year the ſun appeared to be obſcured by thick and dreary clouds between that and the earth: its beams ſeemed of the colour of blood, and gave little or no light from noon till it ſat. Theſe clouds roſe daily for almoſt ſix weeks together.

About this time the north and eaſt parts of England were greatly afflicted with a peſtilence; inſomuch that in the city of York only upwards of eleven thouſand perſons periſhed in a few weeks.

This year playing cards were invented for the amuſement of the king of France.

1393 This year a dolphin was taken in the river Thames near London-bridge. Its coming ſo far up the river was conſidered as an ill omen, which was, in ſome degree, verified by the national confuſion that happened ſoon after.

1397 Blackwell-hall purchaſed by the city of London.

In the month of Auguſt this year Richard began repairing Weſtminſter-hall, and cauſed the walls, windows and roof to be taken down and new built, with a ſtately porch, as it now remains.

During this reign it was a cuſtom among the men to wear their ſhoes long and pecked, from the ends of which were ribbands and chains of ſilver faſtened to the knee, as well to ſupport them, as for the ſake of ornament.

The ladies wore high dreſſes on their heads, with long train gowns, and rode on ſide-ſaddles, after the example of the princeſs Anne of Bohemia, Richard's firſt wife, who brought that faſhion into this country, before which time they uſed to ride aſtride their horſes like men.

HENRY IV. Surnamed of BOLINGBROKE.

The firſt King of England of the Line of Lancaſter.

Coronation of Henry IV. A conſpiracy is formed to dethrone him, which proves abortive, and ſeveral of the principal perſons concerned are put to death. The late king aſſaſſinated. Henry paſſes a law for burning heretics. The Welſh make incurſions into the Engliſh territories. Hotſpur Piercy, ſon of the earl of Northumberland, engages the Scots, and obtains a complete victory. The family of Piercy join the Welſh and Scots againſt Henry. Battle of Shrewſbury, and conſequences thereof. The earl of Northumberland, and ſeveral other noblemen, take up arms againſt the king, but their deſigns are rendered abortive. The archbiſhop of York, who joined in the confederacy, is put to death without trial. The earl of Northumberland retires to Scotland, and from thence goes over to France. He returns, raiſes a large body of forces, and engages the royal army, but is defeated and ſlain. The king is greatly troubled at the miſconduct of his eldeſt ſon the prince of Wales. Some of the king's courtiers inſinuate that the prince had formed deſigns againſt his life, upon which he removes him from the council. The prince acquits himſelf of the accuſation. Henry is ſeized with violent fits, and the prince, thinking him no more, takes the crown from his pillow; but the king recovering, and being told who took it, orders him into his preſence, when the prince ſo far acquits himſelf to the ſatisfaction of his father as to receive his benediction. Death and character of Henry IV.

A. D. 1399. ON the depoſition of Richard II. the parliament having unanimouſly placed Henry of Lancaſter on the throne of England, a day was appointed for his coronation, which ceremony was accordingly performed, with great magnificence, on Monday the 13th of October, by the archbiſhop of Canterbury. On the ſame day Henry created his eldeſt ſon, then in the thirteenth year of his age, duke of Cornwall, prince of Wales, and earl of Cheſter, and appointed him ſucceſſor to the throne on his demiſe.

The very next day after Henry's coronation the parliament re-aſſembled, and the firſt buſineſs they did was, to repeal all the ſtatutes enacted in the two laſt parliaments convoked by Richard, and to paſs ſeveral new laws, tending to ſecure the independency of the crown, and confirming the privileges of the people. They likewiſe deliberated on the caſe of Richard, when it was unanimouſly agreed, that he ſhould be kept in perpetual confinement; but in other reſpects, treated according to his rank and quality. He was accordingly removed from the Tower to the caſtle of Leeds, and ſoon after to that of Pontefract in Yorkſhire.

But though Henry was thus placed on the throne of England by the unanimous conſent and protection of the parliament, yet he was far from being quietly ſeated in the regal chair. His uſurpation was ſo palpable, and the prior right of Edmund Mortimer, earl of Marche (who had retired to his eſtate near the borders of Wales) ſo clear and evident, that it required his utmoſt abilities to ſecure that crown he had ſo unjuſtifiably obtained. The citizens of London, indeed, and the inhabitants of the adjacent counties, were, in general, well affected to him; but thoſe of Wales and its marches, where the Mortimer intereſt lay, and which had always been diſtinguiſhed by Richard, wanted only an opportunity of breaking into open rebellion.

A. D. 1400. Nor were the inhabitants of Wales the only people who wiſhed to dethrone the new mo-monarch. Many of the Engliſh nobility, who had been materially injured by the late revolution, were ſo diſſatisfied, that they entered into a conſpiracy, and determined, if poſſible, to deprive Henry of a crown to which he had no legal claim, and to replace on it the dethroned and captive monarch.

Several conſultations were held on this buſineſs, and it was at length reſolved, that in order to promote their deſign, and render their undertaking ſucceſsful, they ſhould endeavour to prevail on one Maudlin, a prieſt, who greatly reſembled Richard both in ſhape and features, to perſonate him. Maudlin readily complied, in conſequence of which, to make this part of their plan have the greater effect, they agreed to dreſs him in royal robes, and carry him to different parts of the kingdom, till the real Richard could be releaſed from his confinement.

By this ſtratagem they ſoon obtained a prodigious number of partizans, and determined immediately to carry their deſign into execution. Henry was at this time in the caſtle at Windſor, and it was agreed, in order to aſſemble a ſufficient number of perſons without ſuſpicion, to propoſe a tilting match to be held at Oxford, and to invite Henry to be a ſpectator of that manly exerciſe. If he accepted the invitation, they imagined it would be no difficult matter to ſeize his perſon; and if he refuſed, they were to march ſecretly to Windſor Caſtle, where they flattered themſelves with obtaining an eaſy admittance.

Henry accepted the invitation of being preſent at the tournament, but before the day arrived on which it was to be held the earl of Rutland, one of the principal conſpirators, went to Windſor, diſcovered the whole plot to the king, and obtained the promiſe of a pardon. On this diſcovery Henry immediately ſet out for London, where he was ſure of being ſupported by the citizens, and would therefore be in a condition of giving the rebels battle, in caſe they ventured to approach the capital. In the mean time the conſpirators, ſuſpecting their deſign diſcovered, marched immediately to Windſor, and ſurpriſed the caſtle, but were confounded when they found that Henry had made his eſcape. Henry appeared next day at Kingſton upon Thames, at the head of twenty thouſand men, moſtly drawn from the city; and the rebels, unable to reſiſt his power, diſperſed themſelves with a view of raiſing their followers in the ſeveral counties, where their intereſt more immediately lay. But they were ſo cloſely purſued by the royal party, that the earls of Kent and Saliſbury were ſeized at Cirenceſter by the inhabitants, and beheaded the next day without farther ceremony. The earl of Huntingdon and ſeveral other noblemen were taken priſoners, and ſuffered death by the expreſs commands of the king. As for Maudlin, after being publicly expoſed on the pillory to the inſults of the populace, he was taken out half dead, and carried to the gallows, where he was hung up by the heels till he expired.

As Henry was conſcious this conſpiracy had taken place from thoſe who were ſtrenuous advocates for the late king, he could not think himſelf ſafe while Richard was alive. That unhappy prince was ſtill in Pontefract Caſtle, where he was ſhewn ſome ſmall remains of royal reſpect. Sir Pierce de Exton (one of thoſe wretches who think nothing too barbarous for gratifying either their own ambition or that of their maſter) determined to deſtroy Richard, and free Henry from the uneaſineſs that he could not conceal. Accordingly he imparted his deſign to eight ruffians, who all agreed to diſpatch the unhappy prince, not doubting but they ſhould receive a noble reward, as the action was too deteſtible for the king to ſeem to command, and too dangerous for any but abandoned ruffians like themſelves to undertake. The horrid deſign being formed, Exton and his ruffians ſet out for Pontefract Caſtle, in order to execute their barbarous intentions. On the day of their arrival Richard perceived, at dinner, that his victuals was not taſted as uſual: enquiring the reaſon, he was told by the perſon who uſed to perform that ceremony, that the king had ordered it to be omitted; upon which Richard, loſing all patience, ſtruck the taſter on the face with his knife, ſaying, "The devil take Henry of Lancaſter and thee!" Exton coming in at the inſtant, with five of his attendants, attempted to lay hold of Richard, who, gueſſing their deſign, wreſted a pole ax out of the hands of one of them, and defended himſelf ſo bravely that he ſlew four of the ruffians; but at length Exton, getting upon a chair behind him, the villain diſcharged ſuch a blow with an ax upon his head, that he laid him dead at his feet. And thus fell, in the thirty-fourth year of his age, the unfortunate Richard II. king of England.

Henry well knew that the death of Richard, and the execution of thoſe diſtinguiſhed noblemen, who had been concerned in the late rebellion, muſt give riſe to animoſities injurious to the royal authority; and therefore determined, if poſſible, to gain the clergy over to his intereſt. To effect this, he cauſed a law to be paſſed by the parliament, whereby it was enacted, that when any heretic, who refuſed to abjure his opinion, was delivered over to the ſecular power, he ſhould be committed to the flames by the civil magiſtrate. This ſanguinary ſtatute was the ſource of additional diſtreſs to the people, who were already ſufficiently acquainted with misfortunes. Nor was it long before this execrable law was carried into execution. William Soutre, rector of St. Oſithe's in London, having embraced the doctrines of Wickliffe, was condemned by the ſynod of Canterbury, and committed to the flames for entertaining principles contrary to the eſtabliſhed religion.

A. D. 1401. Encouraged by the unſettled ſtate of the Engliſh government, one Owen Glandower, a deſcendant of the antient princes of Wales, made various incurſions into the Engliſh territories, and committed the moſt horrid depredations on the innocent inhabitants. This produced a troubleſome and tedious war, which the Welſh prince long ſuſtained by his valour and activity, aſſiſted by the natural ſtrength of that country, and the untamed ſpirit of the inhabitants. In one of the encounters between the Engliſh and Welſh, the earl of Marche, who (notwithſtanding what had before paſſed between Henry and himſelf) had armed his followers in defence of the king, was taken priſoner. But the ungrateful Henry ſuffered him to remain in captivity; nor would he permit the earl of Northumberland to ranſom him, though he owed his crown to the aſſiſtance of that powerful nobleman.

The Welſh were not the only people that made incurſions into the Engliſh territories. The Scots likewiſe took advantage of the unſettled ſtate of affairs in England, and committed dreadful ravages in the northern counties. The moſt conſiderable body, which conſiſted of twelve thouſand men, was

was commanded by Archibald earl of Douglas. Hotſpur Piercy attacked the invaders at Haly-down-hill, and a deſperate battle enſued, but at length the Scots were defeated, and Piercy obtained a compleat victory. Above ſeven thouſand Scots were killed on the field of battle; and the earls of Douglas, Fife, Angus, Athol, and Montieth, with a great number of other officers of diſtinction, taken priſoners.

But this defeat, inſtead of being advantageous, was productive of very diſagreeable conſequences. Henry no ſooner received intelligence of the reduction of the Scots, than he immediately wrote a letter to the earl of Northumberland and his ſon, which was full of the warmeſt expreſſions of gratitude for their ſervices; but at the ſame time ſtrictly enjoined them not to ranſom any of their priſoners. This injunction was conſidered as an arbitrary uſurpation of power, all priſoners being (by the military laws which then prevailed) the ſole property of thoſe by whom they were conquered.

A. D. 1402-3. Irritated at the proceedings of Henry, who, in a great meaſure, owed his crown to the Northumberland intereſt, the whole family conſpired againſt him, and reſolved, if poſſible, to wreſt out of his hands that ſcepter which they now thought him unworthy any longer to hold.

Thomas Piercy, earl of Worceſter, beſides the inſult offered by Henry on this occaſion, had other cauſes to excite his reſentment. He had been made vice-chamberlain and admiral by Richard; loved the perſon of his old maſter and benefactor while living, retained a grateful ſenſe of the benefits he had received after his death, and could not but deteſt Henry as the author of his murder, and the uſurper of his crown. He therefore joined his father and brother, to drive from the throne a perſon who had no title to fill it, and whoſe power was founded on the blood of his maſter.

The plan being concerted, preparations were accordingly made by the whole family of the Piercies for carrying it into execution. For this purpoſe an alliance was concluded with Owen Glendower; and Hotſpur offered earl Douglas his liberty without ranſom if he would join the Northumberland army, a propoſal which he readily accepted, having long borne an inveterate hatred to the whole houſe of Lancaſter.

In a ſhort time a very conſiderable army was aſſembled; but before the troops were ready to take the field, the earl of Northumberland was ſeized with a ſudden illneſs at Berwick, in conſequence of which the chief command devolved upon Hotſpur Piercy, who led his forces to Shrewſbury, in order to join the troops of Glendower.

It happened at this time that Henry had a conſiderable body of forces which were collected together for the purpoſe of marching againſt the Scots; and therefore no ſooner did he hear of the proceedings of the Piercies, than he immediately quitted London, at the head of his troops, and marched to oppoſe them. On his approach near Shrewſbury, Piercy, who did not ſo ſoon expect to be oppoſed by a royal army, was obliged to abandon the ſiege of that place, which he had juſt inveſted, and prepare for an engagement. He accordingly encamped at Hartlefield near Shrewſbury, where he reſolved to hazard a battle, though he was not then joined by the Welſh forces commanded by Glandower.

The two armies having made the neceſſary preparations, the battle was begun, and the ſhock was at once both dreadful and bloody. Henry's infantry at firſt gave way, and the whole army would have been thrown into confuſion, had not the impetuous valour of Piercy and Douglas given the royaliſts an opportunity of rallying. Theſe two chiefs fought ſide by ſide, and opened themſelves a paſſage to the ſpot where the royal ſtandard was erected, and where they knew Henry fought in perſon, both contending who ſhould have the honour of encountering the royal warrior. Piercy ſupported that renown which he had acquired in ſo many bloody combats; and Douglas, his antient enemy, and now his friend, ſtill appeared his rival amidſt the horrors and confuſion of the battle. Their ardor, however, proved fatal to their cauſe; they charged with ſuch deſperate fury, and pierced with ſuch rapidity the ranks of the enemy, that few of their men could follow them. They performed ſuch prodigies of valour, that they ſoon found themſelves amidſt heaps of dead bodies, and the royal ſtandard was thrown to the ground. Nor did Henry flinch from the heat of battle; he expoſed his perſon in the thickeſt of the fight. His gallant ſon (whoſe military atchievements afterwards became ſo famous) followed the example of his father; and even a wound which he received in his face with an arrow, did not oblige him to quit the field. Henry, however, in order either to elude the attacks of the enemy upon his perſon, or to encourage his own men by the belief that he was preſent every where, had dreſſed ſeveral perſons in the royal garb; and the ſword of Douglas, who ſeemed determined that the king of England ſhould fall by his arm, rendered that intended honour fatal to moſt of thoſe who appeared in the royal attire.

But while the two armies were ſtrenuouſly contending for the palm of victory, the fall of Hotſpur Piercy, by an unknown hand, decided the fortune of the day: the rebels were totally routed, and the royaliſts left maſters of the field. About two thouſand five hundred gentlemen are ſaid to have periſhed in this ſanguinary conteſt; but the perſons of the moſt diſtinction in the royal army were the earl of Stafford, Sir Hugh Shirley, Sir Nicholas Ganſel, Sir Hugh Mortimer, Sir John Maſſey, and Sir John Calverly. About 6000 private men were ſlain, of whom two thirds belonged to Piercy's army. The earls of Douglas and Worceſter were taken priſoners, the former of whom was diſmiſſed without ranſom on account of his diſtinguiſhed valour; but the latter, with ſeveral others, were beheaded at Shrewſbury.

During theſe tranſactions the earl of Northumberland, having recovered from his illneſs, was marching at the head of a very conſiderable body of troops to reinforce his ſon's army; but hearing that he was totally defeated and ſlain, and that the king was advancing againſt him at the head of his victorious troops, he immediately diſbanded his forces, and ſhut himſelf up in Warkworth caſtle. Soon after the king arrived at York, whither the earl of Northumberland, attended by a ſmall retinue, immediately repaired, in order to apologize for his conduct. Being admitted into the preſence of Henry he pretended that his ſole intention in raiſing an army was to mediate a peace between the contending parties: this was certainly a very frivolous excuſe; but the king, unwilling to drive ſo powerful a nobleman to deſpair, admitted his apology, and granted him a pardon.

A. D.

A. D. 1404. The rebellion being totally ſuppreſſed, Henry returned with his forces to London, whither he had not long arrived when a circumſtance happened which gave him freſh alarms. A report was circulated that Richard was ſtill alive, and this report ſeemed to gain univerſal credit. It was propagated by one Serle, formerly a domeſtic to Henry, who wrote letters to different perſons in England, aſſuring them that Richard was then in being, and in good health. But this impoſition was ſoon diſcovered, as alſo the author of it, by means of Sir William Clifford, governor of Berwick, who, in order to make up a former breach with the king, delivered Serle up to juſtice; in conſequence of which he was tried, condemned, and executed, as a traitor to his country, and a public diſturber of the peace of the kingdom.

In the month of July Henry concluded a truce with the Scots, which was to continue in force till the Eaſter following.

A. D. 1405. Henry now thought it adviſeable to take ſome meaſures for ſuppreſſing the inroads of the Welſh, who had continued their depredations on the Engliſh territories. He accordingly raiſed a conſiderable body of forces, and gave the command to the prince of Wales, who marching againſt them routed the greater part of their army. He then advanced farther into the country, and ſoon after fought another battle in Monmouthſhire, againſt a body of eight thouſand men, commanded by Griffith, eldeſt ſon of Glendower, whoſe army was routed, himſelf taken priſoner, and his uncle Tudor killed on the ſpot.

The victorious arms of the prince of Wales might probably have quelled the rebellious Welſh, had they not been encouraged by the French, from whom they expected a very powerful aſſiſtance. The duke of Orleans, who bore great ſway in that kingdom, regardleſs of the truce ſubſiſting with England, ſent an army into Guienne, which reduced ſeveral places belonging to the Engliſh. Theſe were circumſtances that greatly alarmed Henry, and he was deſirous, if poſſible, of ſuppreſſing the Welſh rebellion before they could receive any aſſiſtance from the perfidious French. To effect this he called a council of the nobility, prelates as well as laity, in order to ſolicit a ſubſidy, which, from a liberal ſupply a ſhort time before granted, he could not in reaſon demand of the parliament. But, to his great mortification, he met with an unanimous repulſe; ſo that, for the preſent, his deſigns againſt the Welſh were entirely fruſtrated.

Soon after this another inſurrection took place, and a powerful party was formed againſt Henry's perſon and government. The earl of Nottingham (ſon to the duke of Norfolk, whom Henry, while only earl of Hereford, had accuſed of high treaſon, and by that means procured his perpetual baniſhment) and Richard Scroope, archbiſhop of Canterbury (brother to the earl of Wiltſhire, whom Henry, when duke of Lancaſter, had cauſed to be beheaded) continued to harbour the moſt implacable rancour againſt that prince, and they now reſolved, in conjunction with the earl of Northumberland, to wreak their vengeance on the enemy of their families. They were farther encouraged in their deſign by the junction of the lords Bardolf, Haſtings and Fauconbridge, together with a great number of gentlemen of figure and fortune in their reſpective counties.

The conſpirators, having gathered together their forces, marched to York, where they publiſhed a manifeſto againſt the king, containing nine articles, the moſt important of which were theſe: That Henry, when he arrived in England, had proteſted and ſworn, that he came for no other purpoſe, but to recover his private eſtate, without having any pretenſions to the crown, which he had, nevertheleſs, uſurped: that, like an arch-traitor, he had impriſoned his ſovereign, compelled him to reſign his royal dignity, and then put him to death in a very barbarous manner: that ſince the death of Richard, he had unjuſtly detained the crown from Edmund Mortimer earl of Marche, to whom it lawfully belonged; and that, notwithſtanding the repeated ſolicitations of his clergy, he had refuſed to pay the ranſom of the earl of Marche, falſly charging that nobleman with having voluntarily ſurrendered himſelf priſoner to Owen Glendower. That theſe were the cauſes which induced them to take up arms, in order to deliver the nation from the oppreſſion of ſuch a tyrant, and ſet the lawful heir upon the throne of England. This manifeſto was circulated through moſt parts of the kingdom, by emiſſaries, who had been induſtriouſly and numerouſly employed for that purpoſe.

The earl of Weſtmoreland (who had been appointed to watch the Scottiſh marches) no ſooner heard of this inſurrection, than he immediately advanced at the head of his forces, hoping to ſurprize the rebels before they were prepared for defence. In this, however, he was deceived; for, on reaching Shipton-Moor, in the neighbourhood of York, he perceived the inſurgents, amounting to 17,000 men, drawn up in excellent order, and ready to engage. Knowing his army to be greatly inferior, in point of numbers, to that of the inſurgents, he had recourſe to ſtratagem, which, however unpromiſing in appearance, was, nevertheleſs, attended with the deſired ſucceſs. He prevailed on the earl of Nottingham and the archbiſhop of Canterbury to favour him with a conference between the two armies, when he heard their complaints with great patience, ſeemed heartily to concur with them in taking meaſures for the welfare of the nation, and even undertook to promiſe that Henry, ſhould give them entire ſatisfaction.

This artful behaviour had the wiſhed-for effect. The earl of Weſtmoreland eaſily prevailed on the two confederate leaders to diſmiſs their followers, who were no ſooner out of ſight, than the earl's guard ſeized the earl of Nottingham and archbiſhop of Canterbury before they could receive any ſuccour from their adherents. As ſoon as this piece of treachery was known, and that two of their principal leaders were in cuſtody, the inſurgents were ſeized with the utmoſt conſternation, and conſulted their own ſafety by immediately laying down their arms, and betaking themſelves to flight.

The earl of Weſtmoreland marched with his noble priſoners to York, whither the king ſoon after arrived, and, notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of the earl, determined to make them feel his reſentment. Henry knew the trial of the archbiſhop, if conducted in the uſual form, would prove both troubleſome and tedious; therefore determined to follow the ferocious cuſtoms of the age, by putting the primate to death without the form of a trial. He accordingly applied to William Gaſcoigne, the chief juſtice, to paſs the ſentence of high-treaſon on the archbiſhop: but he refuſed to act contrary to the laws of his country. Sir William Fulthorpe was, therefore, appointed a judge on this occaſion, who, without any indictment, trial, or defence, condemned the prelate to ſuffer death, and the ſentence was immediately carried into execution. This was the firſt inſtance in England of a capital ſentence being inflicted on a dignitary of the church. The earl of Nottingham ſuffered the ſame fate with the archbiſhop, and heavy fines were impoſed on ſeveral others who had been engaged in the inſurrection.

As for the earl of Northumberland, he no ſooner heard of the fate of Nottingham and the archbiſhop, than he immediately ſought his ſafety by flying to Scotland, accompanied by lord Bardolf. But the unfortunate earl did not long enjoy the benefit of this aſylum; an event ſoon after happened which obliged him to ſeek his ſafety on the continent. Robert III. king of Scotland, was by no means qualified to hold the ſceptre in theſe ferocious times. He was a prince of a ſlender capacity, but very innocent and inoffenſive; virtues which were then ſo far from being admired, that they rendered him contemptible. His brother, the duke of Albany, a prince of a more violent and boiſterous diſpoſition, aſſumed the reins of government; and, deſirous of rendering his power perpetual, threw David, the eldeſt ſon of Robert, into priſon, where he was inhumanly ſtarved to death. James, a younger brother of David, was now the only obſtacle that oppoſed the tyrant from mounting the throne on the death of his brother. Senſible of his ſon's danger, Robert embarked him on board a ſhip, in order to ſend him into France, not doubting but he would there find ſufficient protection. But Robert was deſtined to misfortunes: the ſhip was taken by the Engliſh, and Henry, notwithſtanding the truce which ſubſiſted between the two crowns, refuſed to reſtore the young prince to liberty. Worn out with grief and infirmities, Robert was unable to ſupport this laſt misfortune. He ſunk under the weight of his diſtreſs, and left the government in the hands of his brother. Henry now ſaw all the importance of his acquiſition: the duke of Albany was entirely dependent on the Engliſh monarch; becauſe a ſingle attempt to prejudice the intereſt of Henry would be ſufficient to pull him from the throne. James was about nine years of age when he was firſt brought to London; and if any thing could atone for this breach of faith, it was the excellent education which Henry beſtowed upon him, and which afterwards qualified him for filling the throne of his anceſtors with honour to himſelf and happineſs to his people. From theſe circumſtances it is little to be wondered at that the duke of Albany ſhould refuſe protection to a nobleman ſo obnoxious to Henry as the duke of Northumberland: he therefore inſiſted upon his immediately quitting his dominions, with which the earl readily complied, and retired to France.

A. D. 1407. The only remarkable circumſtance that happened this year worthy of recording was, the death of the famous Sir Robert Knolles, who had acquired ſuch military renown during the reign of Edward III. He died at his country ſeat in Kent, and was buried in White Friars church, which himſelf had built. He likewiſe built Rocheſter bridge, and founded a college for ſecular canons at Pontefract in Yorkſhire. He died at a very advanced age, after having retired privately many years, during which he lived univerſally beloved and reſpected for his benevolence and humanity.

A. D. 1408. The earl of Northumberland, who had retired to France, became now weary of his exile, and determined to make one more effort to remove Henry from the throne. He accordingly landed in the north of England with lord Bardolph, hoping his preſence would be ſufficient to rouſe the Engliſh to arms. This was far from being a chimerical conjecture, for he was immediately joined by a party of Scottiſh free-booters, and as he advanced, found his army daily increaſe. Pleaſed to find the inhabitants had not yet loſt their affections for his family, he continued his march, made himſelf maſter of ſeveral caſtles which had been reduced after the fatal battle of Shrewſbury, and appointed Thirſk in Yorkſhire as the place of general rendezvous for his army.

The government were were greatly alarmed at the ſucceſs which had attended the earl in this new inſurrection; but there was now no royal army ready to march againſt the rebels. However, Sir Thomas Rokeſby, ſheriff of Yorkſhire, thinking it his duty to ſtop the inſurgents, raiſed a conſiderable body of forces, and advanced to meet them. The earl of Northumberland was equally deſirous of coming to an action with the ſheriff, being perſuaded that if he could defeat Rokeſby's forces, he ſhould not only diſappoint Henry of ſo eſſential a reinforcement, but alſo engage the city and county of York to declare in his favour. He accordingly put his army in motion, and met Rokeſby on Barham Moor, where a bloody battle enſued, in which the rebels, after an obſtinate reſiſtance, were totally routed, and both the earl of Northumberland, and lord Bardolf fell among the ſlain. This event, together with the death of Glendower, which happened ſoon after, freed Henry from all domeſtic enemies. No more attempts were made to tear the laurel from his brow, and he enjoyed the crown he had uſurped without any farther oppoſition.

A. D. 1409. The coaſts and commerce of England had, for ſome time, been greatly annoyed by a number of French corſairs; to prevent which Henry ordered a ſtrong fleet to be fitted out, under the command of the earl of Kent, who immediately directed his courſe to the town of Brehar, the rendezvous of the corſairs, and inveſted the place; but the earl was repulſed, after receiving a wound in his head, which proved mortal. This diſaſter ſo exaſperated the Engliſh, that they renewed the attack with the utmoſt fury, and in a ſhort time carried the place, put all they found in arms to the ſword, and brought the reſt priſoners to England.

A. D. 1410. The perſecutions which had been carried on againſt the Wickliffites, or Lollards, were far from producing the intended effect: they continued to encreaſe daily, and many of them held places of truſt and power under the government. The clergy, alarmed at their progreſs, determined to carry the laws againſt them into execution with the utmoſt ſeverity, and, by ſome diſtinguiſhed example, prevent them from extending that influence which threatened the foundation of the eſtabliſhed religion. One Bodby, a taylor, took upon him to exclaim violently againſt the abſurdity of the real preſence in the ſacrament. This perſon, therefore, was ſingled out by the clergy for exemplary puniſhment. He was accordingly tried, and condemned to the ſtake; and the prince of Wales had the curioſity to be a ſpectator of the execution. When the flames firſt reached the body of the criminal, he cried out in ſo horrid a manner, that the prince ordered the fire to be removed, and offered the man his life, together with a penſion out of his private purſe, (as

(as the flames had disabled him from following his business) on condition he would renounce his opinion. Bodby, however shocked when he first felt the flames, refused the offered pardon: he loved his opinions better than his life, and was accordingly committed again to the fire, in which he resigned his breath as a forfeit to his faith.

A. D. 1411. In the beginning of this year the Scots renewed their depredations on the northern borders of England; and with their cruizers interrupted the navigation and trade of the English. But they were soon stopped in their proceedings by the courage and abilities of Robert de Umfreville, vice-admiral of England, who entered the Frith of Edinburgh with ten capital ships, and not only destroyed the greater part of their naval force, but ravaged the whole coast, and brought off immense plunder.

The parliament this year met on the 12th of November, when they petitioned the king that a general amnesty might be passed in favour of all his majesty's subjects. Henry readily complied with their request, in consideration of which they very liberally granted him the necessary supplies. At the same time his three sons, John, Thomas and Humphry, were created dukes, the first of Bedford, the second of Clarence, and the third of Gloucester; and Henry's own brother was created duke of Dorset.

A. D. 1412. Henry had now neither foreign or domestic enemies to contend with, and tranquillity prevailed throughout his dominions. But the king could not enjoy that satisfaction which was possessed by his subjects. His days were embittered as a parent by the irregular courses of his eldest son the prince of Wales, whose court was the common receptacle for libertines, and every other character that could disgrace human nature. In short, he plunged himself, with the utmost violence, into all the extravagancies of debauchery, and blushed not for a conduct the most disorderly and licentious.

But these outrages proceeded less from a depraved disposition, than the natural violence of his temper; and many gleams of spirit and magnanimity were observed to break through the cloud which a wild conduct had thrown over his character, and of which the following is an instance. One of young Henry's favorites having been indicted for some misdemeanor, was condemned, notwithstanding all the interest the prince, who was present at the trial, could make in his favor. Young Henry was so incensed at the issue, that he struck Sir William Gascoigne, the judge, as he sat on the bench. But the magistrate was not to be intimidated; he acted with a spirit suitable to his character, and instantly ordered the prince into custody. This sally of passion in the prince was immediately succeeded by a sudden return of reason; he suffered himself, with the utmost resignation, to be conducted to prison by the officers of justice. When the king was informed of this transaction, he said, "I thank God I have a judge possessed of so much courage to execute the laws, and a son endowed with so much obedience as to submit to such chastisement."

But notwithstanding this instance of modesty and submission in the prince, Henry, who was naturally of a jealous and suspicious disposition, too readily listened to the base suggestions of some officious courtiers, who insinuated that his eldest son had formed unnatural designs against his crown and life. These insinuations filled his mind with anxious fears, and he might probably have proceeded to some extremities, in order to secure his safety on the throne, had not his suspicions been removed by the prudent conduct of the prince.

Young Henry was no sooner informed of these base and treacherous aspersions, than he immediately dressed himself in a mourning habit, and repaired to court, in order to request a private audience of the king. Being admitted into his father's presence, he immediately fell on his knees, and addressed him in words to this effect: "Most dread sovereign, and honoured father! It gives me the greatest concern to find that I am suspected by your majesty of an unnatural design against your crown and person, which I, more than any other subject, am bound to reverence and defend. I confess, indeed, with shame and contrition, that my irregularities and excesses have given sufficient cause for your displeasure. But I call upon God (who knows the inmost secrets of the heart, and never fails to punish those who dare invoke him to sanctify a falsehood) to witness, that I never harboured a single thought inconsistent with that duty I owe your majesty as my sovereign and my father. Those who charge me with contrary intentions, seek only to disturb your tranquillity, and to alienate your affections from your son and successor. I would willingly remove those anxieties from your mind; I came for no other purpose. Let me beseech you, therefore, to let my actions be tried by the utmost rigor, with the same severity as if I was the meanest of your subjects; and if I am found guilty, in any respect, of the atrocious crime laid to my charge; if I have ever used any expression that indicated disloyalty or want of affection, let me be punished as the vilest miscreant that ever disgraced the name of son or subject. I will readily submit to any punishment you may think proper to inflict. I again, therefore, beseech you with the utmost humility, both for the ease of your own mind, and the vindication of your injured son, to issue the necessary orders for making the rigorous scrutiny I now demand."

It is little to be wondered at that so ingenuous and pathetic an address should greatly affect the king. He was unable, for some time, to speak, but at length, recovering himself, raised the prince from the ground, embraced him with tears, and assured him, that all his suspicions were entirely removed, and that he would never, for the future, harbour a thought prejudicial to his honour and loyalty.

A. D. 1413. But Henry did not long survive this affecting interview. His health had, for some months, been violently declining, and he was greatly afflicted with fits, which returned at certain intervals, and for a time, bereaved him of his senses. In consequence of this dangerous complaint, (together with some scruples of conscience concerning the means he had employed to obtain the crown, and an idle prophecy, implying that he should die in Jerusalem) Henry wholly dedicated his time to devotional duties, and assumed the cross, resolving to consecrate the remainder of his days to a war against the infidels. He imparted his resolution to a grand council assembled for that purpose, and began to make preparations for the expedition, when his fits increased to so violent a degree, that he was obliged to decline his resolution, and prepare himself to take a final leave of the world.

Henry had been so frequently in danger of losing his crown, that his imagination seems to have have been ſtrongly impreſſed with that idea, which increaſed, as his ſtrength and reaſoning faculties decayed, even to a degree of childiſh anxiety. He would not ſleep unleſs the royal diadem was laid on his pillow. One day he remained ſo long in a ſwoon, that his ſervants thought him actually dead; and the prince took the crown from the pillow, and carried it into his own apartment. The king recovering the uſe of his ſenſes, and obſerving the diadem was removed, aſked who had dared to take it from his pillow? and being told, he ordered the prince to brought into his preſence. When young Henry appeared, the king with an angry countenance, ſaid, "What! would you deprive me of my crown before my death?" "No," replied the prince, "I took it, thinking your majeſty was really dead, as my lawful inheritance; but now, happily perceiving my miſtake, return the diadem with far greater pleaſure than I took it." He accordingly re-placed the crown on the king's pillow; and having receiv'd his father's benediction, retired.

A few days after this Henry was ſeized with a more violent fit than ever while at his devotion before the ſhrine of Edward the Confeſſor in Weſtminſter-abbey, from whence he was removed to the Jeruſalem Chamber. As ſoon as he had a little recovered, finding himſelf in a ſtrange place, he deſired to know where he was, and being informed, immediately concluded that his diſſolution was at hand, and that the prophecy relative to his dying in Jeruſalem would be, in ſome degree, fulfilled. Poſſeſſed with this notion, he deſired to ſee the prince of Wales, to whom he gave ſeveral important inſtructions relative to his future government, and having recommended him to the protection of heaven, ſoon after expired, on the 20th of March, in the 46th year of his age, and 14th of his reign. His remains were interred in the cathedral at Canterbury.

Henry was in perſon of a middling ſtature, well proportioned, and had a graceful and pleaſing countenance. He was of a very ſedate but at the ſame time, eaſy diſpoſition, being neither elated with proſperity, or dejected by adverſity. His perſonal courage and military proweſs were indiſputable, and he poſſeſſed a ſolid judgment, with a deep penetration into human nature. In a word, except the circumſtances of his uſurpation, and the murder of Richard, he ſeems to have been qualified for the high ſtation to which he was exalted; and had he obtained the crown by a juſt and lawful title, might have paſſed his life with as much honour to himſelf, and as much advantage to the nation, as any other monarch that ever filled the Engliſh throne.

Remarkable Occurences during the reign of Henry IV.

A. D.

1407 A great plague broke out in London, which raged with ſuch violence, that, in a ſhort time, it carried off no leſs than 30,000 of the inhabitants.

1408 A little before Chriſtmas began a violent froſt, which laſted fifteen weeks, and being accompanied with abundance of ſnow, prodigious numbers of birds periſhed with cold and hunger.

1409 This year a play was acted at Skinner's-well, near Clerkenwell, London, repreſenting the principal tranſactions that had taken place in the world ſince the creation. It laſted eight days, and the greater part of the nobility and gentry of England were preſent.

1411 The Guildhall in the city of London, which was but a mean place before, was this year rebuilt, as it now appears, at the expence of the city.

ON the death of Henry IV. his eldeſt ſon, Henry, ſurnamed of Monmouth, was immediately proclaimed king, and on the 9th of April following, was crowned at Weſtminſter, amidſt the univerſal acclamations of the people, who, notwithſtanding the looſe he had given to his paſſions during the latter part of the late reign, formed great expectations of happineſs under his government.

Nor were their expectations ill founded; for no ſooner did the young king aſſume the reins of government than he ſo changed his conduct, as to prove himſelf worthy of the high ſtation to which he was advanced. He immediately diſcarded all his profligate companions, but at the ſame time allowed them liberal penſions for their future ſubſiſtence. He publiſhed a general amneſty for all crimes that had been committed, except rapes and murders; choſe a new council compoſed of the wiſeſt and beſt men in the kingdom; and made a thorough reform in the courts of juſtice, by removing ignorant and corrupt judges, and ſupplying their places with men of real abilities and integrity. Sir William Gaſcoigne, the chief juſtice, was received with particular marks of eſteem, and, inſtead of reproaches (as he had expected for his conduct in the late reign) was loaded with favours, for his ſtrict and impartial adminiſtration of juſtice.

Young Henry gave convincing proofs of the deep ſorrow he felt for the fate of the unhappy Richard II. whoſe remains he cauſed to be removed from Langley to Weſtminſter-abbey, where they were ſolemnly interred by thoſe of his queen, Anne of Luxembourg, Henry himſelf walking as chief mourner. He afterwards, by way of atonement for his father's uſurpation, founded three monaſteries near Shene (now Richmond) in Surry, in which prayers were to be read, at certain times, for the ſoul of Richard.

In order to make ſome recompence to the unfortunate earl of Marche, who had been ſo ill treated by his father, Henry paid him ſo much reſpect, that he almoſt forgot his right to the ſceptre of England, to which he had, by birth, an undoubted title; and for which kindneſs that nobleman ever after ſerved him with ſincere loyalty. Henry likewiſe expreſſed a generous concern for the Piercy family, and invited the ſon and heir of Hotſpur to come from Scotland, that he might be reſtored to the honours and eſtates of his anceſtors. In ſhort, Henry ſeemed deſirous of burying all animoſities in the grave of oblivion, and of approving himſelf at once the king and father of his people.

The firſt act of a public nature that took place after Henry's acceſſion to the throne was, the farther proſecution of the Lollards, who, notwithſtanding the ſeverities that had been exerciſed againſt them in the late reign, were every day increaſing in the kingdom, and not only appeared exceeding dangerous to the church, but even formidable to the civil power. The convocation of the clergy unanimouſly agreed, that the only method to extirpate theſe ſchiſmatics would be to make examples of the principal propagators of their doctrines, and therefore determined to begin with Sir John Oldcaſtle, ſtiled, in right of his wife, Lord Cobham, who was conſidered as the head of the Lollards. This nobleman was remarkable for his perſonal courage and military proweſs; and had, by his gallant behaviour, greatly recommended himſelf to the favour of Henry. The archbiſhop of Canterbury was no ſtranger to the ſituation of Cobham, and therefore thought it adviſeable to wait on the king, and (after repreſenting to him the public injuries which aroſe from Cobham's protection of the Lollards) requeſt his permiſſion to proceed againſt him as an heretic. Henry, who was no friend to eccleſiaſtical ſeverity, repreſented to the primate, that reaſon and perſuaſion were the beſt means of ſupporting truth, and correcting error: that every gentle method ſhould be uſed in order to bring back thoſe deluded people to the boſom of the church; and that himſelf would endeavour to reconcile Cobham to the catholic faith. Henry, however, found all his arguments fruitleſs: Cobham, though greatly attached to his ſovereign, would not ſacrifice his principles to conciliate the favour of majeſty; on which the king gave the primate permiſſion to proceed againſt him with the utmoſt ſeverity.

The violence of eccleſiaſtical authority was now exerted, and the primate, aſſiſted by his three ſuffragans, the biſhops of London, Winchefter and St. Davids, tried Cobham as an heretic, and condemned him to the flames. He was accordingly committed priſoner to the Tower of London; but before the day arrived, which was fixed for his execution, he found means to effect his eſcape.

Irritated at this ſevere treatment, Cobham was no ſooner at liberty than he formed a deſign of ſeeking revenge on his enemies. He aſſembled his partizans, who were exceeding numerous, and began an open rebellion againſt the government; but by the vigilance of Henry all his deſigns were rendered abortive. The conſpirators aſſembled in St. Giles's fields near London, whither Henry marched with a ſmall body of forces, and ſoon obliged them to diſperſe. Great numbers of the Lollards were ſeized, tried, hanged and burnt on the ſpot where they aſſembled; among whom were Sir Roger Acton, and one Beverly their preacher. Lord Cobham made his eſcape and fled to Wales, nor was he taken till about four years after, when he was firſt hanged as a traitor, and afterwards burnt as an heretic. purſuant to the ſentence which had been paſſed on him by the convocation of the clergy *.

The king, not ſatisfied with having ſuppreſſed this rebellion, procured the parliament to paſs ſome very ſevere laws againſt the Lollards. Among others, it was enacted, that none ſhould, under pain of loſing life and fortune, read the ſcriptures in Engliſh, and that thoſe who did ſhould have no benefit of ſanctuary.

A. D. 1414. Henry had, ever ſince his acceſſion to the throne, formed the deſign of engaging in a war with France, and from the confuſed ſtate of that kingdom, determined now to make preparations for carrying it into execution. Charles VI. had been ſeized with a fit of phrenzy, which rendered him incapable of exerciſing his authority; and though he recovered from this diſorder, he was ſo ſubject to relapſes, that his ſenſes were gradually but inſenſibly impaired; ſo that he was incapable of purſuing any ſettled plan of government. This misfortune gave a full career to the rage of parties. The duke of Orleans, the king's brother, and the duke of Burgundy, his couſin-german, (after maintaining the moſt violent quarrels, by which the country had been deluged with the blood of its inhabitants) agreed to enter into a ſtrict friendſhip, and ſwore at the altar to the ſincerity of their intentions. But little regard was paid to this ſolemn engagement: the duke of Orleans was ſoon after aſſaſſinated in the ſtreets of Paris by order of the duke of Burgundy, who had even the inſolence to avow openly and defend the juſtice of the action. The dreadful conſequences of this horrid deed were ſoon diſplayed. It was utterly impoſſible to effect a reconciliation between the adherents of the deceaſed duke and his aſſaſſin, and the whole kingdom formed a general ſcene of anarchy and confuſion.

In the mean time Henry, in order to conceal his real deſigns againſt France, ſent over a ſplendid embaſſy to that court, propoſing a laſting peace, and an alliance between the two crowns. To effect this he demanded the French king's daughter in marriage, with two millions of crowns for her portion. He likewiſe demanded the payment of one million ſix hundred thouſand pounds as the arrears of the late king John's ranſom; as alſo the immediate poſſeſſion and full ſovereignty of Normandy, and the other provinces, which Philip Auguſtus had wreſted from the crown of England, together with the ſuperiority of Britany and Flanders.

But the finances of France were in too impoveriſhed a ſtate, and the kingdom in too much confuſion, for the French court to comply with the demands of the Engliſh monarch. They, however, offered, to give him the princeſs in marriage, with a portion of eight hundred crowns; to inveſt him with the entire ſovereignty of Guienne, and to annex to that province thoſe of Perigord, Bouvergne, Angoumois, and other territories.

Theſe were terms far greater than might have been expected; but they were peremptorily rejected by Henry, who publickly declared his intentions of erecting his ſtandard in the fields of France. The parliament granted him very liberal ſupplies for this purpoſe, and ſeveral of the principal noblemen raiſed a number of troops at their own expence; ſo that Henry ſoon found himſelf at the head of a very conſiderable army.

While Henry was making the neceſſary preparations for his expedition to the continent, a horrid conſpiracy was formed to rob him of the Engliſh diadem. The principal perſons concerned were, Richard, earl of Cambridge, younger brother to the duke of York; the lord Scroop, treaſurer of England, and Sir Thomas Grey, a knight of Northumberland. The deſign of theſe conſpirators was, to place the earl of Marche on the throne, as ſoon as Henry was embarked for France with his army. But the plot being diſcovered before it was ripe for execution, the conſpirators were ſeized, and tried by a ſpecial commiſſion directed for that purpoſe to the duke of Clarence, as lord-high ſteward of England. The priſoners were all found guilty on the cleareſt evidence, and immediately received ſentence of death. The earl of Cambridge and Sir Thomas Grey were beheaded; but lord Scroop (having received particular marks of favour from Henry, and thereby added ingratitude to his crime) was ſentenced to be drawn, hanged and quartered.

A. D. 1415. The conſpiracy being effectually quelled, Henry continued his preparations for invading France with the utmoſt alacrity; and on the 11th of Auguſt embarked with his forces (which conſiſted of 50,000 men) at Southampton, leaving his brother, the duke of Bedford, regent of the kingdom. After a ſhort and ſafe paſſage, he landed at the mouth of the Seine in Normandy, a few miles from Harfleur, whither he immediately marched with his army, and inveſted the place. The garriſon, for ſome time, made a reſolute defence, but as they were weak in numbers, and the fortifications in bad repair, they were obliged to capitulate, on condition of ſurrendering on the 18th of September, if not relieved in the interim. A detachment under the command of the marſhal d'Iſle d'Adam, made an attempt to ſuccour the town, but were repulſed; ſo that the time preſcribed being expired, the garriſon ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war, and Henry immediately took poſſeſſion of the place.

While Henry was inveſting Harfleur, the French were buſily employed in collecting an army to check the progreſs of the Engliſh monarch. Private animoſities were laid aſide, and all parties joined in endeavouring to oppoſe an army that threatened deſtruction to the ſtate. The dauphin himſelf took the field in perſon, at the head of an army of 14,000 men at arms, and was ſoon joined by the new duke of Orleans, the dukes of Berry, Bourbon and Brabant, the conſtable d'Albert, the counts of Nevers, Vendome, and Richemont, the flower of the French nobility, and above 40,000 men, all of whom ſeemed eager to ſignalize themſelves in the defence of their country.

The fatigues of the ſiege of Harfleur, and exceſſive heat of the ſeaſon, had greatly reduced the Engliſh army, no leſs than 2000 common ſoldiers, beſides many perſons of diſtinction, having been carried off by the bloody flux. But this was not the only calamity that befel Henry: his fleet had been diſperſed by ſtorms, and proviſions began to grow ſcarce in his camp, ſo that the only reſource he had for the ſafety of his forces was, to march by land to Calais. He accordingly moved towards that place, but met with many difficulties in his march, all the bridges over the Somme being broken down, and all the paſſages defended by ſtrong detachments of the enemy. He, however, at laſt effected a paſſage near St. Quintin, and directed his rout towards Blagney, from the heights of which he beheld the whole French army drawn up on the plains of Agincourt to oppoſe his paſſage.

Henry now ſaw himſelf in the moſt imminent danger, and began to repent of the raſhneſs of his conduct. His army was reduced to almoſt half the number that landed near Harfleur, and even theſe were diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, and many of them debilitated by ſickneſs and continual duty. In this alarming ſituation, Henry diſpatched a meſſenger to d'Albert, the conſtable of France, offering to give up his conqueſt of Harfleur for a ſafe conduct to Calais; but the French generals prided themſelves ſo much on the ſuperiority of numbers, that they rejected his propoſals with contempt, and ſent an herald to inform him, they ſhould engage the Engliſh army on the 25th of October.

Finding it impoſſible to avoid an action, Henry accepted the challenge, and gave a pecuniary compliment to the herald. During the interval, which was three days, Henry employed every means, which prudence could ſuggeſt, in order to prepare his men for the approaching combat. He procured them the beſt refreſhment their ſituation would afford; ordered their weapons and armour to be repaired; rode almoſt the whole day through the ranks of his army to animate his ſoldiers, and ſuperintend the regulation of his camp. He reminded the men of the renown of their forefathers, and gave them plainly to underſtand, that they had no reſource from death or captivity, but in the extraordinary efforts of their own valour. This produced the deſired effect: the ſpirits of the Engliſh were raiſed to the higheſt pitch; they ſeemed to have forgot the ſuperiority of numbers in the enemy, and only wiſhed for the opportunity of ſignalizing their courage, and proving themſelves Engliſhmen. This was evinced in the anſwer given by one of them to the king, who had ſent him to take a private view of the enemy, and to bring him an account of what he thought might be their number. When the man returned, and the king aſked him the queſtion, he replied, "there are enough to be killed, "enough to be taken priſoners, and enough to "run away."

When the important day arrived that was pitched on to determine the conteſt, both armies made the neceſſary preparations for battle. The French troops were divided into three lines, the firſt of which, beſides a great number of other troops, was compoſed of eight thouſand gentlemen, commanded by the conſtable d'Albert, the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the counts of Eu, Vendome and Richemont, the famous marſhal Boucicaut, David Rambure, grand-maſter of the croſs-bowmen, and ſeveral other officers of diſtinction. The ſecond line was led by the duke of Alençon, aſſiſted by the duke of Barre, the counts of Vaudemont, Nevers, Salines, and Grand Pré. The third body was under the command of the counts of Marle, Dampmartin, Fauquenberg, and the ſieur de Lannoy.

While the French officers were employed in drawing up their troops, Henry detached 400 men with lances to take poſt in a wood on the right; as alſo a party of 250 archers to lay in ambuſh on the left, in a low meadow covered with buſhes. The right wing of Henry's army was commanded by the duke of York, aſſiſted by the lord Beaumont, Willoughby and Stanhope. The center was commanded by Henry in perſon, attended by his brother the duke of Glouceſter, the earl-marſhal, the earl of Oxford, and the young earl of Suffolk. The rear, which conſiſted wholly of archers, and ſuch as were armed with ſpears, halberts, and bills, was led by the earl of Dorſet. The chief ſtrength of the Engliſh army conſiſted of infantry; and Henry, fearing that the French horſe would break them by the fury of the firſt charge ordered the archers to fix into the ground piles, or ſtakes, pointed at both ends with iron, and ſix or ſeven feet long, in their front, and alſo on their flanks, or intervals between the horſe and foot. Theſe formed a kind of temporary fortification, behind which the archers were not only ſecure themſelves, but had the opportunity of annoying the enemy as they advanced.

In theſe ſituations the two armies remained for ſome time, without coming to action, the Engliſh not caring to advance, leſt they ſhould loſe the advantage of the grouud; nor the French, for fear of being more crowded than they were already. At length Henry advanced at the head of his main diviſion, the two wings moving at the ſame time, till he came very near the village of Agincourt; when the French horſe moved forwards to attack the Engliſh archers. Upon this the latter halted, pitched their ſtakes, interweaving them together, and bending them a little toward the enemy. Guarded by this fence, they diſcharged a ſhower of arrows which nothing could reſiſt: the ranks of the enemy were thinned, and the line thrown into great diſorder. The archers who lay in a meadow, charged the French in flank, and made a dreadful ſlaughter. The Engliſh infantry took advantage of the enemy's diſorder, fell upon them with their battle-axes, and cut them to pieces, almoſt without reſiſtance. The conſtable of France, perceiving the diſtreſs of his advanced party, haſtened to their aſſiſtance, but under terrible diſadvantages; for the ſoil being wet and miry, both horſe and foot moved with the greateſt difficulty; and continuing ſtill to preſs more cloſely upon one another, preſented a defenceleſs front to the Engliſh, who ſoon threw the whole line into irretrievable diſorder; and their buſineſs was rather that of executioners than ſoldiers. The field was now covered with the diſmounted, the ſlain, and the wounded; men and horſes were blended in one dreadful confuſion. The whole body was totally defeated, and the conſtable himſelf, together with the principal commanders of the firſt line, fell among the ſlain.

No ſooner did the duke d'Alençon, who commanded the ſecond line perceive the route of the firſt diviſion, than he immediately advanced to repair the diſgrace of his countrymen. Henry met him at the head of his center, and a dreadful conteſt enſued. D'Alençon, in order, if poſſible, to ſnatch the victory from the enemy, commanded eighteen French knights of approved valour to watch attentively the motions of the Engliſh monarch, and uſe their utmoſt efforts either to kill, or take him priſoner.

But the genius of Henry ſaved him from this imminent danger. Animated with the amazing ſucceſs of his archers, and deſirous of diſtinguiſhing himſelf by actions worthy of an Engliſh monarch, he alighted from his horſe, and advanced at the head of his diviſion, with a confidence which ſeemed to inſure the victory. He charged the enemy with ſuch fury as was almoſt irreſiſtible, and was met by d'Alençon with a ſpirit worthy of his rank. He received the attack with a firmneſs that deſerved a better fate. The French knights, who had had never loſt ſight of Henry, cut themſelves a paſſage to the ſpot where he fought in perſon; and ruſhing upon him with the utmoſt violence, would, probably, have made themſelves maſters of his perſon, had not David Gam, a Welſh captain, and two other officers, perceiving the danger that threatened their ſovereign, flown to his aſſiſtance; and all the eighteen knights ſoon fell, breathleſs on the field; but Gam, and his two gallant countrymen, were alſo mortally wounded. Henry now darted into the thickeſt part of the battle; but his ardour and impetuoſity again involved him in the moſt imminent danger. His brother, the duke of Glouceſter, who had fought by his ſide, was ſtruck to the ground, and the enemy preſſed in crowds to avail themſelves of the incident. Henry was again ſurrounded by a hoſt of foes, but being a ſtranger to fear, he covered the body of his brother with his ſhield, and defended him with his ſword. In this ſituation he received ſo violent a blow on his helmet with a battle-axe, that he fell on his knees, and would, poſſibly, have been ſeized by the enemy, had not the duke of York advanced to his aſſiſtance, at the head of a freſh body of troops. This intimidated the enemy; they fell back, and Henry and his brother had time to recover from their alarming ſituation. Another reinforcement immediately followed that led by the duke of York; and Henry again attacked the French with ſuch fury, that they were unable to ſupport the ſhock; they fell into diſorder, and a dreadful ſlaughter enſued.

D'Alençon, driven to deſpair at ſeeing the defeat of his diviſion, determined to make one furious effort, and either retrieve the battle, or ſpare himſelf the mortification of ſurviving the diſgrace of his country. He therefore put himſelf at the head of a choſen band of volunteers, and, cutting his way to the ſpot where Henry fought in perſon, ruſhed upon the monarch, killed the duke of York by his ſide, and, with a furious ſtroke of his ſword, cleft the crown on Henry's helmet. The Engliſh monarch returned the blow with ſuch violence, that d'Alençon fell to the ground, and was immediately diſpatched; the conſequence of which was that the French forces, who had been under his command, immediately conſulted their ſafety by a precipitate flight.

The third line of the enemy, which ſtill ſtood firm, were more numerous than the whole Engliſh army, and might have renewed the battle with ſome proſpect of ſucceſs, had they not been ſeized with a general panic. But the deſtruction of their countrymen had deprived them of all thoughts of reſiſtance,: they refuſed to obey the command of their generals, and, inſtead of advancing to the charge, retired, leaving Henry ſole maſter of the field. The ſcattered remains of the two firſt lines had now rallied themſelves, and ſeemed to advance with a reſolution of making another effort for the palm of victory. At the ſame time, ſome gentlemen of Picardy having collected about ſix hundred peaſants, had fallen on the Engliſh baggage, and were deſtroying the unarmed followers of the camp, who fled before them. Henry, on ſeeing the enemy both in front and rear, began to entertain apprehenſions leſt his priſoners ſhould alſo join in the attempt to tear the wreath of laurel from his brow; and therefore thought it neceſſary to iſſue general orders for putting them to death. Having done this he marched towards the enemy, who, on his approach, fled with the utmoſt precipitation, and Henry, perceiving there was no further danger to be apprehended, immediately put a ſtop to the ſlaughter.

This battle proved fatal to the French nobility, many of whom were ſlain, and others taken priſoners. Among the former was the conſtable d'Albert, the dukes of Brabant, Barre, and Alençon, the count of Marle, and the archbiſhop of Sens. Among the priſoners the moſt remarkable were, the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the counts of Eu, Vendome, and Richemont, and the marſhal de Boucicaut. Ten thouſand of the French are ſaid to have been ſlain in this battle, and as the ſlaughter fell chiefly on the cavalry, it was computed that eight thouſand were gentlemen. The loſs of the Engliſh was very inconſiderable; and the only perſons of note that fell were, the duke of York, and the earl of Suffolk.

After a public thankſgiving had been held in the Engliſh camp for this ſignal victory, Henry ſent for Montjoy, a French herald, who had been diſpatched from the dauphin to obtain permiſſion to bury the dead, and deſired to know the name of a caſtle, to which he pointed with his hand. Being told it was called the Caſtle of Agincourt, he ſaid, "Let this action be hereafter remembered by the name of, The Battle of Agincourt."

Though Henry had, by this conqueſt, obtained great advantage over the French, yet he did not think proper to profit any farther by his victory. He purſued his route, by eaſy marches, to Calais, without meeting with any obſtruction in his way. Having ſtaid there about three weeks to recruit his troops, he embarked for England, on the 16th of November, and landed the ſame evening at Dover. The next morning he ſet out for London, where he was joyfully received amidſt the univerſal acclamations of the people.

A. D. 1417. Though the diſturbances in France had been diſcontinued on Henry's invading that kingdom, he no ſooner left it, than the factions were renewed with more violence than ever. All the principles of honour, and all the motives of intereſt, were ſacrificed at the altars of ambition and revenge. The duke of Burgundy redoubled his efforts to reinſtate himſelf in the poſſeſſion of the government. Iſabella of Bavaria, (wife of the unfortunate Charles VI.) deteſtable in her character, and capable of the greateſt crimes, having been baniſhed to Tours, entered into a ſtrict alliance with him againſt the dauphin, who was attached to the oppoſite party. The duke of Burgundy entered France at the head of an army, reduced ſeveral ſtrong places, releaſed the queen from her confinement, and made himſelf maſter of the king's perſon.

A. D. 1418. The whole kingdom of France was now in the moſt horrid ſtate of confuſion: the metropolis itſelf was deluged with blood, and nothing but an invaſion from England was wanting to complete the ruin of that divided kingdom. Nor was this long delayed; for, on the 28th of July Henry again embarked with a large army for the continent, and, on the firſt of Auguſt, landed at Beville in Normandy.

Having ſoon poſſeſſed himſelf of Falaiſe, Cherbourg, Evreaux, and Caen, Henry laid ſiege to the city of Rouen; but the place being defended by a numerous garriſon, he was obliged to turn the ſiege into a blockade. While Henry laid before Rouen, ſeveral negotiations for a peace were carried on between him and the leaders of the French factions, but neither of them turned to any advantage.

A. D. 1419. The garriſon of Rouen having held out till the beginning of this year, were reduced to ſuch extremity by famine, that they deſired to capitulate. Henry very readily liſtened to their propoſals; and it was agreed, that on paying a ſtipulated ſum, the city ſhould be preſerved from plunder, and the garriſon walk out with all the honours of war.

The ſurrender of Rouen was followed by that of all the towns and fortreſſes in Upper Normandy. But a ſudden reconciliation taking place between the dauphin and the Burgundian faction, greatly checked, for a time, Henry's expectations of farther ſucceſs. This reconciliation, however, was ſoon blaſted; for the duke and dauphin having agreed to an interview on the bridge of Montereau, the former was there aſſaſſinated by ſome noblemen in the train of the latter, who had embraced this opportunity of revenging the aſſaſſination of the duke of Orleans. This deſperate act was followed by the moſt dreadful conſequences. The dauphin was accuſed of the crime, becauſe it was perpetrated in his preſence, and by his moſt intimate friends. The new duke of Burgundy and the queen threatened the prince with deſtruction, and conſpired the ruin of the kingdom. In ſhort, every ſentiment of honour, patriotiſm, and even perſonal intereſt, gave way to the fury of revenge.

During theſe tranſactions Henry made himſelf maſter of Pontoiſe and Giſon, and was marching with all expedition towards Paris, which ſtruck ſuch a terror in the French, that the court removed from the capital to Troyes. Amidſt theſe ſucceſſes Henry had the ſatisfaction to find, that the French, inſtead of uniting their joint efforts to oppoſe his progreſs, were ready to eſpouſe his cauſe, and to employ him as the inſtrument of wreaking their vengeance on each other.

While Henry lay with his army before Paris, the queen of France, in conjunction with the duke of Burgundy, ſent meſſengers to him with propoſals for a general peace. The terms being approved of by Henry, he immediately repaired to Troyes, accompanied by his two brothers, the dukes of Clarence and Glouceſter, where the treaty was concluded and ſigned on the 24th of December, in the preſence of the principal nobility of France.

The chief articles of this famous treaty were the following: 1. That Henry ſhould eſpouſe the princes Catherine: 2. That Charles, during his life, ſhould enjoy the title and dignity of king of France: 3. That Henry ſhould be declared and acknowledged heir of the monarchy, and be entruſted with the preſent adminiſtration of the government: 4. That the crown of France ſhould deſcend to his heirs: 5. That France and England ſhould be for ever united under one king; but ſhould ſtill retain their ſeveral uſages, cuſtoms, and privileges: 6. That all the princes, peers, vaſſals, and communities of France, ſhould ſwear, both that they would adhere to the future ſucceſſion of Henry, and alſo pay him preſent obedience as regent: And laſtly, 7. That Henry ſhould unite his arms to thoſe of Charles and the duke of Burgundy, in order to ſubdue the adherents of the dauphin; and that thoſe princes ſhould make neither peace nor truce with him, but by common conſent and agreement.

A. D. 1420. This treaty of peace was ratified by the parliament at Paris on the 21ſt of May, and the members ſwore obedience to Henry, who aſſumed the reins of government as regent of the kingdom; and the treaty was ſent to England, to be recorded in the court of Exchequer at Weſtminſter.

On the 2d of June following, Henry married the princeſs Catherine, who was eſteemed one of the moſt beautiful women of her age. The ceremony was performed at Troyes, and celebrated with great magnificence. Henry was attended by forty Engliſh noblemen, and the royal bride by the duke of Burgundy and forty of the principal nobility of France. At this meeting the peace was again ſworn to by both parties, and the agreement between Henry and the duke of Burgundy mutually renewed. The duke promiſed to obey Henry as regent of France, and heir to the crown; while Henry engaged to deliver up into his hands all who could be found that had any concern in the murder of his father.

During theſe tranſactions the dauphin conducted himſelf with great ſpirit and reſolution. He had diſpatched the count of Vendonne to ſolicit aſſiſtance from the Scots, and thoſe people, wiſely conſidering that if Henry became abſolute maſter of France, Scotland would certainly be the next victim to his ambition, readily liſtened to his requeſt, and immediately ſent him a ſupply of 7000 men, under the command of the earl of Buchan. Aſſiſted by theſe forces, the dauphin made himſelf maſter of Pont de l'Eſprit and Niſmes, in Languedoc; and placed ſtrong garriſons in Melun, Montereau, Montargis, Meaux, and Compeigne.

Alarmed at the progreſs of the dauphin, Henry reſolved immediately to take the field, in order to oppoſe him. He accordingly marched againſt Sens, which ſubmitted after a very faint oppoſition. Montereau opened its gates at the firſt ſummons, and ſeveral ſmall towns followed the example. But the reduction of Melun was attended with ſome difficulty. Great part of that city was encompaſſed by the river Seine, and the whole defended by a ſtrong wall, flanked with bulwarks and towers. De Barbaſon, one of the beſt officers in France commanded the garriſon, and made a noble defence. The place was inveſted on the 12th of July, and did not ſurrender till the 18th of November, when famine compelled the garriſon to ſubmit. Henry promiſed to ſpare the lives of all, except ſuch as had been concerned in the murder of the duke of Burgundy. The governor himſelf was ſtrongly ſuſpected of having been one of the aſſaſſins, and the then duke inſiſted on his being immediately put to death; but by the interceſſion of Henry, his life was ſpared, and he was ſentenced to perpetual impriſonment.

A. D. 1421. Henry's coffers being now almoſt exhauſted, and the ſupplies granted by the ſtates of France not ſufficient to anſwer the complicated exigencies of the ſtate, Henry found it neceſſary to return to England, in order to procure a ſupply from the parliament. Having, therefore, placed Engliſh governors in the fortreſſes he had reduced, and committed the government of Paris to his uncle the duke of Exeter, and the command of the army to the duke of Clarence, he embarked towards the latter end of January with his young queen, who, on the 9th of February following, was crowned at Weſtminſter with great magnificence.

Soon after Henry's arrival in England he received advice of a diſaſter which obliged him with all expedition to return to the continent. The dauphin, assisted by the Scots under the command of the earl of Buchan, engaged the English forces at Baugé in Anjou, and obtained a compleat victory. The duke of Clarence was slain in the battle, and the earls of Somerset, Huntingdon and Suffolk were taken prisoners. This was the first action that terminated in favour of the dauphin, who, in order to attach the Scots more firmly to his interest, and reward the bravery of the earl of Buchan, created that nobleman constable of France.

Alarmed at this advantage gained by the dauphin, Henry, having obtained the necessary supplies from his parliament, went over to the continent with an army of four thousand men at arms, and twenty-four thousand archers. He landed at Calais, and immediately marched to the metropolis, which he entered amidst the shouts and acclamations of the people, who seemed to be heartily reconciled to the English government.

On Henry's return to the continent, the dauphin, knowing it would be madness to meet him in the open field, retired beyond the Loire, with the resolution of acting on the defensive. Henry soon recovered the places he had lost during his stay in England, and made himself master of Dreux, Tilliers, and several others castles, in the neighbourhood of the metropolis.

The garrison of Meaux had, for some time, greatly harrassed the inhabitants of Paris, at whose particular request Henry invested that place, which was strongly fortified, and defended by a numerous garrison under the command of the bastard of Vaurus. This siege lasted upwards of seven months, at the expiration of which the garrison were compelled to surrender at discretion, and Henry took possession of the place. The governor was equally remarkable for his courage and cruelty against the English, being accustomed to hang, without distinction of age or quality, all the English who unfortunately fell into his hands. Henry, therefore, highly incensed at such a horrid and barbarous practice, determined to inflict that punishment on him which his cruelty justly merited; and accordingly ordered him to be hanged on the same tree which he had made the instrument of his inhuman executions.

After the reduction of Meaux Henry made himself master of Compeigne, St. Valery, and most of the principal places on that side of the Loire next the capital; having done which he returned to Paris, and put his army into winter quarters.

Henry's affairs were now in a most prosperous situation. By his mild and gentle government he had secured the internal tranquillity of England: by keeping the young king of Scots in his custody, he prevented those people from making incursions into the northern counties: by his undaunted valour, and a concurrence of favourable circumstances, he had subjected, in a short space of time, the greatest part of the extensive kingdom of France; and to consummate his felicity, and perpetuate his glory, his queen was delivered of a prince on the 6th of December at Windsor, who was baptized by the name of Henry, and lived to succeed his father on the English throne.

A. D. 1422. But the glory of Henry had now nearly reached its summit: the king of terrors interrupted him in his career, and all his mighty projects vanished into air. The dauphin had laid siege to Cosne, and Henry marched with his forces to the relief of the place; but being seized with a violent flux at a place called Soulis, he returned to Vicennes, where his disorder continuing to increase, he was soon reduced to such a state, that there were no hopes of his recovery. Finding his end approaching, he sent for his brother the duke of Exeter, the earl of Warwick, and the English nobility who happened to be near him. As soon as they surrounded his bedside, he delivered to them, with great tranquillity, his last instructions, the substance of which was to the following effect:

He began with observing, that though his life had been short, it had been replete with glory, and employed in promoting the happiness of his people; that though his pretensions to the crown of France had proved the destruction of many thousands, yet those calamities ought not to be imputed to him, but to those whose obstinacy and injustice had forced him to have recourse to arms, by refusing to accept of a reasonable peace: that he should have beheld the approach of death without concern, had not his last moments been somewhat embittered by the reflection, that he had not been able to finish a war he had so happily begun; but hoped they would continue toward his infant son the same fidelity and attachment which they had professed during his life, and which had been cemented by so many mutual good offices. He added, as his last advice, that if they found themselves unable to place his son on the throne of France, they would never at least make peace with that kingdom, unless the dutchy of Normandy was for ever annexed to the crown of England; and earnestly requested that they would assiduously cultivate the friendship of the duke of Burgundy, and never give liberty to the French princes taken at the battle of Agincourt, till his son was of age, and able to hold the reins of government. He left the regency of France to his eldest brother the duke of Bedford; that of England to his younger brother the duke of Glocester, and the care of his son's person to the earl of Warwick.

Having thus delivered his instructions concerning the management of public affairs, and received a promise of their being faithfully fulfilled, Henry enquired of his physicians how long they thought he could live? when one of them falling on his knees by the bed-side, with tears in his eyes, declared, that without a miracle two hours would put an end to his life. This alarming information he heard with the greatest apparent serenity of mind, and made immediate preparations for his approaching dissolution. Having conversed some time with his confessor, he ordered his chaplain to recite the seven penitential psalms; and when he came to that passage, "Build thou the walls of Jerusalem," he interrupted him, declaring on the word of a dying prince, the design he had formed of engaging in a crusade against the infidels, as soon as he should have established a solid peace with France.

Soon after performing this exercise of devotion, Henry paid the debt of nature, on the 31st of August, in the 34th year of his age, and tenth of his reign.

His remains were brought over to England, and interred with great pomp in Westminster-abbey, near the tomb of Edward the Confessor. His queen, to perpetuate the memory of so illustrious a consort, erected over him a monument of grey marble, and on it was placed his statue in silver as large as life, and which remained there till about the latter end of the reign of Henry VIII.

Henry V. was in person tall and slender, had an engaging aspect, and limbs delicately proportioned.

tioned. He excelled all the youth of his age in agility and the exerciſe of arms; was hardy, patient, laborious, and more able to endure cold, hunger and fatigue than any general in his army. His valour was ſuch as no danger could ſtartle, and no difficulty oppoſe: nor was his policy inferior to his courage. He managed the diſſentions among his enemies with ſuch addreſs as made him conſummate in the arts of the cabinet. He fomented their jealouſies, and converted their mutual reſentment to his own advantage. He poſſeſſed a ſelf-taught genius, which blazed out at once without the aid of inſtruction or experience; and a fund of natural ſagacity that made ample amends for thoſe defects. He was chaſte, temperate, modeſt and devout; ſcrupulouſly juſt in his adminiſtration, and ſeverely exact in the diſcipline of his army, upon which he knew his glory and ſucceſs, in a great meaſure, depended. In a word, it muſt be acknowledged that Henry V. was without an equal in the art of war, policy and government.

Remarkable Occurrences during the Reign of Henry V.

A. D.

1414 This year the greateſt part of the city of Norwich was reduced to aſhes by an accidental fire.

1416 On the 30th of November this year ſeven dolphins were ſeen in the river Thames, four of which were taken and preſented to the king.

1417 That part of the city of London, now called Holborn, was this year paved by order of the king.

1420 The officer, entitled, Garter King at Arms, firſt appointed.

The firſt commiſſion of array, which occurs in the Engliſh hiſtory, was iſſued in the courſe of this reign. The military part of the feudal ſyſtem was then aboliſhed, and could no longer ſerve for the defence or ſecurity of the kingdom. For this reaſon, when Henry went to France in the year 1415, he empowered certain commiſſioners to take a review of all the freemen in each county able to bear arms, to form them into companies, and to keep them in conſtant readineſs to oppoſe any attempts that might be made by an enemy.

It was during this reign that the dreadful ſchiſm, which had ſo long diſturbed the Roman church was terminated by the council of Conſtance, who depoſed John XXIII. for his crimes, and elected Martin V. in his place. The authority of a general council over the pope was eſtabliſhed in this aſſembly; and John Huſs, and Jerome of Prague, who had adopted the opinions of Wickliffe, were burnt alive as heretics, notwithſtanding they had received a ſafe-conduct from the emperor of Germany. This act of cruelty and treachery occaſioned a bloody war in Germany, where Ziſca, general of the Huſſites, rendered himſelf remarkably diſtinguiſhed for his great abilities as a man, and his courage as a warrior.

She engages and defeats the earl of Warwick, after which ſhe retires into the north. Henry VI. is dethroned, and Edward, duke of York, choſen to the ſovereignty.

A. D. 1422. AS ſoon as the Engliſh parliament received advice of the death of Henry V. they immediately cauſed his ſon, then an infant, to be proclaimed king; and proceeded to take ſuch meaſures as they thought moſt adviſeable for the good order and government of the nation. They did not, however, comply with the verbal will of the late king, who had deſired that the duke of Glouceſter might be made regent of the kingdom; for, inſtead thereof, they appointed his elder brother the duke of Bedford (then in France) to that office, and changed his title from regent to that of Protector, though at the ſame time, they permitted the duke of Glouceſter to act in his abſence. Nor did they think it prudent to truſt this power wholly in the hands of either; they therefore appointed a council, without whoſe advice and concurrence no meaſures of importance could be determined; and the care of the infant king was entruſted to the biſhop of Wincheſter.

About two months after the death of Henry V. his father-in-law the unfortunate Charles VI. of France paid the debt of nature; in conſequence of which the young prince, his ſon, then about twenty years of age, was proclaimed and crowned king at Poictiers, the city of Rheims, where that ceremony was uſually performed, being then in the hands of the Engliſh.

This circumſtance greatly increaſed the numbers of the French king's partiſans, which being obſerved by the duke of Bedford, he took every method that human prudence could ſuggeſt to prevent the conſequences. He immediately proclaimed Henry VI. king of France, and himſelf aſſumed the title of regent of that kingdom. He aſſembled all the nobility attached to the Engliſh intereſt at Paris, and exhorted them to acknowledge young Henry for their ſovereign. They readily complied with his requeſt, ſwore allegiance to Henry as king of France, and did homage to the duke as repreſentative of the young monarch.

The duke of Bedford was one of the moſt accompliſhed princes in Europe, whether conſidered as a ſoldier or a ſtateſman. He well knew that every foreign aſſiſtance would be neceſſary, before an Engliſh regent could hope to complete the conqueſt of France. He accordingly applied himſelf with great diligence to increaſe the number of his friends on the continent, and for that purpoſe entered into alliances with the dukes of Burgundy and Britany, with the former of whom he added private to political intereſt, by marrying one of his ſiſters.

A. D. 1423. The firſt military expedition of the French monarch after the death of his father was, againſt the town of Meulan, which he took by ſurprize. As this place lay in the neighbourhood of Paris, the duke of Bedford was highly irritatd, and reſolved to retake it at all events. He accordingly inveſted the place, which was reſolutely defended for ſome time, till at length the garriſon, finding themſelves too weak, and being diſappointed of receiving a reinforcement from Charles, as they had reaſon to expect, delivered up the place; the ſurrender of which was followed by ſeveral other fortreſſes in the neighbourhood of the capital.

During theſe tranſactions the Engliſh miniſtry, in order to ſtrengthen the intereſt of Henry in France, propoſed to releaſe from confinement James, the young king of Scotland, who had remained a priſoner in London ever ſince the reign of Henry IV. They communicated their intentions to the duke of Bedford, who highly approved of the plan, imagining that much might be expected from James's friendſhip when laid under this obligation for his crown and liberty. Accordingly, conferences were opened at York in the beginning of September, when the commiſſioners of both nations ſigned a truce for ſeven years, and the Scottiſh king was reſtored to his liberty and crown, on condition of promiſing, as ſoon as poſſible, to recall his troops from the French ſervice.

During theſe tranſactions in England, the French monarch received conſiderable aſſiſtance from the duke of Milan, who ſent him a reinforcement of a thouſand men at arms and five hundred lances; but his chief reliance was upon the Scottiſh auxiliaries, whom he called his guardians, and of whom he had no leſs than fifteen thouſand in his ſervice.

A. D. 1424. In the month of June this year the duke of Bedford received advice that one of Charles's partizans had reduced Ivri on the frontiers of Picardy. As this was a place of very conſiderable importance, the duke determined, if poſſible, to regain it, and accordingly marched at the head of his army, and inveſted the place. The governor, perceiving it would be impoſſible to defend the town for any length of time, agreed to capitulate, if not relieved by a certain day. This propoſal was accepted, and no army appearing within the limited time, the place was delivered up to the beſiegers. Charles had not, however, neglected the neceſſary means for ſuccouring a place of ſo much importance. He had diſpatched the earl of Buchan, conſtable of France, aſſiſted by the earl of Douglas, and ſeveral French noblemen, at the head of a detachment of twenty thouſand men, to relieve Ivri; but before they reached the neighbourhood of that place, the term had been, for ſome days, expired, and the town was in poſſeſſion of the Engliſh.

Knowing that an attempt to retake the place muſt prove fruitleſs, the earl of Buchan marched at the head of his army to Vernueil, which the inhabitants delivered up to him in ſpite of the garriſon. The duke of Bedford, anxious to make the beſt uſe of his time, immediately followed him at the head of 15000 men; and on his arrival near the camp of the enemy took poſſeſſion of an advantageous ſpot of ground flanked by a hill, on which he poſted a body of two thouſand archers and furniſhed all his infantry with ſharp ſtakes, like thoſe uſed with ſo much ſucceſs at the battle of Agincourt, to check the fury of the French cavalry.

The earl of Douglas, having ſurveyed the diſpoſition of the Engliſh camp, called a council of war, and declared that, in his opinion, the French army ſhould ſtand upon the defenſive, and not begin the battle, as the enemy had choſen their own ground, where they could not be attacked without great diſadvantage. This prudent advice, which was highly approved of by Buchan and every officer of experience in the army, appeared to Aymer, viſcount of Narbonne (an headſtrong, imprudent man) as the effect of timidity; nor did he fail to upbraid the commanders, in expreſs terms, with puſillanimity, and of diſhonouring, by their meanneſs, the arms of France. No anſwer being made to theſe invectives, Norbonne was ſo highly exaſperated, that, ſnatching up one of the ſtandards, he exclaimed, "Let all thoſe "who love their ſovereign follow me;" and ruſhing from the council, accompanied by thoſe young noblemen who approved his advice, drew up his men in order of battle, and commanded them to advance to the charge.

Douglas and Buchan, finding their advice deſpiſed, and ſeeing the general confuſion that prevailed in their army, determined to follow the raſh example of Narbonne, and accordingly followed with their troops, though they were conſcious that nothing but deſtruction could be the conſequence of ſuch headſtrong raſhneſs.

The duke of Bedford had given orders for all his cavalry to diſmount and to place their horſes in the rear, forming round them a kind of barricade with the carriages of the army. The attack of the enemy, though made in the utmoſt diſorder, was ſo furious, that a body of the French horſe on the right wing, broke the oppoſite wing of the Engliſh, and advanced to the barricade which ſurrounded their horſes, and behind which were placed a body of archers. Theſe diſcharged ſuch a ſhower of arrows at the French horſe that they were obliged to fall back, after ſuſtaining conſiderable loſs; and that party of archers, who had been poſted on the hill, ſo galled thoſe who were marching up in another line, that they fled with the utmoſt precipitation.

In the mean time the main bodies of both armies maintained the fight with ſuch equal courage and obſtinacy, that the victory for the ſpace of three hours, remained doubtful, when the reſerved body of archers coming up to the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, put an end to the conteſt. The French horſe were driven back upon their foot, and a dreadful ſlaughter enſued. Douglas and Buchan, perceiving their defeat inevitable, determined mined not to ſurvive the diſgrace, and ruſhing into the thickeſt of the battle, together with the headſtrong Narbonne, fell among the ſlain. The other general officers were ſo dangerouſly wounded, that they could no longer exerciſe command; ſo that the ſoldiers, being deſtitute of their leaders, fought at random, until they were entirely routed, with a moſt terrible ſlaughter. Upwards of four thouſand Scots and French fell in this action, and great numbers were wounded and taken priſoners, among the latter of whom were ſeveral perſons of the firſt diſtinction.

The next day the duke of Bedford laid ſiege to Vernueil, which, after a reſiſtance of three days, ſurrendered on capitulation. In this place the Engliſh found all the baggage belonging to the French and Scottiſh generals, together with the money deſtined for the ſoldiers.

The French monarch was now in the moſt deplorable ſituation. He had loſt the braveſt of his troops, and the flower of his nobility, in the fatal battle of Vernueil. His party was diſpirited, and he had hardly money ſufficient to purchaſe the neceſſaries of life, much leſs to pay an army; nor could he raiſe any among his ſubjects without exciting a general diſcontent, which, in his then circumſtances, it was neceſſary to avoid.

But while every thing ſeemed to threaten the total ruin of Charles, an incident happened, which ſaved him from the impending danger, and deprived the Engliſh of a moſt favourable opportunity for completing the conqueſt of France. Jaqueline, counteſs of Hainault, having a violent antipathy to her huſband, the duke of Brabant (couſin-german to the duke of Burgundy) determined to diſſolve her marriage. She was a princeſs of a maſculine ſpirit, and had an uncommon underſtanding; and her huſband of a ſickly conſtitution, and weak intellects. She knew her huſband's family would exert all their power to prevent the pope from diſſolving the marriage; and therefore, to effect her purpoſe with more facility, repaired to England, and put herſelf under the protection of the duke of Glouceſter, who ſoon became enamoured both of her perſon and fortune. That prince, though poſſeſſed of many excellent qualities, was naturally of a very haſty and impetuous diſpoſition: he therefore, without waiting for a papal diſpenſation, or attempting to gain the conſent of the duke of Burgundy, married Jaqueline, and immediately repaired to the Low Countries, in order to take poſſeſſion of her paternal dominions.

The conduct of Glouceſter gave great offence to the duke of Burgundy, who perſuaded his couſin, the duke of Brabant, to oppoſe him by force of arms, prevailed on many of Jaqueline's ſubjects to eſpouſe the cauſe of that prince, and ſent a body of troops to his aſſiſtance; ſo that a war was immediately commenced in the Low Countries.

Theſe were circumſtances which gave great uneaſineſs to the duke of Bedford, who uſed his utmoſt efforts to reſtrain the impetuous temper of his brother; but all his endeavours were fruitleſs; nor was he able to ſoften the reſentment of the duke of Burgundy. To add to theſe diſagreeable circumſtances, the abſence of the duke of Glouceſter had occaſioned violent contentions among the Engliſh miniſtry; ſo that Bedford, inſtead of purſuing the advantages he had gained at Vernueil, left the continent, and embarked for England.

While the duke of Bedford was employed in adjuſting the differences that had taken place in the Engliſh council, Charles laboured aſſiduouſly to gain the friendſhip of the French princes of the blood, whoſe revolt had almoſt occaſioned the total ruin of that monarchy. The duke of Britany liſtened to propoſals made by Charles for an accommodation, and entered into alliance with him againſt the Engliſh; and the count of Richemont accepted of the dignity of conſtable of France.

A. D. 1426. As ſoon as the duke of Bedford received intelligence of the defection of the duke of Britany, and the perfidy of his brother the count de Richemont, he declared war againſt them by public proclamation, and diſpatched meſſengers to the continent with orders to the earl of Warwick immediately to take the field. Theſe orders were ſtrictly obſerved by the earl, who firſt laid ſiege to Pont Orſon which he carried by aſſault. He then took and fortified Beauvron, where he fixed his head quarters, and from thence extended his ravages over the adjacent country, to the very gates of Rennes.

In the mean time Richemont, having raiſed an army of twenty thouſand men, put himſelf at their head, and marched againſt Warwick. In conſequence of this, the earl, whoſe troops did not amount to more than eight thouſand, ſhut himſelf up in Beauvron, which the conſtable inveſted, and propoſed to reduce by famine. His deſign, however, was fruſtrated by means of Giac, prime miniſter to Charles, who, hating the conſtable, neglected to ſend him the neceſſary ſupplies of men and money. Irritated at this diſappointment, and vexed to think of being baffled in his firſt attempt, Richemont raſhly reſolved to make a general aſſault. The garriſon behaved with the moſt diſtinguiſhed reſolution: the beſiegers were repeatedly repulſed; and the earl of Warwick, perceiving a general diſorder in the ranks of the enemy, ſuddenly ſallied out, fell upon their rear, cut the greater part to pieces, and obliged the reſt to ſeek their ſafety by a precipitate flight.

Encouraged by this ſucceſs, the earl of Warwick determined to undertake the ſiege of Montargis, as being a place of the utmoſt importance for facilitating the duke of Bedford's deſigns of carrying the war beyond the Loire. He accordingly inveſted the town, and reduced the garriſon to the utmoſt extremity, when the baſtard of Orleans reſolved to march to its relief. That general (who was natural ſon to that duke of Orleans who had been aſſaſſinated by the duke of Burgundy, and who afterwards acquired great renown under the title of the count de Dunois) boldly approached the Engliſh camp at the head of no more than ſixteen hundred men, and attacked them with ſuch impetuoſity, that he not only forced his way into the place, but gave ſo ſevere a blow to the Engliſh, that the earl of Warwick was obliged to abandon the ſiege. This was the firſt diſtinguiſhed proof of the military genius of Dunois, and laid the foundation of that high character he afterwards attained.

A. D. 1427. During theſe tranſactions the duke of Bedford, having ſettled affairs in England to his ſatisfaction, returned to the continent, and immediately formed a plan, which was both wiſely concerted, and fortunately accompliſhed. He aſſembled a numerous army on the frontiers of Britany, and entered ſo unexpectedly into that province, that the duke, unable to oppoſe his progreſs, requeſted an interview with Bedford, which being complied with, a treaty of accommodation was formed and ſigned on both ſides. By this treaty the duke of Britany renounced his alliance with Charles, promiſed to adhere to the treaty concluded at Troyes, owned Bedford as regent of France, and engaged to ſwear fealty to young Henry for his territories.

A. D. 1428. The next plan concerted by the duke of Bedford was of ſuch a nature as, if attended with ſucceſs, muſt have ſecured the total conqueſt of France. This was the taking of Orleans, a city of the utmoſt importance, as it was the only barrier that oppoſed his entrance into the ſouthern provinces. The management of this ſiege was committed to the earl of Saliſbury, one of the moſt able generals in the Engliſh ſervice. He marched from Paris about the latter end of July, at the head of 16,000 men, and was accompanied by the earl of Suffolk, the lord Talbot, Sir John Faſtolf, and other excellent officers. He advanced through the country of Beauſſe, and made himſelf maſter of all the towns that lay in his route to Orleans, paſſed the Loire, and inveſted the city on the 12th of October.

This important place was commanded by the count de Gaucort, an officer of great courage and experience, and inviolably attached to the family of Orleans. The troops that formed the garriſon were all veterans, and long acquainted with danger; and the citizens themſelves were well qualified to aſſiſt the regulars in the defence of the place. Many new fortifications were raiſed, the old ones repaired, and the greater part of the buildings in the ſuburbs pulled down, that they might not be uſed by the Engliſh in carrying on the ſiege.

The earl of Saliſbury began his operations againſt a ſtrong bulwark erected to cover the caſtle of Tourelles, which defended the head of the bridge over the Loire. The Engliſh artillery ſoon demoliſhed the parapets, and made a breach ſufficiently large for ſtorming it. The French took all the meaſures they could for defending the place, and the earl made every neceſſary preparation for reducing it. The firſt attempt did not ſucceed: the Engliſh were obliged to retreat, leaving two hundred and fifty men dead in the breach. But this repulſe ſerved only to encreaſe the ardour of the beſiegers, who continued to batter the place with ſuch fury, that it was ſoon abandoned by the French, and the Engliſh took poſſeſſion of it without farther oppoſition.

After this ſucceſs forts were erected above and below the bridge, for the better convenience of battering the city. But ſtill the place was inveſted only on one ſide: that towards the Beauſſe was entirely open; and the baſtard of Orleans found means to get into the city at the head of eight hundred men.

The earl of Saliſbury clearly perceived that while the city could be ſupplied with troops and proviſions, it would be impoſſible to reduce it. He therefore ordered ſixty ſmall forts, or redoubts, to be built at proper diſtances round the city; but while he was pointing out the proper ſpots where they ſhould be erected, a ball diſcharged from a cannon in the place put a period to his exiſtence.

In conſequence of this accident the command of the Engliſh army devolved on the earl of Suffolk, who, aſſiſted by the lord Talbot, puſhed the ſiege with the moſt unremitting vigour. Sallies were frequently made by the garriſon, and the moſt aſtoniſhing acts of valour daily performed both by the beſiegers and beſieged, though the former could not reap any real advantage, notwithſtanding they had received a conſiderable reinforcement of Engliſh and Burgundian troops.

A. D. 1429. The ſiege of Orleans had now been carried on near four months, when the duke of Bedford ſent from Paris a large quantity of ſalt-fiſh, herrings, and other proviſions of a ſimilar kind, for the uſe of the beſiegers during Lent. Theſe proviſions were convoyed by a guard of ſeventeen hundred men, under the command of Sir John Faſtolf, an officer of approved valour and great experience. Charles, who had advanced to Chinon (a town in Touraine, about eighty miles from Orleans) receiving intelligence of the march of this convoy, ſent the count de Cleremont at the head of three thouſand men, to attack the Engliſh in their route. The count came up with the convoy at a place called Rouvrai St. Denis on the 12th of February. Faſtolf, apprized of his approach, and knowing himſelf too weak to ſuſtain the ſhock of the French in the open field, drew up his men behind a barricade of his waggons, and in this poſition received the attack of the French, which was made with their uſual fury; but they were not able to force the temporary fortification. At the ſame time they met with ſo warm a reception, that they were thrown into the utmoſt diſorder. Faſtolf, perceiving this circumſtance, ſuddenly ſallied from behind the barricade, and routed the enemy with prodigious ſlaughter; ſo that the convoy reached the Engliſh camp, without meeting with any farther oppoſition. In this action, generally called "The Battle of the Herrings," no leſs than one hundred and twenty French noblemen and perſons of diſtinction loſt their lives, beſides a great number of common ſoldiers.

The French monarch was ſo diſcouraged at this diſaſter, that he began to give up all hopes of being able to retrieve his ruined fortune; but, not to neglect any expedient which might conduce to the preſervation of Orleans, he diſpatched a meſſenger to the duke of Bedford at Paris, with a propoſition that the city might be ſequeſtered into the hands of the duke of Burgundy, till the expiration of the war. This propoſal was treated with contempt by the duke, who obſerved, "that he was not in an humour to beat the buſhes while others ran away with the game;" at which ſarcaſtical expreſſion the duke of Burgundy was ſo offended, that he immediately recalled all his troops from the Engliſh ſervice. But notwithſtanding this defection, the place was every day more cloſely inveſted by the enemy. The utmoſt ſcarcity prevailed in the city; and Charles, giving way to deſpair, formed the reſolution of ſeeking his perſonal ſafety by retiring into Dauphine.

At this dangerous criſis, when the reſtoration of his affairs ſeemed almoſt impoſſible, and when, indeed, he had given up all deſigns of making any farther efforts, Charles unexpectedly received encouragement and aſſiſtance from the daughter of a peaſant, named Joan D'Arc, who laid the foundation of one of the moſt remarkable revolutions recorded in the annals of any country whatever.

Joan D'Arc (afterwards better known by the name of the Maid of Orleans) was born in the village of Dom. Remi, near Vaucoleures, on the borders of Lorraine. She was then about twenty years of age, of an irreproachable character, and had never been diſtinguiſhed for any ſingularity. She, indeed, poſſeſſed a genius ſuperior to moſt in her claſs of life, but had been wholly employed in country buſineſs. A continued recital of the cala-calamities of France had made ſo deep an impreſſion on her mind as to make her fancy ſhe heard angelic voices, and doubted not but ſhe was called upon by heaven to undertake the defence of her country.

Poſſeſſed with theſe notions ſhe repaired to Vaucoleures, and communicated her viſions to the governor of that place, who at firſt treated her with neglect; but, on her repeated applications, he was prevailed upon to ſend her to the king. She ſupported before the court the character of an inſpired perſon with an aſtoniſhing candour and firmneſs; and an aſſembly of divines, who examined her on the ſubject of her miſſion, declared there was ſomething in her ſupernatural. She promiſed to deliver Orleans, and conduct Charles to Rheims, there to be crowned and anointed. She demanded of the king, as the inſtrument of her future victories, a particular ſword, which was preſerved in the church of St. Catherine de Fierbois, and which, though ſhe had never ſeen, it is ſaid ſhe deſcribed with ſo many particular circumſtances as plainly proved her ſupernatural knowledge.

It was conſidered as an object of policy by the French court to make Joan's predictions publickly known, and accordingly every method was taken for that purpoſe. This had the deſired effect: the minds of the vulgar were impreſſed with a conviction of the truth of her miſſion, and they believed her expreſly ſent from heaven to reſcue the kingdom from impending deſtruction. She was accordingly the object of univerſal adoration, and the ſoldiers were impatient to retrieve their honour under the auſpices of this diſtinguiſhed amazon.

In the mean time the ſiege of Orleans was puſhed with the utmoſt vigour, and the beſieged ſtill continued to make a noble reſiſtance; but the want of proviſion increaſing every day, it became abſolutely neceſſary to ſend the garriſon a ſupply, and Charles determined that this ſervice ſhould be Joan's firſt effort in war, and a proof of the truth or falſity of her miſſion. She was accordingly armed cap-a-pie, and mounted on a fine horſe richly capariſoned; and, according to her requeſt, the ſword of St. Catharine was ſent for, and delivered to her with great formality. Thus arrayed, ſhe immediately proceeded to Blois, where the proviſions for the relief of the garriſon were collected, and which was appointed as the place of rendezvous for the troops to convey them ſafe to Orleans.

Such was the infatuation of the people in favour of Joan, that in a few days an army was collected of twelve thouſand choſen men, at the head of whom ſhe marched to the relief of Orleans, carrying in her hand a conſecrated banner. As ſoon as ſhe approached the city, the count de Dunois, who commanded the garriſon, made a vigorous ſally on the Engliſh, in order to favour the entrance of Joan into the city. This had the deſired effect; for the French, animated with the confidence they entertained of the ſupernatural abilities of Joan, fell on with ſuch enthuſiaſtic fury, that the Engliſh, after a long reſiſtance, were defeated, and the convoy paſſed with ſafety into the city.

Joan was conſidered by the inhabitants of Orleans as a tutelar angel: the whole ſucceſs was attributed to her; and her preſence diſpelled every thought of danger. The garriſon believed themſelves invincible under her influence, and the frequent and ſucceſsful ſallies which they made completed the conſternation of the Engliſh, who, on the 12th of May, raiſed the ſiege of Orleans, and retired.

The Engliſh acted in a very indiſcreet manner after their departure from Orleans, of which the French did not fail to take advantage. Inſtead of keeping their forces together in one body to act powerfully againſt the enemy, they diſtributed great part of them into places near the Loire, which they had ſubdued when they firſt paſſed that river. Being thus ſeparated, the French met with little reſiſtance in the places they attempted to take. Joan d'Arc ſtill headed their troops; and wherever ſhe appeared, the Engliſh were ſtruck with a panic, while the French believed themſelves ſupported by an inviſible agent. Gorgeau, a ſmall fortreſs, into which the earl of Suffolk had been ſo imprudent to throw himſelf with only four hundred men, was obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion, and the earl himſelf was taken priſoner. Meulan ſuffered the ſame fate, as did alſo ſeveral other other towns and caſtles that had been garriſoned by the Engliſh.

On the impriſonment of the earl of Suffolk the command of the Engliſh forces devolved on lord Talbot, who found that his whole force did not exceed ſix thouſand men. He therefore endeavoured to avoid a general engagement with the enemy, who were at leaſt double that number: but being overtaken at a place called Potay, a battle became inevitable, and the event was what might have been expected. The Engliſh were totally defeated: above two thouſand fell in the action, and about two hundred were taken priſoners, among whom were the lords Talbot, Scales and Hungerford, with ſeveral other officers diſtinguiſhed for their military abilities.

Joan d'Arc, having fully executed the firſt part of her engagements, now determined to proceed in the execution of the ſecond, namely, that of conducting Charles to Rheims, in order to his being there crowned and anointed. Charles had never expoſed his perſon to danger, but he now ſuffered himſelf to be carried away by the torrent of his ſucceſſes, and the prevailing remonſtrances of the female warrior, with whom he marched, at the head of twelve thouſand men, through the midſt of his enemies, towards Rheims. Troyes, Chalons, and ſeveral other towns in his way, opened their gates at his approach. The inhabitants of Rheims no ſooner heard that he was advancing to that city, accompanied by Joan, than they immediately drove out the Engliſh garriſon, and ſent him the keys of their city, which he entered in triumph. The ceremony of his coronation was immediately performed in the preſence of Joan, who, on this occaſion, attended with her conſecrated banner in her hand. Thus was Charles in poſſeſſion of the city of Rheims, to which his ſubjects (who now looked upon him in a very reſpectable light) repaired from all quarters, and readily joined his ſtandard.

After the ceremony of Charles's coronation was over, Joan d'Arc (who had acquired the title of The Maid of Orleans) conſidering her commiſſion fully accompliſhed, was deſirous of returning to the place of her nativity, affirming that ſhe had executed the deſign of her miſſion; but her influence was ſo great over the troops, that count de Dunois prevailed on her to continue in the army till the Engliſh ſhould be entirely driven from the country.

During theſe tranſactions the duke of Bedford, who had remained in Paris, found means to renew his alliance with the duke of Burgundy, and having ing raiſed a very powerful army, determined to take the field, in order to oppoſe the rapid progreſs of the French monarch. He accordingly advanced as far as Montereau, from whence he ſent an herald to Charles, offering to give him battle in any place he ſhould name, in order to put a final period to the war by a general engagement. But Charles, not chuſing to hazard his crown on the uncertain event of a ſingle battle, refuſed the offer, and continued with his troops in the neighbourhood of Rheims.

A. D. 1430. While theſe things were tranſacting on the continent, the Engliſh parliament reſolved to ſend young Henry into France, in order that he might be crowned at Paris. In conſequence of this reſolution, he embarked at Dover with a ſplendid retinue, and landed at Calais on the 19th of May. But the French army being then in the neighbourhood of Paris, it was thought adviſeable to conduct the young king to Rouen, till the enemy ſhould be removed farther from the capital.

To effect this purpoſe the duke of Bedford laboured aſſiduouſly to induce the duke of Burgundy to act with more vigour than he had done after recalling his troops from the ſiege of Orleans. He accordingly ceded to him all the places poſſeſſed by the Engliſh in Champagne and Bria; and the duke immediately entered France at the head of a powerful army. He ſoon reduced Troyes and Soiſſons, and, being joined by freſh reinforcements under command of the earl of Arundel, inveſted Compeigne, the garriſon of which was commanded by one Flavi, a brave and experienced general.

As ſoon as this enterprize was known, the Maid of Orleans, with Xaintrailles, a celebrated French officer, threw themſelves into the place, which gave freſh ſpirits to the garriſon. The next day Joan, at the head of a conſiderable body of forces, made ſo deſperate a ſally on the quarters of John of Luxemberg, the Burgundian general, that he was driven from his poſt. But the fury of that enthuſiaſtic leader carried her too far: her retreat was cut off, and, after making the moſt deſperate reſiſtance, ſhe was taken priſoner, and delivered up to the Burgundian general, who ſent her under a proper guard to the duke of Bedford. The garriſon of Compeigne, however, continued to make a noble defence, and a large detachment arriving from Charles's army, the Engliſh were obliged to abandon the ſiege.

The Engliſh monarch had, during theſe tranſactions, continued at Rouen; but it was now determined to perform the ceremony of his coronation. He accordingly repaired to Paris, attended by the dukes of Bedford and Burgundy, and a ſplendid train of nobility of both nations. Sunday, the Seventeenth of December, was appointed for the ceremony, which was accordingly performed with great magnificence in the church of Notre Dame, when the cardinal of Wincheſter placed the crown on the head of Henry, and the French nobility ſwore allegiance to his perſon and government.

A. D. 1431. The firſt ſtep taken by the duke of Bedford after young Henry's coronation was, to diſpoſe of the perſon of the Maid of Orleans, who was then his priſoner. As this woman had been the cauſe of that aſtoniſhing revolution, which almoſt ruined the affairs of the Engliſh in France, the duke determined to undeceive the world with reſpect to the divinity of her miſſion, hoping, by theſe means, to revive the drooping ſpirits of his countrymen, and deprive the enemy of thoſe advantages that had reſulted from this ridiculous but ſucceſsful deluſion. To effect this he ſent Joan to Rouen, in order to be tried for witchcraft; and, after a tedious examination, the eccleſiaſtical judges condemned her as an heretic, to do penance all the reſt of her life on bread and water. Soon after the ſame judges, on pretence that ſhe had relapſed into her former errors, delivered her over to the ſecular power to be burnt alive, which cruel ſentence was executed in the old market-place of Rouen on the 30th of May.—Such was the end of the famous Maid of Orleans, whoſe actions had ſtruck the Engliſh with terror, and who ſaved her country from impending deſtruction.

A. D. 1432. The Engliſh monarch, after his coronation at Paris, left that city, and returned to Rouen; where he continued till ſome time after the execution of the famous Maid of Orleans. But thinking it now adviſeable to return to England, he proceeded to Calais, where he embarked, and arrived ſafe at Dover about the middle of February, from whence he immediately proceeded to London, amidſt the univerſal acclamations of the people.

A. D. 1433. It had been conjectured that the death of the Maid of Orleans would have enabled the Engliſh to recover thoſe advantages which they had loſt through her means. But they were ſtill unfortunate, and their affairs grew daily worſe and worſe. In this alarming criſis an event happened which gave a fatal blow to the hopes of the Engliſh. The ducheſs of Bedford, ſiſter to the duke of Burgundy, paid the debt of nature, and was buried in the church of the Celeſtines at Paris. This unfortunate event diſſolved the cloſe connection that had ſubſiſted between her brother and the duke; and the marriage of the latter, about four months after her death, with Jaqueline of Luxemburg, occaſioned a breach between them. The cardinal of Wincheſter endeavoured to mediate a reconciliation between theſe princes, and brought them both to St. Omers for that ſalutary purpoſe. But a point of honour rendered the whole abortive. Bedford expected the firſt viſit, as he had condeſcended to come into the duke of Burgundy's territories, in order to have an interview with him. But Philip, proud of his great power, and independent dominions, refuſed to pay this compliment, upon which the duke of Bedford retired with diſguſt.

A. D. 1434. In the beginning of this year Iſabella, queen dowager of France, obſerving the great ſucceſs of her ſon Charles, (againſt whom ſhe maintained an implacable hatred) and the declining ſtate of the Engliſh intereſt, died of grief at Paris, very little regretted by the French, who conſidered her as the principal cauſe of the ruin of their country.

The death of Iſabella was of very little conſequence to either party: but this was not the caſe with reſpect to that of the duke of Bedford, who expired in the caſtle of Rouen on the 14th of September univerſally regretted by the Engliſh, who conſidered him not only as the chief ſupport of the intereſt of France, but an honour to the country that gave him birth. It is difficult to determine whether this prince ſhone more in the field or the cabinet; whether he was the greater hero or politician: but, to add honour to his name, it is evident, that he was a truly honeſt man, and a ſincere lover of his country.

A. D. 1435. On the death of Bedford, the duke of York was appointed regent of France in his ſtead; but ſuch parties were formed in the Engliſh council that it was ſeven months before the commiſſion, (empowering him to hold that office,) paſſed the ſeals. In the mean time Charles took every advantage for extending his conqueſts, and had made a moſt rapid progreſs in eſtabliſhing his authority when the new regent arrived on the continent. The capital had been ſome time reduced, ſo that the territories of the Engliſh then chiefly conſiſted of Guienne and Normandy.

A. D. 1437. In the ſpring of this year Philip, duke of Burgundy (who had ſome time joined in alliance with Charles) attempted to reduce Calais with an army of 50,000 men, and made himſelf maſter of ſeveral ſmall caſtles in the neighbourhood of that city. The Flemings (who were then much more famous for manufacture than war) vainly imagined that the appearance of their numerous army would be ſufficient to intimidate the garriſon, and the gates would be opened at their approach. But they ſoon found themſelves deceived; for the garriſon, inſtead of being intimidated, dreadfully harraſſed their camp with ſucceſsful ſallies.

In the mean time the duke of Glouceſter, at the head of fifteen thouſand men, landed at Calais, and ſent an herald to the duke of Burgundy, offering him battle. Philip accepted his challenge; but his Flemings had ſo ſeverely felt the effects of the valour of the Engliſh, that they could not be prevailed upon to meet them in the open field; they therefore quitted their camp, and made a precipitate retreat. Philip, fearing leſt the garriſon of Calais might take advantage of this confuſion in his army, drew up his regular troops to ſecure his retreat, and retired in good order to Gravelines, leaving all his baggage and artillery, which, of courſe, fell into the hands of the Engliſh.

Irritated at the proceedings of the duke of Burgundy, Glouceſter led his army into Artois, and after laying the whole country waſte with fire and ſword, returned to Calais loaded with plunder.

A. D. 1438—40. During the courſe of theſe three years the war was carried on by both parties in a very languid manner. The two nations were drained by the expences of the different campaigns, and their troops were at length obliged to ſubſiſt by plundering and oppreſſing the countries both of friends and enemies. Terms of peace were often propoſed and as often rejected; both parties inſiſting on ſuch as could not be granted. At the ſame time both the Engliſh and French courts were filled with factions. The duke of Glouceſter and the cardinal of Wincheſter continually oppoſed each other, and the intereſt of the nation was ſacrificed to their perpetual enmities. The dauphin of France headed a faction againſt his father. He was of a reſtleſs and ambitious diſpoſition, and found means to bring over to his intereſt the dukes of Alençon and Bourbon, with the counts of Vendome and Dunois. Charles perceived his danger, and was deſirous of procuring the releaſe of the duke of Orleans (who had continued a priſoner in England, ever ſince the battle Agincourt) as the only perſon whoſe merit and rank could balance the credit of the dauphin's party. After a tedious negotiation, which was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the duke of Glouceſter, it was determined to ſet him at liberty on his paying a ranſom of thirty-ſix thouſand pounds. The duke of Burgundy diſplayed a noble inſtance of generoſity on this occaſion, by renouncing his former reſentments, and paying the ranſom of a prince, who had been his moſt inveterate enemy.

A. D. 1441. The diſſentions in England between the duke of Glouceſter and the cardinal of Wincheſter ſtill continued with the utmoſt violence; nor could any thing leſs than the deſtruction of the former ſatisfy the malice and ambition of the latter. The cardinal, however, was unable to attack the duke in perſon, and therefore formed the moſt horrid plot that could be deviſed by human invention. He cauſed the ducheſs to be accuſed of witchcraft, and it was pretended that a waxen image of the king was found in her poſſeſſion, which ſhe and her aſſociates, Sir Roger Bolingbroke, a prieſt, and one Margaret Jordon, of Eye in Suffolk, melted before a ſlow fire, with a deſign of making Henry's force and vigour waſte away by the like inſenſible degrees. The accuſation was well calculated to effect the weak and credulous mind of the king, and to gain credit among the illiterate people. The ducheſs and her ſuppoſed confederates were accordingly brought to trial, the two former of whom were acquitted, and the latter found guilty. She was condemned to do public penance for three days ſucceſſively, by walking barefooted and bareheaded, with a wax taper in her hand, from the Tower of London to St. Paul's cathedral, and then to be impriſoned for life; which ſentence was executed with the utmoſt rigour. But theſe violent and baſe proceedings did not produce the intended effect; for inſtead of making Glouceſter appear contemptible in the eyes of the public, it only increaſed their hatred againſt his enemies.

A. D. 1443. The cardinal of Wincheſter had been, for ſome time, averſe to continuing the war on the continent; and he now alledged the impoſſibility of the Engliſh either extending their conqueſts, or even retaining thoſe they then had in their poſſeſſion. He likewiſe obſerved, that the power of the French king was daily increaſing, and that it would be abſolutely neceſſary to ſtop the progreſs of the enemy's arms by a temporary ſuſpenſion of hoſtilities, which would allow the Engliſh time to retrieve their ruined fortunes. The duke of Glouceſter, who was naturally brave and daring, highly diſapproved of theſe meaſures: he could not be perſuaded to reſign all hopes of reducing the power of France, nor could he patiently endure to find his own advice over-ruled by the ſuperior power and intereſt of his rival the cardinal of Wincheſter. But all his oppoſition had no effect: the earl of Suffolk, a nobleman blindly attached to the cardinal's party, was ſent to Tours, in order to treat with the French miniſters. Conferences were accordingly opened; but the parties diſagreeing concerning the terms, the ſole reſult was a truce for two years.

A. D. 1444. Having executed this part of his commiſſion, the earl of Suffolk proceeded to finiſh another matter of no leſs importance, and which was planned by the cardinal of Wincheſter. He propoſed a match between the king his maſter and Margaret daughter of Regnier, duke of Anjou, and nominal king of Sicily; and, inſtead of demanding a dower with her, promiſed, in the name of his maſter, that the province of Maine (then in the hands of the Engliſh) ſhould be ceded to her uncle, Charles of Anjou, who was prime miniſter to the French king.

As ſoon as the duke of Glouceſter was informed of theſe proceedings, he exerted his utmoſt efforts to prevent the intended match; but in ſpite of all his oppoſition, the contract was ratified in London, and the ceremony of marriage performed at Tours, the earl of Suffolk acting as proxy for the Engliſh monarch. On the 18th of April following, Margaret arrived in England, and was re-married in the priory of Southwark, from whence ſhe proceeded to Weſtminſter, and on the 13th of May was crowned with great magnificence.

A. D. 1445. The new queen had not been long in England before ſhe ſufficiently indicated her intentions of being miſtreſs of her huſband's conduct as well as his affections. The oppoſition made by the duke of Glouceſter to her marriage had filled her mind with envy, and induced her to enter into a cloſe correſpondence with the cardinal of Wincheſter and the earl of Suffolk, who, ſtrengthened by her friendſhip, and animated by their common hatred againſt the duke of Glouceſter, reſolved to effect the ruin of that patriotic nobleman. He was accordingly ſtripped of all his preferments, and even entirely removed from the council board. But this unjuſtifiable method of proceeding raiſed ſuch commotions in the nation, that the authors of this diſgrace thought it abſolutely neceſſary for their own ſafety, to colour over their baſe proceedings with a ſhew of juſtice. They accordingly declared their intentions of impeaching the duke before the parliament, and the members being ſummoned to meet at St. Edmundſbury, the duke was cited to appear, to anſwer the accuſations alledged againſt him; but before the day appointed for his trial arrived, he was found dead in his bed. It was, indeed, pretended that his death was natural, and his body was accordingly expoſed to public view without exhibiting any marks of external injury, though no one doubted his having fallen a ſacrifice to the vengeance of his enemies.—Thus fell Humphrey of Woodſtock, duke of Glouceſter, the moſt learned perſon of his age. He founded at Oxford one of the firſt public libraries in England, and was a generous patron to men of ſcience, and able artiſts of every profeſſion *.

A. D. 1446. The cardinal of Wincheſter did not long triumph over the fall of Glouceſter. He died about ſix weeks after with all the horrors of a guilty conſcience, and his name was execrated by the populace, who had as much revered Glouceſter for his virtues, as they had deteſted Wincheſter for his infamy.

By the death of the cardinal, the queen, and her favourite Suffolk, were deprived of the great ſupport they had derived from his experience, his birth, his riches, and his order; and left expoſed to the effects of thoſe unpopular meaſures they afterwards purſued. The miniſter, however, did not immediately feel the reſentment of an injured people. He, for ſome time, enjoyed his power, and the next ſeſſions of parliament was created duke of Suffolk.

A. D. 1447. During theſe tranſactions in England, the French king employed his time in proſecuting ſuch meaſures as might be moſt conducive to the happineſs of his people, and the welfare of his kingdom. He was then in a condition to act with vigour in recovering thoſe places which were ſtill in the hands of the Engliſh; and an accident ſoon happened which gave him a pretence for recommencing hoſtilities.

It had been agreed, by the treaty of marriage between Henry and Margaret of Anjou, that the province of Maine ſhould be ceded to her uncle Charles; but the Engliſh miniſtry, fearful that the ceſſion of that place ſhould occaſion popular clamours, had hitherto poſtponed diſcharging this part of the treaty. At length, however, orders were ſent to Sir Francis Surienne, governor of Mans, the capital of the country, to deliver that city into the hands of Charles of Anjou. Surienne (who was a native of Arragon, but had ſerved the Engliſh with great fidelity above twenty years) diſputed the authenticity of the order, and abſolutely refuſed to deliver up the place. The count de Dunois was therefore ſent, at the head of a numerous body of troops, and a large train of artillery, to reduce it by force. Surienne made a noble defence, but was at length obliged to capitulate; by which the garriſon, conſiſting of two thouſand five hundred men, were ſuffered to march out with their effects, and all the honours of war. They retired into Normandy; but being refuſed admittance into any of the fortified towns, and falling into great diſtreſs, Surienne led his troops into Britany, and procured ſubſiſtence by extending his depredations over the whole province.

At this time the duke of Somerſet was governor of Normandy, from whom the French king demanded ſatisfaction for the outrages committed by Surienne in Britany, that province being included in the late truce made with France. The duke apologized, by returning for anſwer, that he was greatly concerned at the illegality of his proceedings; but that the whole had been executed without his privity and conſent, nor had he any authority over the troops that had committed the ravages of which he complained.

This was far from being ſatisfactory to Charles, who now determined to take advantage of the ſuperiority he had gained over the Engliſh. He accordingly, in the ſpring of the year 1448, declared war againſt Henry, ſoon made himſelf maſter of the principal places in poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, and, in a ſhort time, was ſo ſucceſsful, as to annex both Normandy and Guienne to his dominions.

A. D. 1449. But theſe were not the only misfortunes that now befel the Engliſh. The ſword of civil war was ready to be drawn, in order to drench the fields with the blood of their owners. The duke of York (firſt prince of the blood) was deſcended by his mother, from the houſe of Mortimer, which enjoyed an inconteſtible title to the crown of England after the demiſe of Richard II. when the rights of ſovereignty were uſurped by the houſe of Lancaſter. His perſonal merit was great, and he had contracted a powerful alliance by marrying the daughter of Nevil, earl of Weſtmoreland, one of the moſt conſiderable and reſpected noblemen in the kingdom. The earl of Warwick was alſo one of that family, and his hoſpitality and munificence had gained him ſuch reſpect as to render his authority over his numerous partizans almoſt abſolute.

The duke of York, who had commanded with great applauſe in France, was deprived of his commiſſion, without any reaſon being aſſigned for ſo imprudent an exertion of power. On his return to England ſome dark hints with reſpect to the pretenſions of his family to the crown were dropped by his partizans, and had the deſired effect. The virtues of the duke of York, and the great ſervices he had performed for his country, were ſtrongly impreſſed

* The remains of this prince were interred in the old church of St. Alban's, where a handſome monument was erected to his memory, a great part of which is ſtill to be ſeen. Some few years ago the vault was diſcovered where his remains were depoſited, when the body was found in a ſtone coffin, with the fleſh then but little decayed. The only remains now are his bones, which have been carefully preſerved, and may be ſtill ſeen by the curious.

preſſed on the minds of the people, who ſpared no pains to teſtify their reſpect for ſo diſtinguiſhed a character.

The increaſing popularity of the duke of York greatly alarmed the queen and Suffolk; and a commotion having happened in Ireland, it was thought adviſeable to inveſt him with the title of lord-lieutenant, and ſend him into that kingdom, as the only perſon capable of reſtoring peace and tranquillity.

Though the duke of York well knew the true reaſon for his being ſent out of the kingdom, yet he made no heſitation to accept the commiſſion. He accordingly went over to Ireland, where his mild and gentle behaviour had ſuch an effect on the inhabitants of that kingdom, that they not only returned quietly to their duty, but likewiſe became ſtrongly attached to him and his family.

A. D. 1450. The conduct of Suffolk, in conjunction with his royal patroneſs, had now become ſo enormous, that they incurred the univerſal hatred of the people, and the popular clamours aroſe to ſuch a height, that the Houſe of Commons determined to impeach the favourite miniſter. Accordingly an accuſation was laid againſt the duke of Suffolk for high-treaſon. They aſcribed to him the loſs of the Engliſh dominions on the continent, and even inſiſted, that he had entered into a deſign to dethrone the king. The violence of faction had, however, carried the Commons too far: their allegations would not bear examination, there being no evidence to ſupport them. A new charge was, therefore, drawn up againſt him, the ſubſtance of which was chiefly confined to the perverſions of that authority with which he had been inveſted.

Henry was now alarmed for his favourite miniſter. He had reaſon to think that the parliament were determined to carry on the proſecution againſt him with the utmoſt vigour; nor was he miſtaken, for both lords and commons found him guilty. As ſoon as Henry heard of the iſſue of his trial, he immediately ſent for all the lords ſpiritual and temporal to his palace, produced Suffolk before them, and aſked him, what he could ſay in his own defence. He denied the charge exhibited againſt him, but ſubmitted himſelf to the mercy of the king, who ſentenced him to five years baniſhment.

In conſequence of this ſentence the duke made immediate preparations for leaving the kingdom, not doubting but, as he ſtill enjoyed the queen's favour and confidence, he ſhould be ſoon recalled. But his enemies were determined that his life ſhould pay the forfeit of his crimes. They accordingly employed a captain of a ſhip to cruize off Dover, and intercept him in his paſſage to the continent. The captain, who had imbibed the common prejudices, performed his commiſſion with great ſeverity. He ſeized the duke near Dover, took him into his long-boat, and, with the aſſiſtance of his men, ſtruck his head off on the ſide of the veſſel, and afterwards threw his body into the ſea. Thus fell the duke of Suffolk, a victim to his own ambition and perfidy.

On the death of Suffolk the duke of Somerſet ſucceeded in all his power and credit with the queen; and as he was the perſon who commanded on the continent when the French provinces were loſt, the people, who always judge by the event, made him the object of their animoſity and deteſtation. The conſequence of this was that commotions took place in moſt parts of the kingdom, and at length an inſurrection was raiſed which threatened to overturn the whole ſyſtem of government.

One John Cade, a native of Ireland, having been outlawed for a rape and murder committed in Suſſex, had taken ſanctuary, and was forced to abjure the kingdom. He, however, ſoon after returned into Kent, and, obſerving the diſcontents of the people, determined to turn them to his own advantage. He took upon himſelf the name of John Mortimer, pretending he was the ſon of the late Sir John Mortimer, uncle to Edmund earl of Marche, and thereby made himſelf a near relation to Richard duke of York, the perſon from whom the people hoped for redreſs of all their grievances. The very mention of that popular name was ſufficient to procure him multitudes of followers, and he ſoon found himſelf at the head of twenty thouſand men. The arch-rebel, perceiving that great numbers daily flocked to his ſtandard, advanced to Blackheath, giving out that he was going to make a reform in the government, and redreſs the grievances of the people, by delivering them from the burthen of taxes.

The miniſtry no ſooner received intelligence of theſe diſturbances, than they immediately diſpatched a meſſenger to the inſurgents, demanding the reaſon of their aſſembling in ſo tumultuous and hoſtile a manner. Cade, in the name of the whole body, returned for anſwer, that they had not the leaſt deſign of offering any violence to the perſon of the king: they only deſired to preſent a petition to the parliament, that the miniſters who oppreſſed the people might be removed from the royal preſence. At the ſame time he delivered to the deputies two papers enumerating the grievances of the nation. Among other particulars they prayed that the duke of Somerſet might be puniſhed as the principal author of the loſs of Normandy; that the king's council might conſiſt of the princes of the blood, and other prudent and diſtinguiſhed perſonages, inſtead of vicious and profligate wretches, who were totally deſtitute both of honour and abilities

But the miniſtry were ſo far from paying any attention to theſe remonſtrances, that they determined to have recourſe to violent methods for quelling the inſurgents. Accordingly, an army of fifteen thouſand diſciplined men, under the command of Sir Humphrey Stafford, was ſent againſt them. Cade artfully affected to be terrified at the general's approach, and retired, with the main body of the rebels, to Sevenoak, placing a ſtrong detachment in ambuſcade to intercept Stafford in his march. The royal army followed without obſerving the neceſſary cautions, and were ſo furiouſly attacked by Cade's concealed forces, that great numbers were ſlain, among whom was their leader, and the reſt obliged to ſave themſelves by a precipitate flight.

Animated by this ſucceſs, Cade returned to Blackheath, from whence he ſent another remonſtrance to the king and council, demanding, "That the dukes of York, Exeter, Buckingham and Norfolk, ſhould be recalled to court: and that the muderers of the duke of Glouceſter, together with all thoſe who had contributed to the loſs of the Engliſh territories on the continent, ſhould be brought to condign puniſhment." The government, alarmed at the late defeat of their forces, and knowing that the ſecret friends of the duke of York were on the point of declaring themſelves, reſolved, if poſſible, to purchaſe their ſafety by ſacriſacrificing ſome individuals to the fury of the populace; and accordingly, the lords Say and Cromer, who had rendered themſelves very unpopular, were committed to the tower.

The next day the archbiſhop of Canterbury and the duke of Buckingham were ſent to treat with the inſurgents. Cade received them with the greateſt complaiſance; but told them he was abſolutely determined not to lay down his arms till the king came in perſon, and granted their requeſts. The effect of this conference was reported to the council, and the king, perſuaded he had every thing to fear from the fury of the inſurgents, determined to leave London, and accordingly ſet out, with his whole court, for Kenelworth caſtle in Yorkſhire.

No ſooner was Cade informed of the abſence of the king than he immediately marched, at the head of his troops, to the capital, where the citizens, alarmed at his great ſucceſs, immediately opened their gates, and Cade entered with all the triumph of the moſt diſtinguiſhed warrior. He had even the inſolence to ſtrike his ſword againſt London-ſtone, crying out, "Now is Mortimer lord of London." He, however, maintained, for ſome time, great order and diſcipline among his followers. He always led them out at the approach of night where they continued till morning, when they again returned into the city. But the rebels being reſolved, in order to gratify their malevolence againſt Say and Cromer, to put thoſe miniſters to death, Cade could no longer reſtrain their riotous diſpoſitions. They plundered the houſes of the more opulent citizens, and committed ſo many diſorders, that the inhabitants perceived there was a neceſſity for joining the regular troops, in order to prevent the deſtruction with which they were threatened. Accordingly, after Cade had marched out of the city as uſual in the evening, they ſeized the gates, and put the detachments that guarded them to death. On the return of Cade and his followers the next morning, they found the gates of the bridge ſhut and barricadoed againſt them. They attempted, however, to force a paſſage, the conſequence of which was, that a battle enſued, and the conteſt continued till night, without either party gaining any material advantage.

The rebels were greatly diſpirited at not being able to open themſelves a paſſage into the city; and the miniſtry took advantage of their timidity. They drew up a general pardon for the inſurgents, provided they would lay down their arms; and another for Cade in particular, on condition of his abandoning his rebellious projects. Theſe pardons were iſſued under the great ſeal, and prudently publiſhed during the night in the camp of the inſurgents. The effect was aſtoniſhing. The morning no ſooner appeared than Cade found himſelf deſerted by the greater part of his followers, and retreated to Rocheſter, where the reſt diſperſed, notwithſtanding all his remonſtrances and artful ſpeeches, by which he endeavoured to perſuade them, that the pardon they had received was of no effect, as it had not received the ſanction of the parliament. Perceiving that all his arts were exerted in vain, he fled into the woods of Suſſex, with a few of his friends who were determined to ſhare his fate. A price was now ſet upon his head by the government, and he was ſlain by one Alexander Iden or Eden, a gentleman of Suſſex, who ſent his head to London; and for which ſervice he was rewarded with the government of Rocheſter caſtle.

The duke of York was ſtrongly ſuſpected of being materially concerned in exciting and ſupporting the late inſurrection, in order that he might form ſome idea of the ſentiments of the people with regard to his title and family. He was then in Ireland, where his judicious conduct had entitled him to the public eſteem and confidence; but he now determined to return to England, perſuaded that his perſonal ſecurity depended upon the timely vigour of his future meaſures.

The council no ſooner heard of the duke of York's deſign of returning to England, than, jealous of the pretenſions he might make, and ſuſpecting he would come with an armed force, they iſſued out orders, in the king's name, to oppoſe him wherever he ſhould endeavour to land. But the duke eluded all their deſigns, by coming attended with no more than his ordinary retinue: and this impolitic precaution of the miniſtry ſerved only to indicate their apprehenſion of his power and intereſt, and their own diſtruſt of the affections of the people.

A. D. 1451. A few days after the duke of York arrived in England, he wrote a very ſubmiſſive letter to the king, in which he pointed out the grievances ſo much complained of by the people, and offered his beſt ſervices to remove thoſe abuſes which had crept into the government. The miniſtry perceived the duke's real intentions; but their then ſituation obliged them to act cautiouſly, and it was reſolved to return a civil anſwer. Accordingly, the king, in a letter to the duke, told him, "That he had, for ſome time, been ſenſible of the neceſſity of reforming the government, and intended to nominate a council for that purpoſe, and conſtitute him as their preſident, adding, that, till this could be done, ſuch precautions ſhould be taken, that the duke of Somerſet might be ready to take his trial whenever it was thought neceſſary."

The miniſtry imagined that this remarkable condeceſſion in the king would totally deprive the duke of York of all pretenſions for taking up arms; but they ſoon found themſelves miſtaken: the offers were declared unſatisfactory by the duke's friends, and it was reſolved to proceed in the ſcheme that had been long formed by the duke of laying open his pretenſions to the Engliſh diadem.

The whole kingdom ſoon became one continued ſcene of commotion. The people were divided in opinion with regard to the pretenſions of the houſes of Lancaſter and York. Many plauſible reaſons were urged by the advocates on both ſides, and their arguments appeared weaker or ſtronger in proportion to the prejudice of the party.

A. D. 1452. But no meaſures ſeemed likely to be efficacious in healing the animoſities of the people, and deciding this important conteſt, except that of the ſword. As ſoon, therefore, as the ſpring was conſiderably advanced, the duke of York, who was then in Wales, where he had joined his friends, entered England at the head of a formidable army. But no acts of hoſtility were committed: they marched peaceably forwards, and publiſhed a manifeſto, declaring that their ſole intent was, to promote the good of the nation; to releaſe the oppreſſed ſubject from a burthen he was unable to bear; and to bring to juſtice a corrupt and debaſed adminiſtration.

Theſe plauſible reaſons produced the deſired effect. The people, who groaned under enormous taxes, gladly joined the duke's ſtandard; he ſoon found himſelf at the head of ten thouſand men, and directed his march towards London, not expectecting to meet with any oppoſition from the royal army. But in this he was miſtaken; the queen and Somerſet had exerted all their power to raiſe a number of forces ſufficient to meet the duke in the open field, and their attempts were ſucceſsful. The king marched from London againſt him; but before the two armies met, York, being informed of his danger, changed his route, and, by forced marches, reached the capital, before Henry knew that he intended to evade a battle. The duke, however, ſoon perceived that he had placed too much confidence in the promiſes of the Londoners; for, inſtead of receiving him with open arms, they ſhut their gates againſt his army, and would not even permit himſelf to enter the city.

As ſoon as Henry received advice of the duke of York having changed his route, and marched to London, he immediately returned with the utmoſt expedition towards the capital. On his arrival the duke of York croſſed the Thames at Kingſton, where, being joined by Thomas Courtney earl of Devon, and the lord Cobham, he marched at the head of his forces into Kent, and encamped on a ſpacious and convenient ſpot of ground near Dartford.

Young Henry followed the duke with all expedition, and marching his forces over London-bridge, encamped on Blackheath. The duke of Somerſet, who attended the king on this occaſion (and ſeems to have been an able politician) adviſed Henry to cruſh the rebellion in its bud, and not wait till it had gathered ſtrength, and become formidable. But Henry did not think proper to follow the advice of Somerſet: he totally neglected his prudent counſel, and, liſtening to ſome timorous, perhaps treacherous, noblemen, determined to have recourſe to negotiation.

In conſequence of this reſolution certain prelates and noblemen were ſent to know the reaſons for the duke's appearing in arms, and upon what terms he was willing to lay them down, and uſe his endeavours for reſtoring tranquillity to the nation. The duke, with the greateſt appearance of reſpect and moderation, told the meſſengers, that the proſperity of his country was his ſole intention, that he deſired nothing more than to reform the government, by bringing to juſtice the duke of Somerſet, and others of the counſel, who had trampled on the laws of the kingdom, and oppreſſed the people; adding, that he was willing to diſband his forces, and to throw himſelf at Henry's feet, if the perſons he had mentioned were taken into cuſtody, and brought to anſwer the charges he was ready to exhibit againſt them in parliament.

Henry made no heſitation at complying with the duke's requeſt. Somerſet was put under arreſt, and the duke of York, by this condeſcenſion, deprived of all excuſes for keeping up a body of forces. He ſaw his error, but determined to keep his word. Accordingly he diſmiſſed his army, and repaired to court without arms, and without a paſſport.

As ſoon as the duke came into the preſence of the king and council, he openly avowed the cauſe of his taking up arms, and inſiſted that the duke of Somerſet ſhould be immediately brought to trial; when, to his great aſtoniſhment, that miniſter came from a private cloſet in the preſence-chamber, and bitterly reviled him for his treaſonable practices. A virulent contention enſued, and a torrent of the moſt indecent invectives were poured out, without the leaſt regard to the preſence of the ſovereign. Somerſet inſiſted on putting the duke of York to death on the ſpot; but the more diſpaſſionate members of the council, fearful of carrying matters to ſuch extremes, would not permit the leaſt violence to be offered to his perſon. The duke was accordingly diſmiſſed, after making a formal ſubmiſſion to Henry, and, upon oath, acknowledging him the legal ſovereign of the kingdom.

A. D. 1453. In the ſpring of this year the earl of Shrewſbury was diſpatched to the continent with an army of eight thouſand men, in order to aſſiſt the Gaſcons in throwing off the French yoke. He made himſelf maſter of Bourdeaux, and ſeveral other places; but being at length attacked by a ſuperior force, himſelf, together with his gallant ſon the lord I'ſle, fell among the ſlain. Thus was the plan of reducing that province to the Engliſh government rendered abortive: and thus fell the valiant Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, one of the beſt of men, and moſt illuſtrious heroes of the age, in which he lived.

On the 23d of October the queen was delivered of a ſon, named Edward, who was immediately created prince of Wales, and earl of Cheſter. This circumſtance gave great ſatisfaction to Henry; but at the ſame time it re-kindled the flame of civil diſcord among the people, and greatly increaſed the activity and zeal of the partizans of the houſe of York.

A. D. 1454. Henry, from the natural weakneſs of his capacity, was totally incapable of managing the affairs of government; and, to add to this imperfection, he was at this time ſeized with an illneſs which deprived him of the power even of maintaining the appearance of royalty. On this account the meeting of the parliament had been ſeveral times poſtponed; and the friends of the duke of York, thinking it a convenient opportunity, determined to uſe their utmoſt efforts for replacing that nobleman in his ſeat at the council-board, from which he had been ſome time excluded. They accordingly inſinuated to the queen and Somerſet, that, from the then diſpoſition of the people, it could not be doubted, but whenever the parliament ſhould meet, the firſt thing they did would be to appoint a new miniſtry. That ſuch an incident muſt, of courſe, be productive of diſagreeable conſequences, and that the only ſure method of preventing it would be to admit the duke of York, the earls of Warwick and Saliſbury, with ſome other popular noblemen, into the council. This advice appearing plauſible to the queen and her favourite (who dreaded the effects of a parliamentary cenſure) they readily embraced their propoſal, and thoſe noblemen accordingly took the ſeats at the council-board.

The re-admiſſion of the duke of York into the council greatly animated his party, who continued daily to increaſe, and the queen ſoon found herſelf unable to oppoſe the power of his influence. The whole management of public affairs was changed: proſecutions were renewed againſt Somerſet; and the duke of York, even in the queen's preſence, cauſed him to be ſeized, and ſent priſoner to the Tower.

Henry, ſtill continuing in a ſtate which rendered him incapable of directing the affairs of government, the council thought it adviſeable to appoint the duke of York lieutenant of the kingdom, and to inveſt him with power to hold the next ſeſſion of parliament in the king's name.

This was accordingly done; and, to add to his power, the parliament ſoon after changed his title of lieutenant to that of Protector of England.

A. D. 1455. But the duke of York did not long enjoy that elevated ſtation to which he had been raiſed by the parliament. The king recovered from his indiſpoſition, the duke's commiſſion was ſuperſeded, and himſelf, with the earls of Warwick and Saliſbury, diſmiſſed from the council. The duke of Somerſet was releaſed from his confinement, reſtored to his former power in the adminiſtration, and, in conjunction with the queen, directed all the affairs of government.

Irritated at theſe proceedings, the duke of York immediately left London, and retired into Wales, in order to procure thoſe rights by force of arms, which he found could not be obtained by more lenient meaſures. The popular clamour againſt Somerſet had ſpread itſelf through all parts of the kingdom, ſo that the people flocked in great numbers to the duke's ſtandard. In conſequence of this he ſoon found himſelf at the head of a very conſiderable body of forces, with which he advanced towards the king, who had marched from London, at the head of an army, to give him battle.

The duke of York was aſſiſted on this occaſion by the earls of Saliſbury and Warwick, who ſent a letter from Royſton to the king, profeſſing their attachment to his perſon and government, and deſiring admiſſion to his preſence, that they might clear themſelves from the aſperſions of their enemies, and make him ſenſible of the miſconduct of his miniſters, who, they inſiſted, ſhould be brought to a legal trial, and puniſhed or acquitted according to their deſerts.

But this letter was treated with the utmoſt contempt, and the parties who ſent it threatened with the penalties of high-treaſon. In conſequence of this the malcontents continued their march, and the two armies met in the neighbourhood of St. Alban's, where a deſperate battle enſued, which terminated in favour of the Yorkiſts. The duke of Somerſet, the earls of Northumberland and Stafford, the lord Clifford, with ſeveral other diſtinguiſhed perſonages, and above eight hundred common ſoldiers, were killed on the ſpot. The king himſelf fell into the hands of the duke of York, who, inſtead of looking upon him in the light of a priſoner, treated him with every mark of reſpect due to royalty. Both the duke and his aſſociates fell on their knees before him and declared that, as the enemy of the public was no more, they were entirely devoted to the ſervice of their ſovereign.

In conſequence of this judicious and ſubmiſſive conduct in the duke and his aſſociates, the parliament, which met ſoon after the battle of St. Alban's granted to the Yorkiſts a general indemnity, and reſtored the protectorſhip to the duke; but at the ſame time renewed their oaths of fealty to the king, whoſe diſorder having greatly increaſed, prevented his directing the affairs of government.

This diſtinguiſhed elevation of the duke of York highly incenſed the queen, who, with her aſſociates, determined to exert their utmoſt endeavours to remove him from the ſeat of power. But their deſigns were greatly checked by the prudent conduct of the duke, whoſe great care was, to conduct himſelf in ſuch a manner as to obtain the general affections of the people. Deſirous of convincing them that his conduct was not influenced by paſſion or intereſt, he paid the utmoſt attention to the affairs of the royal family; eſtabliſhed the houſhold of the prince of Wales, and ſettled on him a decent maintenance, and, at the ſame time, left the king and queen at liberty to act as they thought proper; being perſuaded it was not in their power to diveſt him of the dignity of Protector, becauſe his patent could not be revoked without the conſent of parliament.

A. D. 1456. But Margaret was of too active and enterprizing a ſpirit to ſuffer any obſtacles to divert her from her intended purpoſes. The king had again recovered from his indiſpoſition, and the duke of York being abſent, his enemies, with the queen at their head, determined to take this opportunity of removing him from the ſeat of power. The parliament met on the 12th of February, when Henry (at the inſtigation of the queen and her aſſociates) went to the houſe, and declared his reſolution of putting an end to the power veſted in the duke of York, and taking the adminiſtration of affairs into his own hands. As the duke's party were not apprized of this meaſure they were not prepared to oppoſe it, ſo that the duke was removed from his office, and the king reſtored to his ſovereign authority. The duke was not a little ſurprized when he heard of this ſudden revolution, but making a virtue of neceſſity, quietly ſubmitted to the decree of parliament.

A. D. 1457. Elated at having thus far obtained her ends, though far from being ſatisfied at the great popularity of the duke and his aſſociates, Margaret now reſolved to ſecure her future repoſe by arreſting the perſons of York, Saliſbury and Warwick. With this view the court was removed to Coventry, where the queen thought ſhe could execute her purpoſe with greater probability of ſucceſs than in London; and theſe three noblemen were required, by letters under the privy ſeal, to attend the king at that place about ſome affairs of importance. The duke of York made no heſitation at complying with this order, and accordingly ſet out with his aſſociates for the place appointed; but being apprized on the road of the queen's intentions, they immediately parted. The duke of York retired to his caſtle of Wigmore in Herefordſhire; the earl of Saliſbury to his ſeat in Yorkſhire; and the earl of Warwick embarked for Calais, having been ſome time appointed to the government of that place.

The treacherous deſigns of the queen produced general commotions throughout the kingdom. The animoſity that took place between the partiſans of the houſes of York and Lancaſter aroſe to the utmoſt height, and a bloody civil war ſeemed likely to be the inevitable conſequence. In this critical juncture the archbiſhop of Canterbury, with ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, inforced their good offices to bring about a reconciliation, and it was at length propoſed, that the principal leaders of both parties ſhould meet in London, on a day appointed for that purpoſe, to adjuſt their differences.

A. D. 1458. This meeting was held about the middle of January, and after ſome controverſy between the contending parties, an apparent reconciliation was effected. The terms of agreement were notified to the public by a ſolemn proceſſion to St. Paul's cathedral, in which the duke of York conducted queen Margaret, and a chief of one party walked hand in hand with a chief of the oppoſite, the whole exhibiting every appearance of the moſt cordial friendſhip.

But this was nothing more than ſhow: the ſame enmity ſtill prevailed in the minds of both parties, and the confederate lords, inſtead of taking their ſeats at the council-board, retired from court, and took up their reſidence in thoſe parts, where they thought their reſpective intereſts were the moſt conſiderable.

From the conduct of both parties, it was evident that they only waited for an opportunity of re-kindling the flames of diſſention. Nor was it long before an incident happened which fully proved the truth of this conjecture. The earl of Warwick coming to London aſſiſted occaſionally, during his ſtay, at the council, and one of the king's ſervants happening to inſult a domeſtic belonging to the earl's train, a fray enſued, in which ſome of Warwick's followers were killed on the ſpot. Suſpecting this was a ſcheme formed by the court againſt his perſon, and being at the ſame time informed that Henry had granted a warrant to commit him to the Tower, the earl left London, and embarked with all expedition for his government of Calais.

A. D. 1459. The Yorkiſts were highly enraged at ſo direct a violation of the late agreement, and the Lancaſtrians were equally vexed at the miſcarriage of their ſcheme; the conſequence of which was, that both parties made preparations for deciding the conteſt by the ſword. Armies were raiſed in different parts of the kingdom; and it was expected, that when the reſpective forces of each party were joined, the diſpute would be determined by a general battle.

The earl of Saliſbury, having raiſed a number of troops, marched to join the duke of York; but was met on Bloreheath, on the borders of Staffordſhire, by lord Audley, at the head of a much ſuperior body of forces. The river Stow, a ſmall ſtream, but of conſiderable depth, ran between the two armies, and its banks were lined with lord Audley's troops. Saliſbury well knew his forces were not able to engage thoſe of the enemy in the open field, and therefore had recourſe to ſtratagem. He ordered a detachment of his beſt archers to advance briſkly to the banks of the river, and pour a ſhower of arrows upon the royaliſts; which being effected, he ſounded a retreat, and his forces retired with the appearance of precipitate confuſion. This produced the deſired effect. The royaliſts were deceived; and thinking the Yorkiſts flying before them, began to paſs the ſtream with great precipitation; but when part of the royal army had paſſed the brook, Saliſbury ſuddenly turned about; and partly by ſurpriſe, and partly by the diviſion of the enemy's forces, totally routed them, and lord Audley, with ſeveral of his principal officers, fell among the ſlain. The reſt of the army being ſeized with a panic, fled in the utmoſt diſorder, ſo that the earl of Saliſbury obtained a compleat victory.

Having now nothing to interrupt him the earl marched with his forces to Ludlow, where he found the duke of York at the head of a numerous army. In a few days after they received a very powerful reinforcement by the arrival of a choice body of veterans, whom the earl of Warwick had brought over from the continent, under the command of Sir Andrew Trollop and John Blunt, two officers of great reputation and experience.

The duke of York being thus formidably ſituated, no longer concealed his deſign, but publickly avowed his pretenſions to the throne. This alarmed the king's adherents, who exerted themſelves with ſuch vigour in his intereſt, that in a very ſhort time the royal army far exceeded in number that of the Yorkiſts; and a reſolution was formed immediately to march to Ludlow, where the malecontents were encamped.

The royal army accordingly marched with all expedition, and on their arrival within ſight of the Yorkiſts drew themſelves up in order of battle. But when they came near to each other, and a general action was momentarily expected, Sir Andrew Trollop deſerted with the whole detachment under his command; and his example was followed by ſuch a number, that the Yorkiſts, fearful of the conſequences, diſperſed, thinking it the only expedient whereby they could procure their ſafety. The duke of York repaired to Ireland; and the earls of Marche, Saliſbury, and Warwick fled to the continent.

A. D. 1460. But this diſappointment was far from diſpiriting the leaders of the Yorkiſts, who determined to take the firſt opportunity they could of endeavouring to retrieve their fortunes. The earl of Warwick was greatly beloved both by the ſoldiers and ſeamen, and ſuch numbers of the former daily flocked to his ſtandard, that he ſoon found himſelf at the head of a very conſiderable army. Thus powerfully ſupported, he determined to make one effort more in favour of the houſe of York; and accordingly, having fitted out a fleet, and made ſome captures at ſea, he landed in Kent at the head of his forces, accompanied by his father the earl of Saliſbury, together with the earl of Marche, eldeſt ſon to the duke of York.

The earl of Warwick, on his arrival at Sandwich, was joined by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the lord Cobham, and others of the nobility, and directing his rout towards London entered the city amidſt the univerſal acclamations of the people. Having increaſed his army with a ſtrong body of Londoners, he determined to march againſt the royaliſts, who were haſtening with all expedition, from Coventry to attack him. The two parties met in the neighbourhood of Northampton, and a furious battle enſued. For ſome time the palm of victory remained doubtful; but at length the lord Grey of Ruthin (who commanded the van-guard of the royal forces) deſerting to the enemy in the heat of the battle, the reſt of the army were ſo diſpirited that they immediately fled, and Warwick obtained a compleat victory. The duke of Buckingham, the earl of Shrewſbury, the lords Egremont and Beaumont, Sir William Lucy, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, fell among the ſlain. The puſillanimous Henry (who had remained in his tent during the whole time of the action) was taken priſoner, but treated by the victors with every mark of tenderneſs and reſpect due to royalty.

In conſequence of this defeat, the king no ſooner arrived in London, than the parliament were immediately aſſembled, in order to take into conſideration the neceſſary meaſures to be purſued at ſo alarming a criſis. On the third day after the opening of the ſeſſion, the duke of York arrived from Ireland. He immediately repaired to the Houſe of Lords, and advanced towards the throne; but was ſtopped by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who aſked him if he had yet paid his reſpects to the king. The duke replied, "he knew of no perſon to whom he owed that title." He then complained of the various calamities his family had ſuffered ſince the depoſition of Richard II. enumerated the cruelties by which the houſe of Lancaſter had had paved their way to the ſeat of power; and exhorted them to do juſtice to the lineal ſucceſſor to the throne.

Struck with theſe obſervations, and the manner in which they were made, the aſſembly examined, with the utmoſt calmneſs and tranquillity, the duke's pretenſions. At laſt they pronounced a deciſion, calculated, as far as poſſible, to pleaſe both parties. They declared, that the duke's title was undeniable; but as Henry had now enjoyed the crown ſo many years without any oppoſition being made to his title, they determined he ſhould continue to poſſeſs both the title and dignity during his life; but that the adminiſtration of the government ſhould, in the mean time, remain with Richard duke of York, who ſhould be acknowledged the true and lawful heir of the monarchy, and ſucceed to the crown immediately on the deceaſe of Henry: that every one ſhould ſwear to maintain his ſucceſſion: that it ſhould be high treaſon to attempt his life; and that all former acts for ſettling the ſucceſſion of the crown, during the two laſt reigns, ſhould be null and void. Theſe terms were agreed to by the whole aſſembly, and the accommodation celebrated by a ſolemn proceſſion to St. Paul's cathedral, in which the king and both houſes of parliament aſſiſted.

Henry was not in the leaſt concerned at the great change made in his affairs by the parliament. It was immaterial to him who directed the helm, ſo that he could but be indulged in that ſtate of ſupineneſs to which he was naturally addicted. But this was not the caſe with the ambitious and aſpiring Margaret. After the battle of Northampton ſhe had taken refuge in Scotland, accompanied by the dukes of Somerſet and Exeter; and ſhe was now exerting all her talents to bring the inhabitants of the northern countries over to her intereſt, being ſtill determined, if poſſible, to overthrow all the ſchemes and ſucceſſes of Richard.

The duke of York was no ſtranger to the proceedings of Margaret, and, fearful of the conſequences, determined, with all expedition to take ſuch meaſures as might render her deſigns abortive. To effect this, he ſent a ſummons to the queen, requeſting her to repair immediately to London, the deſign of which was to procure a pretence for baniſhing her the kingdom. But, inſtead of any attention being paid to this ſummons, intelligence was ſoon received that Margaret was advancing towards the capital at the head of twenty thouſand men.

In conſequence of this intelligence, Richard, whoſe forces conſiſted only of about five thouſand, immediately marched at their head to ſtop the progreſs of the queen; while his ſon, the earl of Marche, repaired to the borders of Wales, the only parts of the kingdom where he could hope for aſſiſtance. This part of Richard's plan was known to the queen, who in conſequence thereof, determined to attack him before he could obtain any reinforcements from his ſon. She therefore haſtened her march; and the duke of York, conſcious of being unable to meet in the open field an army ſo ſuperior in numbers, threw himſelf into Sandal Caſtle, in the neighbourhood of Wakefield in Yorkſhire.

As ſoon as Margaret was informed of his ſituation, ſhe immediately advanced with her forces to the gates of the fortreſs, and uſed every method in her power to provoke the duke to battle; but all her endeavours proving ineffectual, ſhe had recourſe to ſtratagem. Towards the evening ſhe marched at the head of her forces in the way to London, leaving only a ſmall detachment in the neighbourhood of the caſtle; but during the night ſhe ſeparated the main body of her forces into two diviſions, and placed them in ambuſh on the ſides of Wakefield-green.

This ſcheme produced the intended effect; for early in the morning after the queen's departure, the duke of York drew out his forces in order to give battle to the detachment ſhe had left behind. But juſt as he was going to commence the action, the two bodies ſuddenly ruſhed out from their ambuſcades, and attacked him with the utmoſt violence both in flank and rear. The duke now perceived his error, but it was too late to retrieve it, and he reſolved to ſell his life as dear as poſſible. He therefore fell on the enemy with a fury rather bordering on deſpair than ariſing from courage. The conteſt did not laſt more than half an hour; but that ſhort interval of time was crowded with deſtruction. Near three thouſand of the duke's forces were cut to pieces, and himſelf fell among the ſlain. His ſon, Edmund Plantagenet, earl of Rutland was, after the battle, inhumanly maſſacred in cool blood, at the inſtigation of the implacable lord Clifford. The earl of Saliſbury was taken priſoner, and beheaded at Pomfret, as were alſo ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction. The body of the duke of York being found among the ſlain, his head was cut off by lord Clifford, and ſent to Margaret, who ordered it to be fixed on the walls of York, encircled with a paper crown, in deriſion of the pretenſions he had made to the throne. Thus fell, in the fiftieth year of his age, Edward Plantagenet, duke of York, a prince endowed with many great and amiable qualities, and who loſt his life by adhering to principles, which rather recommend him to pity, than expoſe him to contempt.

A. D. 1461. After the battle of Wakefield, queen Margaret, elated at her great ſucceſs over the Yorkiſts, determined to purſue her conqueſt with the utmoſt vigour, and, if poſſible, totally reduce them. But the meaſures ſhe took to effect this were ill concerted; for inſtead of keeping her whole force together, ſhe ſeparated her army into two diviſions. One of theſe ſhe ſent under the command of Jaſper Tudor, earl of Pembroke, againſt young Edward (now duke of York) who had been ſome time raiſing forces on the borders in order to aſſiſt his father; while herſelf marched with the other diviſion towards the capital, where the earl of Warwick had been left to command the Yorkiſts.

In the mean time young Edward had been ſo ſucceſsful in his levies, that he found himſelf at the head of an army of twenty thouſand men, at the head of whom he ſet out on his march towards London, in order to join the earl of Warwick, reſolving, if poſſible, ſeverely to retaliate on Margaret the death of his father, and the cruelties ſhe had exerciſed on his principal adherents.

When Edward had advanced with his army as far as a place called Mortimer's Croſs in Herefordſhire, he there met with the royal forces which had been ſent by the queen to oppoſe him under the command of the earl of Pembroke, and a deſperate battle enſued; but as Edward's forces were greatly ſuperior in point of numbers, he obtained an eaſy victory over the enemy, who were ſoon routed, with the loſs of four thouſand men. The earl of Pembroke eſcaped by flight; but his father, Sir Edward Tudor, was taken priſoner, and and, with ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, put to death.

The news of this defeat was far from diſpiriting the queen, who ſtill continued her march towards London. She imagined that as ſoon as her army ſhould appear, the citizens would expel Warwick, and receive her with demonſtrations of joy. But in this ſhe was greatly miſtaken; for her troops having plundered the country through which they paſſed, and committed moſt ſhocking diſorders, the citizens were ſo incenſed, that they flocked to Warwick's ſtandard, and reſolved to aſſiſt him in chaſtiſing ſuch lawleſs ravagers.

Thus reinforced the earl of Warwick no ſooner heard of the queen's approach towards London, than he immediately marched with his forces to meet her, having in his poſſeſſion the perſon of Henry. The two armies met and engaged on Bernard's Heath, near St. Alban's, and notwithſtanding the queen's forces were greatly ſuperior in numbers to thoſe of Warwick, yet the courage and conduct of the earl rendered the fortune of the day for a long time doubtful: but at length the lord Lovelace, who commanded one of his wings, having treacherouſly withdrawn from the combat, the Yorkiſts were defeated with the loſs of two thouſand men, and the perſon of the king himſelf fell into the hands of his own party. Lord Bonneville and Sir Thomas Kyriel, to whoſe care the king had been entruſted, continued with him after the defeat of the army, relying on the royal promiſe of protection. But the queen, regardleſs of her huſbands honour, ordered them both to be beheaded the next day at St. Alban's.

This, with ſeveral other acts of barbarity, which the queen had committed, ſo incenſed the citizens of London, that they abſolutely refuſed to ſupply her troops with proviſions. The mayor, indeed, in compliance with her perſonal requeſt, ordered ſeveral waggons, laden with proviſions, to be conveyed to her camp; but they were ſtopped at Newgate by the populace, who declared, that the city ſhould not furniſh proviſions for an army, who came not to defend, but invade their properties.

In the mean time the duke of York continued his march towards the capital, and on his arrival at Chipping-norton was joined by the earl of Warwick at the head of the remainder of his forces. In conſequence of this, and the hatred which Margaret knew the citizens bore her, ſhe thought it imprudent to remain any longer in the neighbourhood of London. Accordingly, having broke up her camp, ſhe retired into the north, hoping to encreaſe her army to ſo formidable a number as would enſure ſucceſs againſt all oppoſition.

The duke of York, accompanied by the earl of Warwick, arrived in London, in the month of February, and was received by the people with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy. Prodigious numbers flocked to the duke's ſtandard from all parts, but more eſpecially from Kent and Eſſex. The ſpirits of the aged ſeemed to revive at the ſucceſs of the heir to the third Edward's crown; and the brave were proud to ſerve under a prince, who had conſpicuouſly diſtinguiſhed himſelf for his military proweſs.

Poſſeſſed of the public favour, and elated with that ſpirit natural to youth, Edward reſolved to aſſume the title and dignity of king; to inſiſt openly on his claim; and, from that moment to treat the oppoſite party as traitors and rebels to his authority. But he well knew that before this could be done with any propriety, it was neceſſary to procure a national acknowledgment of his title to the crown, or, at leaſt, ſomething that had the appearance of it. The calling a parliament would have occaſioned too much delay; and therefore he ventured to proceed in a leſs regular manner, and to put it out of the power of his enemies to throw any obſtacles in his way to the throne.

The army was ordered to aſſemble in the fields near Clerkenwell, in conſequence of which a prodigious number of people flocked to the place in order to gratify their curioſity. The earl of Warwick, placing himſelf in the center of the multitude in an elevated ſituation made a long harangue, in which he diſplayed Edward's right to the throne, and inveighed againſt the uſurpation and tyranny of the family of Lancaſter. After this the people were aſked, whether they were ſtill deſirous that Henry of Lancaſter ſhould continue to hold the ſceptre of England? The whole multitude exclaimed againſt the propoſal. It was then demanded, whether they would accept of Edward, duke of York, for their king? when the anſwer returned was a loud and general acclamation of applauſe.

The unanimous conſent of the people being thus obtained a great council was called at Barnard's Caſtle, where the popular election was confirmed; and the next day (March 5, 1461) the duke was proclaimed king, in the ſtreets of London and Weſtminſter, by the title of Edward IV.

Thus ended the reign of Henry VI. a prince who poſſeſſed many virtues as a man, but without one ſingle qualification to diſtinguiſh him as a monarch. Though he had held the crown even from his cradle, yet he never interfered with the adminiſtration of public affairs. Having weak and narrow intellects, he had not ſagacity to diſcern the courſe he ought to have purſued; and being of an irreſolute temper was eaſily drawn into the meaſures of an ambitious and cruel queen, and a ſelfiſh and wicked miniſtry. But notwithſtanding theſe imperfections, he poſſeſſed many amiable qualities. He was a total ſtranger to cruelty and revenge; on the contrary, he could not, without reluctance, conſent to the puniſhment of thoſe malefactors who were ſacrificed to the public ſafety; and frequently ſuſtained perſonal indignities of the groſſeſt nature, without diſcovering the leaſt mark of reſentment. He was chaſte, pious, compaſſionate and charitable; and ſo inoffenſive, that the biſhop, who was his confeſſor for ten years, declared, that in all that time he had never committed any ſin that required penance or rebuke. In a word, he would have adorned a cloiſter, though he diſgraced a crown; and was rather reſpectable for not being addicted to vices, than for the virtues he poſſeſſed.

Remarkable Occurences during the reign of Henry VI.

A. D.

1428 On the 30th of September a dreadful earthquake happened in London between two and three o'clock in the morning, which was attended with dreadful claps of thunder, and the moſt awful flaſhes of lightning.

1436 This year a violent froſt began on the 24th of November, which continued till the 10th of February following. This froſt was ſo ſevere that the Thames was frozen over as far down as Graveſend; by which means all goods brought thither in ſhips were conveyed to London by carriages.

1439 On the 25th of November there happened a moſt violent hurricane of wind, which blew off the leads of the Grey Friars church, and threw down almoſt all the houſes in the ſtreet called the Old Exchange.

1440 This year there was ſo great a dearth, that in ſome parts of the kingdom the diſtreſſes of the people were ſo great, that they made bread of fern-roots and ivy-berries.

1446 This year Sir Simon Eyre, lord-mayor of London, built Leadenhall, and allotted it as a common granary for the city.

1453 Sir John Norman, who was this year choſen lord-mayor of London, went by water to Weſtminſter to take his oath before the barons of the Exchequer. He was the firſt mayor that ever went in that manner, all his predeceſſors having rode on horſeback.

In the courſe of this reign queen Margaret began Queen's College, Cambridge, which was afterwards finiſhed by Edward IV.

There were ſeveral eminent men who particularly diſtinguiſhed themſelves for their literary abilities during the reign of Henry VI. the moſt remarkable of which were the two following:

Richard Snettiſham, a theologiſt, who acquired ſuch reputation at Oxford, that, though not more than twenty-five years of age, he was elected chancellor of that univerſity. He was indefatigable in his endeavours to expound the Holy Scriptures in the public ſchools, and reckoned one of the beſt diſputants of the age in which he lived.

William Lyndwood was one of the greateſt canoniſts this nation ever produced, and at the ſame time a moſt conſummate ſtateſman. He was keeper of the privy ſeal to Henry V. and employed by him in many important negotiations, particularly to the courts of Portugal and Spain. He was ſent by Henry VI. to the council of Baſil, and in the year 1434 was made biſhop of St. David's. He died in 1446 univerſally lamented both as a man, a ſtateſman, and a divine. His great work, and, indeed, the only one of the kind compoſed by an Engliſhman, is, his Provinciale ſeu Conſtitutiones Angliæ; in which the provincial decrees of forty archbiſhops are digeſted into order, with large and learned commentaries.

Edward is crowned at Weſtminſter, and the parliament recognize his title to the throne. Queen Margeret obtains aſſiſtance from France. Battle of Hexham. The late king Henry VI. taken priſoner, and committed to the Tower. Edward falls in love with lady Elizabeth Gray whom he privately marries, and ſhe is ſoon after crowned at Weſtminſter. An inſurrection in the north. The duke of Clarence and earl of Warwick engage in open rebellion. They go over to the continent, and engage in a treaty with Queen Margaret. The earl of Warwick returns, and marches at the head of a conſiderable army againſt Edward, whom he meets in the neighbourhood of Nottingham. The earl's brother ſuddenly attacks the royal forces in the night, and the king retires to Lynn in Norfolk, from whence he makes his eſcape to Holland. Henry VI. is releaſed from confinement, and replaced on the throne. The duke of Clarence and earl of Warwick direct the affairs of government. Edward receives aſſiſtance from the duke of Burgundy, and returns to England with a body of two thouſand men. Marches to London, which he enters in triumph, and Henry is again dethroned, and committed priſoner to the Tower. Battle of Barnet, with the conſequences thereof. Queen Margaret lands at Weymouth with a conſiderable body of French troops. Battle of Tewkeſbury. Margaret is defeated, taken priſoner, and ſent to the Tower; and her ſon prince Edward aſſaſſinated. Death of Henry VI. Edward is replaced on the throne, and his title again recognized by the parliament. He forms a treaty of alliance with the duke of Burgundy againſt the French monarch, and goes over to the continent at the head of a powerful army. Concludes a treaty of peace with Lewis, and returns to England. The duke of Clarence arreſted and committed to the Tower. Is tried by the parliament, and, being condemned to death, is, by his own choice, drowned in a butt of malmſey. Death and character of Edward IV.

A. D. 1461. AT the time of Edward's acceſſion to the throne, the whole kingdom was in one general ſtate of commotion. The people were divided into two implacable factions, and diſtinguiſhed by the names of the Red and White Roſes, the former being the badge worn by the partizans of the Houſe of Lancaſter, and the latter by thoſe of that of York. And hence the civil wars that followed were known throughout Europe by the name of "The quarrel between the two Roſes."

Edward was naturally prudent, brave and enterpriſing, but theſe qualities were greatly ſullied by the ſeverity of his diſpoſition, which aroſe to ſuch a height as to render him almoſt a ſtranger to the tender feelings of compaſſion. He had obtained the crown by violence, and he was too much diſpoſed to preſerve his authority by acts of cruelty; and of which he gave an inſtance only eight days after his elevation to the throne. One Walker, a grocer, in the city, whoſe ſhop was known by the ſign of the Crown, having told his ſon, in a jocular manner, that he would make him "heir to the crown," the expreſſion was conſidered as a ſarcaſm on Edward's title, and the particulars being related to the king, he ordered him to be immediately put to death; and the innocent but unfortunate man was accordingly beheaded in Smithfield.

While Edward was purſuing every method he could project for ſecuring himſelf on the throne, queen Margaret was aſſiduouſly employed in concerting meaſures for hurling him from it. She had retired to the north, where ſhe exerted all her abilities to recruit her army; and her endeavours were attended with ſuch ſucceſs that ſhe ſoon found herſelf at the head of 60,000 diſciplined troops. Thus ſtrengthened ſhe marched into Yorkſhire, with a determined reſolution of engaging the uſurper of her huſband's throne.

The proceedings of Margaret were no ſooner known than Edward, accompanied by the earl of War-

Warwick, ſet out for London with an army of 40,000 men in order to check her progreſs. On their arrival at Pontefract they diſpatched a body of troops under the command of lord Fitzwalter to ſecure the paſs at Ferry-bridge, on the river Aire, and that nobleman executed his orders with equal celerity and ſucceſs. But he was not able to defend the place againſt lord Clifford (one of Margaret's generals) who attacked him with ſuperior numbers, cut the greater part of his men to pieces, and Fitzwalter himſelf fell among the ſlain.

But this defeat was far from diſpiriting Edward: he immediately diſpatched lord Fauconbridge, at the head of a conſiderable detachment, to recover the paſs in poſſeſſion of lord Clifford. He accordingly paſſed the Aire about three miles above Ferry-bridge, and marched with ſuch ſecrecy, and expedition that Clifford was ſurprized, his detachment routed, and himſelf ſlain in the action.

In conſequence of this ſucceſs Edward, early the next morning, led his troops againſt the enemy; and the two armies met at a place called Towton, where a bloody battle enſued. The queen's forces were commanded by the duke of Somerſet and the earl of Northumberland; and Edward's by the earl of Warwick, lord Fauconbridge and himſelf in perſon. While the Yorkiſts were advancing to the charge there happened a heavy fall of ſnow which being driven by a briſk wind in the faces of the Lancaſtrians prevented them from diſcerning the real diſtance between themſelves and the enemy. Lord Fauconbridge, who led the van of Edward's army, taking advantage of this incident, ordered his archers to advance as near as poſſible to the enemy, and after diſcharging a ſingle flight of arrows, to retire, with the utmoſt expedition, to their former poſt. This ſcheme produced the deſired effect. The Lancaſtrians, finding by the force of the arrows that the enemy was very near, empted their quivers by repeated diſcharges, without producing any material effect, and then advanced ſword in hand to decide the conteſt. On their approach the Yorkiſts, who had kept their arrows, poured in ſo dreadful a diſcharge that the advanced line fell back on the main body; in conſequence of which the earl of Northumberland preſſed forward with the utmoſt reſolution, and the battle ſoon became very obſtinate, each party ſeeming determined either to conquer or periſh.

The dreadful conteſt continued near ten hours with the moſt unremitting fury, and without any perceivable advantage on either ſide; when the Lancaſtrians began to give ground, and retreat, in tolerable order, towards Tadcaſter. The Yorkiſts, animated with the appearance of victory, redoubled their efforts, and fell with ſuch fury on the enemy that they were unable to ſupport the charge. Their ranks, which they had maintained with ſurpriſing firmneſs, were ſoon broken, and a precipitate flight enſued. Edward had iſſued orders to give no quarter, ſo that the carnage was ſhocking to humanity. Above 36,000 perſons periſhed that day by the ſwords of their countrymen; among whom were the earls of Weſtmoreland and Northumberland, the lords Dacres and Wells, and Sir Andrew Trollop. The earl of Devonſhire was taken priſoner; and Henry, his queen Margaret, and the young prince eſcaped to Scotland.

After the battle Edward marched to York, where the earl of Devonſhire, who had lately eſpouſed the cauſe of Henry, was beheaded; and the king ordered his father's head to be taken down from the walls, where it had been placed, and the earl of Devonſhire's put in its ſtead.

Having taken every neceſſary meaſure for preventing farther inſurrections in the north, Edward returned to London, and was crowned with great magnificence at Weſtminſter on the 28th of June following. The parliament met on the 4th of November, when Edward's title to the crown was unanimouſly acknowledged, and they even declared that he was properly poſſeſſed of the throne from the very moment he aſſumed the government tendered to him by the acclamations of the people. They reverſed ſeveral acts made in the late reign, and paſſed an act of forfeiture and attainder againſt Henry, queen Margaret, prince Edward, and all their principal adherents.

A. D. 1462. Edward made no heſitation in committing acts of the moſt horrid cruelty, ſo that they did but appear likely to ſecure his ſafety on the throne. As a proof of this John de Vere, earl of Oxford, a nobleman venerable for his years, and valuable for his virtues, was arreſted on the bare pretence of having engaged in a correſpondence with the queen, and, without form of trial, beheaded on Tower-hill, together with his eldeſt ſon Aubrey de Vere, and three baronets; all of whoſe eſtates Edward diſtributed among his own partiſans.

While Edward was purſuing theſe unpopular meaſures in England, queen Margaret repaired to France, in order to obtain aſſiſtance from Lewis XI. who had lately ſucceeded his father on the throne of that kingdom. She proved ſucceſsful in her embaſſy, for, on promiſing to put Lewis in poſſeſſion of Calais on the reſtoration of Henry to the Engliſh throne, that monarch furniſhed her with 2000 men at arms, and the duke of Britany ſupplied her with 12000 crowns to defray the expences of the war.

Thus ſtrengthened, queen Margaret embarked with her forces for England, landed at Bamburgh in Yorkſhire, and took poſſeſſion of the caſtle; but on receiving advice that Edward was advancing againſt her at the head of a numerous army, ſhe retired with her forces to Scotland; and Edward, after reducing the caſtle of Bamburgh, and not finding any enemy to oppoſe him, returned to London.

A. D. 1463. Queen Margaret was ſo diligent and ſucceſsful while in Scotland, that ſhe ſoon found herſelf at the head of a very numerous army. With theſe ſhe entered Northumberland in the beginning of April, ſurpriſed the caſtle of Bamburgh, and (being joined by the duke of Somerſet and Sir Ralph Piercy with their followers) took ſeveral places in that part of the country.

The firſt oppoſition the queen met with was from lord Montague, who routed a detachment of her forces on Hedgley Moor, where Sir Ralph Piercy, their leader, was ſlain. Elated with this ſucceſs Montague determined to give battle to Margaret's army, without waiting for the reinforcements he expected from Edward, who was marching with all expedition, into the north, at the head of a powerful army. Montague accordingly advanced againſt the queen's forces, who were encamped on a plain near Hexham. He made a furious attack during the night, and was oppoſed with equal reſolution by the queen's troops; but at length, he forced the trenches of the Lancaſtrians, trians, put them to flight with great ſlaughter, and obtained a compleat victory. The duke of Somerſet, the lords Hungerford, Roſs and Moleyns, Sir Thomas Huſſey, Sir Thomas Wentworth, and Sir John Finderne, were taken priſoners. The duke of Somerſet was immediately conducted to Hexham, and beheaded; and the reſt ſuffered the like fate a few days after at Newcaſtle.

The defeat at Hexham gave a terrible blow to the affairs of the Lancaſter family, whoſe fate after that misfortune, was attended with very ſingular circumſtances. Margaret with her young ſon, fled into an adjacent foreſt, where ſhe fell into the hands of robbers, who ſtripped her of her rings and jewels. Fortunately for her, the richneſs of the booty occaſioned a quarrel among them; and while they were thus engaged with each other, Margaret and her ſon made their eſcape, into the thickeſt part of the foreſt, where they wandered for ſome time, ſpent with hunger and fatigue, and oppreſſed with terror and affliction. In this wretched condition the queen perceived another robber approaching with a naked ſword in his hand. There was now no poſſibility of effecting an eſcape, and ſhe trembled for the life of her ſon. But happily recollecting, that the robber might poſſibly be one of thoſe perſons who had been unfortunately proſcribed for adhering to the intereſt of her huſband, ſhe approached the robber with an air of majeſtic confidence, and preſenting to him the young prince, called out, "Here, my friend, I commit to your care the ſafety of my ſon, the ſon of good king Henry." Struck with awe at the name of his prince, and penetrated with compaſſion at beholding perſons of the higheſt rank reduced to ſuch melancholy diſtreſs, the robber, who was not wholly loſt to humanity and virtue, vowed to devote himſelf to her ſafety and protection. He accordingly conducted the queen and her ſon out of the foreſt to a village near the ſea-ſide, from whence they embarked in a veſſel for Flanders, where they were hoſpitably received by the duke of Burgundy, from whoſe court they repaired to that of Margaret's father, Regnier, count of Anjou.

But Henry was far from effecting ſo ſucceſsful an eſcape as Margaret. Some of his friends, indeed, found means to conduct him ſafe into Lancaſhire, where he continued for ſome time in obſcurity; but being at length diſcovered he was delivered up to Edward, who ungenerouſly committed him cloſe priſoner to the tower.

A. D. 1464. From the captivity of Henry, the exile of Margaret, and the execution of the moſt conſiderable of the Lancaſtrian party, Edward now ſeemed to be firmly eſtabliſhed on the throne; to ſecure which he endeavoured to conciliate the affections of his ſubjects, whoſe attachment he had reaſon to doubt from his late ſeverities. He publiſhed a general amneſty in favour of all the Lancaſtrians, who, within a preſcribed term, ſhould take the oath of alliance, and ſubmit to his government. Theſe meaſures contributed greatly to increaſe his popularity, and became the means of ſtrengthening and ſecuring his authority.

A. D. 1466. As Edward now ſeemed to poſſeſs the general affections of the people, his counſellors adviſed him to turn his thoughts on marriage, that he might have the ſatisfaction of ſeeing the ſucceſſion to the throne ſettled on his own iſſue. Edward readily acquieſced with their opinion, and three matches were propoſed for his choice. The firſt was Margaret, ſiſter to the king of Scotland; the ſecond, Iſabella, ſiſter to Henry IV. of Caſtile; and the third, Bona, daughter of the duke of Savoy, and ſiſter to the queen of France. The laſt was choſen, and the earl of Warwick appointed ambaſſador extraordinary to demand that princeſs in marriage. He accordingly repaired to Paris in the ſpring, and ſettled the articles of a marriage contract between king Edward and the princeſs Bona: and Lewis appointed the count of Damarin, his plenipotentiary at the court of London, to finiſh the negotiation.

But juſt as matters were brought to a criſis, the whole was rendered abortive by the indiſcreet conduct of Edward. Being at a hunting-match in Northamptonſhire, the king took the opportunity of paying a viſit to the ducheſs of Bedford, who then reſided at Grafton-manor, near Stony-Stratford. The ducheſs ſoon after her huſband's death, married Sir Richard Woodville, by whom ſhe had a daughter named Elizabeth, at once remarkable for beauty of perſon and mental accompliſhments. This lady married Sir John Gray, of Groby, by whom ſhe had ſeveral children; but her huſband having joined the Lancaſtrian party, and falling in the diſpute between the two Houſes, his eſtate was forfeited to the crown, and Elizabeth, retired to her father's ſeat, where ſhe lived in quiet retirement.

Young Edward was greatly celebrated for his gallantry and condeſcenſion to the ladies. His preſence, therefore, was thought a favourable opportunity for the beautiful widow to obtain ſome redreſs for the loſs ſhe had ſuſtained by the forfeiture of her huſband's eſtates. She accordingly threw herſelf at the king's feet, and, with a flood of tears, implored his pity on her and her diſtreſſed family. The ſight of ſo much beauty in affliction made a ſenſible impreſſion on the mind of the amorous king: love ſtole inſenſibly into his heart, and her grief, ſo becoming a woman of real virtue, ſoon rendered his eſteem and regard equal to his affection. He raiſed her from the ground, and gave her the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of his favour and protection.

Confiding in his elevated ſtation and perſonal endowments, Edward acquainted her with the nature of his paſſion, and propoſed to her terms of concubinage. But Elizabeth, averſe to diſhonourable love, peremptorily refuſed to gratify his paſſion, and nobly anſwered, "That as ſhe was too good to be the concubine, and too mean to be the wife of a king, ſhe would ſtill continue in her humble ſtation." This behaviour increaſed the paſſions of Edward, and he offered to ſhare his throne with the object of his affections. Accordingly the nuptials were privately ſolemnized at Grafton-manor, and every precaution taken to prevent its being publickly known.

But this was an event which could not be long concealed. It was ſoon made known to the earl of Warwick, who had been ſo aſſiduous in managing his negotiation relative to the king's marriage with Bona, daughter of the duke of Savoy, that nothing remained but the ratification of the treaty, and the bringing over the princeſs to England. He therefore conſidered the king's injudicious conduct as the higheſt inſult that could be offered to his honour, and, inſtantly breaking off the negotiation, returned with diſguſt to England.

A. D. 1466. The marriage of the king being now publickly declared, the queen received the the compliments of all the nobility; and on the 26th of May was crowned at Weſtminſter by the archbiſhop of Canterbury.

The impolitic Edward, inſtead of purſuing meaſures for regaining the friendſhip of Warwick, who had been the principal inſtrument in placing him on the throne, took methods which tended directly to widen the breach between them. He laviſhed a profuſion of honours and eſtates on the family of his queen. Her father was created earl of Rivers, and made high conſtable of England. Her brother, John Woodville, was married to the daughter and heireſs of lord Scales, to whoſe honours and eſtates he ſucceeded; and all her friends and relations were enobled by the royal favour.

This ill-judged and diſtinguiſhed partiality excited an uncommon degree of jealouſy among the nobility, and gave the higheſt diſguſt to the earl of Warwick, who ſhewed his reſentment by leaving the court, and retiring to his caſtle. Edward knew the cauſe of this behaviour, and, fearful of the conſequences, took the moſt prudent methods for rendering any attempt that might be made by that ambitious nobleman abortive. Among other meaſures he concluded a treaty of alliance with the duke of Britany, and another with the duke of Burgundy. The latter was a deſcendant of the Houſe of Lancaſter; but he made no ſcruple of ſacrificing to his political ambition the intereſt of that unfortunate and oppreſſed family.

A. D. 1467. The repeated favours continued to be heaped on the queen's family, and ſome few particular perſons whom the king conſidered as his favourites, not only encreaſed the reſentment of Warwick, but likewiſe excited the indignation of the duke of Clarence, elder brother to the king. That prince contracted an intimate connexion with Warwick by marrying his eldeſt daughter Iſabella; which ceremony was no ſooner performed than the earl, accompanied by his daughter and ſon-in-law, retired to his government of Calais.

A. D. 1468. The ſpirit of faction now threatened the kingdom with all the horrors of civil diſcord. The common people, as well as the nobles, were diſguſted with Edward for his injudicious and partial conduct, and commotions took place in various parts of the kingdom. The firſt inſurrection, which was excited in the north, was headed by one Robert Hillyard, generally called Robin of Ryddeſdale; but the inſurgents were ſoon routed, and their leader executed. The malcontents. however, were far from being diſcouraged by the ill ſucceſs of their firſt attempt. They again aſſembled in more formidable numbers; and were joined by lord Fitz-Hugh, and Henry Neville, ſon to the lord Latimer. But as both theſe noblemen were totally ignorant of military affairs, the command was given to Sir John Conyers, an officer of great reputation and experience. Their firſt intention was to make themſelves maſters of the city of York; but being diſappointed in procuring a ſufficient train of artillery, they reſolved to direct their march towards the capital; and openly declared, "That they were marching to deliver their lawful ſovereign, king Henry, from his confinement, and re-place him on the throne of his anceſtors."

Alarmed at theſe proceedings the king diſpatched a meſſenger to the earl of Pembroke, commanding him to aſſemble the Welſh, and immediately croſs the country in order to intercept the march of the rebels from the north. Theſe orders he ſtrictly obeyed, and having raiſed an army of ten thouſand men, marched with all expedition againſt the inſurgents, who had advanced as far as the neighbourhood of Northampton; in the way to which Pembroke was joined by the earl of Devonſhire, at the head of a conſiderable body of archers.

As ſoon as the two armies came within ſight of each other, Pembroke detached all his cavalry, under the command of his brother Sir Richard Herbert, with orders to obſerve the poſition of the enemy, and, if he thought it practicable, to attack their rear. Sir Richard executed his orders; but perceived that ſuch wiſe precautions had been taken by the leader of the inſurgents, that an attack muſt be attended with the utmoſt diſadvantage. But the fiery ſpirit of the Welſh could not be reſtrained by prudential reaſons: they fell upon the rear of the enemy, and, in a ſhort time, were repulſed with great ſlaughter, and Sir Richard narrowly eſcaped with his life.

A. D. 1469. During theſe tranſactions the earl of Warwick arrived from the continent, which being made known to the rebels, they flattered themſelves with being powerfully aſſiſted by that popular nobleman. In conſequence of this they changed their route, and, inſtead of purſuing the road to London, directed their march towards Warwick-caſtle.

The earl of Pembroke, deſirous of revenge for the late repulſe of Sir Richard Herbert, followed the rebels with ſuch expedition, that he came up with them near Banbury, and the two armies encamped within ſight of each other. But during the night a trivial difference about quarters ariſing between the earls of Pembroke and Devonſhire, the latter retired with his archers, and left Pembroke alone to encounter the rebels.

Encouraged by the deſertion of the earl of Devonſhire, Sir Henry Neville, one of the leaders of the inſurgents indiſcretely charged the royaliſts at too great a diſtance from the main body, in conſequence of which he was ſurrounded, moſt of his men cut to pieces, and himſelf taken priſoner. The earl of Pembroke, without any form of trial, put Neville to death, which act of cruelty exaſperated the inſurgents to a degree bordering on madneſs. They attacked the Welſh army with the utmoſt fury, put all to the ſword that fell in their way, and having taken Pembroke and his brother priſoners, ordered them both to be beheaded. They then ſent a detached party to Grafton manor, with orders to ſeize the earl of Rivers and his ſon John, which orders being obeyed they were both conducted to Northampton, and beheaded in the market-place of that town. After this the inſurgents, ſatisfied with having deſtroyed the moſt obnoxious of Edward's miniſters, diſperſed, and returned quietly to their reſpective habitations.

A. D. 1470. But this inſurrection was only a prelude to commotions of much more fatal conſequences to Edward. The duke of Clarence and earl of Warwick determined to engage in open rebellion, and to facilitate their deſigns went over to France, where they were hoſpitably entertained by Lewis XI. who promiſed them a powerful aſſiſtance. Queen Margaret then reſided at Angers, and the politic Lewis, (notwithſtanding the moſt inveterate animoſity ſubſiſted between her and Warwick) engaged to bring about a reconciliation; which, as it tended to further the deſigns of both, was eaſily effected.

Warwick ſought a pretext for dethroning Edward, and he could deviſe none ſo ſpecious and plauſible as the reſtoration of Henry, a deſign which he could not attempt without the conſent of the queen. On the other hand, Margaret could not entertain hopes of ſeeing her huſband replaced on the throne without the aſſiſtance of Warwick, and therefore made no heſitation in ſoliciting the aid of her former enemy. Such being their reſpective motives, a treaty was at length concluded between them, through the mediation of Lewis, on the following terms: that the duke of Clarence and the earl of Warwick ſhould uſe their endeavours for replacing Henry on the throne: that the queen ſhould engage upon oath to veſt the adminiſtration in them during the life of Henry, or the minority of his ſon, in caſe of his acceſſion before he ſhould be of age: that prince Edward ſhould marry Anne, the younger daughter of the earl of Warwick; and that, in caſe of failure of male iſſue in the prince, the crown ſhould deſcend to the duke of Clarence.

Though theſe tranſactions were carried on with great ſecrecy, yet, by ſome means or other they reached the ears of the duke of Burgundy, who immediately tranſmitted an account of them to Edward. But that prince paid little regard to the intelligence, flattering himſelf that the earl of Warwick could never perſuade the people to riſe in his favour. Confidently relying on the attachment of his ſubjects to his perſon and government, and Warwick's want of credit and influence, he neglected to take the neceſſary precautions for his own defence, and gave himſelf up to all the exceſſes of pleaſure and diſſipation.

In the mean time the earl of Warwick, having obtained a ſupply of money and troops from Lewis, determined to embark for England, under the protection of a French fleet, commanded by the baſtard of Bourbon. The duke of Burgundy, however, blocked up the mouth of the Seine with a numerous fleet, in order to intercept him in his paſſage; but his fleet being diſperſed by a ſtorm, Warwick embarked at Havre-de-grace, and landed at Dartmouth in the month of September. He immediately proclaimed Henry VI. king of England, and at the ſame time iſſued out an order to all his ſubjects, from ſixteen to ſixty, to arm themſelves againſt Edward, and expel the uſurper from the throne. This had the deſired effect; the people flocked to Warwick's ſtandard from all quarters, and, in a few days, his army was increaſed to the number of ſixty thouſand men.

At the time Warwick landed at Dartmouth, Edward was employed in quelling an inſurrection raiſed in Yorkſhire by lord Fitz-Hugh, who had married one of the earl's ſiſters; but on receiving advice of the ſucceſs of Warwick, he immediately altered his route, and directed his march towards London.

The earl of Warwick determined, if poſſible, to engage Edward before he could reach the capital; and accordingly marching acroſs the country with all expedition, came up with the royal army in the neighbourhood of Nottingham. The marquis of Montacute, brother of Warwick, had raiſed an army of ſix thouſand men, and was following Edward, in order (as it was imagined) to reinforce the royal army. But the king had no ſooner halted on account of the approach of Warwick, than the marquis fell with the utmoſt fury upon the rear of the royal army during the night, and the air reſounded with the ſhouts of "Long live king Henry."

This was a moſt alarming circumſtance to Edward, who immediately called a council of war, in which the lord Haſtings gave it as his opinion, that great part of the army would deſert to the earl of Warwick; and that even though that might not happen, they ſhould not be able to cope with the enemy, who were ſo materially ſtrengthened by the revolt of Montacute. He therefore adviſed the king to conſult his perſonal ſafety by flying to the ſea ſide, where he might find an opportunity of eſcaping to ſome part of the continent. As the danger was ſo great, Edward readily took this ſalutary advice, and ſet out at midnight for Lynn in Norfolk, from whence he embarked on board a Dutch ſhip, and landed at Alcamer in Holland.

As ſoon as the royaliſts heard of the king's flight, they immediately laid down their arms, and ſubmitted to Warwick, who then, in the ſpace of only eleven days from his landing, became entire maſter of the kingdom. He immediately marched to London, which he entered in triumph, delivered Henry VI. from the Tower, replaced him on the throne, and cauſed him to be proclaimed king of England. The moſt conſiderable partizans of the York family either ſought protection beyond the ſeas, or took ſhelter in ſanctuaries. Among the latter was Edward's queen, who went privately by water from the Tower to Weſtminſter-abbey, in order to avoid the violence of the citizens, who now appeared as extravagantly zealous for Henry as ever they had been for Edward.

A parliament was ſummoned to meet at Weſtminſter on the 26th of November, when the late treaty made with Margaret was fully ratified, Edward declared an uſurper, and Henry acknowledged king; but as his incapacity for government was univerſally allowed, the regency was entruſted to the duke of Clarence and earl of Warwick till prince Edward ſhould arrive at the age of maturity; and, in default of that prince's iſſue, Clarence was declared ſucceſſor to the throne.

A total change now took place in the adminiſtration. All the judges, ſheriffs, and coroners of the kingdom were removed from their offices, and others placed in their ſtead. The archbiſhop of York, brother to the earl of Warwick, was appointed chancellor; the earl himſelf was made admiral of England, and the duke of Clarence lord-lieutenant of Ireland. At the ſame time the paternal eſtates of the York family, which had been declared forfeited by the parliament, were ſettled upon the duke. The marquis of Montacute was pardoned for his former adherence to Edward, and rewarded for his late defection with a grant of ſeveral manors; and the dukes of Somerſet and Exeter, together with the earls of Oxford, Richmond, Pembroke and Ormond, were reſtored to their eſtates and dignities.

A.D. 1471. During theſe tranſactions in England the fugitive Edward had taken up his reſidence in the court of his brother-in-law the duke of Burgundy, whoſe protection and aſſiſtance he ſolicited for recovering the Engliſh diadem. The duke readily complied with his requeſt: he aſſiſted him with a conſiderable ſum of money, fitted out a number of veſſels, and furniſhed him with a body of two thouſand veteran troops.

With theſe Edward embarked for England, and, after a ſhort paſſage, reached the coaſt of Eſſex, but found it impracticable to land from the diſaffection of the inhabitants. He therefore ſteered to the northward, intending to land at Cromer in Norfolk; but being informed by Sir Robert Chamberlain and Sir Gilbert Debenham (whom he ſent on ſhore to learn the ſentiments of the people) that the inhabitants were not willing to receive him, he again put to ſea, and at length landed at Ravenſpur in Yorkſhire, about the latter end of March.

From the great coolneſs of the people, and the power of the magiſtrates who had been appointed to their offices by Warwick, Edward had but little reaſon to expect ſucceſs in his deſigns, and therefore, in order to effect his purpoſe, thought it expedient to have recourſe to art and diſſimulation. He accordingly pretended, and even took an oath, that he came not to challenge the crown, but to recover his paternal eſtates, which had been unjuſtly taken from him by the parliament. This political diſſimulation produced the deſired effect upon the minds of the people. Compaſſion ſupplied the place of affection: numbers, deceived by his humble pretenſions, flocked to his ſtandard, and the nobility were willing to receive him as a fellow-ſubject, though not as a king. He marched directly for York, and found the inhabitants univerſally diſpoſed to aſſiſt him in recovering the eſtates he enjoyed from his anceſtors, though not in the recovery of the crown. It was, therefore, thought neceſſary to give them every ſatisfaction in his power with regard to his pretenſions; and he ſcrupled not to take a ſolemn oath in the cathedral, never to renew his claim to the crown of England.

But this was all hypocriſy, for Edward never deſigned to obſerve his oath any longer than it tended to promote his intereſt. His army was now conſiderably increaſed, and he determined to march towards the capital, in hopes of finding many powerful friends in that quarter. In the mean time Warwick had aſſembled an army in the neighbourhood of Leiceſter, and advanced to give him battle; but Edward, by taking another road, paſſed unmoleſted, and proceeded with all expedition to London. On his arrival he was readily admitted by the citizens, and he once more triumphantly entered the capital, while Henry, who had not found means to ſecure himſelf, nor perhaps ſo much as thought of it, was taken into cuſtody, and again committed priſoner to the the tower.

Encouraged by this ſucceſs, and being informed the earl of Warwick was marching to give him battle, Edward advanced to meet him, and the two armies came within ſight of each other in the neighbourhood of Barnet. Queen Margaret was every day expected with a conſiderable reinforcement of foreign troops, and all her friends held themſelves in readineſs to join her ſtandard; but Warwick would not wait her arrival, being determined either to gain the whole honour of the victory, or periſh in the attempt.

The very evening before the day appointed for deciding the conteſt, an incident happened which greatly affected the ſpirits of Warwick's ſoldiers. This was the defection of the duke of Clarence, who, having ſecretly entered into engagements with his brother, went over to him at the head of twelve thouſand men. In conſequence of this unexpected diſaſter, the earl would, in all probability, have declined a battle, and waited the arrival of Margaret; but he was now ſeveral days march from any place of ſafety, and to have attempted a retreat in ſight of ſo ſuperior an army would have been certain ruin. Edward and Clarence offered him terms of peace; but theſe he rejected with diſdain, telling them, "he would rather be conſiſtent with himſelf than follow the example of a perfidious duke; and that he was determined either to gain the victory, or loſe his life."

Early in the morning on the 14th of April the battle began with incredible fury on both ſides, the leaders being exaſperated againſt each other to the moſt virulent degree of rancour. The troops of Warwick, though inferior in numbers to Edward's fought with deſperate reſolution, knowing the conſequences that muſt follow ſhould they be vanquiſhed. Such was their impetuoſity that the firſt line of the royal army was obliged to give way, upon which Edward ordered his body of reſerve to advance and charge the enemy in flank. The earl of Warwick ſaw the ſituation he was in, and therefore wheeled about to oppoſe the Yorkiſts; but this circumſtance occaſioned the loſs of the battle. The device on Warwick's ſhield and enſign was a blazing ſtar, and that of Edward's, a ſun. Warwick's ſoldiers ſeeing the ſtar through the medium of a fog, miſtook it for Edward's ſtandard, and fell upon their friends with ſuch fury that they were totally broken. Univerſal confuſion enſued, and Edward, taking advantage of their diſorder, charged them with redoubled fury. Warwick in vain exerted all his efforts to ſupport his forces, now borne down by the weight of numbers. He perceived the battle was irretrievably loſt, and, diſdaining life, when victory was beyond hopes, ruſhed into the hotteſt part of the battle, and fell covered with wounds, while his brother Montacute, endeavouring to ſave him, met with the like fate. The deaths of the two leaders compleated the rout of their army; and as Edward had iſſued orders to give no quarter, a dreadful carnage enſued. About two thouſand fell on the ſide of the conquerors, and near five thouſand on that of the vanquiſhed.*

Thus fell the earl of Warwick, a nobleman of great abilities and courage, who, had he not been betrayed by thoſe in whom he chiefly confided, would, in all probability, have prevented Edward from long triumphing over the houſe of Lancaſter.

The day after the battle Edward returned to London, and ordered the mangled bodies of Warwick and his brother to be expoſed in the cathedral of St. Paul's, after which they were carried to Biſham in Berkſhire, and interred in the priory founded by their anceſtors.

But this battle did not put an end to the civil war. On the very day after it happened, queen Margaret landed at Weymouth with a conſiderable body of troops, attended by her ſon, the counteſs of Warwick, lord Wenlock, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction. As ſoon as ſhe was informed

* In 1740 an obeliſk was erected on the ſpot where this bloody battle was fought, by Sir Jeremy Sambroke. It ſtands near where the two great roads divide, one to Hatfield, and the other to St. Alban's. On the lower part of the obeliſk is the following inſcription:

"Here was fought the famous battle between Edward the "Fourth and the earl of Warwick, April the 14th, "Anno 1471, in which the earl was defeated and "ſlain."

formed of the death of Warwick and captivity of Henry, her courage and magnanimity gave way to grief and deſpair, and ſhe took ſanctuary with her ſon in the abbey of Beaulieu in Hampſhire. But her ſpirits were ſoon raiſed by the appearance of the duke of Somerſet, the earl of Devonſhire, Sir John Forteſcue, Sir Thomas Seymour, and many other perſons of diſtinction, who, with their vaſſals and dependents, declared their reſolution of ſpending their lives and fortunes in her ſervice.

Margaret now determined to make one bold attempt for the recovery of her throne. Accordingly, putting herſelf at the head of her foreign forces, ſhe marched through the counties of Devon and Somerſet, and her army was every day conſiderably increaſed by the continual acquiſition of new partizans. On the 29th of April the queen reached Tewkeſbury in Glouceſterſhire, where ſhe propoſed to halt and refreſh her troops, and then proceed to the borders of Wales, in order to join the earl of Pembroke, who had now raiſed a conſiderable body of archers for her ſervice.

But this junction was prevented by the activity of Edward, who haſtened with all expedition at the head of his army to give the Lancaſtrians battle, and on the third of May arrived within three miles of her camp. Aſtoniſhed at the approach of Edward's army, a council was immediately held in the queen's camp, when it was reſolved to paſs the Severn, in order to join Pembroke's forces; but the citizens of Glouceſter refuſing to open the gates, it was conſidered as impracticable to croſs the river in their then ſituation without expoſing their rear to inevitable ruin. It was therefore determined to intrench the army in a part adjacent to the town of Tewkeſbury, where the troops would be flanked on both ſides with hollow ways, ditches, hedges, and broken ground, and the rear defended by the town and abbey; while a ſtrong entrenchment was to be thrown up in front of the army. This plan was accordingly ſet about with the utmoſt expedition, but the activity of Edward interrupted their deſigns, as he determined to attack them the next day, before their fortifications could be completed.

Accordingly, early in the morning Edward drew up his army in two lines, the firſt of which was commanded by his brother the duke of Glouceſter, while himſelf, aſſiſted by the duke of Clarence and lord Haſtings, led the other. The Lancaſtrian army was formed into three lines; the firſt commanded by the duke of Somerſet and his brother lord Beaufort; the ſecond by Margaret's ſon, aſſiſted by lord Wenlock; and the third by the earl of Devonſhire.

The duke of Glouceſter began the attack with the utmoſt fury; but Somerſet's diviſion, who guarded the front of the entrenchment, received them with ſuch reſolution, that they were repulſed with conſiderable ſlaughter; and had Somerſet been as remarkable for prudence as he was for valour, Edward, in all probability, would have been obliged to abandon the attempt. Glouceſter, purſuant to the orders he had received from his brother, perceiving the intrenchments were not to be forced, pretended to retire in confuſion. This ſtratagem ſucceeded. Somerſet, whoſe diſpoſition was naturally impetuous, led his diviſion through the defiles of the intrenchment, leaving orders for the ſecond and third lines to ſupport him, and attacked the Yorkiſts in the open field with the utmoſt fury. A dreadful conteſt enſued, and continued without any perceptible advantage on either ſide, till a detachment of two hundred horſe from Edward's army attacked the Lancaſtrians in flank, and threw them into the utmoſt diſorder. Somerſet was now obliged to fall back through the defiles to his former ſtation, but was followed ſo cloſely by Glouceſter's diviſion, that the greater part of his troops were cut to pieces. Amazed at not being ſupported, the duke caſt his eyes around the camp, and perceived lord Wenlock ſtanding cooly at the head of his diviſion. Somerſet conſtrued this into an act of treachery, and riding up to him with the utmoſt fury, cleft the head of that nobleman with his battle-ax, and he immediately fell dead on the ground.

In the mean time the duke of Glouceſter purſued his advantage with ſuch prudence and ſucceſs, that his whole diviſion made their way into the entrenchments, and were ſoon followed by Edward, at the head of the ſecond line. Confuſion now took place in every part of the queen's camp. The whole army betook themſelves to a precipitate flight after a faint reſiſtance, and Edward gained one of the moſt complete victories recorded in hiſtory; ſcarce a perſon of any note in the queen's army eſcaping either death or captivity.

Among the ſlain were the earl of Devonſhire, lord Beaufort, Sir John Delves, Sir Edward Hambden, Sir Edward Whittingham, and Sir John Luckner. The duke of Somerſet, the grand prior of St. John, and about twenty gentlemen of rank and fortune, took ſanctuary in the abbey-church. But Edward paid no regard to eccleſiaſtical privileges: he ſent a detachment of his forces, who dragged them from their aſylum, and put them immediately to death. Queen Margaret and her ſon who had alſo taken ſanctuary in another religious ſtructure, were dragged from thence by Edward's ſoldiers. The queen was ſent to the Tower, where ſhe remained about four years, when, being ranſomed by the king of France, for fifty thouſand crowns, ſhe was releaſed, and, retiring to the continent, ſpent the remainder of her days in obſcurity.

But a more melancholy fate attended the young prince her ſon. He was brought into the preſence of Edward, who aſked him, in an inſulting manner, "How he dared to invade his dominions?" The noble youth, forgetting his then ſituation, replied, with an unſeaſonable vivacity, "That he came to recover his father's crown, and to claim his juſt inheritance." Stung with this anſwer, the ungenerous Edward, inſenſible to pity, ſtruck the young prince on the face with his gauntlet; when the dukes of Clarence and Glouceſter, and lord Haſtings, conſidering the blow as a ſignal for farther violence, hurried the prince into the next apartment, where, with their daggers, they put a period to his exiſtence.

A few days after the battle of Tewkſkbury Henry VI. expired in the Tower, but whether of a natural or violent death, cannot be aſcertained. It was, however, generally thought the latter, and that the duke of Glouceſter was principally concerned in putting an end to his life. The remains of Henry were depoſited in the abbey of Chertſey, but afterwards removed by Richard III. and interred in a more pompous manner at Windſor.

A. D. 1472. The earl of Pembroke, convinced that the fatal battel of Tewkeſbury had put a final period to the hopes of the Lancaſtrian family, fled into Britany, taking with him his nephew the young earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII. The only only partizan, therefore, that now remained for the Houſe of Lancaſter was the baſtard of Fauconbridge, who took the advantage of Edward's abſence to attempt the recovery of the capital. He had been honoured with a vice-admiral's commiſſion by the earl of Warwick, and appointed to guard the channel; but having been ſtripped of his employment on the death of that nobleman, he withdrew, with the ſhips under his command, and, for ſome time, ſubſiſted by piracy. The landing of Margaret induced him to aſſiſt that princeſs in recovering the Engliſh ſcepter; and being joined by 300 men from the garriſon of Calais, he landed with his forces at Sandwich, and was admitted into Canterbury by the magiſtrates. Great numbers flocked to his ſtandard, ſo that he ſoon found himſelf at the head of 17,000 men. With theſe he marched to London, and entered Southwark without oppoſition; and had not the news of Edward's victory at Tewkeſbury arrived in the critical moment, he would, in all probability, have made himſelf maſter of the capital. But the citizens, encouraged by the hopes of effectual aſſiſtance from their victorious monarch, ſhut their gates againſt the inſurgents. They made, however, a deſperate attempt to carry the bridge by ſtorm; but being repulſed with great ſlaughter, they deſerted their leader, who was ſoon after taken priſoner, and put to death.

A. D. 1472. Edward no ſooner returned to London after the battle of Tewkſbury than he convoked a parliament, who ratified all the acts he had made, and recognized his title to the throne. No farther attempts were made in favour of the Houſe of Lancaſter; the nation in general ſeemed ſatisfied with the then government, and tranquillity was again re-eſtabliſhed throughout the kingdom.

Nothing material occurred from this period till the year 1474, where Edward concluded a treaty of alliance with Charles duke of Burgundy; by which it was ſtipulated that Edward ſhould croſs the ſeas with an army of at leaſt ten thouſand men, and that Charles ſhould join him with all his forces, in order to invade the territories of Lewis: that Edward ſhould claim the crown of France, and that the ſword of war ſhould not be ſheathed, till he had obtained the provinces of Guienne and Normandy. That Champaigne, and ſeveral other territories, ſhould be procured for the duke; and that all his dominions ſhould be freed from paying homage to the crown of France. This treaty was highly approved by the Engliſh parliament, who granted the king a very conſiderable ſubſidy on the occaſion; and every precaution was taken that could be thought of to render the expedition ſucceſsful.

A. D. 1475. Early in the ſpring Edward embarked for the continent, and landing at Calais with an army of thirty thouſand men, marched with all expedition to join the forces of the duke of Burgundy, being reſolved to carry his conqueſts into the very heart of France. But he was ſtopped in his deſigns by the natural puſillanimity of the French monarch, who, diſdaining all military honours, and dreading the events of war, ſent an herald to Edward, with propoſals of accommodation. As the terms were of an advantageous nature, they were readily liſtened to by Edward, and a treaty of peace was concluded at Pecquigni near Amiens. By this treaty it was ſtipulated, "That Lewis ſhould pay 70,000 crowns to indemnify Edward for the expences of the expedition: that he ſhould alſo pay him annually 50,000 crowns during their joint lives: that the dauphin of France ſhould marry Elizabeth, Edward's daughter, and ſettle on her 60,000 livres a year as her jointure; and that neither party ſhould encourage civil wars in the other's dominions, but, on the contrary, aſſiſt in ſuppreſſing the rebellions of their ſubjects." This treaty being properly ratified, the two monarchs had an interview on the bridge of Pecquigni, when mutual profeſſions of friendſhip paſſed between them; after which Edward returned with his forces to Calais, and the next day embarked for England.

A. D. 1476. As the Engliſh had formed the greateſt expectations from Edward's expedition to the continent, they were greatly irritated at the treaty made with Lewis, and the parliament intimated their deſigns of not granting the king any farther ſupplies. In conſequence of this Edward had recourſe to other methods for raiſing money, and accumulating treaſure. He engaged in commerce, which he carried on with great advantage, as a private merchant; ſold the profits of vacant biſhopricks; demanded fines for the reſtitution of temporalities; ranſacked old records to find defective titles, and obliged the proprietors to pay large ſums for their confirmation. Theſe methods he purſued with great aſſiduity, and, by theſe means, not only ſaved himſelf the mortification of a refuſal from his parliament, but acquired very conſiderable poſſeſſions.

A. D. 1477. Edward, inſtead of directing his attention to the affairs of government, and the tranquillity of his ſubjects, now gave himſelf up to the indulgence of every ſenſual gratification. He chiefly paſſed his time in the converſation of women, and his court became a ſcene of lewdneſs and diſſipation. The management of public affairs was engroſſed by the queen and her relations, who were now become very unpopular, not only on account of their unbounded ambition and inſolent behaviour, but alſo the conſtant oppoſition they made to all the ſchemes of the king's brothers.

A. D. 1478. Theſe two princes were greatly irritated at the ſupineneſs of Edward, and the tyrannical proceedings of the queen. Richard, duke of Glouceſter (a prince of profound diſſimulation and conſummate artifice) concealed his reſentment in ſuch a manner as to prevent an open rupture between him and the miniſtry. But that was not the caſe with his brother the duke of Clarence, who was ſo aggravated, that he threw out the moſt bitter invectives againſt the king and the miniſtry. Edward was highly incenſed againſt the duke of Clarence for his conduct, which being aggravated by the artful ſuggeſtions of Glouceſter (who had entertained a deſign upon the crown, and conſidered his brother as the only obſtacle in his way) he ordered him to be arreſted, and committed to the Tower.

A few days after the parliament were ſummoned to meet that the duke might be tried by his peers. Accordingly, being aſſembled for that purpoſe, the king appeared perſonally as his brother's accuſer; and though nothing more could be proved than his having dropped ſome raſh expreſſions, he was condemned to ſuffer death, and the commons meanly ſupported the injuſtice of the peers, by petitioning for his execution. Edward did not ſuffer his brother to languiſh long in priſon. The only favour he granted him after his condemnation was, to give him the choice of his own death, which which he desired might be effected by being drowned in a butt of malmsey, and which choice was accordingly carried into execution.---Thus fell George duke of Clarence, a prince who was certainly more weak than wicked, and had infinitely more merit than any of those who had plotted or accomplished his ruin. He left behind him one son, named Edward, who was earl of Warwick, and a daughter, who was afterwards countess of Salisbury.

A. D. 1479---81. Edward continued to grow more and more indolent with respect to the affairs of government, and to give himself up entirely to debauchery and dissipation. The French monarch had long beheld his supine conduct with a secret pleasure, and at length determined to take advantage of it. Being desirous of marrying the dauphin to the daughter of Maximilian of Austria, an infant only two years of age, the treaty was now concluded, though he had promised, by the treaty of Pecquigni, that the dauphin should marry the princess Elizabeth, daughter to the English monarch.

Astonished and incensed at this unpardonable affront, Edward vowed to take ample vengeance on Lewis for his perfidy. But that monarch, having foreseen the gathering storm, had taken measures to break its force. He sent ambassadors to James III. of Scotland, offering him great advantages if he would break his truce with Edward, and carry his arms into the northern parts of England. James, who was a very weak prince, and lived on bad terms with his own nobility, imprudently listened to the artful suggestions of Lewis, and levied an army to execute a design to which he was far from being equal; but when his forces arrived on the borders of England, the barons conspiring against his favourites, put them to death without the form of a trial; and his whole army immediately dispersed.

A. D. 1482. In the beginning of this year the duke of Gloucester entered Scotland at the head of a considerable body of forces, made himself master of Berwick, and forced James to accept of a peace, by which that important fortress was ceded to the English.

The war with Scotland being thus terminated, Edward directed his whole attention towards making the necessary preparations for carrying on a war against France, and punishing Lewis for his perfidy; but while thus employed he was seized with a violent fever, of which he died on the 9th of April, A. D. 1483, in the 42d year of his age, and 23d of his reign.

Edward IV. possessed some personal accomplishments, and had a pleasing mien and address. In his youth he was active and courageous; but at the same time cruel and vindictive. Had the scenes of his slaughter closed in those of his victories; had he not, in his cooler moments, stained upon scaffolds the laurels he had gathered in the field, he might justly have claimed a place amongst the greatest heroes of his country. But his vindictive disposition made him commit acts detestable to human nature, and at length rendered him an object of universal contempt. The latter part of his reign was almost spent in indolence and pleasure, notwithstanding which his natural cruelty continued, as is evident from the unfeeling treatment he shewed to his brother the duke of Clarence. In short, Edward IV. possessed some qualities which would have made him appear amiable as a man, but at the same time he had others which rendered him detestable both as a man and a monarch.

Remarkable Occurrences during the Reign of Edward IV.

A. D.

1468 At this period the inhabitants of London had a strange and extravagant method of adorning their feet. They wore the peaks, or pikes, of their shoes so long, that they encumbered them in walking, and they were forced to support them by a chain fastened at the tip of the shoe, and braced about the knee: the better sort had chains of silver, or silver gilt, and the more common people used silken laces. This ridiculous fashion had been in vogue ever since the year 1382; but it was now prohibited, on the forfeiture of twenty shillings from every person who offended.

1471 This year one William Caxton, a mercer of London, and a lover of letters, brought the art of printing into England; and the first press was set up in Westminster-abbey, under the patronage of the abbot.

1472 A dreadful plague happened this year in England, which soon carried off great numbers of the inhabitants.

1473 The royal chappel at Windsor founded by king Edward IV.

1481 This year was born Thomas Parr, noted for the extraordi- great age to which he lived, being, at his death 152 years old.

Accession of Edward V. Treacherous behaviour of Richard, duke of Gloucester. The young king is conducted to London, and placed in the bishop of London's palace. The Queen-Dowager flies for sanctuary to Westminster. Gloucester is declared Protector of the kingdom. Gets the duke of York into his hands, and sends him, together with his elder brother (Edward V.) to the Tower. Puts to death the earl of Rivers, and other noble prisoners, in Pontefract-Castle. Accuses the Queen Dowager, and Jane Shore, (mistress of the late king) of witchcraft. Death of Lord Hastings. Jane Shore tried for adultery, and obliged to do penance in St. Paul's cathedral. The Duke of Gloucester, after using a variety of artifices, obtains the sovereignty.

A. D. 1483. AS soon as the death of the late king was known, his eldest son, then only twelve years of age, was proclaimed king by the title of Edward V. at which time he resided at Ludlow Castle in Shropshire, where he had been some time placed under the care of his uncle Anthony Woodville earl of Rivers.

But, unhappily for young Edward, at the time of his accession two irreconcileable parties divided the court; namely, that of the queen and her relations (particularly the earl of Rivers her brother, and the marquis of Dorset, her son by a former husband); and that of the antient nobility (at the head of whom were the duke of Buckingham, and and the lords Haſtings, Howard and Stanley) who had long envied the exaltation and unlimited credit of the Woodville family. Each of theſe parties followed their ſeparate intereſts, and each endeavoured to gain over to their intereſt the duke of Glouceſter, who had, by his brother, been appointed regent of the kingdom.

Glouceſter, who was at once both cruel and ambitious, and capable of the moſt inhuman crimes, concealed his dark purpoſes under the maſk of the moſt profound diſſimulation and policy. He affected the greateſt zeal for the queen, that he might acquire a full influence over her conduct. The earl of Rivers had been entruſted by the deceaſed monarch with the care and education of his ſon; and the queen expreſſed her deſire that he ſhould now levy a body of troops in Wales, in order to conduct his young ſovereign to London. But Glouceſter perſuaded her that an armed force was not at all neceſſary on the occaſion, but, on the contrary, might produce dangerous conſequences. An order was therefore ſent to Rivers to bring the young king to London, with no greater retinue than was neceſſary to ſupport his ſtate and dignity.

The earl not ſuſpecting any treacherous deſigns in Glouceſter, readily obeyed the order, and immediately ſet out with the young prince for London, attended only by his ordinary domeſtics. He was met at Northampton by the dukes of Glouceſter and Buckingham, each of whom was attended with a ſplendid retinue; and, after ſpending a ſeemingly friendly evening with them, was, the next morning, arreſted by Glouceſter's orders. Sir Richard Gray, one of the queen's ſons, and Sir Thomas Vaughan, who poſſeſſed a conſiderable poſt in the king's houſhold, were, at the ſame time, put under a ſtrong guard, and all three ſent priſoners to Pontefract Caſtle in Yorkſhire. In vain did young Edward, with tears and entreaties, intercede with his cruel uncle for the releaſe of perſons ſo dear to him. Glouceſter refuſed his requeſt, and taking the king under his own care, left Northampton, and proceeded towards London.

The queen was no ſooner informed of theſe tyrannical proceedings, than ſhe immediately conceived the whole whole deſign of the duke of Glouceſter; and, conſidering her brother and two ſons as irrecoverably loſt, fled to the ſanctuary of of Weſtminſter, with the duke of York, the marquis of Dorſet, and the reſt of her family.

Lord Haſtings was at this time in London, and, though he hated the queen and her relations, ſtill revered the memory of his late maſter, and was unalterably devoted to the king and his brother. Not ſuſpecting the real deſigns of Glouceſter, he imagined that the ſeizing of Rivers was intended only to weaken the party of the queen; and therefore wrote to the archbiſhop of York (then lord-chancellor of England) deſiring him not to be alarmed at what had happened, as every thing would tend to promote the peace and tranquillity of the kingdom. The archbiſhop, ſurprized at this information, haſtened, before day-break, to the ſanctuary, where he found the queen ſitting upon the floor in the utmoſt agony and diſtreſs, bewailing the fate of her children. He endeavoured to comfort her with the aſſurances of Haſtings; but ſhe could derive no conſolation from that quarter. He then proteſted, that if the lords ſhould ſo far deviate from the principles of humanity and juſtice as to take away the life of the king, he would immediately crown the duke of York, who was ſtill ſafe beyond their power; and as an earneſt of his affection for his deceaſed maſter's family, left in her cuſtody the great ſeal of England. On the very ſame day that the archbiſhop had this interview with the queen, young Edward entered London amidſt the univerſal acclamations of the people. He was attended by the dukes of Glouceſter, and Buckingham, with many others of the principal nobility; and Glouceſter like a conſummate diſſembler, rode before him bareheaded, calling out to the people, "Behold your prince and ſovereign!"

Young Edward was conducted to the biſhop of London's palace, that being thought the moſt proper place of reſidence for him previous to his coronation. On the ſame day the duke of Glouceſter ſummoned a grand council of the nobility to ſettle the adminiſtration, and as this aſſembly conſiſted chiefly of his own friends, he was choſen protector of the kingdom, though the council, on this occaſion, uſurped a prerogative that belonged to the parliament.

Though Glouceſter had thus far ſucceeded in his deſigns, yet he well knew, that unleſs he could find means to get the duke of York into his power, all his ſchemes muſt prove abortive. He therefore complained to the council, that the queen's having taken ſanctuary, and the ill-grounded apprehenſions ſhe had formed, were an indignity to the government; and repreſented the neceſſity of the young prince's appearance at the coronation of his brother, propoſing that if the queen refuſed to liſten to the voice of reaſon, he ſhould be taken from the aſylum by force. This propoſition was unanimouſly approved by the council; and Cardinal Bourchier, the primate, with Rotherham, archbiſhop of York, were ſent to the ſanctuary, with orders to uſe every argument in their power to induce the queen to comply with the wiſhes of the council. Elizabeth, for ſome time, refuſed to give up the prince; but at length, by the powerful arguments of the primate, ſhe was prevailed on to give her conſent. Accordingly, having embraced him with all the eagerneſs of maternal affection, ſhe delivered him into the hands of the archbiſhop, by whom he was immediately conducted to Glouceſter. Richard received the young prince with all the ſeeming marks of paternal tenderneſs, and after deſiring that he would conſider him as his guardian and father, conducted him to his brother in the biſhop's palace.

The two young princes ſeemed overjoyed at this interview, and began to think their uncle had a real regard for their intereſt. But in this they were greatly deceived. In a few days after they were both conveyed from the biſhop's palace to the tower, from whence, at that time, it was cuſtomary for the kings of England to ride in proceſſion through the ſtreets of London to their coronation at Weſtminſter.

Glouceſter had ſtill many obſtacles in his way to exclude him from the throne. But no reſtraints were ſufficient to check the violence of Richard, whoſe fierce and ſavage nature was ſuch that he ſtartled at no crimes, however enormous. The death of the earl of Rivers, and the other noble priſoners confined in Pontefract Caſtle, was now determined; and the Protector found no difficulty in obtaining the conſent of his party to that ſanguinary meaſure. Fearful, however, that a trial might fill the people with apprehenſions (eſpecially as no crime could be alledged againſt them of a capital nature) it was reſolved to diſpatch them without without any legal proceſs; and orders were immediately ſent to Sir Ralph Ratcliffe (a man capable of the moſt enormous actions) to put them to death, which was accordingly done by their heads being ſevered from their bodies.

On the very day theſe bloody orders were executed, Richard ſummoned a council to meet in the tower; and having diſcovered, by his agents, that Haſtings, was unalterably attached to the children of his deceaſed maſter, determined to take him off, fearful leſt, from the great power and popularity of that nobleman, he might render his deſigns abortive.

Haſtings, not ſuſpecting any deſign was formed againſt his life, repaired to the council, where he met the protector, whoſe behaviour was remarkably affable. After a ſhort ſtay, Richard retired from the board, deſiring the lords to continue their deliberations during his abſence. He ſoon returned with an angry and enflamed countenance, biting his lips, and exhibiting all the marks of the moſt violent indignation. "My lords," ſaid he, "what puniſhment do thoſe deſerve who have "plotted againſt my life?" Haſtings replied, that they deſerved the puniſhment of traitors. "Theſe "traitors," replied the protector, "are thoſe "ſorcerers my brother's wife, and Jane Shore his "miſtreſs, with others their aſſociates. See to what "a condition they have reduced me by their in-"cantations and witchcraft!" On uttering theſe words, he uncovered his arm, which was ſhrivelled and decayed. The members of the council, who well knew that his arm had always been in that condition, were confounded, and looked upon each other with aſtoniſhment. After a conſiderable pauſe, Haſtings anſwered, certainly, my lord, if "they are guilty of theſe crimes, they deſerve the "ſevereſt puniſhment." "And you reply to "me," ſaid the protector, "with your ifs and "your ands? You are the chief abettor of that "witch Shore: you are yourſelf a traitor; and I "ſwear by St. Paul, that I will not dine before "your head be brought me!" On this he ſtruck the table violently with his hand; when a number of armed men ruſhed into the council-chamber, and ſeized ſeveral of the members. Haſtings was led immediately to the green before the chapel of the Tower, where, after confeſſion to a prieſt, who happened accidentally to be on the ſpot, he was beheaded on a log of timber lying on the green. The archbiſhop of York, the biſhop of Ely, and lord Stanley, who aſſiſted at the council, were ſent to different apartments in the tower, and no perſon, except the keeper, ſuffered to ſee them.

As Richard was ſenſible that lord Haſtings was univerſally beloved by the people, he thought it prudent to make ſome public apology for the precipitate manner of his execution. He therefore iſſued out a proclamation, repreſenting the great crimes of which he had been guilty, and that his haſty execution aroſe from the ſuddenneſs of the diſcovery. To put a farther gloſs on his proceedings, he ordered Jane Shore to be apprehended, and tried before the council for ſorcery and witchcraft. No proofs, however, being found againſt her (notwithſtanding the ignorance and abſurdity of the age) ſhe was acquitted of the charge. But the Protector was determined ſhe ſhould not eſcape his vengeance. He cauſed her to be indicted before the ſpiritual court for lewdneſs and adultery; and ſhe did penance in a white ſheet at St. Paul's before all the people*.

As the deaths of lord Haſtings, and the noble priſoners in Pontefract Caſtle, had excited no inſurrection among the people, Glouceſter grew more and more confident of ſucceſs, and throwing off the maſk of diſſimulation, openly aſpired to the crown, which he claimed from the illegitimacy (as he aſſerted) of his brother Edward's children. Theſe vile aſſertions he cauſed to be promulgated from the pulpit. Dr. Ralph Shaw, an eminent orator of thoſe times (and brother to the mayor who was one of Richard's creatures) preached a ſermon at St. Paul's Croſs, taking for his text the following words from the Wiſdom of Solomon, "Baſtards ſlips ſhall not thrive." In the courſe of his ſermon he artfully advanced many arguments, by which he endeavoured to prove the illegitimacy of the ſons of Edward IV. He afterwards extolled the virtues of Richard duke of Glouceſter, repreſenting him as the legal heir to the crown, and the only hope of the nation; concluding his panegyric with calling aloud, "God ſave king Richard." But this fulſome parade and exaggeration was far from producing the intended effect. The audience kept a profound ſilence: the doctor loſt his popularity, and Richard was looked upon with contempt by the people.

In conſequence of this diſappointment it was the next day agreed by the council (which now conſiſted wholly of Richards creatures) that another attempt ſhould be made to obtain the voice of the people in his favour. Accordingly, the lord-mayor, aldermen, and livery of London were ſummoned to aſſemble at Guildhall, where the duke of Buckingham, in a ſtudied harangue, expatiated on the virtues of the duke of Glouceſter, and concluded with aſking, Whether they would have that prince for their king? A profound ſilence reigned through the whole aſſembly. The duke repeated the ſubſtance of his harangue, and aſked the ſame queſtion; but the ſame ſilence was continued. The mayor then deſired that the recorder might addreſs the aſſembly. The experiment was accordingly tried, but with no better ſucceſs, not a word eſcaping from the lips of the audience. "This is aſtoniſhing obſtinacy, (cried the duke) "declare your ſentiments one way or other. But "you ought to remember, that your conſent is "not conſidered as neceſſary. The Lords and "Commons have ſufficient authority to place "whom they pleaſe on the throne; and when we "aſk your conſent, it ſhould be conſidered as a "favour. However, I now demand, in plain "terms, whether you will, or will not, have the "protector for your ſovereign?" This ſpeech, which was conſidered rather as a menace than an appeal to their judgment, occaſioned a general murmur among the whole audience. At length ſome of the apprentices, excited by bribes from Richard's partiſans, ſet up a feeble cry of "Long live king Richard." This was conſidered as a ſufficient declaration of the ſentiments of the nation; and Buckingham haſtened to acquaint the Protector

* Jane Shore lived many years after this event, and was alive in the reign of Henry VIII. when Sir Thomas Moore knew her. But though ſhe had greatly recommended herſelf by acts of beneficence and humanity, though ſhe had removed the ſtings of poverty from the breaſts of the indigent, and applied the balm of comfort to the wounds of affliction, ſhe found no friends in adverſity, and ſpent the evening of her life in miſery and want.

Richard, at firſt pretended to be aſtoniſhed at the propoſal, declared he would obſerve inviolably his loyalty to his ſovereign, and hypocritically exhorted them to imitate his example. But he ſoon changed his note, by willingly ſuffering himſelf to be perſuaded to accept the crown; and from that moment he acted as the legitimate and legal poſſeſſor of the Engliſh throne. CHAP. V.

RICHARD III.

Richard III. proclaimed king, and crowned at Weſtminſter. Cauſes the two ſons of Edward IV. to be murdered in the Tower. The duke of Buckingham, in conjunction with the biſhop of Ely, forms a deſign of dethroning Richard, and inveſting the earl of Richmond with the ſovereignty. Buckingham raiſes a body of forces, who, deſerting him, he is taken priſoner and beheaded. The earl of Richmond embarks for England with five thouſand men, but his fleet being diſperſed by a ſtorm, he is obliged to return to the court of Britany. Richard engages to marry the daughter of the Queen-Dowager. Richmond lands at Milford-Haven at the head of two thouſand foreign troops, marches to Haverfordweſt, and is joined by great numbers of the inhabitants. Richard marches againſt him, and takes up his poſt at Nottingham. Battle of Boſworth, and conſequences thereof. Death of Richard III.

A. D. 1483. RICHARD, duke of Glouceſter, having, by his own unparalleled artifices, and the aſſiſtance of his partizans, obtained the ſovereignty by a faint and forced conſent of a part of the people, was, on the 18th of June, proclaimed king of England and France by the title of Richard III. The next day he married Anne, youngeſt daughter of Rich Nevil, the great earl of Warwick, and relict of prince Edward, ſon of Henry VI. and on the 6th of July following they were both ſolemnly crowned at Weſtminſter.

Having thus fixed himſelf on that throne to which he had ſo ambitiouſly aſpired, Richard now determined, (in order to eſtabliſh himſelf in the ſeat of power) to put to death the two princes, who were ſtill confined in the tower. But in order to avoid being conſidered as acceſſary to this tragical ſcene, he made a tour through ſeveral of the counties of England, under pretence of reforming the abuſes, which had crept into the government.

After being abſent a few days he diſpatched a meſſenger to Sir Robert Brackenbury, then conſtable of the tower, with expreſs orders for him immediately to put the two young princes to death. But that gentleman, who was naturally humane, and poſſeſſed a true ſenſe of honour, refuſed having any ſhare in ſo infamous a tranſaction.

Diſappointed in this attempt, Richard next applied to Sir James Tyrrel, a man practiſed in the ſcenes of blood, who readily accepted the inhuman commiſſion. Tyrrel choſe three aſſociates, namely, Slater, Deighton and Foreſt; and having, by Richard's expreſs order, obtained the keys of the tower, he conducted his companions to the door of the chamber where the two princes lodged, bidding them execute their orders. The aſſaſſins finding the unſuſpecting innocents in a ſound ſleep, immediately ſuffocated them with the bolſters and pillows, after which they ſhewed their naked bodies to Tyrrel, who ordered them to be buried at the foot of the ſtairs, and the place to be covered with an heap of rubbiſh *.

Richard, after paſſing through ſeveral of the counties in England, made a ſtop at York, where he appeared with his queen in all the pomp of royalty; and during his ſtay was crowned with great ceremony in the cathedral of that city.

After being abſent about ſix weeks Richard returned to London, and flattered himſelf with enjoying that crown he had ſo flagrantly uſurped without interruption. But he ſoon found himſelf miſtaken. The duke of Buckingham, not ſatisfied with the rewards which had been beſtowed on him for his ſervices, and irritated at being refuſed a favour which he aſked of Richard, left the court, and retired to his caſtle of Brecknock, where Moreton, biſhop of Ely (who had been committed to his cuſtody by Richard) was confined.

The biſhop was not only a perſon of ſingular penetration and addreſs, but likewiſe an able politician, and conſidering the diſguſt of the duke as a favourable incident, determined, if poſſible, to bring him over to his own party, in which he had great hopes from the family of that nobleman, having been zealous Lancaſtrians. The prelate was far from being diſappointed in his expectations. Buckingham liſtened, with great attention, to his arguments, and a ſcheme was concerted for removing Richard from the ſeat of power. It was agreed that they ſhould both declare for Henry, earl of Richmond (then at the court of Britany) who ſhould marry Elizabeth, daughter of Edward IV. and by that alliance unite the intereſt of both houſes in his favour.

Having concerted this plan they communicated their deſigns to the old ducheſs of Richmond and the queen-dowager, the latter of whom was ſtill in the

* The bones of theſe unhappy victims were not diſcovered till the reign of Charles II. the cauſe of which was as follows: The Six Clerks Office being too much crouded with records of bills and other matters neceſſary to be preſerved, orders were given to remove them to the White Tower, and a new ſtair caſe was made into the chapel for the more eaſy conveyance of them. The labourers, in digging at the foot of the old ſtairs, came to a wooden cheſt, containing human bones covered with ſtones and rubbiſh. Theſe were the bones of the royal infants ſo inhumanly murdered, which king Charles cauſed to be interred in Henry the Seventh's Chapel near two other royal children, viz. Mary and Sophia, daughters to James I. and over the place was an ornament of white marble with an inſcription on it in capital letters.

ſanctuary at Weſtminſter. They both readily approved of the propoſal, and a friendſhip was eſtabliſhed between them and the duke of Buckingham. In conſequence of this, meſſengers were diſpatched to the earl, acquainting him with the meaſures that had been entered into in his favour, and the terms on which he was invited to land in England.

The earl of Richmond no ſooner received this intelligence, than he immediately related the particulars to the duke, who promiſed to give him all the aſſiſtance in his power. In conſequence of this the earl immediately diſpatched a meſſenger to his mother and the duke of Buckingham, informing them of his approbation of the plan and the promiſe of the duke of Britany; and deſiring, at the ſame time, that they would prepare for his reception by the beginning of October.

Thus far every thing ſucceeded to the wiſhes of the conſpirators, who reſpectively began to exert their power and influence in promoting the main deſign; and their ſucceſs was far beyond their expectations. Richard had incurred the hatred of the nation in general: the partizans of the houſe of York were incenſed againſt him for the murder of the two young princes, while thoſe of Lancaſter chearfully embraced a propoſal that ſeemed likely to place a prince of that houſe * on the throne of England.

Though the utmoſt precaution had been taken to keep theſe proceedings a profound ſecret, yet they could not eſcape the penetrating eye of Richard, who no ſooner diſcovered the plot than he iſſued out orders for his troops to be in readineſs to march on the firſt notice. He then diſpatched a meſſenger to the duke of Buckingham (whom he imagined to be at the head of the conſpiracy) enjoining his immediate attendance at court; but the duke, inſtead of paying any regard to the order, employed himſelf in collecting his forces, hoping, in a ſhort time, to join thoſe of his confederates.

From the behaviour of Buckingham, Richard found it neceſſary to exert himſelf with the utmoſt expedition. Accordingly, having collected his forces, he began his march towards the weſtern counties, where he was informed the earl of Richmond propoſed to land, and where ſeveral of his friends were already in arms, expecting to be joined by the duke of Buckingham, at the head of his forces.

In the mean time, the duke, having raiſed a powerful army, advanced, by haſty marches, into the foreſt of Deane, with a deſign of croſſing the Severn, and joining his weſtern friends at Saliſbury. But on approaching the borders of the river, he found the waters had overflowed the banks in ſuch a manner that there was no poſſibility of paſſing it. His army conſiſted entirely of Welſh, who, alarmed with ſuperſtitious terrors at this extraordinary event, and at the ſame time diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, abandoned his camp, and Buckingham, in a few days was left with only one ſervant, who was faithful enough to attend him in his diſtreſs. In this hapleſs ſituation he took refuge in the houſe of one Banniſter, who had ſubſiſted by his bounty, and enjoyed a comfortable eſtate near Shrewſbury, and which had been given him by the duke. But this wretch, dead to all the feelings of honour and gratitude, betrayed his patron† into the hands of the ſheriff of Shropſhire, who conducted him to Richard, and the unfortunate duke was, without any form of proceſs, immediately beheaded.

Alarmed at the news of this diſaſter, and deſpairing of ſucceſs, the friends of the duke immediately diſperſed. The marquis of Dorſet, and biſhop of Ely, fled to the continent, while others concealed themſelves in different parts of the kingdom; but ſeveral, who were ſo unfortunate as to fall into the hands of the uſurper, were immediately put to death.

During theſe tranſactions the earl of Richmond had not been wanting on his part in endeavouring to join his friends at the time appointed. He embarked with 5000 men at St. Malos on board forty veſſels; but being overtaken by a terrible ſtorm his fleet was diſperſed, and himſelf obliged to return to the court of Britany, where he was informed of the fate of the duke of Buckingham, and the diſperſion of his friends.

A. D. 1484. This dangerous inſurrection being quelled, Richard returned to London, and immediately ſummoned a parliament, who recognized his authority, and acknowledged his title to the crown. His only ſon Edward was created prince of Wales; and duties of tonnage and poundage were granted him for life; and Richard, in order, if poſſible, to reconcile the people to his government, paſſed ſeveral acts, which tended to promote the happineſs of his ſubjects.

But Richard's mind was far from being yet eaſy: he had great reaſon to ſuſpect that many of his principal nobility were ſtrongly attached to the intereſt of the earl of Richmond, and only waited for a proper opportunity of diſcovering their ſentiments. Theſe were diſagreeable circumſtances; but what moſt concerned him was, the intended marriage between the earl of Richmond and the princeſs Elizabeth. He ſaw the danger of ſuch a connection, and determined, if poſſible, to prevent it. To effect this he paid his addreſſes to the queen-dowager with ſuch art, and made ſo many profeſſions of a ſincere and unalterable friendſhip, that Elizabeth, thinking her former projects totally deſtroyed, liſtened to his propoſals, and even promiſed him her daughter in marriage; the baſe and cruel Richard having made way for this ſtrange connection, by taking off his former wife by poiſon. The queen's conſent being obtained, Richard applied to the court of Rome for a diſpenſation for concluding the alliance with the princeſs, which was generally conſidered as inceſtuous. But before the papal inſtrument arrived the face of affairs was ſuddenly changed, and Richard hurled from that throne he had ſo baſely uſurped.

A. D. 1485. Though the earl of Richmond had failed in his late attempt, yet he determined to make another effort for obtaining the Engliſh diadem; to effect which he had, by his importunities, got conſiderable ſuccours from the court of France.

* The earl of Richmond was now conſidered as the head of the Lancaſtrian party. He was heir, by the female line, to the family of Somerſet, and grandſon to Sir Owen Tudor, who had married Catharine of France, the widow of Henry V.

† It is recorded of Banniſter that he was afterwards puniſhed in a moſt diſtinguiſhed manner for his ingratitude and perfidy. His eldeſt ſon went mad, and died raving in a hogſtye: his eldeſt daughter, who was very beautiful, was ſuddenly ſtricken with a foul leproſy: his ſecond ſon was deprived of the uſe of his limbs: his younger ſon was ſuffocated in a ditch of filthy water; and himſelf, at an extreme old age, found guilty of murder, but his life ſaved at the interceſſion of the clergy.

France. Encouraged by this ſucceſs, he ſet out for Rouen, where he received letters from England, inviting him to land in Wales, aſſuring him that the people of thoſe parts were ſtrongly attached to his intereſt, and had raiſed a conſiderable ſum for his ſervice. He was at the ſame time informed that the whole kingdom was diſſatisfied with the character and conduct of Richard, and that he could not poſſibly land more opportunely than at a time when the tyrant had made no preparations for oppoſing his deſcent.

Animated with this intelligence the earl, accompanied by many noble exiles from England, and at the head of two thouſand foreign troops, embarked at Harfleur on the laſt day of July, and on the 6th of Auguſt landed with his forces at Milford Haven, without oppoſition. From hence he directed his march to Haverfordweſt, where he was joyfully received by the inhabitants; and as he advanced was joined by ſuch numbers of the partiſans of both families, that he ſoon found himſelf at the head of a very conſiderable army.

As ſoon as Richard was informed of the landing of the earl of Richmond, and the ſucceſs that attended him, he collected together his forces, and marched with the utmoſt expedition to oppoſe him. He took up his poſt at Nottingham, being the moſt centrical town in the kingdom, and propoſed marching from thence, on the firſt alarm, to whatever place ſhould be moſt expoſed to danger.

Richard's affairs were now in a very critical ſituation, and he had much more to fear from his ſecret than his open enemies. The duke of Norfolk was the only nobleman ſincerely attached to his intereſt: the reſt were friends to the earl of Richmond, and only waited for a favourable opportunity of deſerting Richard's ſtandard. But the perſons who gave Richard the greateſt uneaſineſs were lord Stanley, and his brother Sir William, whoſe connections with the earl of Richmond were ſtrongly ſuſpected by the uſurper. He had, indeed, employed the former to levy a body of five thouſand men, but inſiſted that he ſhould leave his ſon, the lord Strange, as an hoſtage for his fidelity. This obliged lord Stanley to act with great precaution, and though he found means to inform Henry of his friendly intentions, yet, from his ambiguous behaviour, no certainty could be formed of his real deſigns.

Richard's alarms were greatly augmented by the continual increaſe of Henry's army; he therefore determined, at all events, to give him battle, and, by a general action, decide their diſpute for the Engliſh throne. He accordingly left Nottingham, and marching his forces with all expedition, the two armies came within ſight of each other at a place called Boſworth in Leiceſterſhire. The royal army which conſiſted of 12,000 men, all veterans, and well armed, were formed into two lines. The firſt was commanded by the duke of Norfolk; and the ſecond by Richard in perſon, who appeared that day with the royal diadem on his head. The earl's army did not conſiſt of much more than five thouſand men, but was alſo divided into two lines; the firſt commanded by the earl of Oxford, and the ſecond by himſelf in perſon: Sir Gilbert Talbot commanded the right wing, and Sir John Savage the left.

While the two armies, were preparing for battle, lord Stanley poſted himſelf, at the head of four thouſand men, on a piece of ground fronting the interval between the two armies, while his brother Sir William Stanley, with three thouſand, ſtood facing him on the other ſide of the interval. Richard, ſuſpecting Stanley's deſign, ſent him an order to join his army; but receiving an equivocal anſwer, he was ſo enraged, that he would have ſtruck off the head of his ſon, had he not been diſſuaded from that reſolution by ſome of his chief officers. They repreſented to him, that ſuch an act could be attended with no advantage, and would certainly provoke Stanley and his brother to join the enemy, though perhaps their intention at preſent might be to remain neuter, till near the concluſion of the battle, and then declare for the party that ſeemed to have gained the advantage. Richard ſubmitted to theſe reaſons, well knowing that if he ſhould defeat the earl of Richmond, he would then be enabled to take ample revenge on all his enemies.

The two armies now approached each other, and the battle was begun by a general diſcharge of arrows; after which the combat became cloſe and bloody. The duke of Norfolk made a motion to encloſe the left wing of Richmond's army, which being perceived by the earl of Oxford, he fell with the utmoſt fury upon Norfolk's diviſion, but was in the utmoſt danger of being ſurrounded. Lord Stanley ſaw that it would be impoſſible for him to extricate himſelf from his then ſituation without aſſiſtance, and therefore advanced at the head of his forces, and joining Oxford's line ſecured his flank, and ſtood ready to receive the front of the line commanded by the king in perſon. At the ſame time Sir William Stanley fell upon the flank of Richard's line, and drove them back upon the main body. Norfolk, however, advanced to the charge with more fury than ever, and a dreadful carnage enſued. But the battle was no longer equal; the royal forces were intimidated by the deſertion of Stanley and his brother; while it inſpired Henry's with unuſual courage. Senſible of his deſperate ſituation, the furious tyrant caſt his eyes around the field, and diſcovering his rival at no great diſtance, he ſoon opened himſelf a paſſage to the ſpot where Henry fought in perſon, killed Sir Henry Brandon, his ſtandard-bearer, unhorſed Sir John Cheyney, and advanced againſt Henry with all the fury of deſpair. He called aloud to him, challenging him to determine the conteſt by ſingle combat. This was readily accepted by Henry; but the two leaders were hardly engaged when Sir William Stanley, breaking in with his troops, ſurrounded Richard, who, after performing the moſt aſtoniſhing acts of valour, fell covered with wounds.

The death of Richard put an end to the conteſt; the royaliſts, deprived of their leader, immediately threw down their arms, and ſought their ſafety by a precipitate flight. No leſs than four thouſand of Richard's forces were ſlain on the field of battle, among whom were, the duke of Norfolk, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, Sir Robert Piercy, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction. Such was the iſſue of the battle of Boſworth, which terminated the quarrel between the two houſes of York and Lancaſter.

Richard's crown, being found in the field of battle, was brought to lord Stanley, who, placing it on Richmond's head, hailed him king; the victorious army repeatedly ſhouting, "Long live Henry VII. king of England.

The body of Richard being found among the ſlain was treated with the utmoſt indignity. It was faſtened acroſs a horſe, and in that ignominious manner conveyed to Leiceſter amidſt the ſhouts of the inſulting populace, where it was buried, with-without any ceremony, in the church of the Grey Friers.

Henry, by a policy that tended greatly to augment his power, pardoned all who ſubmitted to him. Sir William Cateſby, the tool of Richard's crimes, was the only perſon that ſuffered. He was diſcovered after the battle, and being conveyed to Leiceſter, was there beheaded. Lord Lovel, and the two Staffords, who had incurred the univerſal odium of the people for their attachment to the tyrant, would, in all probability, have ſuffered the ſame fate, had they fallen into the hands of the victor; but they fortunately made their eſcape, and took ſanctuary in the abbey of Colcheſter.

Thus fell Richard III. in the 34th year of his age, and the third of his uſurped reign. He was one of the moſt deteſtable tyrants that ever diſgraced a throne. He was low in ſtature, and had a gloomy aſpect. One of his arms was withered, and one ſhoulder higher than the other, from whence he acquired the ſurname of Crook-back. Nor was his mind leſs deformed than his body: dark, ſilent and reſerved, he was ſuch a maſter of diſſimulation, that it was impoſſible to dive into his deſigns: falſe, treacherous and ungrateful, he ſcrupled not to violate the moſt ſacred ties of religion and conſcience, whenever he found it conducive to the gratification of his ambition. In ſhort, his numberleſs and atrocious crimes compoſe ſuch a ſcene of horrid guilt as hardly ever centered in any other perſon, and have rendered his name the object of univerſal deteſtation to all ſucceeding generations.

Marriage of Arther prince of Wales and the princeſs Margaret. Deaths of Arthur and the queen. Extortions of the king and his miniſters Empſon and Dudley. Revolt of the earl of Suffolk. Henry becomes deſpotic, and aſſembles a parliament, who comply with his avaricious demands. Death and character of Henry VII.

A. D. 1485. THE victorious earl having by conqueſt ſecured a ſtill ſtronger title to the throne to which he had already an hereditary claim, made his triumphant entry into London on the twenty-ſeventh day of Auguſt, applauded by the ſhouts of a grateful people, who hailed him as their deliverer from a tyrant's power, and as the man whoſe happy union with the amiable princeſs Elizabeth was to put a total end to the civil diſſenſions which had for ſo many years ſubſiſted between the contending families of York and Lancaſter.

The firſt object which employed his attention, was gratitude to the Supreme Being, the God of battles, who had led him on to conqueſt, and had afforded him this joyful opportunity of offering up to him in his holy temple, the trophies he had obtained. In the cathedral of St. Paul's therefore he accordingly offered up the ſtandard of the enemy, and after divine ſervice, returned to his apartments in the epiſcopal palace, where in a council of the nobility aſſembled for that purpoſe, he renewed the oath he had before taken to eſpouſe the virtuous princeſs Elizabeth.

Having diſcharged his duty to his God, Henry's next care was to promote the friends who had aſſiſted him. Of theſe his uncle Jaſper, earl of Pembroke, the faithful guardian of his early years, and protector againſt the deſigns of his adverſaries, was rewarded with the title of duke of Bedford. His father-in-law Thomas Stanley, to whom he was indebted for his ſucceſs in Boſworth field, he created earl of Derby; and Edward lord Courteney, earl of Devonſhire.

On the thirtieth of October, (the day of his coronation, and which ſolemnity was performed by Bourchier archbiſhop of Canterbury) he inſtituted a body guard of fifty archers, under the command of a captain, which has been ever ſince maintained, and is ſtill known by the title of yeomen of the king's guard.

The parliament which met at Weſtminſter entailed the crown upon Henry, with perpetual reverſion to the legitimate heirs of his body. The next ſtep was to reverſe the attainder which had been iſſued againſt Henry and his adherents, and to paſs the ſame againſt ſeveral of thoſe who had eſpouſed the cauſe of the late uſurper Richard.

The amount of theſe confiſcations was ſo conſiderable as to preclude the neceſſity of aſking a ſupply from parliament, ſo that Henry found by theſe means an ample gratification both for his revenge and his avarice. And now in conſequence of a general pardon to thoſe who had taken up arms againſt him, great numbers quitted their ſanctuaries, and took an oath of allegiance to their new ſovereign.

On the diſſolution of the parliament, Henry remitted money to the French king, to reimburſe him for what he had advanced, towards the ſupplies he had furniſhed him with preparatory to his arrival arrival in England. John Moreton, biſhop of Ely, and Richard Fox biſhop of Exeter, were ſworn of his moſt honourable privy council, the former of whom ſucceeded cardinal Bourchier as archbiſhop of Canterbury, and to the latter was committed the cuſtody of the great ſeal, and theſe two prelates, from the great power with which they were inveſted, and the diſtinguiſhed protection of their royal maſter, directed the principal affairs of government.

A. D. 1486. In conſequence of his promiſe to eſpouſe the princeſs Elizabeth, Henry found himſelf indiſpenſibly bound to ſolemnize his nuptials with her, which were accordingly celebrated with great joy and feſtivity on the 18th of January. After the ceremony Henry took a journey into the northern counties, and paſſed his Eaſter holidays at Lincoln, in hopes of conciliating the affections of his people by his preſence and acts of liberality.

During his abode in that city, he was made acquainted with the news of lord Lovel, together with Humphrey and Thomas Stafford, having privately quitted their ſanctuary at Colcheſter. Undiſmayed, however, at theſe tidings, he purſued his journey to York, towards which city he was informed that three or four thouſand men were on their march with Lovel at their head, and that the city of Worceſter was already inveſted by the Staffords. Henry could not help being alarmed at this intelligence, as he ſuſpected thoſe rebellious leaders actually held a correſpondence at that time with the party among whom he now reſided. He, however, concealed his ſuſpicions, and iſſued commiſſions for immediately raiſing men throughout the county of York; which was ſo ſucceſsfully accompliſhed, that in a ſhort ſpace of time a body of three thouſand men was levied, and the command of them given to the duke of Bedford.

The duke thus empowered to act againſt the rebels, was nevertheleſs ſtrictly enjoined to avoid a general engagement, the men being not only undiſciplined, but alſo of a very ſuſpicious attachment; and on his approach, to declare the king's free pardon to all ſuch as ſhould lay down their arms. This wiſe expedient had the deſired effect; and Lovel, through fear of being deſerted by his troops, retired alone into Lancaſhire, from whence he croſſed the ſea, and repaired to the court of the ducheſs dowager of Burgundy.

This event being communicated to the Staffords, they quitted the ſiege of Worceſter, and being deſerted by their men, fled for ſanctuary to the church of Coleſham, near Abingdon; but the privileges of that place not extending to the crimes of high treaſon, they were forcibly dragged from thence, and Humphrey, the elder brother, was executed at Tyburn. The younger brother, Thomas, on account of his youth, and being conſidered as influenced by the evil ſuggeſtions of the other, obtained the king's pardon.

The queen's delivery of her ſon prince Arthur, which happened on the twentieth of September, gave hopes to the nation that the king's lukewarm affections would, by this fortunate event, be kindled into an ardour of conjugal love; but when they found him ſtill inſenſible to her attractions, and that he ſtill delayed her coronation, ſhewing on every occaſion a rooted inveteracy to the family of York, to whom the people were for the moſt part attached, their diſlike of him daily encreaſed, and they began to fear they had only exchanged one tyrant for another.

It may be ſuppoſed that his enemies were not backward in promulgating ſuch an inſinuation: reports were privately circulated, that he intended to murder the earl of Warwick; and that the duke of York had eſcaped from the power of his uncle Richard; and was ſtill in being on ſome part of the continent. The people greatly inclined to favour this report, ſuggeſted to one Richard Simon, an Oxford prieſt, a ſcheme equally hazardous and ridiculous. The eccleſiaſtic had a pupil named Lambert Simnel, natural ſon of a baker in that city, a youth of quick parts, and uncommon perſonal endowments; and his deſign was to inſtruct this youth to paſs himſelf upon the world for Richard duke of York, ſecond ſon of Edward IV.

While this ſcheme was in agitation, and the neceſſary inſtructions preparing, a rumour prevailed that Edward Plantagenet, earl of Warwick, had eſcaped from the Tower: Simon therefore, thinking he had found out a more plauſible device, reſolved that Simnel ſhould perſonate that young nobleman, though pretty generally known among the people. Simon ſpared no pains in qualifying his pupil for the taſk, and when he looked upon him as ſufficiently inſtructed in his part, went with him over to Ireland, where he thought he would be leſs liable to detection than in England, and where the memory of Clarence, who had been their governor, was ſtill held in the higheſt reſpect.

Henry had been apprized of ſome deſigns forming in Ireland to his prejudice, and therefore ſummoned the earl of Kildare, (deputy to the duke of Bedford, viceroy of that kingdom) to appear perſonally at his court in London; but by the intereſt that nobleman had in the council, he found means to evade complying with the order, by ſtating the indiſpenſible neceſſity of his preſence in Ireland.

Immediately after Simnel's arrival in Dublin, he publickly aſſumed the character of the earl of Warwick, and as ſuch preſented himſelf to the earl of Kildare, to whom he gave a ſpecious account of his eſcape from the Tower, and though the deputy and his brother did not think it ſafe to eſpouſe his cauſe openly, they, by their connivance, ſecretly favoured the impoſture. Having concealed their own ſentiments till they ſhould diſcover thoſe of the people, they were ſoon convinced they might with ſafety avow them; for Simnel received a welcome reception as the ſon of that Clarence whom they had ſo highly eſteemed. The earl of Kildare and his brother the chancellor, having conſulted their friends upon the ſubject waited upon Simnel at his habitation, and conducted him with great pomp to the caſtle, where he was treated conformably to his ſuppoſed rank and diſtinction. Simnel, on his part, acquitted himſelf with ſo much dexterity, that he actually impoſed upon many, who had at firſt entertained ſuſpicions of the fraud; and the people in general ſoon became ſo attached to him, that he was ſhortly after proclaimed in Dublin king of England, by the title of Edward VI.

A. D. 1487. Alarmed at a circumſtance of ſuch weight and importance, the king's fears were not without reaſon excited, leſt the torch of diſcord, which had been ſo rapidly kindled in Ireland, ſhould communicate its deſtructive flames to England, and involve both kingdoms in one general conflagration. In the midſt of this perplexity, Henry called a council, to deliberate on the neceſſary ſteps to be taken to avert the impending danger; and the queen-dowager being, by Henry's order, arreſted and confined in the monaſtery of Ber-mondsey, and her estate confiscated without the form of a trial, it has been generally supposed that his suspicions of her, as a party concerned, were the grounds of her severe treatment, especially as he could never be prevailed on to set her at liberty.

Henry now finding the people divided in their opinions of this story of Simnel, resolved to convince them of the delusion, by causing the real earl of Warwick to be conducted publickly through the streets of London, and he was even permitted to visit many individuals, who entertained the profoundest respect for his person and family. The impostor, however, notwithstanding this precaution, found a strenuous and zealous adherent in John earl of Lincoln, whom his uncle Richard III. had declared presumptive heir to the crown, and who, in support of his claim, actually embarked for Flanders, to concert with his aunt Margaret, duchess dowager of Burgundy, such measures as were most likely to facilitate the success of the undertaking.

The duchess, justly irritated at king Henry's treatment of her neice, and his unconquerable aversion to all the friends of the house of York, entered with alacrity into all the designs of Simnel, and with the concurrence of Lincoln and Lovel engaged to supply him with two thousand German troops of experienced valour, commanded by one Martin Swartz, an officer of great courage and conduct, who were to embark for Ireland, and form a junction with the forces of the newly created monarch.

About the beginning of May these auxiliaries arrived in Dublin, soon after which it was determined in the council to crown Simnel in the most public manner. A crown was accordingly taken from a statue of the Virgin Mary, carried to the cathedral church of Dublin, and there placed on the head of the impostor by the bishop of Meath.

The ceremony was no sooner finished than it was resolved, in the pretender's council, immediately to invade England, where they doubted not but all the zealous adherents of the family of York would readily join in every measure to dethrone Henry.

A. D. 1488. Having caused fortifications to be erected along the eastern coast, the king returned to London, where he had the mortification to hear that the earl of Lincoln and his continental supplies had landed in Ireland; in consequence of which he collected all the forces he could muster to the environs of Coventry, where he resolved to wait for more substantial information. Here he soon learned that Simnel and his party were landed in the county of Lancaster, and that some few malecontents had already repaired to his standard. In their progress towards York, however, instead of seeing their numbers increase as they had expected, they found themselves miserably deceived; for the inhabitants dreading the miscarriage of the enterprize, or not disposed to reverence a king set up by a confederacy of Irish and Germans, resolved to discountenance the scheme, and the earl of Lincoln fearing his troops might take the alarm at the backwardness of the English to support them, resolved to make the best use of the forces he had yet under his command, and engage the king's army, before their expected reinforcements should arrive.

In order to this he altered his manœuvres, and took his route towards Newark, which he formed a design of attacking before the royalists could receive any succours. The king in the mean time, with six thousand men, having reached Nottingham, was there joined by as many more, headed by the earl of Shrewsbury, and determined to risque a battle with the rebels at all events.

The two armies met in a small plain near the village of Stoke, where they attacked each other with amazing impetuosity; but fortune soon decided in favour of the royalists. The rebels after an obstinate resistance, sustained a total defeat, in which four thousand men, (among whom was Count Martin Swartz, and the earls of Lincoln and Kildare) were slain on the spot. Nor was the king's army exempted from loss on this day's action, one half of his foremost ranks having fallen victims to the fury of the rebels. The ideal prince and his instructor were both taken prisoners; but Henry, rightly conceiving that contempt was the propereſt punishment he could inflict on him, placed him in his kitchen where he discharged the office of a turnspit, and was ranked among the meanest of the king's menial domestics. Simon the priest was committed to prison, and no farther mention is afterwards made of him.

As soon as the rebellion was suppressed the king proceeded to Lincoln, and from thence to York, inflicting in his way severe punishments on all who had espoused the cause of Simnel, or who propagated a suggestion that the royal army had been defeated, as such a rumour had prevented some powerful barons from joining the king before the action. The lives of these delinquents, however, were spared, and their punishment confined either to confiscation of their fortunes and effects, or imprisonment for life.

In the course of his northern progress Henry discovered that the general discontent among his subjects arose from the severity shewn to the friends of the house of York, and the unaccountable delay of the queen's coronation. In order, therefore, to redress this grievance, having returned triumphantly to London about the beginning of November, he, on the following day, went to St. Paul's church, and joined in a publick thanksgiving for his late success against the rebels. The duke of Bedford was then appointed high-steward for the coronation of the queen, which was solemnized, with the usual formalities, on the twenty-fifth of November, upwards of two years after her marriage.

A. D. 1489. Henry being now called upon to assist the duke of Britany, he summoned a parliament, to whom he applied for a subsidy for that purpose. A tax was accordingly voted upon all personal estates and moveables. No difficulty was found in levying this tax in any part of the kingdom, except Yorkshire and the bishoprick of Durham, which counties being firmly attached to the interest of the House of York, detested the then government, and for that reason refused to submit to the payment of the new duty, which they considered as an intolerable imposition.

Finding the people so obstinate in their resistance, the commissioners were obliged to make application to the earl of Northumberland, who wrote to court for instructions how to act. The king absolutely refused to dispense with the assessment, alledging that such a partial exemption might afford just cause of complaint in the rest of the counties, which would certainly claim an equal right to dispute the payment of the tax.

The earl, having called a meeting of the justices and freeholders of the county, communicated to them the king's answer in so peremptory a manner, as not only confirmed them in their former resolutions olutions, but provoked their reſentment againſt himelf, and a mob being raiſed, they ruſhed into his ouſe and murdered him and ſeveral of his domeſtics.

The people were inſtigated to this oppoſition by a ertain popular incendiary, named John Chamber, nd appointing for their leader Sir John Egremont, zealous adherent of the houſe of York, they declared their reſolution to march to London, and id defiance to the royaliſts. Henry, on hearing of this inſurrection, ſent a body of troops to oppoſe hem, commanded by the earl of Surry, who had been releaſed from the tower, and received again into favour.

This nobleman's firſt attack was ſo ſucceſsful, that the rebels were inſtantly defeated, and Chamber taken priſoner. Sir John Egremont, however, eſcaped and fled for refuge to the ducheſs-dowager of Burgundy. The king followed the earl of Surry with a very ſtrong reinforcement, and proceeded to York, where John Chamber and ſome of his accomplices were hanged, and the reſt of the malecontents received a pardon.

Having appointed the earl of Surry his lieutenant in the north, and Sir Richard Temſtal principal commiſſioner for levying the duties, his majeſty returned to London, where he received the melancholy tidings of the defeat of the duke of Britany at St. Aubin.

At this period likewiſe a rebellion was raiſed in Scotland againſt James III. at the inſtigation of his own ſon. James, having retired to Edinburgh caſtle, applied to the kings of England and France for aſſiſtance, and obtained a promiſe of ſupport. The rebels notwithſtanding prevailed, and his ſon James, then but fifteen years of age, was proclaimed king, and in July ambaſſadors arrived at the Engliſh court with the notification of his acceſſion to the throne of Scotland.

A. D. 1490. Henry now began to take into conſideration the neceſſary means for promoting the landed intereſt of the kingdom. And as the encouragement of agriculture was juſtly deemed the barrier of the Engliſh government, and its beſt defence againſt the encroachments of the nobility, this became the primary object of his attention, in purſuance of which his firſt ſtep was to aboliſh the feudal law, which placed upon an equal footing the gentleman and the ſlave. He had, by theſe means, an opportunity of obſerving that the progreſs of trade and agriculture advanced in proportion to the increaſe of freemen, and the conſequent decline of the power of the barons.

It is well known that war is ever the ruin of huſbandry; and the late commotions had proved ſo deſtructive to the peaſants, and had made ſuch dreadful havock in the realm, that the arable lands were for the moſt part converted to paſture; towns and villages were deſolated, the eccleſiaſtical revenues greatly diminiſhed, and the king deprived of many of his moſt valuable ſubjects.

To reſtore theſe paſtures to the beneficial purpoſes of the ſtate, by improving them and rendering them fit objects of cultivation, an act was paſſed, "that all houſes of huſbandry, that were occupied with twenty acres of ground and upwards, ſhould be manured and kept up for ever, together with a competent proportion of land to be uſed and occupied with it." This ſalutary law tended to aggrandize the fortunes of the cottagers or villains, and raiſe them from their abject ſituations, to the enviable ſtate of wealth and independence.

A. D. 1491. The marriage of the French king with the ducheſs of Britany, terminated the diſputes between the duke and that monarch, an event the moſt unwelcome and diſpleaſing to king Henry, who, though he long dreaded it, had neglected the proper means for its prevention. For at the time when, to ſatiate his avarice, he was employed in drawing a deed of ſecurity for the ſums he had advanced in Britany, he ſhould have turned his thoughts towards the reinforcement of the allied army.

A. D. 1492. Henry, having conceived a reſolution to re-aſſert the rights of his anceſtors to the kingdom of France, ſignified his intention to the parliament, which, at the commencement of the year, he had called together for that purpoſe. The brilliant ſucceſſes at Creſſy, Poictiers, and Agincourt, were alledged as inducements to put this great deſign in execution, together with the victories formerly obtained by the valour of a few brave Engliſhmen over the moſt formidable armies, in France. Arguments were drawn to urge the neceſſity of raiſing ſupplies adequate to the importance of the enterprize; and that theſe ſupplies might not prove a burden upon the induſtrious labourer and uſeful artificer, the king recommended to them, that they ſhould be drawn from the purſes of the opulent, who were beſt able to contribute towards them.

An object ſo important as the acquiſition of the kingdom of France, was not to be withſtood by the commons; ſo that they not only ſtimulated Henry to purſue his undertaking with vigour, but granted him the ſubſidy with the greateſt chearfulneſs, and, at his particular requeſt, authoriſed him to levy a contribution on the wealthieſt ſubjects throughout his dominions.

It appeared, however, that Henry's intentions were far from being directed towards applying theſe reſources to the purpoſe for which he had obtained them. As avarice was his ruling paſſion, to gratify that paſſiſion was the ſole aim of all his ſpecious pretences, and the parliament was no ſooner diſſolved, than he received an embaſſy from France with propoſals which he never thought fit to communicate; but as a peace was concluded in the courſe of the ſame year, it was judged that the preliminaries of that peace were the object of the embaſſy. By this treaty it was agreed that Charles ſhould diſcharge the debt contracted by his queen for the defence of Britany, and that Henry ſhould be paid the arrears of the ſubſidy granted by the late king of France to Edward the Fourth of England. No wonder then if an agreement from which the people were not to derive the leaſt advantage ſhould excite their reſentment, at being fleeced for the purpoſe of enriching himſelf, under the oſtenſible pretence of carrying on the war againſt the common enemy.

Nor was Henry himſelf unconſcious of having brought upon himſelf the popular clamour: he ſaw but too plainly the hearts of his ſubjects daily alienated from their allegiance. The general diſcontent which now prevailed was not a little fomented by a new pretender to the the crown, much more formidable than Simnel. This new claimant made his firſt appearance on the continent, under the name of Richard Plantagenet duke of York, ſecond ſon of Edward IV. ſuppoſed to have eſcaped from the tower after the death of his brother.

The father of this impoſtor was ſaid to have been a jew at Tournay, of the name of Oſbeck, or Warbeck, who after his converſion came over to England and reſided in London, where this ſon of his his was born and baptized by the name of Peter, corrupted, after the Flemiſh manner, into Peterkin or Perkin. It was generally ſuppoſed that Edward had carried on an illicit correſpondence with the wife of Warbeck, which ſeems to account for the ſtriking reſemblance young Perkin bore to that monarch, and from this likeneſs he was judged a fit inſtrument to impoſe himſelf upon the people as the duke of York.

Perkin, after ſome years reſidence in England, had been removed by his parents to Flanders, where he retained his native language, and, by aſſociating with gentlemen of his own country, had acquired the moſt elegant accompliſhments of body and mind. Theſe attractions procured him the notice of the ducheſs-dowager of Burgundy, who, anxious to deſtroy the tranquillity of Henry, found this youth extremely well ſuited to her purpoſes. She accordingly furniſhed him with his inſtructions to repreſent the duke of York, and, in this aſſumed character, to aſſert his claim to the throne of England. That he might not be found deficient in any reſpect he was made acquainted with all the peculiarities relative to the duke he was to perſonate, together with the moſt minute deſcription of the perſons of his ſuppoſed parents and relations, and every tranſaction in the court of Edward, which a child of eleven years of age could be deemed capable of noticing and retaining.

To prevent, however, any ſuſpicion of her ſecret deſigns, ſhe contrived that Perkin ſhould accompany the Lady Brompton to Portugal, where he ſhould continue until Henry declared war againſt France. He was then ordered by the ducheſs to make his firſt appearance in Ireland, where he was moſt likely to gain credit and ſupport, from the invariable attachment of that nation to the family of York. Agreeable to theſe inſtructions the pretended Richard Plantagenet, duke of York, landed at Cork, as the ſecond ſon of king Edward IV. The credulity of the people gave him credit for his pretenſions, and great numbers flocked to him from all parts. Thus far encouraged he wrote to the earls of Deſmond and Kildare, ſoliciting their ſupport, in vindication of his rights, with the addition of all their dependents over whom they had any influence. The ſtrange ſtories he circulated concerning his eſcape from the cruel deſigns of his uncle Richard were ſwallowed with uncommon avidity; and the more incredible the particulars he related, the greater degree of confidence he ſeemed to obtain.

From Ireland his fame extended to France, whoſe monarch ſent ambaſſadors to invite him to his court, where he was received with all the honours due to the perſon he repreſented. At the concluſion of the late peace, Henry applied to Charles, but without effect, for the ſurrender of his perſon. But though the French king refuſed to infringe the laws of hoſpitality, he aſſured Henry, he ſhould have no aſſiſtance from him to ſupport his claim to the throne of England; ſo that finding himſelf bereft of every hope from that quarter, he was obliged to withdraw to Flanders, where he had the art to obtain admittance as a ſtranger into the preſence of the ducheſs-dowager, from whom he had received all his inſtructions.

That ſhe might, however, exempt herſelf from any ſuſpicion of privity to his deſigns, Margaret thought it neceſſary to pretend ignorance of his perſon, and ſeeming to doubt his veracity, cauſed him to undergo a public examination, in which he acquitted himſelf with ſo much dignity, that he left not the leaſt doubt in the whole aſſembly of his being the real Richard Plantagenet duke of York. Convinced, therefore, that ſhe ran no riſque in ſo doing, ſhe now acknowledged him as her nephew, and as ſhe thought proper to call him, the White Roſe of England, the diſtinction by which the houſe of York was known, as that of Lancaſter was by that of the red, during the civil broils between the two contending families.

The Engliſh, ready to avail themſelves of every opportunity of manifeſting their averſion to the king, partly from that motive, and partly from their natural credulity, were perfectly inclined to favour the impoſture. Lord Fitzwalter, Sir Simon Mountfort, Sir Thomas Thwaits, and Sir Robert Clifford, were among thoſe who joined in the confederacy to aſſert the pretenſions of Perkin; but the perſon whoſe influence bore the greateſt ſway in this aſſociation, was Sir William Stanley, the lord chamberlain, whoſe brother (the celebrated lord Stanley) had been the principal inſtrument in placing Henry on the throne.

The abettors of this faction eſtabliſhed a correſpondence with the malcontents in Flanders, and emiſſaries were employed at the court of Burgundy, who, after converſing freely with the young pretender, wrote ſatisfactory letters to the confederates, to aſſure them of his veracity and identity.

While this conſpiracy was carrying on and daily acquiring new ſtrength from every quarter, Henry, who received but a confuſed intimation of it, diſpatched agents to find out the particulars of the impoſtor's birth and education, and to diſcover who were his ſecret abettors. The better to ſucceed in his enquiries, he deviſed a ſcheme by which he might diſcover the ſuſpected parties. He ordered all the agents he had employed in this inveſtigation to be excommunicated at St. Paul's, and their names entered in the bead-roll of the king's enemies, according to the eſtabliſhed practice of the times; beſides this, he endeavoured to come at the ſecret diſpoſitions of the nobility, by tampering with their ſervants for that purpoſe. And while he was ſo aſſiduous in procuring the deſired intelligence, he was no leſs ſo in producing the moſt incontrovertible evidences of the murder of the duke of York in the Tower. Among theſe were the confeſſions of Sir James Tyrrel and his ſervant Dighton, who made no ſcruple to avow themſelves the horrid perpetrators of this atrocious act of cruelty. This proof of the two young princes having been ſmothered in the tower, ſtanding barely upon the aſſertion of perſons of ſuch an infamous character, was but little credited, and ſeemed for want of better ſupport to confirm many in their belief that Perkin was the identical duke of York, and as ſuch entitled to every aſſiſtance they could give him.

The myſterious conduct of Henry on this occaſion ſerved but to ſtrengthen the general opinion as to the validity of Perkin's claim, for the intelligence he had received of the life of that adventurer was not publickly notified by proclamation, but only circulated in dark and incongruous reports by his courtiers and dependents.

While affairs remained in this perplexed and intricate ſituation, the king had diſperſed his ſpies throughout all Flanders, and by conſiderable bribes had gained over ſome whom he knew to be in the intereſt of his enemy. Sir Robert Clifford was the moſt conſpicuous among theſe, from whom he obtained the whole particulars of Perkin's birth and and tranſactions, together with the names of thoſe who had ſecretly combined in his cauſe.

Henry now diſpatched ambaſſadors to the archduke, repreſenting Margaret as the contriver of this impoſture, and inſiſting on the ſurrender of Perkin, who had no right to protection according to the law of nations, but ought to be treated as a pirate, and a nuiſance to ſociety. The archduke in reply, teſtified his great regard to the Engliſh monarch, but alledged he had no power to controul the actions of the ducheſs-dowager, whoſe authority was abſolute in her own dominions.

Incenſed at the ingratitude of many of his courtiers, (a liſt of whom Sir Robert Clifford had delivered to the king, in which were inſerted the names of thoſe with whom the ducheſs and Perkin maintained a correſpondence) orders were iſſued for apprehending lord Fitzwalter, Sir Simon Mountford, Sir Thomas Thwaits, William Daubigny, John and Robert Ratcliff, Thomas Creſſenor, and Thomas Aſhwood, who were arreſted, arraigned, convicted and condemned for holding a treaſonable correſpondence with the king's enemies. Mountford, Ratcliff, and Daubigny were immediately executed. The lord Fitz-Walter was conveyed to Calais, where, being unable to brook confinement, he made an attempt to eſcape, but being diſcovered was condemned to ſuffer death, and the reſt of the conſpirators were pardoned and ſet at liberty.

The principal delinquent ſtill remaining to be puniſhed was, Sir William Stanley, whoſe office of Chamberlain, and whoſe reſpectable connexions in the kingdom ſeemed to exempt him from cenſure. That he might not, however, elude the hand of juſtice, Clifford was ordered over to England, and to accuſe him in perſon, which he did to the ſurprize of all who heard him. Henry affected to receive this intelligence as falſe and malicious; but Clifford perſiſting in his charge, Stanley was committed to priſon, and ſhortly after brought before the privy-council. On his examination he readily acknowledged the juſtneſs of the charge exhibited againſt him by Clifford, either imagining that an open confeſſion might ſerve as an atonement, or relying on his former ſervices for ſafety and forgiveneſs. But in this he found himſelf miſtaken; for after a delay of ſix weeks, (during which the king affected to deliberate on his conduct) he was brought to trial, condemned, and ſhortly after beheaded.

A. D. 1494. Upon the extinction of this confederacy, Henry turned his attention to the affairs of Ireland, where he was informed Perkin had ſecured himſelf a very conſiderable party. He appointed his ſecond ſon Henry, then only in the third year of his age, Lieutenant of that kingdom, and Sir Edward Poynings his deputy in the adminiſtration of the civil and military departments of government.

Sir Edward, on his arrival in Ireland, made a very diligent and ſtrict enquiry into the conduct of all thoſe who had rendered themſelves liable to ſuſpicion, and particularly the earls of Deſmond and Kildare, who had carried on an epiſtolary correſpondence with the pretender. Theſe, however, both experienced the king's clemency, and received a free pardon, which was afterwards extended to all the rebels in that kingdom, the king wiſely judging that there was no way ſo likely to cruſh the ſeeds of rebellion as by acts of mercy, which for that reaſon he thought proper to adopt in preference to that rigour and ſeverity which had already created him ſo many enemies, and eſpecially in a country, the inhabitants of which were ſo generally attached to the intereſts of the houſe of York.

The influence of Henry's inſatiable avarice got the better of all the deſigns his clemency had ſuggeſted; and though he was deemed the richeſt ſovereign that ever ſat on the Engliſh throne, his abundance ſerved only to excite his rapacious deſires. Nothing could ſtop his avidity for accumulating riches. He enforced the execution of the penal laws, ſo that no ſubject, however exalted his ſtation, was ſafe. Payments only could protect the rich, and inability defend the poor.

The firſt object of his ſeverity was Sir William Capel, Alderman of London, who was falſely accuſed, and condemned in the ſum of 2700 pounds, 1600 of of which was accepted by way of compoſition; but the moſt flagrant inſtance of his extortion and ingratitude, was his proſecution of the lord chamberlain Stanley, by whoſe death the king found himſelf in poſſeſſion of an eſtate of three thouſand pounds a year, beſides forty thouſand marks in caſh and plate, together with jewels, furniture and effects, to an immenſe value, in his caſtle of Holt.

So many complicated inſtances of avarice and ingratitude could not fail to incur the popular reſentment, which was exhibited in the moſt acrimonious and ſatirical libels againſt the judges, the council, and the king himſelf, in revenge for which five perſons of inferior rank, who were detected in diſtributing them, were executed on a charge of high treaſon.

A. D. 1495. The next ſummer Henry took another journey into the North, under colour of paying a viſit to the earl of Derby, to vindicate to him his proceedings againſt the late lord chamberlain, who was brother to that nobleman.

Perkin Warbeck having been furniſhed with ſome ſhips and a number of forces to enable him to make a deſcent in England, reſolved not to neglect this favourable opportunity. In the month of July, therefore, he embarked and landing ſome of his party on the Kentiſh coaſt, began to ſound the diſpoſitions of the inhabitants.

Notwithſtanding an attempt made to perſuade the gentlemen of the country, that a powerful force was preparing in Flanders to ſupport the duke of York's pretenſions, they, inſtead of joining them as they were ſolicited, endeavoured, by fair promiſes, to decoy the impoſtor on ſhore, in order to ſecure his perſon and deliver him up to the king's reſentment. The cautious youth, however, refuſed to hazard his ſafety on theſe flattering aſſurances, and the diſappointed Engliſh avenged themſelves of his want of confidence, by putting to the ſword all whom he had landed, except about an hundred and fifty, who were conducted to London, and afterwards hanged on gibbets erected along the ſea-coaſt.

In conſequence of this diſaſter, Perkin returned to Flanders; but, in about three months after, effected a ſecond landing in Ireland, where he expected the like favourable reception he had before met with from the partizans of the houſe of York. But theſe hopes were now entirely defeated, the king having taken every meaſure for ſuppreſſing all tumults and inſurrections in that part of his dominions. Diſappointed, therefore, in his deſigns in Ireland, he determined to try his fortune in Scotland, where, indeed, his affairs ſeemed to wear a more more benignant aſpect. On demanding an audience of James the Fourth of that nation, he was cordially received by that weak monarch, who not only gave implicit credit to the ſtory of his birth and adventures, but even honoured him with ſo great a degree of confidence, as to give him lady Catherine Gordon in marriage, a lady endowed with a great ſhare of beauty and underſtanding, who was daughter of the earl of Huntley, and nearly related to himſelf.

A. D. 1496. Nor did the favours of the Scottiſh king ſtop here; for, not ſatisfied with having afforded Perkin ſhelter at his court, he determined to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to put him in poſſeſſion of the crown of England. A manifeſto was according publiſhed, in which Henry was ſtigmatized as an uſurper, tyrant and murderer; and the moſt ſeducing promiſes held out to ſuch as ſhould join their lawful prince, and inveſt him with the crown of which he had been unjuſtly deprived. This proceeding, however, was attended with no ſucceſs notwithſtanding the ſpirited manner in which it was ſet on foot. The Engliſh were too well acquainted with the rigour of their reigning monarch, and thought it highly impolitic to entruſt their ſafety and poſſeſſions to a ſtranger, even though he ſhould prove to be the legitimate offspring of Edward IV. So that finding the Engliſh refuſed the leaſt aſſiſtance, James deſpaired of accompliſhing the buſineſs he had begun, and contented himſelf with ravaging the country, to indemnify himſelf for the charges of the expedition.

The conſequences, however, of this attempt, unſucceſsful as it proved, were not deemed worthy to be ſlighted by Henry, who could not but be conſcious of the progreſs Perkin had hitherto made in the affection of his ſubjects, the influence of the Yorkiſts over the Iriſh, together with the convenient ſituation of the invader, to embrace the firſt opportunity of making another trial. With this unfavourable proſpect before him, the king thought it beſt, at all events, to provide againſt contingencies, and therefore iſſued a general pardon to all the Iriſh who had taken up arms in behalf of the pretender, which he ſuppoſed would prevent their engaging a ſecond time in any future rebellion. And in order to ſecure an alliance with James, he empowered Richard Fox, biſhop of Durham, to offer that prince his eldeſt daughter in marriage.

A. D. 1497. The late interference of James in favour of Perkin furniſhed Henry with a pretence to apply for a new ſubſidy. In January therefore he called a parliament in which he urged the neceſſity of carrying on a war with Scotland, for which a ſum of money muſt be immediately raiſed, not that this plea had any foundation in reality, but that his boundleſs rapacity would in reſources find at leaſt a temporary gratification. Not doubting the ſucceſs of his negotiation with Scotland, he determined to be ſpeedy in levying the tax which had been granted, fearful leſt the concluſion of a peace might put it out of his power.

But the collection of this ſubſidy was attended with more difficulty than he had foreſeen; for the inhabitants of Cornwall abſolutely refuſed to contribute ſupplies for the ſafety of the weſtern counties, and reſolved never to ſubmit to ſo intolerable a grievance. Theſe diſcontents were greatly aggravated by Michael Joſeph, a farrier of Bodmin, who was ever a popular orator in the cauſe of faction. With him was joined Thomas Flammock, a clamorous lawyer; and theſe two undertook to harangue the people, who they ſaid ought not to be burdened with the expences of a Scottiſh war, as the fiefs of the crown were the proper funds appropriated to ſuch purpoſes. The populace thus convinced of the illegality of this meaſure, put themſelves under the guidance of Joſeph and Flammock, who readily quitted their reſpective profeſſions and undertook to conduct the enterprize, till ſome perſon of rank ſhould aſſume the command.

Weapons of various kinds were immediately procured, armed with which, and headed by theſe leaders, the inſurgents, marched through the counties of Devon and Somerſet, and picked up a number of ſtragglers in their way. Their firſt exploit was at Taunton, where they murdered a collector, who had been rather rigid in the diſcharge of his duty.

On their arrival at Wells they were joined by Lord Audley, a popular nobleman, of a reſtleſs ambitious and factious diſpoſition, to whom the command was now transferred, and who led them with all expedition towards London, threatning vengeance againſt the king's commiſſioners, but committing, however, no devaſtation, by the way. Nevertheleſs, inſtead of continuing their route to the capital, which had been their original intention, they pitched their camp on Blackheath, between Eltham and Greenwich. Their object in ſo doing was the hopes of being joined by the Kentiſh inhabitants, many of whom had been remarked for their zeal and attachment to the cauſe of freedom. But in this part of their project they failed, the nobility and freeholders having taken ſuch prudent precautions, that not a ſingle man could be obtained, which ſo intimidated many of the rebels, that they returned to their own habitations.

Although Henry had ſuffered the inſurgents to proceed thus far without interruption, he was yet reſolved to keep a conſiderable reſerve of troops in the ſouthern parts of the kingdom, having previouſly provided againſt the danger of a Scottiſh invaſion by detaching the earl of Surry with an army to defend the northern frontiers.

Hearing that the rebels had committed no acts of violence on their way, he put himſelf in no great haſte to oppoſe them, but employed himſelf in ſounding the diſpoſitions of the counties through which they paſſed, and flattered himſelf that the length and fatigue of their march would tire them out, and induce them to diſperſe.

The Londoners were, notwithſtanding, filled with dreadful apprehenſions, till they ſaw the king concert meaſures for their ſecurity, and even take up his ſtation between them and the enemy. Henry was no ſooner informed that the rebels had encamped on Black-heath, than he ranged his army in three diviſions, one of which commanded by the earl of Oxford was prepared to cut off their retreat, and attack them in the rear as occaſion ſhould require. Lord d'Aubigny having the command of the ſecond body, was to engage them in front, and Henry himſelf was encamped with the third diviſion in St. George's Fields, in order that he might be in readineſs to ſupply the other two with occaſional reinforcements, or, in caſe of accidents, to make a ſafe retreat to the metropolis.

Having given ſuch manifeſt inſtances of his caution and prudence, he ſignified his intentions of engaging the rebels on Monday, though his real deſign sign was to attack them on Saturday, which manœuvre was attended with the desired success. In the afternoon of the 22d of June the Lord d'Aubigny, having arranged his troops in proper order, marched towards the enemy. On his arrival at Deptford, he repulsed an advanced guard of the rebels placed to secure the bridge, after which, ascending the hill, he found the main body on the heath seemingly in great disorder, not having suspected that any attack would be made till the ensuing Monday.

On the appearance of d'Aubigny they drew up their forces with all expedition, and defended themselves with such resolution, that upwards of three hundred of the king's troops were slain. D'Aubigny, in advancing to the charge, was taken prisoner, but the valour of his soldiers soon released him from captivity, and slew great numbers of the rebels, who, in their endeavours to escape by flight, were intercepted by that division commanded by the earl of Oxford.

In this action two thousand of the rebels were slain. Lord Audley, Flammock and Joseph were taken, and the remainder surrendered at discretion. Audley was beheaded on Tower-hill, Flammock and Joseph were hanged at Tyburn; and the rest, amounting to near sixteen thousand, were pardoned.

Such being the state of affairs in the south, we now proceed to give an account of what was doing in the northern parts of the kingdom. James, king of Scotland, having made a second irruption into England, had besieged the castle of Norham, but was soon obliged to retreat by the earl of Surry, who marched to relieve the place, and pursued him to his own country, where he reduced the castle of Ayton, between Berwick and Edinburgh. But conferences were soon afterwards held at Ayton, on the mediation of Don Pedro d'Ayala the Spanish ambassador, and with the joint consent of both sovereigns.

The negotiation was at first attended with some difficulty, on account of the fate of Perkin Warbeck, whom James refused to surrender. It was resolved, however, at length that the Pretender should be honorably dismissed, and that matters should continue in the same train as if he had never been received in Scotland. Whereupon James told Warbeck, that as he had exerted all his power in his behalf, and had met with no encouragement from the English, he could not expect that he should be able to establish him on the throne of that kingdom in direct opposition to their inclinations. He advised him, therefore, to prosecute some more likely methods for the attainment of his design, and withdraw to some other country; assuring him, that he would nevertheless equip him with a supply of money and shipping to convey him to a more eligible situation. Perkin's resolution supported him under the pressure of his misfortunes, and having obtained conveyance for himself and wife, he departed for Ireland, and landed at Corke, where he found still a considerable number of friends and adherents.

After his departure, the commissioners at Ayton concluded a truce for seven years, the substance of which was that hostilities should entirely cease between the two kings; that some particulars still undetermined, should be left to the decision of Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain, and that the truce should continue for the space of twelve months, after the death of that party which should first happen. Though the treaty was wholly silent as to the marriage of James and the daughter of Henry, that event afterwards took place, and established the union between the two crowns.

A. D. 1498. Notwithstanding peace was now settled with all the powers of Europe, Henry was in a far different situation with respect to his own subjects. His clemency to the Cornish insurgents instead of conciliating their affections, tended only to create new disorders. On their arrival at their own habitations, they insinuated that the king's lenity proceeded from fear, and not from principle; and this opinion gained ground with the majority of the people. These sentiments encouraged them to make another effort against the government, in which they were joined by many of their friends and acquaintance: and still farther to strengthen their party and countenance their proceedings, Perkin was invited over from Ireland, to command their expedition.

Being assured that he should find many friends to support him, Perkin accepted the invitation, and embarking with about 70 men in four small vessels landed at Whitesand bay in the month of September.

Perkin no sooner made his appearance at Bodmin, than the populace to the number of three thousand flocked to his standard. Here he first assumed the title of Richard the fourth, king of England, and caused himself to be publickly proclaimed as such, exhorting the multitude to arm themselves in defence of his and their common rights, and to wrest the sceptre out of the hands of an usurper.

Resolving not to suffer the spirits of his party to languish, he led them on gallantly to the gates of Exeter, intending to establish a magazine in that town, and retain it as an asylum in case of misfortune. Finding the inhabitants obstinate in refusing him admittance, he resolved to take the city by storm. But being unprovided with artillery for that purpose, he had recourse to scaling the walls. All his attempts, however, proved fruitless: the inhabitants made a vigorous resistance, and the assailants were repulsed with the loss of two hundred men.

In the mean time Henry, having gained intelligence of the proceedings of Perkin, testified great satisfaction on the occasion, declaring himself overjoyed at the thoughts of having an interview with a person he had long desired to see. The nobility and gentry of Devonshire now raised troops at their own expence, equally zealous to repel the insurgents, and remove all suspicions of their fidelity to the king. The lords D'Aubigny and Brooke, the earl of Devonshire and the duke of Buckingham appeared at the head of their respective forces, anxious for an opportunity of displaying their courage and loyalty, and the king ordered D'Aubigny to march towards Exeter, to which place he promised soon to follow him with a numerous army.

Perkin, informed of these preparations, raised the siege of Exeter, and retired to Taunton, where he declared he would hazard a battle. His followers amounting to seven thousand men, appeared ready to support him; but his courage failing him, he stole away secretly from them in the night, and took sanctuary in the monastery of Beaulieu in the new forest. Lord d'Aubigny, hearing of his retreat, detached three hundred horse to beset the sanctuary, till farther orders.

The wretched adherents of Perkin, finding themselves deserted, laid down their arms, and submitted to the king's mercy, which was extended to all except a few of the principals, who alone were treated with capital severity. A detachment of cavalry was then ordered to St. Michael's mount, to ſecure the lady Catherine Gordon, Perkin's wife, as the king foreſaw that in caſe of her pregnancy the rebellion might be continued to another generation. On her arrival in his majeſty's preſence he was ſo captivated with her beauty and graceful deportment, that he reſolved to ſhew her all the lenity due to her ſex and quality, promiſing her protection, appointing her a reputable ſtation near the perſon of the queen, and allowing her a conſiderable penſion, which ſhe enjoyed till her death.

Henry after this proceeded to Exeter, to the mayor of which he preſented his ſword in gratitude for his ſignal defence of the city, and the zeal he had teſtified to the royal cauſe. A council of war was now called to determine in what manner to diſpoſe of Perkin, who ſtill remained in the ſanctuary. By ſome it was ſuggeſted that he ſhould be dragged from his retreat, and made a public example; but the king was of opinion that mild methods would anſwer a much better purpoſe. Some perſons were, therefore, deputed to treat with Perkin, and to prevail with him, on aſſurance of pardon, to ſurrender himſelf to juſtice, and make a full confeſſion of every circumſtance of his impoſture. The deſperate ſtate of his affairs induced him to accept the king's offers, and to quit the ſanctuary, without heſitation. Henry, deſirous of ſeeing him, had him brought to court, where he looked at him from a window; but he was never admitted into his preſence. He was then led through the ſtreets in a kind of mock triumph from Weſtminſter to the Tower, where one of his chief abettors was executed; and himſelf ſigned a confeſſion, which was nevertheleſs ſo defective and contradictory, that, inſtead of explaining the impoſture, it ſerved but to involve it in ſtill greater myſtery and perplexity.

A. D. 1499. However, though Perkin's life was ſpared, he was ſtill kept in confinement, which not being long able to brook, he eſcaped from his guard, and flying to the ſanctuary of Shene, put himſelf into the hands of the prior of that monaſtery. He was a ſecond time requeſted to rely on the king's clemency; but this he refuſed, and, in order to degrade him to the moſt abject ſituation, he was ſet in the ſtocks at Weſtminſter and in Cheapſide, and compelled to read aloud the confeſſions he had formerly made. He was afterwards conducted to the Tower, where ſuch was his turbulent and active diſpoſition, that he engaged in a plot which coſt him his life. Having found means to obtain an intimacy with ſome ſervants of Sir John Digby, lieutenant of the Tower, and by their means effected a correſpondence with the unfortunate earl of Warwick, they agreed together to take the firſt opportunity of eſcaping. They, however, perceived that this could not be done without murdering the lieutenant, in order to which Perkin tampered with the ſervants, who, it is ſaid, agreed to perpetrate the horrid deed, and thus ſecure the gates of the Tower, by which the priſoners might make their eſcape to ſome ſecure part of the kingdom.

It has been conjectured that Perkin was permitted to enter into this correſpondence with the earl of Warwick by the connivance of the king, who hoped that his enterprizing ſpirit and inſinuating addreſs would engage the ſimple Warwick in ſome project, that would afford a pretence for taking away the life of that nobleman.

The deſigns of the ſagacious Henry were greatly facilitated by another commotion which was now raiſed in Kent, where a young man called Ralph Wilford, a ſhoemaker's ſon, perſonated the earl of Warwick, under the tuition of one Patrick an Auguſtine Monk, who, in his ſummons, exhorted the people to take up arms in his favour. The friar and pupil were both arreſted; and Wilford was hanged without ceremony, but the tutor, who had been employed as a tool by the king's emiſſaries, obtained his pardon. This was but the prologue to the tragedy of Perkin and the earl of Warwick, the former of whom being tried at Weſtminſter, and convicted on the evidence of the ſervants of the Tower, was hanged at Tyburn, together with John Walter, mayor of Corke, a firm adherent in his cauſe through all the viciſſitudes of his fortune. Blewet and Aſhwood, two of the ſervants, ſhared the ſame fate, but ſix of their accomplices, who had been likewiſe condemned, were afterwards pardoned. Within a few days after Perkin's execution, the wretched earl of Warwick was tried by his peers, and, being convicted of high treaſon, was beheaded on Tower-Hill on the 28th of November; and with him periſhed the laſt male heir of the Houſe of York.

A. D. 1500. Henry, having no longer any oppoſition to dread, reſolved to increaſe his opulence at the expence of his enemies. Pretending therefore that the rebels were amenable to the rigour of the law, he inſiſted that every one ſhould purchaſe his pardon ſeparately, from which device he obtained very conſiderable reſources. And in order to levy the money ariſing from theſe indulgencies, commiſſioners were appointed to diſcover who were the perſons that had been directly or indirectly engaged in the rebellion of Perkin or the Blackſmith. Theſe inquiſitors were authorized to demand a fine from every one who claimed the benefit of this pardon, and even to ſeize the effects of the deceaſed, ſhould their heirs refuſe to make a compoſition.

Theſe arbitrary and oppreſſive meaſures were generally imputed to the pernicious counſels of cardinal Moreton, archbiſhop of Canterbury, whoſe death at this time diffuſed univerſal joy throughout the kingdom. This prelate was ſucceeded by Henry Dean, biſhop of Saliſbury, and it ſoon plainly appeared, that Moreton had been unjuſtly cenſured for an extortion which was the ſole effect of the king's own avarice.

A. D. 1501. An accident happened at the beginning of the year enſuing, which gave Henry great uneaſineſs, and was productive of ſome ſtate-commotions. The earl of Suffolk, (nephew to Edward IV. and brother to the earl of Lincoln, who loſt his life at the battle of Stoke) had in his paſſion killed a man, and though he was allied to the houſe of York, the king refuſed (and indeed very juſtly) to indulge him with a pardon, unleſs he ſhould appear and plead it publickly. This was conſidered by the earl as an indignity ill-ſuited to his pride, in reſentment of which he retired in diſguſt to his aunt the dutcheſs of Burgundy.

Henry was alarmed at the ſtep taken by Suffolk: he was fearful leſt he ſhould concert ſome deſign to his prejudice; and therefore diſpatched emiſſaries to the continent, with large offers and promiſes, to that nobleman, which being accepted, a reconciliation took place, and Suffolk returned to England.

The death of Perkin and the earl of Warwick having ſecured the crown to Henry againſt all pretenders, a marriage took place between Arthur prince prince of Wales, and Catherine, daughter of Ferdinand of Arragon, which was ſolemnized with great ſplendor on the fourteenth of November; the prince being in his ſixteenth, and the princeſs in her nineteenth year. Her dowry was ſaid to amount to two hundred thouſand ducats in ſpecie, beſides jewels and plate; and the jointure ſettled upon her, in caſe the prince ſhould die before his acceſſion to the throne, was a third part of the principality of Wales, the dukedom of Cornwall, and the earldom of Cheſter.

A. D. 1502. This marriage was ſoon after ſucceeded by another, between the king of Scotland and the princeſs Margaret, daughter of Henry; the treaty for which being ratified by the Scottiſh ambaſſadors in London, on the twenty-fourth of January, the nuptials were ſolemnized by proxy, to the great ſatisfaction of the people, who hoped that in conſequence of this event, all differences would ſubſide between the two nations. Their joy, however, was but of ſhort duration, being greatly damped by the death of Arthur, who about five months after his marriage, departed this life at Ludlow, univerſally lamented by the Engliſh, who had formed great expectations from his extraordinary talents, had he lived to enjoy the crown. His title and dignities devolved upon his brother Henry, afterwards king of England.

A. D. 1503. The death of the queen in childbed, which happened the beginning of this year, inſtead of being conſidered by the king as a misfortune, gave him no little pleaſure, as his hatred to the family of York could never be eradicated.

As Henry advanced in years his avarice increaſed, and the methods he took to fill his coffers at the expence of his ſubjects were highly unjuſtifiable. For this purpoſe he had pitched upon two infamous miniſters, called Empſon and Dudley, as perfectly qualified to promote his avaricious deſigns. They both followed the practice of the law, the firſt of low extraction, brutiſh behaviour, and an unrelenting diſpoſition; the other better born indeed, and better bred, but equally inflexible and cruel. Their method was to prefer indictments againſt the objects of their oppreſſion, and commit them to priſon on falſe accuſations, which having done their liberty could only be obtained by heavy fines, which were extorted as mitigations and compoſitions as they were then called; and to ſuch a height of injuſtice were they at laſt arrived, that even the common forms of law were diſpenſed with, and cauſes were decided without the verdict of a jury. In this ſummary way did they determine upon the properties of the ſubjects, and confiſcate their eſtates to the royal treaſury.

Theſe oppreſſions were not only countenanced by the king, but he even condeſcended to practice them himſelf; nor could the remonſtrances of the ſuffering parties in the leaſt avail them againſt this unwarrantable exerciſe of arbitrary power. Nor was it his enemies only whom he plundered; but even his friends, and thoſe to whom he lay under the greateſt obligations were made to feel the effects of his boundleſs rapacity. One day when he was on a viſit to the earl of Oxford to whom he was in a great meaſure indebted for his crown, after having been entertained in a moſt ſumptuous and hoſpitable manner, as he was preparing to depart he ſaw ranged on both ſides a number of men dreſſed in rich liveries. The king ſurprized at ſeeing ſo many domeſtics, aſked his lordſhip whether he conſtantly retained in his ſervice ſo conſiderable a number of menial ſervants. The earl very modeſtly replied, they were only retained on this occaſion to do his majeſty the greater honour. The king ſtarted back, ſaying "By my faith, my lord, "I thank you for your good cheer; but I muſt "not ſuffer the laws to be broken before my "face; my attorney-general muſt talk with you." Nor did he ſcruple to verify his declaration, for the earl is ſaid to have paid no leſs than ſixteen thouſand marks for this pretended offence.

The reſult of theſe iniquitous proceedings was a general tumult among the people, whoſe violence was farther excited and encouraged by the earl of Suffolk, who having diſſipated and impoveriſhed his fortunes, was in hopes of repairing them by the contrivancce of new ſchemes againſt Henry's perſon and government. Becoming by degrees more and more popular, he found means to acquire a number of adherents, and went over to Flanders, with a view of obtaining ſuccours from Margaret of Burgundy.

Alarmed at his retreat, Henry employed Sir Robert Curſon, governor of the caſtle of Hammes, to practiſe the ſelf ſame expedient, which had formerly fruſtrated all the meaſures of Perkin Warbeck. That officer acquitted himſelf ſo dexterouſly in the taſk aſſigned him, that in a ſhort time he inſinuated himſelf into the favours of Suffolk, and ſoon became acquainted with the names and perſons of all the parties concerned. In conſequence of this information, which Sir Robert immediately communicated to the king, writs were iſſued againſt William Courtney, earl of Devonſhire, Henry's brother-in-law, and huſband to the princeſs Catherine, daughter of Edward IV. William de la Pole, brother to the earl of Suffolk, Sir James Tyrrel and Sir John Wyndham, George, lord Abergavenny and Sir Thomas Green, were upon a ſlight ſuſpicion taken into cuſtody, but were ſoon diſcharged for want of evidence.

The earl of Devon and de la Pole were detained in confinement during the king's life, though no material charge was ever brought againſt them. Tyrrel, ſo notorious for his ſhare in the death of Edward V. with Wyndham, and ſome others of leſs conſequence, were executed as traitors. Suffolk found refuge for ſome time in Flanders, where he was protected by Philip the archduke of Auſtria, and entertained in a manner ſuitable to his character.

Finding himſelf ſecure from any farther apprehenſions in conſequence of the revolt of Suffolk, Henry directed his attention towards a buſineſs of very material importance. The late prince of Wales having died without iſſue, Henry perceived he muſt either ſend back his widow into Spain, and conſequently refund one half of her dowry, or if ſhe continued in England, put her in poſſeſſion of the jointure ſettled on her by treaty. In order to overcome this difficulty, and obviate theſe diſagreeable alternatives, to both of which he had equal objections, he propoſed to Ferdinand that the princeſs Catherine ſhould be married to Henry prince of Wales, brother to her late huſband. The Spaniſh monarch readily concurred with this propoſal, provided means could be found to procure the pope's diſpenſation, a ſtep highly neceſſary to eſtabliſh the validity of ſuch a prepoſterous and illegal union.

A. D. 1504. A parliament being now aſſembled, Henry obtained a ſubſidy for the portion of his eldeſt daughter, which amounted to a far greater ſum than that which he had paid to the king of Scotland. The government became at this period in the higheſt degree deſpotic, of which nothing can be a ſtronger proof, than the choice they made of the venal and wicked Dudley as Speaker of the Houſe of Commons: and indeed the meanneſs of this parliament was perfectly correſpondent to the mercenary views of the ſovereign, which they teſtified their zeal to promote, by gratifying the king's avarice to the diſgrace of their own honour, and the moſt intolerable oppreſſion of their conſtituents, whom they were in duty bound to defend.

Henry now thought it neceſſary to amuſe the people with the oſtentatious parade of a ridiculous and unneceſſary pageantry. With this view he gave orders for removing the corpſe of Henry VI. from Windſor to Weſtminſter, where it was interred with great pomp and ſolemnity. The king even applied to the pope for the canonization of that monarch, but ſo little credit had been given to the miracles pretended to have been wrought by him after his deceaſe, that his holineſs would not admit him to a place among the ſaints, without ſuch a conſideration as Henry's avarice would not permit him to afford, ſo that he was obliged to relinquiſh that part of his deſign.

A. D. 1505. As the height of Henry's ambition was to amaſs wealth, and as all his thoughts were directed to this one point, he ſuppoſed that if he could effect a marriage with the widow of Ferdinand, king of Naples, he ſhould by that means get poſſeſſion of the vaſt dowry allotted to her in that kingdom. He therefore employed Francis Pearſon and other agents to make a minute enquiry into all the particulars of that lady's perſon and fortune; but the reſult of this enquiry was that the queen's large jointure in land had been converted into an annuity for life, ſo that theſe emiſſaries ſet out for Spain without making known the intention of their journey to Naples.

A. D. 1506. Philip and Joan having been proclaimed king and queen of Caſtile at Bruſſels, were nevertheleſs prevented from taking poſſeſſion of that kingdom, by the war in Guelderland, and the pregnancy of the queen, who was in a ſhort time delivered of the princeſs Mary, afterwards queen of Hungary. However, at the concluſion of the war, the queen being in a condition for travelling, on the tenth of January they both embarked with a powerful armament.

A violent ſtorm having overtaken them in the channel, the fleet was ſeparated, and the ſhip in which the royal paſſengers had embarked was driven into the harbour of Weymouth. Alarmed at the ſight of ſo large a ſquadron the peaſants took to their arms; but Sir Thomas Frenchford, a Devonſhire knight, hearing that the royal Caſtilians were landed, paid his reſpects to them in perſon, begging to have the honour of accommodating them till the king ſhould be informed of their arrival. With this requeſt Philip willingly complied, as the weather would not admit of their immediate embarkation.

When the news of their landing was communicated to Henry, he ſent the earl of Arundel with compliments of congratulation, and aſſurances of the pleaſure he ſhould feel in entertaining them, which he ſhould gladly embrace with all poſſible expedition, and in the mean time deſired they would conſider him and his dominions as wholly devoted to their ſervice.

The court being at this time kept at Windſor, Philip and his queen inſtantly repaired thither, and met with a very gracious and honourable reception. Henry reſolved to profit by this royal interview, and therefore propoſed to Philip that the treaty of commerce between England and the Low Countries ſhould be renewed, with ſome alterations favourable to England, and to which propoſition Philip readily acceeded.

Encouraged by his ſucceſs in this application, Henry then acquainted Philip with his intention of eſpouſing his ſiſter Margaret, widow to the duke of Savoy. The king of Caſtile tempted by the proſpect of an alliance ſo conſiderable, readily acquieſced with this propoſal, in conſequence of which the contract was ſigned, and Philip agreed to pay three hundred thouſand crowns, as a dowry to his ſiſter, together with an annuity to a very large amount.

Another point ſtill however remained to be obtained. It may be remembered that the earl of Suffolk had found an aſylum in the territories of Philip, and Henry ſtill feeling ſome apprehenſions of freſh commotions, determined to detain his royal gueſt, till he ſhould conſent to deliver up that nobleman into his power. In a private converſation with Philip therefore he addreſſed him in words to this effect: "Sir, you have been ſaved "on my coaſt, I hope you will not ſuffer me to be "wrecked on yours."

Surprized at this unexpected addreſs, the emotion with which it was delivered, and the ambiguous terms in which it was couched, Philip requeſted an explanation: Henry anſwered, "I mean "that wild extravagant fellow, my ſubject, the "earl of Suffolk, who is protected in your coun-"try, and begins to play the fool when others are "tired of the game." To this Philip replied, "I thought your preſent circumſtances had raiſed "you above all ſuch apprehenſions; but ſince his "reſidence in Flanders gives you diſquiet, I will "baniſh him from my dominions." Henry intimating ſtill a deſire of having him in his power, Philip told him with ſome heſitation, that his honour was engaged not to deliver him up, beſides that ſuch a requeſt would derogate from the character of the Engliſh monarch, as the world would thence conclude that he had treated his gueſt as a priſoner; "I will venture to incur the diſgrace," ſaid Henry," and ſo your honour will remain in-"violate." Philip finding him ſo importunate, anſwered, "Sir, you give law to me, and I will "dictate to you in my turn: Suffolk ſhall be de-"livered up to you, but on condition of your "paſſing your honour that his life ſhall be ſafe." This promiſe being obtained, Philip wrote to the earl, aſſuring him he had procured his pardon, which being confirmed by an expreſs meſſage from Henry, that nobleman returned to England, but was committed priſoner to the Tower.

On Suffolk's arrival, the king of Caſtile was ſuffered to purſue his voyage, after a reſidence of three months in England, during which he was inſtalled a knight of the garter, and in return confirmed the honour of the golden fleece on the prince of Wales.

A. D. 1507. Empſon and Dudley, the two infamous inſtruments of Henry's oppreſſion, among other acts of extortion and injuſtice, entered a ſevere proſecution againſt Sir William Capel, whom under colour of miſconduct in his mayoralty, they amerced in the ſum of two thouſand pounds; but being irritated by former exactions, he refuſed payment, and was committed to the Tower, where he continued in confinement during the remainder of Henry's reign.

But the wealth and opulence which Henry had now now acquired by the moſt ſordid avarice, joined to the meaneſt frugality, could not ſhield him from the misfortunes incident to human nature. The gout which had ſeized him, fell upon his lungs, and in a ſhort time produced an aſthma; notwithſtanding which he continued his attention to buſineſs of the ſtate, till at length the decay of his health obliged him to direct his attention to affairs of a more ſerious nature.

A. D. 1508. The king's diſorder continuing to increaſe, notwithſtanding all the art of medicine, and there being great reaſon to imagine his diſſolution was near at hand, Henry was deſirous of performing ſome actions that might recommend him to the divine mercy, and, at the ſame time, in ſome meaſure, procure him the applauſe of the people. To effect this, he diſtributed alms, founded religious houſes, and granted a general pardon to all his ſubjects. He affected great concern at the extortions of Empſon and Dudley, diſcharged all debtors from confinement, under the ſum of forty ſhillings; and among other religious foundations, endowed the hoſpital of the Savoy, and erected that beautiful chapel in Weſtminſter Abbey, which ſtill bears his name.

A. D. 1509. Having made his will and bequeathed his crown to his ſon Henry, he died at Richmond on the twenty-ſecond day of April, in the twenty-fourth year of her reign, and fifty-third of his age.

Henry VII. was tall, ſtrait, and well ſhaped, though ſlender; a grave aſpect, and ſaturnine complexion: auſtere in addreſs, and reſerved in converſation, except when he had a favourite point to carry; and then he could fawn, flatter, and practiſe all the arts of inſinuation. He inherited a natural fund of ſagacity, which was improved by ſtudy and experience; nor was he deficient in perſonal bravery, or political courage. He was cool, cloſe, cunning, diſtruſtful and deſigning; and of all the princes that had ſat upon the Engliſh throne, the moſt ſordid, ſelfiſh, and ignoble. He poſſeſſed in a peculiar manner, the art of turning all his domeſtic troubles, and all his foreign diſputes, to his own advantage: hence he acquired the appellation of the Engliſh Solomon, and all the powers of the continent courted his alliance on account of his wealth, and uninterrupted proſperity. He entirely excluded the nobility from the adminiſtration of public affairs, and employed clergymen and lawyers, who, depending entirely upon his favour, were more obſequious to his will, and ready to concur in all his arbitrary meaſures. His mind was continually actuated by two ruling paſſions equally baſe and unkingly; namely, the fear of loſing his crown, and the deſire of amaſſing riches; and theſe motives influenced his whole conduct. Nevertheleſs, his apprehenſion and avarice redounded, on the whole, to the advantage of the nation. The firſt induced him to depreſs the nobility, and aboliſh the feudal tenures, which rendered them equally formidable to the prince and the people; and his avarice prompted him to encourage induſtry and trade, becauſe it improved his cuſtoms, and enriched his ſubjects, whom he could afterwards pillage at diſcretion. Such is the character of Henry VII. who (as the lord Bacon juſtly obſerves) may be ſaid to have "lived with employment, and died with repentance."

Remarkable Occurences during the reign of Henry VII.

A. D.

1483 Yeomen of the guard to attend on the king firſt inſtituted.
In September this year a diſeaſe (called the ſweating ſickneſs) prevailed throughout the kingdom, and, though it did not continue five weeks, carried off many thouſands of the inhabitants. A remedy was at length diſcovered to effect a cure, which was by keeping the patient moderately warm, and giving him cordials not too ſtrong.
1486 Bernard Andrews, appointed Poet Laureat to the king, and allowed ten marks as his ſalary, amounting to about ſix pounds.
1487 The court of Star-Chamber inſtituted.
1488 Maps and ſea charts firſt brought into England by Columbus.
1491 Greek firſt introduced into England.
1492 America diſcovered this year by Chriſtopher Columbus.
1493 Joan Boughton, a widow, burnt for hereſy.
1494 Alice Hackney, who had been buried 175 years, was dug up in the church of St. Mary Hill: the ſkin was whole, and the joints of the arms pliable.
1497 The Eaſt-Indies diſcovered this year by a Portugueſe.
1498 The Weſt-Indies diſcovered by Columbus.
1500 This year there happened a great plague in England, which, in a ſhort time, carried off no leſs than 30,000 people.
1501 The firſt annual city feaſt held at Guildhall, when Sir John Shaw was lord-mayor.
The company of Taylors ſtiled Merchant Taylors.
1504 Henry VIIth's chapel built at the eaſt end of Weſtminſter-abbey.
1505 Shillings firſt coined in England.
1507 This year the ſweating ſickneſs again broke out in England, and carried off great numbers of the inhabitants.

In this reign the intereſt of money, the profits of exchange and the exportation of plate and bullion were prohibited. Prices were fixed on woollen cloth and hats, and the wages of labourers were ſettled. Several neceſſary laws were enacted for the execution of juſtice and the puniſhment of murderers, and for ſubjecting the clergy to capital puniſhments for enormous offences.

The moſt conſpicuous perſons of genius and learning who flouriſhed during the reign of Henry VII. were, Sir John Forteſcue and Sir Thomas Lyttleton. The former was Lord chief juſtice of the King's Bench in the reign of Henry VI. to whom he was appointed chancellor, after Edward IV. had ſupplanted him in the throne. For his attachment to the houſe of Lancaſter, he was impriſoned ſoon after the battle of Tewkeſbury, and attainted with others of that party, but was afterwards pardoned by Edward IV. His principal productions were his celebrated book "De laudibus legum Angliæ," written for the uſe of prince Edward, and a treatiſe on the "Difference between an abſolute and a limited monarchy," the latter of which did not make its appearance in print, till the year 1714.

Sir Thomas Lyttleton, knight of the Bath, and a judge in the court of common pleas, wrote the book of "Tenures or Tithes," by which all poſſeſſions were formerly held in England, and was firſt publiſhed at Rouen about the year 1533.

A. D. 1509. FREED from the avaricious tyranny of the late king, the nation conſidered the acceſſion of his ſon as an event that might be productive of their greateſt felicity. And as the peace of the kingdom was ſecured by powerful alliances, the higheſt expectations were conceived from the extraordinary abilities of young Henry, who, at the time of his acceſſion, was only in the eighteenth year of his age.

The diſpoſition of Henry was the very reverſe of that of his father's, for his liberality almoſt bordered on profuſion. Pleaſure ſucceeded to deſpondence, and avarice was exchanged for diſſipation. Titles and tournaments were exhibited with magnificence, and the treaſures amaſſed by the late king were laviſhed by his ſucceſſor with an unbounded luxury.

Henry was, nevertheleſs, attentive to the remonſtrances of his people, and ſuch as had exerciſed their lawleſs oppreſſions over them now felt the force of royal reſentment and popular indignation. Among theſe the foremoſt were Empſon and Dudley, who were cited before the council to anſwer for their delinquencies: but they ſoon found means to evade the charges exhibited againſt them. They urged that all they had done was in conformity to their maſter's orders; that it was not their office to alter or amend, but to enforce the laws, whoſe validity they had no right to diſpute. Theſe arguments were deemed unanſwerable, in conſequence of which the council could only commit them to the Tower till freſh matter ſhould be found to convict them. A few days after a charge of high treaſon was brought againſt them, wherein it was alledged, "that, conſcious of the popular odium, they had concerted meaſures, while "the king lay on his death-bed, to ſecure themſelves from the peoples reſentment." Theſe meaſures were conſtrued into a conſpiracy againſt the new king, of which they were found guilty, and ſoon after beheaded.

The next object which engaged the attention of the council, was to deliberate on the legality of the king's intended marriage with Catherine of Arragon. Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter, ſtrongly ſupported the meaſure. Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, was againſt it, urging, that a marriage with a brother's widow was ſtrictly prohibited by God himſelf, and that the pope's diſpenſation, therefore, was of no force. In anſwer to this, Fox pointed out the abſolute authority of Chriſt's vicar, with many other arguments religious and political, tending to prove the validity of the diſpenſation, and the neceſſity of conſummating the nuptials. He diſplayed the mental and perſonal graces of the princeſs, her love for the king, the large dowry ſhe brought, and the expediency of forming a ſtrict alliance with Spain, to balance the power of France; and in conſequence of theſe forcible arguments, the marriage was accordingly ſolemnized.

But notwithſtanding the ſucceſs of Wincheſter in this particular, his intereſt ſoon began to decline. His own notions of frugality were ill calculated to countenance the young king's prodigality, againſt which he could not forbear to remonſtrate, while the earl of Surry's ſelfiſh principles led him to encourage the prevailing taſte for ſplendor and magnificence. This conduct of Surry ſo incenſed the biſhop of Wincheſter, that he determined to find out ſome proper perſon to inſpect into his actions; and the one who ſeemed beſt calculated for this office was Dr. Thomas Wolſey, a perſon eminently diſtinguiſhed for his mental abilities. This inſinuating young gentleman having recommended himſelf, by his addreſs, and pleaſurable propenſities, to the notice of the king, ſoon became a moſt conſpicuous object of his favour, as will farther appear in the courſe of this reign.

A. D. 1510. The wars of Italy now attracted the attention of all Europe. A league had been formed at Cambray at the inſtance of pope Julius II. in in conjunction with the kings of France and Spain, for ſtripping the republic of Venice of her continental territories. Abſorbed in the aggrandizement of the holy ſee, this pontiff made no ſcruple of involving Italy in a deluge of blood. No ſooner had the French recovered the territories claimed by the contracting parties, than the pope, having obtained poſſeſſion of the dominions which he pretended belonged to the church, determined to break the alliance, and reduce the power of Lewis, which he thought much too formidable. Having excited the reſt of the European ſtates againſt him, he endeavoured to gain over the king of England on his ſide, and to that end ſent him a conſecrated golden roſe as a mark of his favour and attention. He alſo engaged Ferdinand of Spain to aſſiſt him, concluded a treaty with the provinces of Switzerland, and with this powerful confederacy attacked the duke of Ferrara, an ally of France.

Lewis, not ſuſpecting any attack, had made no preparations for defence; but he determined to ſupport his ally with his utmoſt force. Chamont, his general, hearing the pontiff was arrived at Boulogne, reſolved to ſurprize him, and led his army towards the city; but inſtead of puſhing the ſiege with vigour, he accepted propoſals from Julius which that inſidious churchman never intended to perform. Hoſtilities thus ſuſpended, the Venetians threw themſelves into the caſtle, and Chamont, for want of artillery, was obliged to relinquiſh his undertaking.

Lewis, after trying all methods to obtain a peace with the pope, determined to depoſe him at the council of Piſa. But no danger intimidated the pontiff, who, though ſeventy years of age, laid ſiege to Mirandola in perſon, and at length entered the breach, and put his forces in full poſſeſſion of the place.

A. D. 1512. In the beginning of this year Henry, at the inſtigation of Ferdinand, who had joined the pope, declared war againſt France. His ambition to render himſelf ſerviceable to the pope, and the hopes of conquering the provinces once annexed to the Engliſh crown, ſtimulated the young king to engage in this enterprize. Ferdinand perſuaded Henry to undertake the conqueſt of Guienne, in which he promiſed to aſſiſt him with a Spaniſh army, while his real intention was to turn this force to the acquiſition of the kingdom of Navarre.

The Engliſh monarch, little ſuſpecting the deſigns of Ferdinand, agreed to the propoſal, and an army was accordingly collected with the utmoſt expedition, the command of which was given to the marquis of Dorſet, who embarked at Portſmouth, and, after an eaſy paſſage, landed in the province of Guipuſcoa. The Engliſh admiral made ſeveral ſucceſsful deſcents upon the coaſt of Britany, and being joined by a ſquadron under the command of Sir Thomas Knivet, the depredations were continued with advantage. The Engliſh and French fleets ſoon after came to an engagement, in which Primauget the French admiral's ſhip was ſet on fire, but reſolving not to periſh alone, he bore down upon the Engliſh admiral, and grappling together, both became involved in the ſame inevitable deſtruction. In this dreadful cataſtrophe, ſixteen hundred men loſt their lives, and both parties were ſo affected, that they gave up the engagement, the French retiring to Breſt, and the Engliſh continuing to cruize in the channel.

The marquis of Dorſet having, by this time, penetrated into the deſigns of the Spaniſh monarch, complained to him that inſtead of undertaking the ſiege of Bayonne, his forces had changed their route towards the frontiers of Navarre, and obtaining but an evaſive anſwer, he refuſed to give him any farther aſſiſtance, reſolving not to ſacrifice the intereſts of his maſter to the ſelfiſh views of Ferdinand in the reduction of Navarre. The ſeaſon was now too far advanced for Dorſet to think of making any progreſs towards the conqueſt of Guienne, ſo that he returned to England without having been able to effect any thing worthy of notice. Henry was greatly diſpleaſed at the failure of this enterprize, and could hardly be perſuaded by Dorſet to impute the miſcarriage to the deceitful behaviour of Ferdinand.

A. D. 1513. This war, though it proved diſadvantageous to the Engliſh, ſerved to weaken the powers of France. Obliged to recall his troops for the defence of his dominions, Lewis loſt all his conqueſts in Italy. Julius triumphed in the diſgrace of the French king; but he did not long enjoy his good fortune, for on the twenty firſt of February he paid the debt of nature, and was ſucceeded by John de Medici, under the title of Leo X. one of the greateſt pontiffs that ever filled the papal chair.

The celebrated Wolſey, now at the head of public affairs, did his utmoſt to encourage the king's inclination for war, and to provide an army that might retrieve the ancient glory of the kingdom. The deciſive blow was to be ſtruck on the continent. The van of the army, conſiſted of eight thouſand men, commanded by the earl of Shrewſbury, aſſiſted by the earl of Derby, lords Fitzwalter, Haſtings and Cobham, and Sir Rice ap Thomas, captain of the light horſe. This diviſion, being landed at Calais, was ſupported by another body of ſix thouſand, under lord Herbert, attended by the earls of Northumberland and Kent, the lords Audley and Delawar, with many other perſons of rank and fortune. Henry prepared to follow, but before his departure gave orders for the execution of the earl of Suffolk, who was accordingly beheaded on Tower-hill. His reaſons for this cruel action are not ſufficiently known. It is imagined, that the unfortunate earl was ſacrificed to the king's reſentment againſt his brother Edward de la Pole.

An Engliſh fleet preſented itſelf before Breſt, but was obliged to retire. The French too made an unſucceſsful attempt upon the coaſt of Suſſex. The continent alone ſeemed the fitteſt place for action, and on the thirteenth of June, Henry, attended by the duke of Buckingham and others of the nobility, landed the third diviſion at Calais. The Swiſs who had been offended by Lewis the twelfth, engaged to invade Burgundy. The emperor Maximilian too had promiſed to reinforce the Engliſh with ſeven or eight thouſand men, but was not able to fulfil his engagement; and in order to exculpate himſelf, entered as a ſoldier, and joined Henry with a ſmall body of troops.

Before the king's arrival, the earl of Shrewſbury and lord Herbert had planned the ſiege of Terouenne on the borders of Picardy. The garriſon made a vigorous defence; but being reduced to great extremity for want of ſupplies, Lewis determined to run a dangerous riſque in ſending them. Eight hundred cavalry, each of whom carried a quantity of gunpowder and proviſions, forced their way through a part of the Engliſh camp, and advancing to the Foſs-Way, threw down every man his burden; and galloping back again, ſuſtained very little loſs in their return. But the party that was diſpatched to cover their retreat was not ſo ſucceſsful. Theſe troops, though commanded by ſome of the braveſt captains in the ſervice of France, were ſo exceedingly diſmayed at the ſight of the Engliſh, that they betook themſelves to flight, and many of their beſt officers were taken priſoners. This action was called by the French the battle of Guinegaſte; but by the Engliſh the "Battle of the Spurs," as the French, on that occaſion, made more uſe of their ſpurs than their ſwords. Had Henry made a proper advantage of this victory, it might have been attended with very important conſequences; but, inſtead of conducting his army into the heart of France, he returned to the ſiege of the little town of Terouenne, which had made ſuch an obſtinate reſiſtance, and when forced to ſurrender, neither recompenced the blood, nor the delay expended in its reduction.

Nor did the ſiege of Tournay afford Henry much greater advantage, though the place capitulated in a little time after it had been inveſted. Sir Edward Poinings was appointed governor, and the biſhoprick confirmed on Wolſey, who immediately took poſſeſſion of its ample revenues.

This ſiege, though of no long duration, ſerved to retard the great object, which was, the conqueſt of France; and Henry, hearing that the Swiſs had retreated, reſolved to return to England, where he arrived on the ſeventeenth of October, and where flattery was put to the torture, to congratulate him on the ſucceſs of this ridiculous expedition. A truce was ſoon after concluded between the two kingdoms.

While Henry had been employed on the continent, James IV. king of Scotland, was ravaging the northern parts of Northumberland, with an army of fifty thouſand men. The earl of Surry, at the head of twenty-ſix thouſand men, ſet forward to oppoſe him. The Scots were encamped on an eminence near Cheviot hills. The river Till, which ran between the armies, prevented an engagement, for which reaſon Surry ſent an herald to the Scottiſh monarch, offering to meet him in the plain of Milfield, which lay to the ſouth, and there to try their valour on a day appointed for that purpoſe. But this offer being rejected, he made a feint of marching towards Berwick, which putting the Scotch in motion to annoy his rear, he took advantage of a great ſmoke, cauſed by the firing their huts, and paſſed the little river, which had hitherto prevented their coming to action. Both armies now finding that a battle was inevitable, prepared for the attack with great compoſure and regularity. The Engliſh army was divided into two lines; lord Howard led the main body of the firſt line, Sir Edmund Howard the right wing, and Sir Marmaduke Conſtable the left; the earl of Surry himſelf commanded the main body of the ſecond line, ſupported by lord Dacres and Sir Edward Stanley on the right and left. The Scots, on the other hand, formed themſelves into three diviſions, the middle commanded by the king himſelf, the right by the earl of Huntley, and the left by the earls of Lenox and Argyle; beſides a fourth diviſion, as a body of reſerve under the command of the earl of Bothwell. The charge was begun with ſuch impetuoſity by lord Huntley, on the diviſion of lord Howard, that the latter was immediately routed and put into great diſorder. Lord Dacres, however, came ſo ſeaſonably to his ſupport, that the troops rallied, and a general battle enſued. Both armies fought a long time with amazing fury, until the Highlanders, headed by James and his principal nobility, who were moſt forward in engaging the Engliſh, broke in ſword in hand upon the main body commanded by the earl of Surry. This they did with ſuch amazing velocity, as to be encompaſſed by the Engliſh forces. Although thus ſituated, James reſolved to maintain his ground to the utmoſt, and alighting from his horſe, formed his forces into a circle, and in this poſition, exerted ſuch a degree of fortitude, as, for a time, rendered victory doubtful. The Engliſh were now obliged to ply their bows and arrows, which did dreadful execution; but night ſeparating the combatants, it was not till the day following, that lord Howard found the victory decided greatly in his favour. The Engliſh loſs was very inconſiderable, but the whole flower of the Scotch nobility were ſlain in the battle. Ten thouſand of the common men were cut off, and a body ſuppoſed to be that of the Scottiſh monarch was found among the dead, and conveyed to London, where it remained unburied, under a ſentence of excommunication denounced againſt James, for having leagued with France againſt the holy ſee. Henry, however, obtained a reverſal of the ſentence from the pope, and the body was permitted to be interred. The Scots, however, believed their king to be ſtill living, and cauſed a report to be ſpread that he was gone on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. Such was the event of the battle of Floddon, which was fought on the ninth of September.

Henry had now an opportunity of making his own terms with Scotland; but he generouſly liſtened to the requeſt of his ſiſter, who, by the death of her huſband, became regent of that kingdom, during her ſon's minority, and concluded a treaty of peace with that princeſs.

A. D. 1514. In the beginning of this year a negotiation was opened for bringing about a peace between England and France, which was at length effected on the following terms: that the Engliſh ſhould be allowed to keep poſſeſſion of Tournay, that Richard de la Pole, ſhould be baniſhed to Metz; that Henry ſhould receive the arrears due to his father and himſelf, and that the princeſs Mary ſhould be given in marriage to Lewis, with a portion of four hundred thouſand crowns, and a jointure equal to that of the former queen of France, who was heireſs of Britany. This princeſs, who was endowed with a great ſhare of beauty, and other accompliſhments, was then in her twentieth year, and Lewis in his fifty-ſixth. The nuptials were celebrated at Abbeville, but Lewis did not long enjoy the company of his amiable conſort. His conſtitution being greatly impaired, he yielded to the decay of nature, and died within three months after his marriage, beloved and ſincerely regretted as the "Father of his country," which honourable appellation he had deſervedly obtained. His youthful queen was ſoon after eſpouſed to Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk.

In the mean time Henry, intoxicated with his ſucceſſes, gave himſelf up to his favourite pleaſures, while his treaſury was exhauſted by the ſupplies for repeated expeditions. As he had for ſome time diſdained to be adviſed by the miniſters of his father, and deſpairing of their concurrence in his frivolous and extravagant purſuits, he placed his his chief confidence in the more welcome counſels of Thomas (afterwards cardinal) Wolſey, whoſe ready acquieſcence flattered and gave a ſanction to his conduct.

Wolſey was the ſon, (not of a butcher as ſome hiſtorians have repreſented him, but) of a private gentleman at Ipſwich: he was ſo early ſent to Oxford, that at the age of eighteen he took the degree of Batchelor of Arts, and was diſtinguiſhed in the college by the title of the Boy Batchelor. On quitting the univerſity, he obtained one preferment after another, till he became rector of Lymington in Hampſhire, to which he was preſented by the marquis of Dorſet, whoſe children he had inſtructed. So inconſiſtent, however, was his behaviour with the duties of his profeſſion, that ſoon after his induction to this living, he was put in the ſtocks by order of a juſtice of the peace, for raiſing diſturbances at a neighbouring fair. This diſgrace, however, did not obſtruct his promotion, for he was recommended as chaplain to Henry VII. and acquitted himſelf with diligence and credit in negotiating that king's intended marriage with Margaret of Savoy. Having obtained a commiſſion from that monarch to Maximilian, who then reſided at Bruſſels, he, in leſs than three days after, preſented himſelf to the king to his infinite ſurprize, who, ſuppoſing he had been tardy in the undertaking, began to reprove him for his delay. Wolſey, however, ſatisfied him with teſtimonials of his having diſcharged his truſt, and punctually fulfilled all his majeſty's commands. His diſpatch on that occaſion procured him the deanery of Lincoln, in which character he was introduced by Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter, to the attention of the ſucceeding monarch, in hopes that he would be able to ſupplant the earl of Surry, who then ſtood high in the king's favour; and herein the conjectures of Fox were fully verified. Soon after his introduction at court he was honoured with a ſeat in the privy council; and by that means had frequent opportunities of ingratiating himſelf with the young king. As he was of a temporizing and ſubmiſſive diſpoſition, he took every method to accommodate himſelf to the royal temper, and entered into every degree of libertiniſm, then practiſed in the court; neither his age, which was that of forty, nor his ſacred function, produced any reſtraint, or had any tendency to check, by unſeaſonable ſeverity, the gaiety of his aſſociates. To a prince of Henry's weak and vicious inclinations, theſe qualifications were highly meritorious, and Wolſey ſoon gained ſuch an aſcendancy over his maſter, that he was entruſted with the chief management of ſtate affairs.

The new favourite's ſervile condeſcenſion in ſoothing the king's follies, and his haughty demeanour to his fellow ſubjects, ſoon excited the popular indignation. The people had long taken notice of the arrogance and oſtentation of the clergy, and Wolſey's promotions reflected a new diſgrace upon that body, already the object of their envy and abhorrence. The more elevated his character appeared, the greater ſtill was the diſlike of him. Ungovernable in his deſires, and magnificent in his profuſion; of extenſive abilities, and ſtill more unlimited in his undertakings; ambitious of authority, and ſtill more covetous of glory; ſometimes fawning, creeping, and inſinuating, and at others lofty, vindictive, and commanding; inſolent to his equals, but affable to his dependents; oppreſſive to the people, but generous to his friends; more liberal than grateful; and proud of aſſuming a conſequence incompatible with true dignity and real ſuperiority.

A. D. 1515. Wolſey had been early advanced to the biſhoprick of Lincoln, which he afterwards reſigned on being promoted to the archiepiſcopal ſee of York, an opportunity for which occurred by the death of the late prelate, who had been poiſoned at Rome by his chaplain, in revenge for a blow he received from him. This aſpiring churchman now governed both king and kingdom. Preferments were heaped upon him with unbounded profuſion. He was not only Archbiſhop of York, but had got poſſeſſion, at very moderate leaſes, of the revenues of Bath, Worceſter, and Hereford, which he filled by perſons, who were permitted to reſide abroad, on making a ſuitable compenſation for that indulgence. Beſides many other church preferments, he was allowed to unite with the ſee of York the biſhopricks of Durham and Wincheſter; his avarice ſeeming to encreaſe in proportion to its gratifications. The pope obſerving Wolſey's influence over the king, thought to engage him in his intereſt, and in order thereto created him a cardinal. He had eight hundred ſervants in his retinue, many of whom were knights and gentlemen; even ſome of the nobility ſent their children into his family for education, and the adepts in the arts or ſciences paid court to the cardinal, ambitious of his patronage and protection. He was the firſt clergyman in England who wore ſilk and gold, not only on his habit but alſo his ſaddles and the trappings of his horſes. The croſs of York was always carried before him, though in the dioceſe of Canterbury, in contempt of the privileges of that primate.

Beſides theſe important diſtinctions, the pope conferred upon him that of legate, deſigning to make him inſtrumental in draining the kingdom of money, on pretence of enabling him to carry on a war with the Turks, but, in reality, to enrich his own coffers. In this part he acquitted himſelf ſo much to the ſatisfaction of his pontifical employer, as in ſome little time after that office was made perpetual to him; and he now united in his perſon the dignities of legate, cardinal, archbiſhop, and prime miniſter.

About this time Warham, chancellor and archbiſhop of Canterbury, a man of a very moderate diſpoſition, choſe rather to retire from public employment, than maintain a diſputed ſuperiority with the haughty cardinal. He accordingly reſigned the great ſeal into the hands of the king, who, two days after, committed it to the cuſtody of Wolſey. Even Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter, who had ſo long directed the affairs of government, and had been the firſt to introduce Wolſey to the king, impatient of the neglect ſhewn towards him, obtained leave to retire to his biſhoprick, and, at leaving the council-board, recommended to the king, "not to ſuffer the ſervant to become greater than his maſter." "Fear not, my good lord biſhop," replied Henry, "I know how to make all my ſubjects obey me."

Theſe prodigious ſtretches of power ſerved but to render this greedy churchman ſtill more inſatiable. He procured a bull from the pope, impowering him to create knights and counts, to legitimate baſtards, to confer degrees in arts, law, phyſic and divinity, and to grant diſpenſations of every kind. The nobility could not but be juſtly offended at all this pride and power beſtowed on the avaritious and ambitious cardinal; yet

ſo well was his vindictive temper known, that none dared publickly to expreſs their indignation.

Francis I. who ſucceeded Lewis XII. on the throne of France, renewed the treaty made by his predeceſſor with Henry, and, inſtigated with a deſire of conqueſt, paſſed over into Italy. His aim was to re-conquer the duchy of Milan, which Lewis had loſt. He was ſupported by the Venetians, who had the ſame deſigns againſt Maximilian, who had ſtripped them of the Veroneſe. His oppoſers were Leo X. and Maximilian the debilitated emperor; but his moſt formidable enemies were the Swiſs, who were irritated againſt France by the refuſal of Lewis XII. to fulfil the treaty concluded before Dijon. They had aſſumed the title of "Defenders of the popes, and protectors of princes," and, indeed, within the laſt ten years not without a plauſible foundation.

In his progreſs to Milan, Francis continued to negotiate with that nation. Skilled in diſſimulation, they amuſed the king, till the military cheſt of France arrived, when they deſcended into the plains, and though deſtitute of cavalry, determined to oppoſe the French arms. A deſperate battle enſued at Marigano, near Milan, which was continued with great perſeverance on both ſides, till the darkneſs of the night parted the combatants. The king ſlept on the carriage of a cannon within forty paces of a Swiſs battalion. The battle was vigorouſly renewed with the morning dawn, and it was not till the Swiſs had loſt the braveſt of their troops that they could be prevailed upon to retire. The killed on both ſides amounted to twenty thouſand, and the old marſhal Trivulcio, who had ſeen eighteen pitched battles, denominated this "The battle of the giants." The victory of Marigano was followed by the reduction of the Milaneſe, and Maximilian was contented to live in France a wretched dependant on the bounty of Francis.

Wolſey now employed his attention to cultivate and increaſe the jealouſy which Henry had conceived at the ſucceſs of the French monarch. The cardinal enjoyed the revenues of the biſhoprick of Tournay; but could not help regretting that the titular biſhop of that ſee was protected at the court of France. He perſuaded Maximilian to renew the war in Italy; but the undertaking was rendered abortive: ſo that by this failure Henry and his miniſter were diſappointed in their deſigns to weaken the power of France.

A. D. 1516. Charles V. king of Spain, ſucceſſor to Ferdinand, was a man endowed with great natural talents, which had been improved by an excellent education. Francis, fearful of the power of Charles, formed a treaty with that monarch, in which he engaged to give him his eldeſt daughter, then an infant, in marriage: that Francis ſhould relinquiſh all pretenſions to the kingdom of Naples; that he ſhould allow Charles an hundred thouſand crowns a year till the conſummation of the marriage, and that he ſhould give the king of Navarre ſatisfaction with regard to his dominions.

A. D. 1517-18. But notwithſtanding this treaty, Francis was fearful of the increaſing power of Charles, and therefore reſolved to take the ſureſt method of gaining the friendſhip of the Engliſh monarch, by an aſſiduous application to his favourite Wolſey. Having ſucceeded in this buſineſs, he ſent his admiral Bonnivert to the court of London, in quality of ambaſſador. That ſubtle politician negotiated a treaty with the cardinal, in which the reſtitution of Tournay was one of the articles. It was farther ſtipulated, that the princeſs Mary ſhould be betrothed to the dauphin, though they were both infants; that Tournay ſhould be the dowry of that princeſs; that Francis ſhould pay ſix hundred thouſand crowns, as a compenſation for the expence of the citadel which had been erected there; and that he ſhould allow the cardinal a penſion of twelve thouſand livres, in lieu of the revenues of the biſhoprick.

Germany was now agitated with thoſe religious diſputes, which produced the reformation. Pope Leo X. by his encouragement of learning, furniſhed arms againſt himſelf, and gave riſe to that remarkable revolution, in which the Engliſh monarch had afterwards ſo great a ſhare. In order to defray the expence of a deſign, began by Julius II. his predeceſſor, of erecting a ſtructure in Rome ſuperior to that of St. Sophia at Conſtantinople, Leo had recourſe to the ſale of indulgencies, which the popes were ſuppoſed to have a power of diſtributing, on certain conditions, to the greateſt and moſt profligate ſinners, as a full remiſſion of their manifold offences. Theſe indulgencies were at firſt confined to the relaxation of penances and church diſcipline. Urban II. was the firſt that granted a full remiſſion of all ſins to ſuch as ſhould take up arms for the recovery of the Holy Land from the infidels. At length theſe ſpiritual favours were extended to thoſe who took the field againſt heretics, or ſuch as were enemies to the Romiſh church. By theſe means great ſums were raiſed, the Auguſtine friars were made the brokers of this ſcandalous commerce, and each of them was entruſted with a ſet of indulgencies of all prices, and for the moſt atrocious ſins of any denomination whatever.

Leo X. had employed the dominicans in this ſpecies of traffic, inaſmuch as they had diſtinguiſhed themſelves by exaggerating the benefits to be derived from indulgencies. The Auguſtines were highly affronted at this preference. Martin Luther, an Auguſtine friar, and profeſſor of divinity at Wirtemberg, ſhocked at theſe proceedings, was loud in his declamations againſt the church of Rome. Nor did his invectives want a ſufficient foundation. A variety of ſuperſtitious ceremonies had been introduced into the exerciſe of religion. Divinity was involved in ſophiſtry, the clergy abſorbed in luxury, and the court of Rome guilty of numberleſs frauds and uſurpations. Reformation being therefore univerſally demanded, Luther knew how to take advantage of it. His firſt writings were confined to the doctrine of indulgencies; but he afterwards carried the matter farther than he is ſuppoſed to have intended; as is the general caſe in all diſputes, whether civil, political, or religious.

The Dominicans, ſupported by the pope's nuncio in Germany, cauſed his books to be burnt. The pope thundered out a bull againſt him; but being protected by the princes of Germany, he was ſo far from being intimidated, that he even ordered the pope's bull to be burnt in the market-place of Wirtemberg.

During theſe tranſactions on the continent, the Engliſh enjoyed the bleſſings of peace. Arts, trade and manufactures flouriſhed and improved. Cardinal Wolſey executed his power in promoting the good of his country. Never was juſtice better adminiſtered than by him. He was a firm ſupporter of the poor, and enforced ſeveral ſalutary laws for the protection of commerce and induſtry.

try. He introduced a taſte for literature, and beſtowed rewards on men of genius and ſcience, and literary merit was the beſt recommendation to his favour. He alſo founded lectures at Oxford for the improvement of learning, and his laudable and patriotic views met with the king's ſupport and encouragement.

A. D. 1519. From theſe literary purſuits, however, the attention of Wolſey was called by the death of the emperor Maximilian. Francis I. and Charles V. were the candidates for the imperial throne, both of whom were worthy of the dignity to which they aſpired. Henry ſupported the election of Charles, which, by his aſſiſtance, he gained by a majority only of a ſingle voice.

A. D. 1520. Francis, deſirous of cultivating the friendſhip of Henry, ſolicited an interview with him at Calais. Wolſey, proud of diſplaying his power and grandeur, ſeconded the requeſt, and Henry, excited by the ſame oſtentatious views, acceded to the propoſal. Charles was alarmed at this intended interview, and would gladly have prevented its taking place. The cardinal guided the helm of ſtate, and had no rival in the cabinet. His pomp was equal to his power, and he celebrated maſs with all the magnificence of the Roman pontiff. He was ſerved by biſhops; and even the nobility preſented him with the water and the towel. His dreſs was ſuperb to an extreme: he wore regal veſtments; his ſhoes were of ſilver gilt, and enriched with pearls of precious ſtones. When he went abroad, two large croſſes of maſſy ſilver were carried before him, together with two pole-axes, two pillars of maſſy ſilver, golden cuſhions, and a train of ſtately horſes. Yet all the power and wealth he enjoyed in England could not ſatisfy him, while there was one eccleſiaſtical dignity to which he had not attained. He now began to aſpire to the papal throne, the thoughts of which increaſed his natural pride and auſterity, and he was extremely rigid to the laity; but as all exertion of deſpotic power, when levelled at the lives and liberties of mankind, become highly obnoxious, his intolerable ſeverities were repreſented to the king, who expreſſed his great diſſatisfaction, and Wolſey ſet bounds to his power, and greater moderation and caution were obſerved in his future deciſions.

In this ſituation was Wolſey, when Charles V. landed at Dover, in order to obtain an interview with Henry previous to that concerted with Francis I. Wolſey was immediately ſent to congratulate the new Emperor, and the next day he was met by Henry, who conducted him to Canterbury where he was ſumptuouſly entertained. Charles found means to ſoothe the vanity and ambition of Wolſey, by promiſing him his aſſiſtance in procuring the papacy, of which, however, there was but little proſpect, as Leo X. was a young man, and conſequently likely to ſurvive the cardinal.

On the ſame day that Charles left England, Henry, with his queen and the whole court, paſſed over to Calais. Francis, attended in the ſame manner, came to Ardres, a ſmall town in the vicinity of Calais. The interviews were at firſt carried on with the greateſt ceremony: but the French king, diſdaining to ſhew any diſtruſt, viſited the Engliſh monarch without guards or attendants: Henry followed his generous example, and they viſited each other without the leaſt precaution. Their time was paſſed in tilts and tournaments, in which they reſpectively diſtinguiſhed themſelves; but no ſerious buſineſs was tranſacted during the whole time.

A. D. 1521. In ſpite of all the endeavours of Henry to ſuppreſs the enmity ſubſiſting between Charles and Francis, hoſtilities were now carried on with great violence between them. Henry, however, affected to obſerve a ſtrict neutrality, and the two monarchs having ravaged the territories of each other, referred their diſputes to Henry. Conferences were accordingly opened at Calais, and Wolſey was deputed to ſettle the differences; but Francis refuſing to accede to the demands of Charles, the conferences were broke off, and the cardinal ſoon after made a journey to Bruges, where he was received by the emperor, with as much ſtate, as if he had been the king of England himſelf; and he concluded, in the name of his maſter, an alliance offenſive and defenſive with the pope and the emperor againſt France.

Soon after Wolſey's return he ſet on foot a proſecution againſt the duke of Buckingham, ſon of him who loſt his life in the reign of Richard III. This nobleman had been often heard to treat Wolſey's pride and profuſion with juſt contempt; and being, perhaps, too unguarded in his reſentment, informers were not wanting to communicate the whole to the cardinal. The ſubſtance of his accuſation was that he had conſulted a fortune-teller concerning his right of ſucceſſion to the crown, being a deſcendant in the female line from the duke of Glouceſter, ſon of Edward III. This was but a ſlight pretext to take away the life of a nobleman, whoſe father had died in defence of the late king; he was, however, brought to trial, and the duke of Norfolk, whoſe ſon had married his daughter, was created lord Steward to preſide at this tribunal. Being found guilty by a jury of his peers, he was condemned and afterwards executed on Tower Hill. But as his crime ſeemed ſolely the effect of imprudence, his ſentence was generally imputed to the malice and revenge of the cardinal.

In the mean time the religious diſputes in Germany ſtill ſubſiſted, and ſeveral of its princes had declared in favour of Luther's reformation. And ſuch are the capricious terms of fate in human affairs, that Henry himſelf became a party in this diſpute. He was ſtrictly attached by education to the court of Rome, and had been incenſed againſt Luther, for having ſpoken contemptuouſly of Thomas Aquinas his favourite author, that reſentment, and not religion, prompted Henry to write in oppoſition to the doctrine of his adverſary. The book when finiſhed was received at Rome with rapture, and the pope beſtowed upon Henry and his ſucceſſors, the title of "Defenders of the Faith." Luther, who paid no reſpect to the dignity of the author, in his anſwer, treated the king with that acrimony and virulence to which he had been ſo long accuſtomed. Henry's interference rendered the controverſy the more illuſtrious. Mankind grew daily more and more intereſted therein; and the Lutheran party gained ground in every part of Europe. The pope was ſtigmatized with the name of Antichriſt, and Rome with that of Babylon; and as theſe appellations, however applied, were, notwithſtanding, ſcriptural, it is no wonder that they ſhould be adopted in this eccleſiaſtical controverſy.

In the infancy of this diſpute, Leo X. departed this life in the prime of life, and in the ninth year of his pontificate. His death tended greatly to advance the rapid progreſs of the reformation, which he had moſt ſteadily oppoſed. He was ſucceeded by pope Adrian VI. who had been tutor to Charles the then emperor. Such was the virulence of the reformers againſt the Romiſh church, that the candour and moderation of this pontiff rather hurt them, though he could not help owning that many abuſes and unwarrantable practices prevailed in the court of Rome.

A. D. 1522. Wolſey had flattered himſelf that he ſhould have been choſen to ſupply the vacant chair, and was found upon a ſcrutiny to have had no leſs than nineteen voices in his favour. He nevertheleſs loſt his election. But the age and infirmities of Adrian ſtill gave him hopes of being ſoon able to gratify his ambition. Charles V. never wiſhed to ſee Wolſey arrive at this honour. What he wanted was to have a pope entirely at his devotion, and this he knew he muſt never expect in the imperious temper of the cardinal. He ſtill, however, affected to countenance his pretenſions, and his diſſimulation had the deſired effect. Wolſey ſhewed no ſigns of reſentment, the late treaty was renewed, and it was reſolved in council to declare war againſt France. In conſequence of this, Henry fitted out a ſtrong fleet, the command of which was given to the earl of Surry, who was now made lord high admiral of England. Surry accordingly embarked for the continent, and after taking ſome towns in Britany, proceeded to Calais, and laid ſiege to Heſden; but not being able to take the place, he re-embarked his forces, and returned to England.

A. D. 1523. The ancient league between France and Scotland having been renewed, the duke of Albany was now preparing to invade the northern parts of England. The earl of Surry was ſent with an army to oppoſe him, and having entered Scotland, he committed the moſt terrible ravages, burnt the town of Jedburgh, with ſeveral neighbouring villages and caſtles, and returned to Newcaſtle. Albany then ſent an herald to Surry to offer him battle, but the earl told him that though he diſdained to follow the dictates of an enemy, he ſhould never decline an engagement. Albany therefore paſſed the Tweed and inveſted the caſtle of Wark. Sir William Liſle the governor, conſcious that the fortreſs was not in a condition to ſupport a long ſiege, made a deſperate ſally, and repulſed the enemy, with the loſs of three hundred men. The Scots were ſo much intimidated by this miſcarriage, that they withdrew into their own country, and a truce was concluded for a year.

The army which was fitted out againſt Scotland about the middle of Auguſt, was tranſplanted to Calais, and the command given to the duke of Suffolk, who was joined at St. Omer's by three thouſand foot and five hundred horſe in the Imperial ſervice. It was now determined to march along the banks of the Somme, and, if poſſible, provoke the French to a deciſive engagement; but they contented themſelves with harraſſing the Engliſh army, relying on the ſtrength of their garriſons, and the advanced ſeaſon of the year to prevent them from taking up their winter quarters in France.

In this conjecture they were not miſtaken, for though the duke had got ſeveral conſiderable places into his poſſeſſion, (among which were Bray, Montdier, Roye and ſome others) and had even advanced within eleven leagues of Paris, he found it impoſſible to canton his forces in the places he had conquered, as the duke of Vendeſme had a large body of troops in Paris, and the marſhal Tremouille was forming another army from the garriſons in Picardy. He was therefore obliged to take up his winter quarters at Calais, but before his troops could reach that place many of them periſhed by the inclemency of the weather.

Notwithſtanding theſe miſcarriages of the Engliſh, the alliance proved in the end too powerful for Francis, and the deſertion of the duke of Bourbon, conſtable of France to the emperor, together with the ill ſucceſs of Bonnivet the French general in his invaſion of Milan, whoſe abilities were in no wiſe equal to his enterprize, gave a diſaſtrous turn to the affairs of Francis, and the campaign ended on his part in fruitleſs attempts and unavailing expeditions.

The death of pope Adrian VI. which happened at this time, and the acceſſion of Clement VII. to the pontificate through the intereſt of the Imperial party, convinced Wolſey of the inſincerity of the emperor, and of the improbability of his ever ſucceeding to the papacy by his means. He, nevertheleſs, diſſembled his reſentment, congratulated the new pope on his election, and ſolicited a continuation of the legatine powers he had enjoyed under the two laſt pontiffs. Clement, well knowing the neceſſity of maintaining the friendſhip of this imperious miniſter, not only granted his requeſt, but ſent him a commiſſion for life, by which Wolſey obtained the whole papal authority in England. In conſequence of this extenſive authority, he erected a college at Oxford, and another at Ipſwich, and invited learned men to preſide in theſe colleges, a meaſure greatly approved by the court of Rome, as there was now a neceſſity for ſuch to defend the church againſt the alarming innovations of the reformers.

A. D. 1524. Bonnivet, the French general, who had retired to Piedmont, having, by his inſolent deportment, offended the Swiſs, they abandoned the French army, and returned to their own country. The general being thus deſerted, quitted his camp, and was purſued by the allied army. A fierce conflict enſued, in which Bonnivet's rear was moſtly deſtroyed. The chevalier Bayard, who, diſtinguiſhed for his magnanimity, had been honoured by his ſoldiers with the title of "the knight without fear and without reproach," was mortally wounded. When this valiant hero could no longer keep his ſeat on horſeback, he ordered his attendants to place him under a tree, with his face to to the enemy, that he might die in that poſition. Every one ſeemed to lament his fate. The ſoldiers dropped a tear as they paſſed by him, and the allied generals expreſſed their concern for his hapleſs ſituation. Seeing among the reſt the conſtable of France "Pity not me," cried he to Bourbon, "I die in the diſcharge of my duty: they alone are objects of pity, who fight againſt their prince and their country."

The pope was now alarmed for Italy. He proceeded, however, ſo far in his oppoſition to Charles, that he ordered his nuncio at London to mediate a reconciliation between France and England. But this was an honour Wolſey reſerved for himſelf; he therefore prevailed on Henry to refuſe the pope's mediation; and Charles and Henry agreed upon the invaſion of France.

In conſequence of a treaty concluded for this purpoſe, the duke of Bourbon entered Provence with ten thouſand foot, two thouſand horſe, and eighteen pieces of cannon. Antibes, Frejus, Vigolles and Aix were presently reduced; and on the ineteenth of August the constable sat down before Marseilles, whose garrison consisted of three thou- nd foot, and two hundred men at arms, besides ine thousand inhabitants who took up arms for s defence. The siege was carried on for about month, when the approach of Francis with forty housand men obliged Bourbon to relinquish the iege, and retire with some precipitation into taly.

A.D. 1525—6. So inconsiderable was the pro- gress of industry and commerce in Europe, that Charles, notwithstanding his extensive possessions, ad not a sum sufficient to pay his forces. Even Bourbon pawned his jewels; and with the money, nd his personal interest together, levied twelve housand men, and joined the Imperial generals Piscarra and Lannoy, who had collected forces rom all parts of Italy. The army, thus com- pleated, advanced to raise the siege of Pavia, here Francis persisted in his design, though he met with insuperable difficulties. The French camp was surrounded with such strong entrench- ments, that the emperor's generals were contented with cannonading the enemy for several days, when the Swiss attacked the entrenchments of the be- siegers on the twenty-fifth of February about mid- night.

Upon the first alarm, Francis, at the head of two housand cavalry, fell so furiously upon Piscarra's division, that the general was dismounted, and dangerously wounded, and the whole corps would have been entirely defeated, had not Bourbon, has- tened to his assistance, after having made a most dreadful slaughter in another part of the camp. The contest was now unequal, and the French, to defend their king, fought as if driven to despair. La Plesse, Tremouille, Galeas de San Severino, nd general Bonnivet were slain by his side. The king himself made a vigorous defence: his horse was killed under him, and he continued fighting on foot, after receiving a desperate wound in his leg.

An officer of rank named Pomerant, who had revolted with the duke of Bourbon, seeing the king thus exposed to danger, assisted him in keep- ng off the soldiers, who were endeavouring to take him alive. He then ordered Bourbon to be alled, to receive the king as a prisoner. The en- aged monarch, however, declared, he would ooner die than yield up his sword to a traitor. Send," said he, "for Lannoy, viceroy of Na- les, to him I will surrender." That officer coming up, the king said to him, "M. de Lannoy, take his sword; it is that of a king, who is not a pri- oner from cowardice, but the accidents of for- ne." Lannoy received the sword upon his knee, issed his hand with the profoundest respect, and resented him his own sword, saying, "I beg your ajesty will be so good as to receive mine, which as this day spared the lives of many Frenchmen. does not become an officer of the emperor to ave a king disarmed, though a prisoner." Lannoy d not, however, think Francis safe in the army; earing the Germans might seize his person as a se- urity for their pay, he carried him to the castle of izzighitone, where he was treated by Alvazon, e Spanish governor, with the respect due to his rson and dignity.

The king of England had been, for some time, atisfied with the emperor's conduct; and his de now completed the disgust of Henry. Charles d hitherto written to him in his own hand, and subscribed himself "Your affectionate son and cousin," but he had now laid aside his usual com- plaisance, and, elated with prosperity, dictated his letters to his secretary, and subscribed himself Charles." Henry could ill brook this change of sentiment and expression, and Wolsey still retained the remembrance of his duplicity, with regard to the papacy. He was now furnished with a sufficient excuse for breaking with him. Henry soon after engaged to procure the liberty of Francis on very reasonable terms, for which he negotiated with his mother the duchess of Angouleme, regent of France. It was agreed, that he should enjoy an annual pension of seven hundred crowns, and at the same time the regent should acknowledge that France owed him one million eight hundred thousand crowns. The cardinal was to receive the arrears of his pension, granted him instead of the revenues of the bishopric of Tournay, besides the additional sum of an hundred thousand crowns.

A war with the emperor was the natural conse- quence of this alliance, the supplies for which, Henry empowered the cardinal to raise; but the measures he took to effect this were very opposite to the designs of the king. Without calling a par- liament, Wolsey issued a decree, in the king's name, for levying one sixth of all the lay revenues, and one fourth of those of the clergy. This tax was deemed so violent an encroachment on the li- berties of the subject, that a rebellion had like to have ensued; and the king was so alarmed, that he actually disowned the measure, declaring, "that no necessities of the crown should make him at- tempt to raise money any other way than by con- sent of parliament."

This, and similar exactions, so incensed Henry, that the favourite was obliged to have recourse to the most abject submission to appease him. He produced his will, wherein he had bequeathed all his riches to the king, and endeavoured to per- suade him that all he had done was with a view to promote the king's honour, and would, in the end, prove of infinite advantage to him. At the same time he made him a present of his magnificent pa- lace at Hampton court, which he had newly erected.

A. D. 1528. On the fourteenth of January, a treaty was signed at Madrid for the purpose of li- berating the French king; wherein it was stipu- lated, "that Francis should resign the duchy of Burgundy to the emperor, that he should be set at liberty in his own kingdom by the tenth of March, and that the duke of Orleans, and his two eldest sons, should be put into the emperor's hands as hostages. That Francis should resign all his pre- tensions to the kingdom of Naples, the duchy of Milan, the lordship of Genoa, the counties of Asti, Arras, Tournay, Mortaigne, St. Arnaud, Lisle, Donay, Orchies, Hedin; and also his so- vereignty over the countries of Flanders and Ar- tois: that the emperor should give up all his claims to the cities and lordships of Peronne, Montdidier, Rouen, Guisnes, and Ponthieu; with all the cities and territories on the river Somme: and, that the duke of Bourbon should be restored to all his for- mer estates and possessions."

These articles Francis engaged to ratify at the first town he should enter in his own dominions. But however tenacious of his honour he might be in other respects, he by no means considered him- self as bound by a promise extorted from him by compulsion, and which was strenuously opposed by the states of Burgundy. This circumstance

Charles

Charles ſhould have foreſeen; but his uſual policy forſook him on this occaſion. Francis would have compounded with the emperor for Burgundy at the expence of two millions of crowns, but Charles would accept of no compoſition, or recede in the leaſt from any one article of the treaty. The French, therefore, concluded an alliance with Clement VII. the Venetians, and the reſt of the Italian ſtates, againſt the emperor, and the king of England was declared protector of the confederacy. The conſtable of Bourbon, however, conquered the Milaneſe; but not having money to pay his troops, he was conducted to Rome, where he was killed in ſcaling the walls. His death inſpired the ſoldiers with fury and revenge. Rome was taken by aſſault and pillaged, and the pope was taken priſoner, and confined in the caſtle of St. Angelo.

Irritated beyond meaſure at the news of Clement's misfortune, the kings of England and France reſolved to carry their arms into Italy. They therefore concluded a new treaty, by which Henry renounced his ancient chimerical pretenſions to the crown of France, and his ally engaged for himſelf and his ſucceſſors to pay a penſion of fifty thouſand crowns to the kings of England.

While affairs were in this ſituation on the continent, a new ſeries of events excited the attention of all Europe. Henry had now been married eighteen years to Catherine of Aragon, his brother's widow, and as ſhe was ſix years older than the king, and had loſt his affections, he was grown heartily tired of her. Though ſhe had brought him three children, of whom the princeſs Mary was ſtill living, and had ſuſtained an irreproachable character, yet all her accompliſhments were unable to fix a heart addicted to variety. Her marriage with the king had been conſidered as illegal by moſt of the foreign ſtates, and as ſuch had been oppoſed by Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, whoſe opinion had been confirmed by both houſes of convocation. The curſe of ſterility is denounced in the levitical law againſt any one who ſhould marry his brother's widow, and as all Henry's children, except the princeſs Mary, had died in their infancy, he could not but think himſelf obnoxious to this malediction. The great progreſs Henry had made in caſuiſtical divinity, enabled him thoroughly to examine this queſtion, and his favourite author Thomas Aquinas, (to whoſe authority in eccleſiaſtical matters he gave implicit credit) had treated of this very caſe in the following terms: "the prohibitions contained in Leviticus (ſays that celebrated caſuiſt) and among the reſt that of marrying a brother's widow, are moral, eternal, and founded on a divine ſanction; and though the pope may diſpenſe with the rules of the church, the laws of God cannot be ſet aſide by any authority leſs than that which enacted them."

Henry was now convinced of the illegality of his marriage, and a circumſtance fell out, at this time, which confirmed him in his reſolution to obtain a divorce. Anne Boleyn, a beautiful and accompliſhed young lady, had been lately appointed maid of honour to the queen, and ſoon attracted the notice and affections of Henry. Finding her proof againſt all the arts of ſeduction, he determined to raiſe her to the throne; but he had many obſtacles to encounter before this could be effected, and as Catherine was aunt to the emperor, her repudiation was not eaſily to be accompliſhed.

A. D. 1529. The firſt ſtep to be taken was to get the bull of pope Julius annulled; but this, however neceſſary, was a meaſure very difficult to reconcile with the pontifical authority. Clement VII. however, ſtill a priſoner to the emperor, thought it highly eſſential to maintain a friendſhip with Henry, and therefore liſtened to the propoſitions which were made to him. He gave Wolſey a commiſſion to examine, as legate, into the validity of the marriage, and promiſed, in due time, to expedite the divorce. But the pope, with all his parts and addreſs, was deficient in courage and integrity. The emperor, knowing his diſpoſition, threatened to depoſe him on pretence of baſtardy, he being only the reputed ſon of Julian de Medicis. He flattered himſelf, too, with the hope of re-eſtabliſhing the houſe of Medicis, againſt which the Florentines had revolted. Preſſed by the ſolicitations of Henry, he conſented to an examination of his marriage: he joined Campeggio to Wolſey, but without engaging not to revoke the commiſſion. The ſtudied delays of Campeggio, at firſt, gave ſome offence, till at length he arrived with the wiſhed-for bull. Henry and Wolſey were the only perſons permitted to ſee it. It was not to take place till the marriage was ſet aſide. The two legates, therefore, prepared to begin this important proceſs.

Nothing could be more affecting than the behaviour of the queen, when ſhe and the king were cited before their tribunal. Inſtead of anſwering to her name, as the king had done, ſhe threw herſelf at his feet, and addreſſed him in the moſt pathetic manner. She urged the implacability of her enemies to a friendleſs woman, in a country where ſhe was a ſtranger, pleaded her irreproachable conduct, and proteſted, in the ſtrongeſt terms, that her former marriage had never been conſummated; that in eſpouſing him ſhe had only conformed to the will of two able monarchs, Henry VII. and Ferdinand the catholic. She expreſſed her ſuſpicion of the commiſſioners impartiality, appealed from them to the pope, and at length left the court, with a firm reſolution to appear there no more. Henry bore witneſs to her virtue; but inſiſted on the ſcruples which diſturbed his peace. He proved, in a plauſible manner, the conſummation of the queen's marriage with his brother Arthur, declared his doubts of the validity of the diſpenſation of pope Julius, and demanded judgment to be given according to the laws of equity and religion. The affair was protracted to a conſiderable length. Clement was either influenced by the promiſes, or intimidated by the threats of Charles the Fifth. Campeggio ſuſpended the proceedings, the cauſe was evoked to Rome, and the decretal bull thrown into the fire.

Henry, being thus diſappointed in the expected ſucceſs of his wiſhes, began to ſuſpect Wolſey of treachery; and from this æra we may juſtly date the favourite's downfall. The emperor joined his endeavours to accompliſh that event, and the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk exerted all their influence to ſupplant him. But the chief inſtrument in the fall of Wolſey was Anne Boleyn, whoſe aſcendancy over the mind of Henry was ſo firmly eſtabliſhed, that the cardinal found his authority likely to be ſhaken by her extraordinary influence.

The diſgrace of Wolſey was expected to have been the immediate conſequence of the reference of the cauſe to the court of Rome: but Henry had ſo far the the government of his paſſions, as to conceal his diſlike of his miniſter's proceedings. No ſooner, however, had the pope's legate obtained ined his audience of leave, than Henry, to diert his chagrin, made a progreſs through ſome f the neighbouring counties, unaccompanied by Wolſey. This neglect the cardinal knew foreoded him no good. Yet, as he flattered himſelf e might ſtill find means to avert his impending uin, he diſcharged the duties of his office with is accuſtomed punctuality. But Anne Boleyn, nd the reſt of his enemies, had worked up the ing's reſentment to ſuch a degree, that, on his reurn to London, the dukes of Norfolk and Sufolk, Wolſey's inveterate foes, were ſent to deand the great ſeal. Wolſey at firſt refuſed to deiver it, on pretence of holding it by patent for ife; but the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk return-ng next day with orders, beſides the king's ſignet, Wolſey immediately reſigned it into their hands;

pon which the king gave it to Sir Thomas More, man of profound literature, and unblemiſhed inegrity; Wolſey was ordered to quit York palace, which, a few days after, though it belonged to the archiepiſcopal ſee, was ſeized by Henry, nd became afterwards a royal reſidence, under the title of Whitehall. A cup-board of maſſy gold, with all his other valuable furniture, beſides a thouſand pieces of fine Holland, were convert-d to the king's uſe, and Wolſey, having diſmiſſed his ſplendid retinue, retired to his ſeat at Eſher, on the banks of the Thames.

But notwithſtanding this ſeverity, Henry ſtill expreſſed ſome affection for the cardinal; but yielding to the ſolicitations of his enemies, he at laſt gave him up to a parliamentary enquiry. The houſe of lords exhibited no leſs than forty-four articles againſt him, all of which were rejected by the commons. Thomas Cromwell, an old ſervant to Wolſey, undertook his defence with great reſolution and ſtrength of argument; a ſtep which, far from retarding his promotion, as might have been expected, laid the firſt foundation of thoſe favours he afterwards received from the king. The cardinal was, however, condemned for having ſolicited bulls from Rome, a pretext the more frivolous, as all he had done was ſanctioned by his maſter's conſent. The king, however, ſoftened the rigour of the proſecution, granted him a pardon for all offences, and continued to intimate, from time to time, that he ſtill retained for him his former friendſhip and eſteem.

The policy of Clement VII. (together with the intrigues and powers of Charles V.) had, by this time, deprived the king of all hopes of ſucceeding in his application to the court of Rome for a divorce. It was, therefore, neceſſary to find out ſome other expedient to gain his ends. From this difficulty he was at length extricated by the aſſiſtance of Dr. Thomas Cranmer, fellow of Jeſus College, Cambridge, who propoſed to conſult all the univerſities of Europe on this ſubject. "If they," ſaid he, "approve of our marriage with Catherine of Arragon, your ſcruples muſt neceſſarily ſubmit to their ſuffrages; if they declare the marriage unlawful, the pope cannot refuſe his con-ſent to the divorce." This propoſition was well received by the king, who agreed that it ſhould be carried into immediate execution. Finding that Cranmer's piety and moderation were equal to his extraordinary abilities, he ſent for him to court, and placed him near his perſon. In the mean time agents were diſpatched to all the univerſities of Europe on the propoſed commiſſion.

A. D. 1530. The reſult of this enquiry terminated in favour of the monarch. Several of the univerſities, without heſitation, maintained, "that the marriage of any perſon with a brother's widow was contrary to the divine law; and, conſe-quently, could not be authoriſed by any diſpenſation."

The court of Rome, however, paid no regard to this deciſion, which had given Henry ſo much ſatisfaction. A ſpirited letter was, therefore, written to the pope, ſigned by many of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, in which they plainly told him,
"that if he continued to perſiſt in refuſing the king that juſtice which he had a right to demand, and after he had obtained the ſanction of ſo many learned univerſities, they would renounce their obedience to the holy ſee, who had ſo long a-muſed the king, and to ſo little purpoſe. All theſe events tended to the ruin of the Romiſh church, the reſpect of the people for the pontifical authority daily diminiſhed, and as for the king, the more oppoſitions he met with, the ſtronger were his reſolutions to overcome every obſtacle which ſtood in the way of his deſires.

Wolſey ſtill entertained hopes of retrieving the royal favour, having been already re-inſtated in the revenues of his archbiſhoprick, and thoſe of the ſee of Wincheſter. This alarmed the council, who procured an order from the king, that he ſhould remove to his archiepiſcopal ſee. In conſequence of this, he retired to Cawood in Yorkſhire, where he ſoon gained popularity, by a diligent diſcharge of his paſtoral duties.
Short, however, was the date of the happi-neſs he now enjoyed. He was ſoon after arreſted for high treaſon, by the earl of Northumberland and Sir Peter Walſh, who were ſent down for that purpoſe.

In compliance with the king's commands, he ſet out for London with ſeeming chearfulneſs; but partly by the fatigue of his journey, and partly by the anxiety of his mind, he was ſeized with a diſorder which ſoon turned to a dyſentary; ſo that it was with the greateſt difficulty he reached Lei-ceſter. On his arrival there, he was immediately carried to his bed, from which he never more aroſe. Convinced of the vanity of all ambitious purſuits, and ſublunary grandeur, he ſincerely regretted his compliance with the unruly paſſions of an ungrateful maſter. "Had I," ſaid he, "ſerved my God, as diligently as I ſerved my king, he would not have forſaken me in my grey hairs." He died ſoon after in all the pangs of remorſe, on the twenty-third of November, in the ſixtieth year of his age, and was, at his own requeſt, buried in the chapel of Leiceſter abbey.

A. D. 1531. The parliament, which met ſoon after Wolſey's deceaſe, availed themſelves of the ſame act, which had deſtroyed the cardinal, to enrich the crown at the expence of the clergy, on whoſe humiliation Henry ſeemed firmly reſolved.
The Proteſtant faith was, at this time, privately embraced by many of the Engliſh, whoſe ignorance and ſuperſtition had been, in a great meaſure, removed by the writings and ſermons of Wickliff and his diſciples. But, however deſirous the commons might be of humbling the clergy, moſt of them found themſelves in the ſame predicament; for having maintained cauſes in the eccleſiaſtical courts, they became apprehenſive for their own ſafety. Having, however, found means to get themſelves included in a pardon, which the clergy had purchaſed at a great expence, they exulted in their ſucceſs, and extolled to the ſkies their ſove-reign's clemency.

A. D. 1532. The whole kingdom was now ſufficiently convinced of Henry's intention to marry Anne Boleyn, in defiance of the pope's authority, and the obedience which the king owed to the holy ſee. Sir Thomas More, incapable of making his religion ſubſervient to his intereſt, and totally indifferent to the advancement of his fortune, was overjoyed at being permitted to reſign the ſeals; ſoon after which, Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, paid the debt of nature. This was a moſt flattering circumſtance to Henry; for though the deceaſed prelate had been convinced of the illegality of the king's marriage with Catherine, he was too much devoted to the ſee of Rome, to do any thing in oppoſition to the papal power. Dr. Thomas Cranmer was ſoon after appointed his ſucceſſor.

Not all the eloquence of the ſubtle Henry could induce Catherine to withdraw her appeal from Rome; ſo that having concluded a treaty of alliance with Francis I. he privately married Anne Boleyn on the 14th of November.

A. D. 1533. The queen's pregnancy, which ſoon after appeared, made it neceſſary for Henry to own his marriage publickly; in conſequence of which it was determined in council, that Cranmer ſhould pronounce the ſentence of divorce againſt Catherine. The archbiſhop accordingly repaired to Dunſtable, in the neighbourhood of which Catherine reſided, and cited her to appear before him. As ſhe paid no regard to the ſummons, ſhe was declared contumacious, and the primate, after examining into the merits of the cauſe, annulled the king's marriage with Catherine, as illegal. He afterwards ratified his marriage with Anne Boleyn, who was publickly crowned, with great ceremony and magnificence. On the 7th of September the new queen was delivered of a daughter, who was named Elizabeth, and who afterwards governed the realm with ſuch merited applauſe. Henry conferred on her the title of Princeſs of Wales, though ſhe was only preſumptive heir to the crown.

Theſe proceedings were no ſooner known at Rome, than the whole conſiſtory was thrown into the moſt violent ferment. The king was threatened with excommunication if he did not, within a limited time, make atonement for the criminal acts he had committed. The mediation of Francis I. whoſe ſecond ſon, the duke of Orleans, was to marry Catherine de Medicis, the pope's neice, ſeemed to promiſe a favourable accommodation. Henry conſented to ſubmit his cauſe to the judgment of the conſiſtory, provided all the cardinals of the imperial party were excluded, and the pope ſeemed diſpoſed to comply with his requeſt. The court of Rome expected the king's poſitive anſwer. The courier not arriving on the day he was expected, the enraged pontiff entered the conſiſtory, pronounced the legality of Henry's marriage with Catherine, and declared him excommunicated, if he refuſed to acknowledge the ſentence. Two days after the meſſenger arrived with the monarch's letter; but it was then too late to remedy the evil, and the kingdom of all others in Europe moſt devoted to the ſee of Rome, and moſt laviſh in its contributions, became the moſt irreconſileable enemy.

A. D. 1534. In the enſuing parliament laws were enacted wholly ſubverſive of the papal authority, which was then declared to be confined within the limits of the dioceſe of Rome. The ſtatute of Henry IV. againſt heretics was moderated. No ſynod was to be convoked without the king's permiſſion. It was further enacted, that the pope ſhould have no ſhare in the election of biſhops, and that the biſhops, elected by the chapter, ſhould ſwear fealty to the king. That no one ſhould apply to the biſhop of Rome on any religious account whatever. That peter-pence, and all diſpenſations iſſued by the court of Rome, ſhould be aboliſhed. That the archbiſhop of Canterbury ſhould be empowered to grant diſpenſations, the profits ariſing from which to be paid into the king's exchequer. That all religious houſes ſhould be ſubject to the archbiſhop's viſitation, that the king's marriage with Catherine ſhould be null and void, and that the ſucceſſion ſhould devolve upon the iſſue of Anne Boleyn, his lawful wife. An act of attainder was alſo paſſed againſt Elizabeth Barton, (commonly called The Holy Maid of Kent) and her accomplices, for treaſonable practices.

This female enthuſiaſt, who was ſubject to a very extraordinary kind of hyſteric convulſions, was inſtructed, by ſome clerical impoſtors, to aſſume the character of an inſpired perſon; and to feign a miraculous cure, in order to attract a number of credulous perſons to an image of the Virgin.

When the people became thoroughly perſuaded of her being divinely commiſſioned, ſhe was taught to declaim not only againſt the reformation, which ſhe called hereſy, but againſt all eccleſiaſtical innovations, and againſt the king's divorce: nay, ſhe even threatened him with death if he perſiſted in his crime. Henry, for ſome time, diſdained to take any notice of this woman, conſidering her pretended prophecies as the effects of a diſtempered brain; but finding her ſupported not only by the monks, but alſo by all the pope's agents in England, he determined to proſecute her with the utmoſt rigour. She and her accomplices were accordingly arreſted, and, being examined in the Star-Chamber, confeſſed their guilt, and were all committed to priſon.

The detection of this impoſture greatly injured the credit of the eccleſiaſtics, eſpecially the monks, who ſeverely felt the weight of Henry's reſentment. John Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, and Sir Thomas More, were committed to the tower, for refuſing to take the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy.

But though Henry had renounced the pope's authority, he was far from being a friend to the reformers, whoſe tenets were, notwithſtanding, embraced by great numbers in the kingdom. The king's book againſt Luther had gained him reſpect with the catholics, but the contemptuous anſwer of that reformer had hurt his pride. He did not, therefore, abandon the tenets of the Romiſh faith, though he had diſclaimed the authority of the pontiff. His courtiers knew not which religion to adopt, and ſeemed exceeding cautious in declaring their ſentiments. The duke of Norfolk, and Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, though they pretended to acknowledge the king's ſupremacy, were very rigid againſt the reformers. On the other hand, the queen, with archbiſhop Cranmer and ſecretary Cromwell, were as violent againſt the profeſſors of the Romiſh religion. In conſequence of this, perſecution prevailed on both ſides, and it was equally unſafe to acknowledge the pope's ſupremacy, as to embrace the tenets of Luther. The prior of the Carthuſian monks, the prior of Hexham, Benaſe, a monk of Sion-College, and John Haile, vicar of Iſleworth, were put to death for denying the pope's ſupremacy. Theſe, and too many more inſtances of the like horrid perſecution, ons, which disgrace the close of this reign, evince the direful effects of a misguided zeal in matters of a religious nature.

Nor did the reformers escape the violence of the king, who was highly offended at that spirit of liberty cherished by the whole sect. A gentleman of the Temple, and a clergyman, were put to the torture for embracing the doctrines of the reformation; but, being unable to endure their sufferings, they abjured the tenets of Luther, and were set at liberty. However, feeling afterwards the deepest compunction for their timidity, they boldly preached against the superstitions of the established religion, and were condemned to the flames, the violence of which they endured with amazing fortitude, glorying in the faith for which they yielded up their lives.

It was, indeed, exceeding difficult to avoid incurring the king's displeasure. Such were the effects of his furious bigotry, that the most innocent actions were deemed heretical. To teach children the Lord's Prayer in the vulgar tongue, to read the English translation of the New Testament, to speak against pilgrimages, and to omit observing the fasts of the church, were considered as highly criminal, and the offenders punished with the utmost severity.

A. D. 1535. Fisher, bishop of Rochester, and Sir Thomas More, were still confined in the tower. The pope, who imputed the sufferings of Fisher to his attachment to the church of Rome, sent him, during his imprisonment, a cardinal's hat; but this promotion could not exempt him from punishment. He was, at last, tried and condemned to lose his life, for refusing to take the oath of supremacy, and submitted to his fate with great calmness and fortitude. Sir Thomas More also fell a victim to Henry's fury for the same offence. When conducted to the scaffold, neither the serenity of his mind, no the usual chearfulness of his temper, forsook him. He entreated the executioner to stay till he had just put aside his beard; "for (said he) that has never committed treason." The resolution of this great and good man will be remembered with respect, while the malice of his enemies will be recollected with abhorrence.

Paul III. who had lately succeeded Clement VII. in the papacy, had flattered himself with being able to reconcile Henry to the see of Rome. He was more desirous than Clement himself to bring about an accommodation. While this business seemed to wear a prospect of success, and terms were negotiating for this purpose, the news of Fisher's execution re-kindled the resentment of the sacred college. A cardinal put to death for defending the rights of the holy see, called aloud for vengeance on the royal aggressor, and the thunder of the vatican was hurled against him. Henry was cited to appear before the pope's tribunal, excommunicated for his refusal, his marriage with Anne Boleyn declared illegal, his subjects freed from their allegiance, his kingdom delivered up to the first invader, and his leagues with all catholic princes dissolved. These censures the pope, however, delayed to publish, till all hopes of an accommodation should prove abortive, and till Charles V. (then employed against the Turks and the protestants of Germany) should be able to assist him in putting these menaces into execution.

The league of Smalcalde, where the reformers assumed the name of Protestants, formed a strong barrier to the ambition of this formidable sovereign. The kings of England and France made some advances to be admitted into this league. But their rigorous persecution of their heretical subjects, or those who were only suspected as such, and their bigoted zeal for the support of the antient faith, did not allow the German princes to place any dependence on them. A league formed upon religion and policy required a conformity of sentiments as well as of interests.

A. D. 1536. During these religious controversies, queen Catherine was attacked with a distemper which put a period to her existence on the 6th of January, in the 50th year of her age. When her last moments were approaching, she wrote a very affecting letter to the king, whom she stiled, "her most dear lord, king and husband." Henry was greatly moved with this last proof of Catherine's affection, given at such a period. But very different was the behaviour of Anne Boleyn, who openly expressed her satisfaction at the death of Catherine, and seemed pleased in making it publickly known, little thinking how soon she was to be sacrificed to the ungovernable passion of her husband. Catherine's remains were deposited in the abbey of Peterborough, which Henry afterwards converted into an episcopal cathedral.

The affronts which Henry had received from the monks were now threatened to be repaid with ample vengeance. Conscious of their connexion with the Roman see, they had strained every nerve in depreciating the reformation. They declaimed, with the utmost violence, against the adherents of Luther, who, on the other hand, reproached the monks with their laziness, sophistry, and superstition. The revenues of the convents had, probably, inspired Henry with a desire of appropriating them to his own use: the design, however, appeared to him exceeding hazardous, they having been long considered as sacred and inviolable. Some caution was, therefore, necessary to be observed; and it was resolved in council, that a general visitation should be made of all the monasteries, that a strict inquest should be taken of all their titles and revenues, and that the morals and regulations of the whole fraternity should be minutely inspected. Cromwell was created vicar-general and inquisitor-general of all the monasteries; and the result of this enquiry, by discovering unparalleled scenes of vice and licentiousness, seemed to justify the necessity of such a salutary proceeding. Nothing was more easy than to detect these abuses and enormities; but a great number were, indeed, rather imputed, than really existed. Doubtful evidences were admitted as facts, calumnies were aggravated into proofs, and several convents of both sexes were represented as exhibiting scenes of the most abandoned lewdness. Violent dissentions, the grossest superstitions, laziness, effeminacy, and ignorance, were among the least imputations with which these societies stood charged. The account of this visitation was published, in order to render them more execrable in the eyes of the nation. And now the first blow was given to these religious orders. The vows of the religious under the age of twenty-four were cancelled, all of whom were obliged to leave their convents; while others above that age were left at their liberty of renouncing the cloister if they thought proper. The parliament, who were merely the tools of Henry, suppressed all the smaller monasteries, the revenues of each of which did not amount to less than two hundred pounds. No less than three hundred and seventy-six of these were accordingly abolished at one time. Their lands were confiscated to the king's use; and his his yearly revenue was thereby encreaſed to thirty thouſand pounds, beſides an immenſe perſonal property, which was computed at one hundred thouſand pounds.

While the parliament was employed in ſuppreſſing the leſſer monaſteries, an affair of great importance to the proteſtants engaged the attention of the convocation. Tindal's Verſion of the Bible, publiſhed ſome years before, had been found inaccurate, and was condemned to be burnt. A new tranſlation of the Scriptures was, therefore, propoſed. This motion, long oppoſed by the papiſts, and favoured by the reformers, was at length carried, and perſons properly qualified were engaged in the undertaking.

The decline of the Romiſh religion was, in a great meaſure, owing to Henry's paſſion for Anne Boleyn, who had now loſt that aſcendancy ſhe formerly poſſeſſed over the king's paſſions. Jane Seymour, one of her maids of honour (a lady of ſingular beauty and merit) had newly gained his affections, and, immoderate in his deſires, he did not ſcruple to ſacrifice a wife to a miſtreſs. The diſpoſition of Anne Boleyn, though perfectly conſonant with virtue, was, nevertheleſs, gay and lively, and had, perhaps, an appearance of gallantry, which, allowing for the freedoms practiſed in the court of France, where ſhe had been bred, is not to be wondered at. Calumny had converted her moſt inoffenſive actions into crimes, and Henry, taking it into his head to doubt her fidelity, determined on the deſtruction of one whom he had, ſo ſhort a time before, extravagantly admired. She was, therefore, arreſted and accuſed of adultery and inceſt, by having had a criminal connexion with her brother the viſcount Rochford and others, for which charge there was not the leaſt ſhadow of a foundation. Such, however, was the ſlaviſh compliance of the parliament with the king's will, that, though no evidence appeared againſt her, ſhe was condemned to death. She declared her innocence to the laſt, and, in a moſt pathetic letter to the king, which ſhe ſent when juſt going to aſcend the ſcaffold, ſhe ſays, "You have been con"tinually raiſing me: from a private gentlewoman
"you made me a marchioneſs; from a marchio-
"neſs, a queen; and as you can raiſe me no higher "in this world, you are this day ſending me to be
"a ſaint in heaven." She recommended to him her daughter Elizabeth, and received the ſtroke of death with the greateſt compoſure and reſolution, on the 19th of May; and her remains were privately interred in the tower.

The very next day after the execution of Anne Boleyn, Henry married lady Jane Seymour, ſo eager was he to ſatisfy his inordinate deſires. Nor was he content with putting Anne Boleyn to death; he even declared his marriage with her illegal, under pretence of her former contract with the earl of Northumberland, and, by this act of cruelty, rendered the princeſs Elizabeth illegitimate.

The ſame obſequiouſneſs appeared in the new parliament as in the former. They confirmed the divorce of Catherine, declared the two princeſſes (Mary and Elizabeth) illegitimate, and adjudged the crown to devolve on the iſſue of the then, or any future, marriage of the king.

In revenge for the ſuppreſſion of the monaſteries, Henry was again excommunicated, the kingdom laid under an interdict, and the people abſolved from their allegiance. In conſequence of this a rebellion was excited by the monks, who perſuaded the people that it was their duty to take up arms againſt a prince who had trampled under foot all their civil and religious liberties. Upwards of twenty thouſand perſons aſſembled in Lincolnſhire, headed by Thomas Mackerels, prior of Barlings; but being unable to reſiſt a body of regulars ſent under the duke of Suffolk to oppoſe them, they diſperſed of themſelves, on condition of a pardon: but their leader was taken, and paid his life as a forfeit for his treaſon.

This inſurrection was ſucceeded by one of much greater importance in Yorkſhire, under the influence and command of one Aſke, a gentleman of that country, poſſeſſed of talents ſuited to the purpoſes of rebellion. The rebels marched under the banner of the croſs, and ſtiled their enterprize, "The pilgrimage of grace," which they pretended to have undertaken for the love of God, the ſervice of the king, the re-eſtabliſhment of the church, and the ſuppreſſion of heretics. So great was the effect of this deluſion, that Aſke ſoon found himſelf at the head of forty thouſand men. Pontefract-caſtle ſoon yielded to their attacks, as did likewiſe York and Hull, and Aſke compelled all the nobility of the coutry to join him, except Henry Clifford, earl of Northumberland, who defended Skipton caſtle againſt all their attempts.

The prudence of the duke of Norfolk, whom the king had ſent againſt them, with an army of only five thouſand men, tended to impede their progreſs. The river Till, which was rendered impaſſable by violent rains, had twice prevented their coming to an engagement. Perſuaded that heaven oppoſed their deſign, ſuperſtition got the better of their courage, and they accepted of a pardon from the duke of Norfolk, which the king afterwards confirmed.

The prieſts, in a ſhort time, re-kindled the torch of diſcord at the ſhrine of religion, and perſuaded the people once more to undertake the defence of their ſuperſtitious worſhip. The duke of Norfolk was obliged to continue in the north during the winter, but by the exerciſe of martial law, he encreaſed, inſtead of abated, the diſorders. Muſgrave and Treby, two gentlemen, at the head of eight thouſand peaſants, made an attempt on Carliſle, but were defeated by the duke of Norfolk: Muſgrave eſcaped, but Treby, and ſeventy of his adherents, were all hanged on the walls of that city.

A. D. 1537. In order to prevent any farther inſurrections, Henry ſent for the ring-leaders to court. Aſke obeyed the ſummons, and was favourably received; but the lords Darcy and Huſſey, with ſeveral other rebel officers, refuſing obedience to the royal commands, were ſeized, and beheaded on Tower-Hill. Aſke, intimidated by their fate, retired into the country without leave, and was ſoon afterwards hanged at York.

Inured to ſlaughter, the practice of it became familiar to Henry. Thomas Fitzgerald and five of his uncles, who had been long impriſoned in the tower, for a revolt in Ireland, were ordered for execution. The earl's youngeſt ſon Stephen, however, fled to the continent, and was engaged by cardinal Pole, in his attempts to re-eſtabliſh the papal authority in England.

The wiſhes of the king were now happily gratified by the birth of a ſon, the indiſputable heir to his crown; but his ſatisfaction received a conſiderable alloy by the death of the queen in childbed. Of all his wives ſhe was the moſt eſteemed by him, and reſpected by the people for the affability fability and humility of her diſpoſition. Her loſs was ſo much regretted by the king, that he ſecluded himſelf from all company for ſeveral days. The young prince was baptiſed by the name of Edward, and had the titles of prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Cheſter, conferred on him.

A. D. 1538. This fortunate event greatly conduced to the aggrandiſement of Henry's power; he was dreaded by his ſubjects, and his friendſhip ſolicited by the greateſt princes of Europe. He therefore now determined on a total ſuppreſſion of the monaſteries. A new viſitation of theſe receſſes was ordered by the parliament, and guilt and innocence were confounded by the viſitors. In many of the monaſteries were found artificial relics, and various inventions were diſcovered for impoſing on the credulous.

A remarkable crucifix at Boxley in Kent was held in ſacred veneration. This inſtrument of idolatry, which was diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of "The rood of grace," was contrived by means of ſprings placed within it, to ſhake its head, open its lips, and perform ſundry motions of the human body. This object of bigotted devotion was broken in pieces at St. Paul's croſs, by Hilſey, biſhop of Rocheſter, who expoſed the manner in which the deception had been practiſed, to the conviction of a deluded croud of ſpectators.

Impoſitions of this flagrant nature could not but expoſe their detected authors to public deteſtation and abhorrence. Henry reaped all the advantage from them he could deſire, and the monks, finding all reſiſtance fruitleſs, conſented to abandon their ſanctuaries and receive penſions for their ſubſiſtence. The number of monaſteries diſſolved was ſix hundred and forty-five, twenty-eight of which had abbots who ſat in parliament. Ninety colleges, two thouſand three hundred and ten hoſpitals, were demoliſhed in different parts of the kingdom: and the whole confiſcated revenues amounted to the annual ſum of one hundred and ſixty thouſand one hundred pounds.

The moſt reſpected object, however, was the ſhrine of Thomas à Becket, which, though it had hitherto eſcaped, could not be overlooked by this vindictive enemy to the holy ſee. Henry could not bear the thought that the memory of this arch-rebel to his ſovereign, ſhould be held in ſuch pious veneration by the people, and his tomb loaded with the ſuperb offerings of the pilgrims who conſtantly reſorted to it. The actions of Becket were recapitulated, his pretended miracles expoſed, his name expunged from the calendar, the office for his feſtival omitted in the breviary, his bones burnt, and his aſhes ſcattered by the winds. Among other ſpoils of the ſaint, which Henry appropriated to his own uſe, was a diamond of infinite value, preſented by Lewis VII. of France, who had made a pilgrimage to the ſhrine of St. Thomas. This jewel was ſet in a ring and worn by Henry on his thumb. To reconcile the people to theſe innovations, the king erected ſix new biſhopricks, made ample donations to his courtiers, and ſettled ſalaries on ſome of the abbots and monks.

Theſe violent proceedings excited the reſentment of the court of Rome, which vented itſelf in reproaches and anathemas againſt the perſon and conduct of Henry, who was repreſented as the moſt ſacrilegious tyrant that ever diſgraced the dignity of a throne. Libels were publiſhed in which he was degraded below the character of Julian the apoſtate. The king eaſily recognized, in theſe invectives, the ſtyle of cardinal Pole, his relation; and his pride and ſanguinary temper prompted him to revenge the inſult. The cardinal, indeed, who reſided in Italy, was out of the reach of his reſentment. But as he was ſuſpected of having formed a conſpiracy againſt him, ſome lords, and particularly two of the cardinal's brothers, were arreſted as his accomplices: Sir Geoffrey de la Pole alone eſcaped with his life, by diſcovering the conſpiracy.

Pope Paul III. finding all hopes of a reconciliation with Henry impoſſible, reſolved to publiſh the ſentence of excommunication againſt him, which he had hitherto ſuſpended. He uſed his utmoſt endeavours to exaſperate the neighbouring princes againſt him, and even promiſed the crown to James of Scotland, provided he would aſſiſt in dethroning Henry. But the power of the Engliſh monarch enabled him to ſet his holineſs at defiance, and to exact a new oath from the clergy, to abjure the authority of the biſhop of Rome. The new tranſlation of the bible was now compleated, and preſented to the king by Cromwell, who was of opinion, that a free toleration of the ſcriptures, in the vulgar tongue, would effectually eradicate the Romiſh ſuperſtition. Henry, however, who was but half a proteſtant, would indulge the people only in a partial uſe of the ſcriptures, to which they were reſtricted by a public proclamation. This indulgence, however, was embraced by the reformers as a great acquiſition, eſpecially as the clergy, were permitted to read the Lord's prayer, the creed, and the decalogue in Engliſh. They were alſo recommended to preach good works, and the inefficacy of relics, roſaries, and other inſtruments of popery, to procure ſalvation.

A. D. 1539. Notwithſtanding the pope's excommunication, and his inveteracy againſt the Romiſh clergy, Henry conſtantly piqued himſelf on an ardent zeal for the Catholic doctrine; which he gloried in defending by diſputation as well as perſecution. Of all the inconſiſtencies of that doctrine, was, that moſt abſurd one tranſubſtantiation, which he maintained with the moſt ridiculous obſtinacy. One Lambert, a ſchoolmaſter, had maintained unorthodox opinions concerning the real preſence, and, being cited before the biſhops, appealed to the king. Henry was overjoyed at this opportunity of diſplaying his theological talents. The prelates, peers, and other perſons of diſtinction, being aſſembled in Weſtminſter Hall, the royal theologiſt, ſeated on the throne, challenged Lambert to defend his opinion with reſpect to the Euchariſt. The pedagogue acquitted himſelf in the taſk with great courage, but the king, aſſiſted by ten biſhops, who all engaged in the diſpute, effectually confounded the diſputant, after a conference of five hours. He concluded by propoſing to him to alter his ſentiments, or be burnt alive. Lambert, confounded, but not convinced, preferred the fire to the ſhame of retracting, and periſhed with amazing reſolution amidſt the moſt dreadful tortures. The monarch, intoxicated with the applauſe beſtowed upon him for his ſucceſs in this diſpute, expected a more implicit ſubmiſſion to his principles than before. To think differently from him in eccleſiaſtical matters was deemed a capital tranſgreſſion; and he availed himſelf of the ſervility of his parliament, to make his own opinion the ſtandard of orthodoxy in England. A bill was drawn up, and preſented to the houſe, where it paſſed into a law, called the bill of the ſix articles, or, as the proteſtants juſtly ſtiled it, "The bloody bill." By this act the preſence in the Eucahriſt; communion in one kind; the perpetual obligation to vows of chaſtity; the celibacy of the prieſthood; the utility of private maſſes; and the neceſſity of auricular confeſſion, were eſtabliſhed, on pain of death; fines, confiſcations, and impriſonment, according to the heinouſneſs of the crimes committed in breach of this law. Cranmer alone had the reſolution to oppoſe this bill, but when it was paſſed into a law, he immediatcly ſeparated from his wife, and the king was contented with this inſtance of his ſubmiſſion.

By an act yet more ſtrange, in which the parliament ſhewed themſelves equally regardleſs of their civil as of their religious liberties, they even gave to the king's proclamation the ſame force as an act of parliament; thus transferring the legiſlative power to the crown, and totally ſubverting the Engliſh conſtitution.

Nor did the meanneſs of their condeſcenſion ſtop here. In compliance with the king's hatred to cardinal Pole, they paſſed bills of attainder, not only againſt his adherents, but alſo againſt his mother the counteſs of Saliſbury, the marchioneſs of Exeter, Sir Adrian Forteſcue, and Sir Thomas Dingley, without the leaſt proof of their guilt. The two gentlemen were executed, the marchioneſs received a pardon, and the counteſs was reprieved. The ſtatute of the ſix articles reduced the proteſtants to deſpair, but Cranmer and Cromwell ſuſpended the execution of them, and the capricious monarch himſelf favoured at one time the party he oppreſſed at another, by allowing every perſon to have the tranſlation of the bible in his own family.

The final deciſion of theſe religious diſputes ſeemed to depend upon Henry's choice of a future conſort, he having given ſeveral hints of his deſigns to enter into a new matrimonial engagement. He at firſt caſt his eyes upon a daughter of the duke of Guiſe, but found ſhe had been betrothed to the king of Scotland. Cromwell recommended to him Anne of Cleves, whoſe father, the duke of Cleves, and brother-in-law, the elector of Saxony, held a conſiderable rank among the princes of Germany. Henry had been ſtruck with her beauty by a flattering picture of her, drawn by Hans Holbein; and the marriage was ſoon after concluded with her father's conſent, though contrary to the will of her brother-in-law. This union (had it ſubſtantially taken place) would have been very likely to have fruſtrated all the attempts of the catholic party, but no ſooner was the princeſs introduced to him at Rocheſter, than, irritated at his diſappointment, he ſwore "they had ſent him a great Fanders mare." But when he found that ſhe could ſpeak only German, which he did not underſtand, and that the charms of her converſation would not atone for the homelineſs of her perſon, he would have broken off the match abruptly, had not the friendſhip of the German princes been neceſſary to his affairs. He, therefore, determined to complete his marriage, and told Cromwell that as matters were gone ſo far, he muſt e'en put his neck into the yoke.

A. D. 1540. On the ſixth of January the nuptials were accordingly celebrated, and the next morning Cromwell was deſirous of knowing whether the king liked his ſpouſe any better. Henry told him, he hated her more than ever, that her perſon was more loathſome the nearer he approached her, and that he was reſolved never to cohabit with her. He behaved, however, very kindly to her, and diſſembled even with Cromwell the diſguſt he had conceived againſt him for the ſhare he had taken in this tranſaction. He even created him earl of Eſſex and knight of the garter. Cromwell harangued the parliament in his character of vicar-general; and the houſe of lords, thinking to pleaſe the king by flattering his miniſter, told him, he merited to be vicar-general of the univerſe.

At length, however, the ſtorm broke over the head of Cromwell, which the duke of Norfolk and Gardiner contributed all in their power to aggravate. Jealous of his influence at court, they failed not to improve every circumſtance to his diſadvantage. Obnoxious to the Romiſh party on account of his enmity to their principles, a ſtratagem was projected to effect his ruin. They introduced Catherine Howard, neice to the duke of Norfolk, a lady of exceeding beauty, at court, and obſerving ſhe had gained the king's affections, the duke made uſe of her influence, to precipitate the fall of a miniſter whom, in reality, he now deteſted. Henry readily liſtened to all the inſinuations of the duke and Gardiner, and it was determined that the miniſter ſhould fall a victim to the reſentment of the public; in conſequence of which, he was arreſted at the council board, and cloſely committed to the Tower. Cromwell now found himſelf forſaken by all the friends of his proſperity, and ſupported only by Cranmer, his faithful adherent in affliction. The more highly the parliament had flattered him, the more eager were they now to oppreſs him. He was accuſed of hereſy and treaſon, and condemned to the Scaffold without examination and without evidence. In vain did he implore the king's clemency, a virtue to which Henry was a ſtranger. The miniſter was executed without delay, and all his ſervices diſregarded or forgotten. This nobleman certainly deſerved a better fate; for, though elevated from the loweſt origin to the ſummit of human grandeur, he had neither been arrogant to his inferiors, nor ungrateful to his friends.

The king became more and more enamoured of lady Catherine: and Gardiner made frequent entertainments at his own houſe, for the royal lover and his miſtreſs, to whom he had now made offers of partaking a ſhare in his throne. Theſe propoſals having been accepted, Henry determined to procure a divorce from Anne of Cleves, and found no difficulty in obtaining a deciſion from the convocation in his favour. They declared the marriage void, on pretence that ſhe had been affianced in her youth to the duke of Lorrain; that the king had not "inwardly" given his conſent, and that the marriage had never been conſummated. Theſe objections were certainly very frivolous; but as the queen made no oppoſition, the ſentence of divorce was paſſed by the clergy, and ratified by the parliament. Anne acquieſced in the decree on condition of three thouſand pounds a year, and a patent of precedency, with the choice of living either in France or England.

This great point being obtained, and all obſtacles removed, Henry married Catherine Howard, who was ſoon after crowned queen of England. But this marriage, pleaſing as it was to Henry, had not the leaſt effect in ſoftening his diſpoſition. Proteſtants and papiſts were equally the objects of perſe-perſecution; a ſpirit not a little enflamed by the enthuſiaſtic zeal of the duke of Norfolk, and Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter. They executed ri-gorouſly the ſtatutes of the ſix articles. They conſigned to the flames the unhappy proteſtants, who ſuffered triumphantly in the cauſe of truth. Dr. Barnes, Thomas Gerard, a reforming miniſter, and William Jerome, vicar of Stepney, were condemned to the ſtake for hereſy; but they did not ſuffer alone; three bigotted catholics ſhared the ſame fate for denying the king's ſupremacy. Barnes diſputed on theological points even at the ſtake; and the ſheriff preſſing him on the invocation of ſaints, "I doubt," ſaid he, "whether the ſaints can pray for the living; but if they can, I hope in half an hour to be praying for you, and the reſt of the people here aſſembled." This indiſcriminate exerciſe of tyranny excited great murmurs among the people, and produced ſome appearance of an inſurrection. Cardinal Pole was ſuſpected; and on this ſuſpicion, the king ordered his mother the counteſs of Saliſbury, the laſt remains of the blood-royal of Plantagenet, to be executed.

Bigotry and enthuſiaſm had been equally employed in kindling the torch of diſcord in Scotland as well as England. Patrick Hamilton, a young man of noble deſcent, having, about the year 1527, been ſent abroad to receive an education to qualify him for the church, had imbibed the principles of the reformed religion, and, on his return to Scotland, did not ſcruple openly to avow them. A treacherous Dominican, who had inſinuated himſelf into his friendſhip, accuſed him before the archbiſhop of St. Andrews. He was accordingly ſentenced to be burnt, and ſuffered with the reſolution of a martyr. The Dominican, probably overcome by remorſe, ſoon after died diſtracted. Hamilton's martyrdom brought over great numbers of proſelytes to the proteſtant faith, among whom was one friar Foreſt, who became an aſſiduous preacher, and, for his zealous attachment to the holy ſcriptures, was condemned, and ſuffered death as an heretic.

Such was the ſituation of religion in Scotland when James received an invitation from Henry to meet him at York, which the Scottiſh nobility perſuaded him to accept. But the clergy, alarmed at the conſequences of ſuch an interview, which they feared might tend to aggrandize the nobility at the expence of the church, made uſe of ſuch powerful arguments, as induced him to lay aſide his intentions. After a few days delay, he ſent excuſes to Henry, who was waiting for him at York. An inſult of this nature fired the Engliſh monarch with reſentment; but his revenge was, for a time, diverted by an event, which demanded his return to the capital.

A. D. 1541—2. During the king's abſence, one Laſcelles had waited on archbiſhop Cranmer in London, and from the information of this man's ſiſter, who had been a ſervant to the ducheſs dowager of Norfolk, gave a very ſurpriſing account of the queen's incontinency. He avowed, that ſhe had led a very lewd life before her marriage with the king, and had carried on a criminal correſpondence with two men, named Derham and Mannock; and that ſhe had continued to indulge herſelf in the ſame guilty pleaſures, ſince her elevation to the throne.

Equally aſtoniſhed and perplexed, Cranmer communicated this intelligence to the chancellor, and ſome other members of the privy-council, who adviſed him to make the king acquainted with the affair. The archbiſhop not only knew the danger of interfering in matters of ſuch delicacy, but alſo the danger of concealing this information. He, therefore, reſolved to commit what he had heard to writing, in the form of a memorial, which he ſhortly after delivered into the king's own hand, deſiring his majeſty to peruſe it in private. Henry, at firſt affecting to diſbelieve the report, ordered the keeper of the privy-ſeal to examine Laſcelles, who not only perſiſted in his former ſtory, but even brought his ſiſter to confirm it. Derham and Mannock were accordingly arreſted, and being examined, confeſſed their own guilt, and the queen's incontinency. Beſides this, they impeached the old lady Rochford, who had formerly been ſo inſtrumental in procuring the death of Anne Boleyn. They aſſerted, that this lady had introduced one Culpepper into the queen's bed-chamber, who continued with her there during the whole night. On the queen's firſt examination, ſhe denied the charge, but afterwards, finding her accomplices were her accuſers, ſhe confeſſed her incontinence before marriage, but denied her having ever diſhonoured the king's bed. Three maids of honour, however, who had been entruſted with her ſecrets, ſtill further corroborated her guilt, and ſome of them confeſſed having paſſed the night in the ſame bed with her and her lovers. The king was ſo affected at this diſcovery, that he burſt into a flood of tears, and bitterly lamented his misfortunes. Derham, Mannock, and Culpepper were convicted and executed; but Henry was reſolved to throw the odium of the queen's death upon the parliament, who had been always ready to contribute to his ſeverities. Theſe ſervile creatures, on being informed of the queen's crime and confeſſion, ſoon found her guilty, and petitioned the king that ſhe might ſuffer capital puniſhment; that the ſame might be alſo inflicted on lady Rochford the accomplice of her debaucheries, and that her grand-mother, the dutcheſs dowager of Norfolk, together with her father, mother, and nine others, as having been privy to the queen's irregularities, ſhould ſhare in her puniſhment. It is not to be wondered at that the king ſhould readily comply with this petition; the conſequence of which was, that they were condemned to death by an act of attainder, which, at the ſame time, made it capital for any perſon to conceal the debaucheries of any future queen. It was alſo enacted, that if the king married any woman who had been incontinent, taking her for a true maid, ſhe ſhould be guilty of treaſon, in caſe ſhe did not previouſly reveal her ſituation. The people diverted themſelves with this abſurd and brutal ſtatute, and ſaid "the king muſt look out for a widow."

After all theſe laws were paſſed, the queen was beheaded on the twelfth of February on Tower hill, together with the lady Rochford. The queen was greatly pitied; ſhe owned having led a diſſolute life before marriage; but denied, in her laſt moments, and with the utmoſt ſolemnity, having ever been inconſtant after her marriage with the king. The public exclaimed ſo loudly againſt the ſeverity of the act, which included ſo many of her accomplices, that the king did not think proper to put them to death, though ſome of them were long detained in confinement.

Henry, having thus, by various acts of tyranny, ſhewn that he was abandoned to all ideas of juſtice and humanity, at laſt took it into his head to compoſe poſe a book of religion, which was to be the code by which his ſubjects ſhould, for the future, regulate all their principles and practices. Having procured an act of parliament for this purpoſe, in which all ſpiritual ſupremacy was declared to be veſted in him, he publiſhed a ſmall volume ſoon after, called "The Inſtitution of a Chriſtian Man," which was favourably received by the convocation, and voted to be the infallible ſtandard of orthodoxy. All the abſtruſe points of juſtification, faith, free-will, good works, and grace, were there defined, with a leaning towards the opinion of the reformers; while the ſacraments, which a few years before were only allowed to be three, are there extended to their original number of ſeven, conformable to the ſentiments of the catholics. But the king was not long ſatisfied with this code of belief; for he ſoon after procured a new book to be compoſed, called "The Erudition of a Chriſtian Man," which he publiſhed upon his own authority; and though this new creed differed much from the former, yet he was no leſs poſitive in requiring aſſent to this, than he had been to the former. In both theſe books he was very explicit in enforcing the doctrine of paſſive obedience; ſo that his inſtitutions were not likely to weaken what he ſo powerfully enforced by his ſeverities.

Henry now found himſelf at leiſure to revenge the affront offered him by the king of Scotland. He declared war by a manifeſto, in which after reproaching his nephew with having broken his word, with giving an aſylum to ſome rebels, and retaining ſome territory which belonged to his kingdom, he renewed his ancient pretenſions to the crown of Scotland, and ſummoned him to do him homage as his liege lord. An Engliſh army paſſed the Tweed at Berwick, but retreated on the firſt approach of the enemy. James was eager to purſue them; but the nobility, reſenting the preference he had ſhewn to the clergy, refuſed to aſſiſt him. A body of ten thouſand men, commanded by lord Maxwell, were defeated at Solway by the Engliſh; an event which threw James into a deſpairing condition, and the grief of which ſhortly put an end to his life. Hearing, juſt before his death that his queen was delivered of a daughter, he lamented the approaching miſeries of his kingdom; of which, ſaid he, "Henry will make himſelf maſter either by arms or marriage."

The death of James, and birth of a daughter, ſole heireſs of a kingdom, whoſe friendſhip was of ſo much importance to England, gave a new turn to the deliberations of the Engliſh councils. Inſtead of exaſperating the Scots, by availing themſelves of the benefits of the late victory, the Engliſh adopted a ſcheme for uniting the two kingdoms by a marriage between Edward, prince of Wales, and Mary the infant queen of Scotland.

A. D. 1543. The Scottiſh priſoners, who had been ſet at liberty in conſequence of this new projected alliance, found, on their return, their country involved in confuſion. James Hamilton, earl of Arran, preſumptive heir to the crown, next to the princeſs, was a nobleman of a ſlender capacity and pacific diſpoſition, not at all calculated to rule the helm of ſtate in thoſe turbulent times. He was, however, perſuaded by the proteſtants, to whom he was attached, to claim the regency by virtue of his proximity of blood. The earl liſtened to their arguments, and reſolved to demand it at the meeting of the next parliament. He was ſtrongly oppoſed by the catholic faction, headed by cardinal Beaton, archbiſhop of St. Andrews, and primate of Scotland, a prelate of unpopular manners, and a perſecuting ſpirit. Beaton publiſhed the late king's will ſoon after his deceaſe, in which that prince had left the government to him in conjunction with the earls of Argyle, Huntley and Murray. By virtue of this inſtrument, which the ambitious churchman is ſaid to have forged, he took poſſeſſion of the government; and having joined his intereſt with that of the queen dowager, ſiſter to the duke of Guiſe, he obtained the conſent of the convention of the ſtates, and excluded the pretenſions of the earl of Arran.

His power, however, was but of ſhort exiſtence. The majority of the parliament declared in favour of Arran, and the cardinal was committed to priſon. A negotiation was immediately entered into with Sir Ralph Sadler, the Engliſh ambaſſador, and a treaty of marriage was concluded, by which it was agreed, that the queen ſhould continue in Scotland till ſhe was ten years of age, when ſhe ſhould be ſent to England for education, and that Scotland, notwithſtanding this union, ſhould ſtill retain its laws and privileges. But Beaton having found means to eſcape from priſon, ſtirred up the clergy againſt this treaty, and awakened the natural antipathy of the Scots againſt the Engliſh: ſo that, inſtead of the propoſed union, a war ſeemed likely to take place between the two kingdoms, in which Francis engaged to ſupport the intereſt of Scotland.

The French king, however, being engaged in a war with the Emperor, was little able to fulfil his engagement. Matthew Stewart, earl of Lenox, was then at the French court, and Francis, knowing his hereditary enmity to the family of Hamilton, by whom his father had been murdered, perſuaded him to return home, and aſſiſt the queen-mother and the cardinal, promiſing to ſend after him a ſupply of pecuniary and military ſuccours. He was alſo flattered with the hopes of eſpouſing the queen dowager, and, in caſe of the death of Mary, of aſcending the throne of Scotland in preference to the earl of Arran, whoſe legitimacy was diſputeable. Lenox, allured by theſe expectations, agreed to the propoſal, and on his arrival in his native country, exerted all his endeavours to break off the marriage treaty. He aſſembled a number of forces in order to reſcue the young queen out of the hands of the regent, who being either not inclined, or not ſtrong enough to contend with his enemies, agreed to an accommodation. The queen and cardinal having now no farther occaſion for Lenox, deſired Francis to recall him; but the earl, aware of their deſign, retired to his caſtle at Dumbarton, and the following year threw himſelf into the arms of the Engliſh.

In about a twelve-month after the death of the late queen, Henry married his ſixth and laſt wife, Catherine Parr, widow of the late Neville, lord Latimer, who was allowed to be a woman of diſcretion and virtue, and well affected to the proteſtant cauſe. But this event did not put a ſtop to the perſecutions of the times. Anthony Perſonne, a prieſt, Robert Teſtwood, a ſinging-man, and Henry Fulmer, a taylor, were, at Gardiner's inſtigation, burnt at Windſor for hereſy. And the biſhop's own ſecretary was executed for denying the king's ſupremacy.

A. D. 1544. The winter ſeaſon having put a period period to military operations, Henry called a parliament, when the princeſſes Mary and Elizabeth were reſtored to their rights of ſucceſſion; but the king would not ſuffer the ſtatute, which declared their illegitimacy, to be reverſed. As ſoon as the ſeaſon would permit a fleet and army were fitted out to invade Scotland. The former was commanded by Dudley lord Liſle, and the latter by the earl of Hertford. The troops landed near Leith, which town they took, and thence proceeded to Edinburgh, and ſet that city on fire, after plundering the inhabitants. The regent and cardinal, unable to oppoſe them, retired to Stirling. After burning the towns of Haddington and Dunbar, the forces were withdrawn; for Henry having, in conjunction with the emperor, formed a deſign for an invaſion of France, was deſirous of employing his whole army in that expedition.

In conſequence of this plan, they had agreed to march directly to Paris, and without entering upon any ſiege, to proceed from thence to the entire conqueſt of the kingdom. But fortunately for the French king, the emperor had taken the field before Henry landed at Calais, and without waiting for his ally, had ſet down before Luxemburg and taken poſſeſſion of the place. Commercy on the Meuſe, and Ligny alſo, ſoon ſurrendered, but at St. Dezier on the Maine, he met with a powerful reſiſtance from Monſ. Sancerre the Governor.

While the emperor was thus employed, Henry landed at Calais, and hearing of Charles's ſucceſs, determined to follow his example, and accordingly inveſted Montreuil and Boulogne. Theſe ſieges produced delays; and Charles, finding the ſeaſon ſo far advanced, that the ſcheme of ſubduing France would be likely to prove abortive, concluded a ſeparate peace with Francis. In conſequence of this treaty, the count de Buren, who had joined the Engliſh army, withdrew his forces, and Henry was compelled to raiſe the ſiege of Montreuil, and return to England, where he found his ſubjects ready to offer him their accuſtomed adulation, and to praiſe him for an enterprize in which he had laviſhed away great ſums of money, and from which not the leaſt benefit could be derived.

A. D. 1545. Francis, whoſe thoughts were turned towards the diſtreſſing of Henry, employed the whole winter in equipping a fleet to invade the coaſt of England. They ſailed the beginning of July, and proceeded towards the Engliſh fleet then riding at St. Helens. But being unable to do any execution againſt them, they landed on the Iſle of Wight, and committed dreadful ravages, till they were driven back to their ſhips, by the militia of the country.

Finding the expences of the war too great for him to ſupport, Henry again applied to the parliament, and obtained a ſmall ſubſidy. But this not being ſufficient he ſolicited aſſiſtance from the clergy, who (as uſual) were found to be more liberal than the laity; which made the emperor obſerve, that, on the ſuppreſſion of the monaſteries, "the king had killed the hen which brought him the golden eggs." But, tenacious as the parliament had been of their own money, they were amazingly profuſe with what did not belong to them. They granted to Henry all the revenues of the univerſities, chapels, and hoſpitals; but the king took care to inform the univerſities, that he did not intend to encroach upon their endowments.

A. D. 1546. No ſooner was the campaign opened for which the parliament had voted ſome ſupplies, than an accident happened which afforded the Engliſh little hopes of ſucceſs. The earl of Surry, who commanded Henry's forces in Boulogne attempting to intercept a convoy of proviſions going to the fort of Outre Eau at the entrance of that harbour, was compelled to return with ſome loſs without effecting his purpoſe. Yet, not intimidated by his unſucceſsful effort, he attacked the marſhal de Biez, who was eſcorting a much larger convoy. In this attempt he again miſcarried, and ſuſtained a loſs of about eight hundred men killed on the ſpot, and one hundred and twenty taken priſoners, among whom was Sir Edward Poynings.

Theſe misfortunes, added to Henry's natural decay, which boded his approaching diſſolution, inclined him to liſten to terms of accommodation, and a peace was once more eſtabliſhed, in which the emperor and the Scots were included. Thus ended a war which coſt Henry upwards of one million three hundred and forty-three thouſand pounds, without gaining any material advantage; and ſimilar to this was the ſucceſs of almoſt all Henry's expeditions.

Among other alterations in the form of public worſhip, Henry now permitted the Litany to be read in Engliſh, and ordered that the following words ſhould be added: "to be delivered from the tyranny of the biſhop of Rome, and all his deteſtable enormities." Cranmer endeavoured to make farther innovations in favour of the proteſtants, but Gardiner, then at the emperor's court as ambaſſador from England, wrote to inform the king, that if he carried his oppoſition againſt the catholic faith any farther, the emperor would break off all correſpondence with him. The archbiſhop himſelf was at the brink of deſtruction at court. He had, at this time, loſt a ſincere and powerful friend by the death of Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, brother-in-law to the king, a nobleman of diſtinguiſhed merit, and who, according to the teſtimony of Henry himſelf, had never ſpoken a word to the prejudice of any one. The enemies of Cranmer, hiding their malice under the maſk of orthodoxy, endeavoured to ruin him as a concealed heretic. This ſo dangerous an accuſation did not, however, for the preſent, ſucceed, a circumſtance the more ſingular, as thoſe times produced the moſt ſhocking inſtances of perſecution.

Anne Aſcue, a beautiful young woman, highly eſteemed, and honoured by the friendſhip even of the queen herſelf, was accuſed of having in converſation expreſſed her diſbelief of the doctrine of the real preſence. The menaces of biſhop Bonner drew from her an imperfect recantation, with which he was not ſatisfied. Being thrown into priſon, and animated, rather than diſcouraged, by this rigour, ſhe wrote to the king, telling him, that in the myſtery of the Euchariſt, ſhe confirmed her belief to the words of Chriſt, and the doctrine of the church; but not being able to admit that ſenſe of it which his majeſty gave, ſhe expected her enemies would make a crime to him of her letter. The chancellor Wriotheſley was ſent to interrogate her on the correſpondencies ſhe had at court. Amidſt all the torments of the rack, ſhe kept the ſecret with unſhaken conſtancy. After diſlocating her limbs by the torture, they carried her to the place of execution, where, not being able to prevail on her to recant, ſhe was burnt alive. Three other unhappy perſons, executed at the ſame and for the ſame cauſe, imitated her courage, and gloried in their ſufferings.

The queen now ſaw herſelf on the point of being ſacrificed to her huſband's dogmatical zeal. Henry was now grown very corpulent, and was afflicted with an ulcer in his leg, that encreaſed his natural peeviſhneſs. The tenderneſs and aſſiduity of Catherine, on this occaſion, were remarkable. The king's favourite topic was theology, and Catherine was frequently obliged to diſcuſs the moſt abſtruſe tenets of religion with him. In the heat of one of theſe converſations ſhe ſuffered too much of her ſentiment to appear. The ſuſpicion of hereſy awakened all the native cruelty of Henry's heart. Gardiner and the chancellor envenomed the wound. They perſuaded the king to have articles of impeachment drawn up againſt her, which were ſoon after brought for him to ſign. The fatal paper, being luckily dropt by the chancellor, was found by one of the queen's friends, and put into her hands. Senſible of her danger, ſhe exerted all her prudence to avert the ſtorm. She accordingly paid her uſual viſit to the king, and found him in a more ſerene diſpoſition than ordinary. The converſation turning on religious ſubjects, Henry challenged her to maintain her uſual arguments. To this ſhe replied, that ſuch profound ſpeculations were above her comprehenſion, and in her opinion very ill adapted to the imbecillities of her ſex. That ſhe had, indeed, engaged in ſuch ſpeculation with him, merely to divert his pain, and profit by his inſtructions: to effect this, ſhe had made uſe of arguments, which ſhe knew when ſhe uſed them were far from being concluſive. "And is it ſo, ſweetheart? replied Henry; then, by St. Mary, we are friends again." After which, embracing her with great tenderneſs, he diſmiſſed her with aſſurances of his kindneſs and protection.

The next day as the royal pair were walking in the palace garden, the biſhop of Wincheſter, who was a ſtranger to this reconciliation, appeared with a guard to ſeize the queen, and convey her to the tower. The king no ſooner ſaw him approach, than taking him aſide, he was obſerved to ſpeak to him in an angry tone of voice. The queen was greatly alarmed on overhearing the terms knave, fool, and beaſt frequently repeated. On the prelate's retiring in great confuſion, the queen generouſly interpoſed to appeaſe the king's reſentment: but Henry replied, "Poor ſoul! you know not how little that man is intitled to your favour." The queen was very cautious in future of incurring her huſband's diſpleaſure, and Gardiner never more recovered the king's good opinion.

A. D. 1547. Though Henry's health was declining very faſt, his implacable cruelties were not the leſs frequent. Theſe were indiſcriminately exerciſed on proteſtants and catholics. The laſt objects of his groundleſs ſuſpicion were the duke of Norfolk and his ſon the earl of Surry. The latter excelled in all the military exerciſes, encouraged the arts by his practice and example, and was the firſt whoſe poetry brought our language to any degree of refinement. Theſe qualifications, however, were no ſecurity againſt Henry's ſuſpicions; the earl had dropt ſome expreſſions of reſentment againſt the king's miniſters, on being removed from the government of Boulogne; and the whole family was become obnoxious from the late incontinency of Catherine Howard. Private orders were therefore given for arreſting father and ſon, which being carried into execution, they were both the ſame day committed to the tower. Surry, being a commoner, his trial was the more expeditious; and as to proofs, there were many informers baſe enough to betray the intimacies of private confidence, and all the connection of conſanguinity. The ducheſs dowager of Richmond, Surry's own ſiſter, was among the number of his accuſers; and Sir Richard Southwell, his moſt intimate friend, charged him with infidelity to the king. It ſeemed, at this dreary period, as if all faith and honour had fled out of the nation; Surry denied the charge, and challenged his accuſer to ſingle combat. This favour was refuſed him; and it was alledged that he had quartered the arms of Edward the Confeſſor on his eſcutcheon, which was of itſelf ſufficient to convict him of aſpiring to the crown. To this he could make no reply; and, indeed, no anſwer would have availed him; for neither parliament nor juries, during this reign, ſeem to be guided by any other will than that of the crown. This young nobleman was, therefore, condemned for high treaſon, notwithſtanding his eloquent and ſpirited defence; and the ſentence was ſoon after executed upon him on Tower-hill. The duke, in the mean time, endeavoured to ſoften the king by the moſt ſubmiſſive letters; but the monſter's hard heart was rarely ſuſceptible of tender impreſſions. The parliament meeting on the fourteenth of January, a bill of attainder was found againſt the duke of Norfolk, it being thought he could not ſo eaſily have been convicted on a fair hearing by his peers. The only crime alledged againſt him was, that he had once ſaid the king was ſickly, and could not hold out long; and that the kingdom was likely to be torn between the contending parties of different perſuaſions. Cranmer, though for many years engaged in oppoſite party to Norfolk, would have no ſhare in the unjuſt proſecution; but retired to his ſeat at Croydon. The death warrant, however, was made out, and immediately ſent to the lieutenant of the Tower. The duke prepared for death, and the next morning was to be his laſt; but an event of greater conſequence to the kingdom intervened, and prevented his execution.

The king had been, for ſome time, approaching faſt towards his end; and for ſeveral days all thoſe about his perſon plainly ſaw that his ſpeedy death was inevitable. The diſorder in his leg was now grown exceeding painful, which, added to his monſtrous corpulency, rendered him unable to move. Ever ſtern and ſevere, he was now become outrageous. In this ſtate he had continued for near four days before his death, the terror of all, and the tormentor of himſelf; his courtiers having no inclination to make an enemy of him, as they were more ardently employed in conſpiring the deaths of each other. Thus, therefore, was he ſuffered to ſtruggle, none of his domeſtics having the courage to warn him of his approaching end, as, in the courſe of this reign, perſons had already been put to death for foretelling the death of the king. At laſt, Sir Anthony Denny undertook to diſcloſe to him the dreadful ſecret; and, contrary to his uſual cuſtom, he received the tidings with an expreſſion of reſignation. His anguiſh and remorſe, at this time, were beyond conception; he deſired that Cranmer might be ſent for; but, before the arrival of that prelate he was ſpeechleſs. Cranmer entreated him to give ſome ſign of his dying in the faith of Chriſt; upon which he ſqueezed his hand, and immediately expired, on the 28th of January, January, after a reign of thirty ſeven years and nine months, and in the fifty-ſixth year of his age.

The character of this monarch may be but collected from his actions. His conduct was ſo totally inconſiſtent with itſelf in the different periods of his life, that it is very difficult, if not impoſſible, to deſcribe. In his youth he was ſincere, open and liberal; in his advanced years, he grew froward, rapacious, and, withal, ſo exceſſively cruel, that he ſeemed to delight in the blood of his ſubjects. The gratification of his ſenſual and brutal appetites, appears to have been the ultimate object of his purſuits, for to this he ſacrificed every obligation of juſtice, every feeling of humanity. And it is reported, that he reproached himſelf when dying, "with having ſpared no woman in his luſt, nor man in his anger."

With all his vices and imperfections, however, he boldly rejected a ſlaviſh ſubjection to the ſee of Rome, and by that means laid the foundation of religious, and, in the end, of civil liberty; nevertheleſs, even in this laudable work, he ſeems to have been actuated rather by the impulſe of his vicious and unruly paſſions, than by the motives of conſcience and religion, from whence we may draw this concluſion, that divine wiſdom, by means undiſcoverable to human underſtanding, and in a courſe highly improbable to human reaſon, frequently accompliſhes the moſt gracious purpoſes and benevolent deſigns.

Henry VIII. was the firſt king of England, who took the title of majeſty, before which the ſovereigns were addreſſed by the title of my liege, your highneſs, or your grace.

The moſt diſtinguiſhed perſonages for learning and ſcience, in this reign, were the following:

Henry Howard, earl of Surry, one of the greateſt ornaments of this king's court, though the moſt unprovoked object of his cruelty. He was, as has been already mentioned, famous for the tenderneſs and elegance of his poetry.

Archbiſhop Warham excelled as a divine, a lawyer, and a ſtateſman, though ſupplanted in the king's favour by Wolſey. Eraſmus makes mention of this prelate, whom he eſteemed as a perfect model of the epiſcopal character. He died on the 23d of Auguſt, 1532.

John Collet, dean of St. Paul's, was one of thoſe great men who contributed to the revival of learning in England. No higher teſtimony need be given of the merit of Collet, than his great intimacy with Eraſmus. There was a remarkable ſimilitude of manners, of ſtudies, and of ſentiments in religion, between theſe illuſtrious men, who ventured to withdraw the veil of ignorance and ſuperſtition, and expoſe both in their genuine colours, to the eyes of the world; and to prepare the minds of the Engliſh for that reformation in religion, and the reſtoration of learning, which ſoon after followed. Collet, Lynacre, Lilly, Grocyn, and Latimer, were the firſt that revived the literature of the ancients in England. He founded St. Paul's ſchool, and died 1519.

William Tindale, canon of Chriſt church, Oxford, and deſervedly ſtiled the Engliſh apoſtle, was the firſt that tranſlated the Greek Teſtament into Engliſh. This work appeared in 1526; and three or four years after, he publiſhed an Engliſh tranſlation of the Pentateuch from the original Hebrew, and intended to have gone through the reſt of the Old Teſtament; but his attempt provoked the Catholic clergy, and he was burnt for hereſy at Wilford, near Bruſſels, in 1536.

Sir Thomas More was a great maſter of the elegant learning of the antients. His Utopia, a kind of political romance, which gained him the higheſt reputation as an author, is an idea of a perfect republic, in an iſland ſuppoſed to be newly diſcovered in America. He was beheaded, as we have already mentioned, for denying the king's ſupremacy on the ſixth of July, 1535.

The duke of Northumberland obtains great power in the adminiſtration, and prevails on the king to exclude the two princeſſes, Mary and Elizabeth, from the ſucceſſion to the throne. Death and character of Edward VI.

A. D. 1547. AS this young prince was appointed to the ſucceſſion by his predeceſſor when he ſhould attain to the age of eighteen years, and as he was then only turned of nine, his guardianſhip, together with that of the realm, was committed in truſt to ſixteen executors to be aſſiſted occaſionally by the advice of twelve counſellors. On a general aſſembly of theſe executors and counſellors, the earl of Hertford was choſen protector, with only one diſſentient voice, (that of the chancellor Wriotheſley,) and ſo declared accordingly; but reſtricted from acting without the concurrence of the other parties. When theſe matters were adjuſted, various promotions were made in the different ranks of peerage; the duke of Somerſet, late earl of Hertford, was likewiſe appointed treaſurer and mareſchal, and baron Sudley, admiral of England.

Somerſet, for private reaſons, had ſuppreſſed his attachment to the cauſe of the reformation, till the death of Henry VIII. but now he openly declared in favour of the ſame, and embarked moſt cordially with others in correcting the abuſes of the Romiſh ſuperſtition, and adopting many of the doctrines, which tended to ſubvert the authority of the Roman pontiff. The cauſe of the reformation was alſo eſpouſed by the primate, the archbiſhop of York, the biſhops of Lincoln and Ely, and doctors Ridley and Latimer, who were by this time releaſed from priſon.

Prompted by the ſame motive, he extended his views of reformation to foreign countries; and from the ſame laudable zeal appointed viſitors to examine the churches in Germany, and empowered them to aboliſh certain abuſes.

Nor was he leſs attentive to military atchievements, than religious reformation; for after taking the neceſſary ſteps for the promotion of the latter, he began to make preparations for an invaſion of Scotland, reſolving to proſecute that ſcheme, the execution of which, the late king had recommended with his dying breath. However, at the deſire of the French ambaſſador, he conſented to try the effect of a negotiation before he commenced hoſtilities: this, however, proving abortive, he entered Scotland with a numerous army; but as he found the governor was prepared to meet the attack at the head of a force vaſtly ſuperior, and poſted in a ſituation much more advantageous, than that of the Engliſh army, Somerſet determined to reconnoitre the Scottiſh camp, when judging it impracticable to make an attempt with any probability of ſucceſs, he ſent a meſſage to the earl of Arran, with propoſals of accommodation.

The leaders of the Scottiſh army imputing this conciliating propoſal to motives of puſillanimity, reſolved to avail himſelf of thoſe diſtreſsful circumſtances of the enemy. Underſtanding that the Engliſh were in motion, they croſſed the river Eſke, and advanced into the plain. The Scottiſh army was marſhalled in three bodies, the earl of Angus commanded the van, the earl of Arran the center, and Huntley, the regent, conducted the rear. Their cavalry conſiſted only of light horſe, which were ſtationed on their left flank, interlined with ſome Iriſh archers, brought over for this ſervice by the earl of Argyle.

The diſpoſition of the Scots, inſpired Somerſet with freſh courage; and as the Engliſh, from ſuperior proweſs, generally conquered in regular engagements, he was fluſhed with aſſured hopes of victory. He formed his van on the left, fartheſt from the ſea, upon an aſcent, where he ordered them to remain, until the enemy ſhould approach; he drew up his main body, and his rear towards the right; and beyond the van he poſted lord Gray, at the head of the men at arms, and directed him to flank the Scots, but not till the front of both armies ſhould be engaged: ſo, that by this manœuvre while the enemy were advancing, they were aſſailed by the artillery from the Engliſh ſhips, lord Graham was killed, and the highlanders thrown into ſome confuſion; when the lord Gray, obſerving their ſituation, neglected his orders, quitted his poſt, and, at the head of his heavy armed horſe attacked the Scottiſh infantry, hoping to decide the action by one vigorous effort. But this gallant intention of lord Gray was fruſtrated by the intervention of a moraſs, behind which ſome of the enemy's infantry were placed in ambuſh, and ſo annoyed the Engliſh cavalry with their ſpears, that lord Gray was wounded, his men routed, and their ſtandard in great danger of being loſt; and had the Scots been furniſhed with cavalry to improve the advantage, a total overthrow of the Engliſh muſt have enſued.

Notwithſtanding this repulſe, Somerſet exerted himſelf boldly in rallying his diſperſed forces; while while other commanders discovered equal skill and presence of mind, in preserving the ranks of the foot, on which the horse had recoiled. He detached Sir Peter Meucas, and Peter Gamboa, a Spanish officer, to ply the Scottish infantry with their shot. These officers rushed on, with impetuosity, to the spot where the English cavalry had been so warmly assailed, and discharged vollies in the face of the enemy; the ships galled them in the flank, and the artillery, planted on an eminence, made such havock among them, that they sustained considerable loss, without being able to oppose force to force.

The advantage obtained by the English from this last manœuvre threw the whole Scottish army into disorder; the van began to retreat, the center followed, and a total confusion ensuing thereupon, the English horse availing themselves of this favourable opportunity, charged most furiously, and, meeting with no resistance, made most terrible carnage. About three thousand ecclesiastics, who made a separate body, were massacred without mercy. Never was victory more decisive, or purchased at an easier rate by the conquerors. The English lost not more than two hundred men, and, according to the lowest calculation, there fell above ten thousand of the Scots. This memorable and decisive victory being atchieved on a spot adjacent to the villa of a nobleman, whose surname was Pinkey, acquired, from thence, the appellation of, "The battle of Pinkey."

This success opened the way for further conquest on the part of the victors, as it tended to the further loss of the vanquished; for during the action between the respective regents, the lord Wharton and the earl of Lenox entered Scotland by the western marches, reduced several castles, and ravaged the whole country. Had the protector improved his advantage, he might have compelled the Scots to agree to any terms he could have imposed; but he was impatient to return to England, where he heard cabals were forming against his authority, in which his own brother made a principal. Having reduced several small places, as well as gathered the spoils of the field, he returned to England, and was gratified by the king with lands to the value of five hundred pounds a year. These late successes, while they enhanced the reputation of Somerset amongst the people, raised him many enemies amongst the nobility, from that detestable principle, envy.

In consequence of these victories, Somerset, immediately on his return, convened a parliament, and obtained a patent, empowering him to arrogate all the honours and privileges, that any prince of the blood, or any uncles of the kings of England, had ever possessed. As the most salutary effects frequently arise from causes not the most laudable; so these honours, from whatever motives they sprang, tended essentially to the interest of the kingdom by means of the laws enacted in this session, in which all statutes were repealed, touching high treason, passed since the reign of Edward III. together with those passed during the late reign, extending to the crime of felony; and all the former acts against heresies, and the statute of the six articles.

The supremacy of the king, as well ecclesiastical as civil, was established by law, and the right of succession duly and irreversably confirmed. The benefit of the clergy, and the privileges of sanctuary, were restored, except to assassins and four sorts of thieves mentioned in the act. Private masses were prohibited, and the cup restored to the laity. The king was empowered to fill the vacant sees, by which means fraudulent elections were abolished. The cognizance of matrimony and testamentary causes, was removed from the ecclesiastical, to the civil courts. Great immunities were granted to Edward respecting the foundation of colleges, cathedrals, &c. to which his predecessor had not asserted a claim.

Somerset, though he assented to the repeal of an act vesting the king's proclamation with the authority of a statute, by no means admitted the exclusion of discretionary interference, which had ever been exercised by the crown, and which differs in very few respects from the power of making laws.

A. D. 1548. Impartiality must confess, upon the whole, that the protector did not pervert the influence he obtained by his extraordinary elevation. He issued an order, enjoining, that candles should no longer be carried about on Candlemas day; palms on Palm-Sunday; and that prostration before the cross on Good Friday should be abolished. He submitted a number of other ceremonious matters, respecting the form of religion, entirely to the option of the people, but peremptorily restricted the worship of images.

These vigorous exertions in behalf of the protestant cause and interest, as might reasonably be supposed, tended greatly to retard the accommodation with the Scottish nation, as the queen dowager, as well as the clergy, conceived an antipathy to a nation, which had departed so far from the principles of the Romish church.

The protector, however, proceeded in his military operations, and having reduced several important fortresses, as well as possessed himself of some smaller castles on the frontiers of Scotland, caused them to be strongly garrisoned as well as fortified, as a clue to the internal parts of the Scottish dominions. The reduction of one of these, called by the name of Broughty, was attempted by the earl of Azzar; but in vain, for he was disappointed in his expectation of a considerable reinforcement from France, and therefore compelled to desist.

While the English and Scottish nations were thus continually engaged in the pursuits of hostile designs, the queen-dowager convoked a parliament, and requested of them, that her daughter should be conveyed to France, and put under the protection of that ancient ally. The king of France, in order to obtain the consent of the regent, created him duke of Chateleraut, with a yearly revenue of two thousand livres. Thus gratified, he permitted the young queen to be put on board the fleet destined for France, by which she was conveyed round the Orkneys, and Ireland, and landed safe in Britany, whence she was conducted to Paris. It was supposed that the French went thus far about, in order to avoid the English fleet under admiral Seymour, who cruized in the Frith of Edinburgh, and landed in several parts of Fife, but reimbarked without doing any thing effective.

During these transactions, Haddington, which had been strongly fortified, was invested by the combined force of the Scots and French; but the English army approaching under the command of the earl of Shrewsbury, they abandoned the enterprize. Had Shrewsbury been able to attack the enemy on their march, he would, in all probability, have gained an easy victory; but as he had loſt that opportunity, and could not, with any hopes of ſucceſs, attempt to force them in their preſent ſituation, after he had relieved the garriſon, he marched with his army to the ſouthward.

The much deſired event of a total reformation was now approaching, and the nation in general ſeemed to exert itſelf in accompliſhing that glorious deſign. The committee of divines, by order of council, having drawn up a new form of prayer, to be uſed throughout the proteſtant churches, conceived it in ſuch terms as might be admitted by all moderate and candid profeſſors of chriſtianity; the parliament confirmed this liturgy, and ordained that a perfect uniformity ſhould be obſerved in all religious rites and ceremonies; but it is to be lamented, that in order to obtain this end, they were guilty of many barbarities, of which they had formerly accuſed the papiſts.

Somerſet, verſed in the knowledge of mankind, though he heartily acquieſced in the late proceedings, found it neceſſary, with reſpect to himſelf, to proceed with caution, as the Romiſh religion had ſtill many votaries, and himſelf many enemies, among whom his own brother the lord Seymour was the moſt inveterate and dangerous.

The queen-dowager dying in September, Seymour renewed his addreſſes to the princeſs Elizabeth; but as his deſign in that proceeding was fruſtrated by an abſolute clauſe in the will of her father, he had recourſe to another plan, and ſuch was his ambition, that, according to report, he aſpired to a deſign of making himſelf maſter of the king's perſon, and ſeizing the reins of government into his own hands, in order to which, he aſſembled two thouſand men in different places. The council having received intelligence of theſe proceedings, committed him to the Tower, and appointed commiſſioners to take depoſitions of his accuſers. By theſe he was flatly charged with having conſpired againſt the government, protected pirates, and committed acts of violence on the ſubjects of different ſtates at peace with England.

A. D. 1549. The protector, convinced of the illegal and impolitic deſign of his aſpiring brother, endeavoured, by every method of argument and entreaty, to divert him from his purpoſe; but finding all his remonſtrances ineffectual, he reſolved to have recourſe to ſeverer remedies, and therefore, as the moſt effectual barrier to his towering projects, at the advice of the earl of Warwick, he deprived him of the office of high admiral, and exhibited againſt him a charge of high-treaſon, and ordered the whole to be laid before the privy council, who thought proper to go in a body to the Tower, in order to examine the priſoner in a more full and circumſtantial manner.

With the utmoſt fortitude he aſſerted his claim to a fair and impartial hearing, and deſired he might have leiſure to examine the articles of his accuſation, and prepare for his defence; but his peremptory demand met with as peremptory a denial, and the council determining at all events to criminate him, a bill of attainder paſſed both houſes with very little oppoſition, and ſoon after received the royal aſſent. On the tenth of May the admiral was beheaded, contrary to the ſenſe of the nation in general, who, as impartial judges of the merit of the cauſe, could never be brought to juſtify the protector; but, on the contrary, inſiſted, that his rigorous and cruel proceedings with reſpect to his brother, aroſe from the very ſame principles he condemned in him, even the unconquerable prevalence of pride and ambition.

An edict paſſed at this time for the abolition of the monaſtic order, which though attended with good effects, as it reſpected the furtherance of the proteſtant cauſe, produced much diſcontent amongſt a numerous and uſeful body of people of England; for the abbots and priors being permitted to grant leaſes at a low rate, and to receive in return a large gratuity from the tenant; when the abbey-lands were divided among the great, they were ſoon ſubjected to a different management; the rents of farms were advanced, the money was ſquandered away in the capital, and the farmers perceiving that wool was a more profitable commodity than meal, converted their arable land into paſtures.

A dearth of corn conſequently enſued, to the general diſtreſs of the poor; to which being added the neglect of agriculture, the common people inveighed with the utmoſt acrimony againſt the authors of ſuch an edict, as the principal cauſe of their miſery from want of their former employment.

The protector, conſcious of the importance of conciliating the affections of the people, took this favourable opportunity of attending to the complaints they preferred on the occaſion; and therefore appointed a commiſſion for making enquiry into all caſes relative to incloſures, high-ways and cottages. As this meaſure was very diſpleaſing to the nobility and gentry, they exclaimed againſt the commiſſion as illegal; and the peaſants imagining their deſign was to reduce them to ſervitude, determined, at all events, upon an inſurrection, which began at once in ſeveral counties. The rioters, however, in Wiltſhire were diſperſed by Sir William Herbert; thoſe in the neighbouring counties of Oxford and Glouceſter, by lord Gray of Wilton. Many of the inſurgents were ſlain in the field; others ſuffered by martial law. The malecontents of Devonſhire, amounting to ten thouſand, were headed by one Humphrey Arundel, an experienced ſoldier, who was abetted in this raſh enterprize by ſome people of the clerical order, who affected a furious zeal from mercenary and lucrative motives.

This party having formed military aſſociations, preſented a ſet of articles to the king, demanding that maſs ſhould be reſtored, half of the abbey-lands reſumed, the law of the ſix articles revived, and the redreſs of ſeveral grievances. The council rejected the purport of their demand, and promiſed them a free pardon for their miſdemeanors in preſenting the ſame, on condition of their returning to allegiance; but they, ſpurning the offer with indignation, undertook the ſiege of Exeter, which was gallantly defended by the inhabitants. Lord Ruſſel then lay at Honiton, when, being joined by Sir William Herbert, lord Gray, and ſome others, he determined to undertake the relief of Exeter, which was now reduced to the laſt extremity. Theſe officers jointly attacked the inſurgents, drove them from their poſts, ſlew a great number both in the action and purſuit, and took many priſoners.

Humphrey Arundel, and the other abettors of this inſurrection, were brought to trial, and executed in London; the inferior part came under the cognizance of the martial law: but this inſurrection was trifling in its effects to that of the county of Norfolk, where the malecontents roſe in arms to the amount of ſixteen thouſand, headed by by one Kett, a Tanner, and Conyers, a Prieſt, who officiated in a double capacity, eccleſiaſtical and military, and at whoſe inſtance they were wrought upon to demand the excluſion of many perſons then in power, the nomination of a new ſet of privy counſellors, and the reſtoration of the ancient rites and ceremonies. They fixed their quarters on Mouſhold-hill, near Norwich, where Kett, the Tanner, and a committee, ſat in judgment under a large tree, ſince known by the name of the Oak of reformation. They inveſted and reduced the city of Norwich, and impriſoned the mayor with ſome of the principal citizens. The marquis of Northampton was firſt ſent againſt them, but was worſted in the action, in which lord Sheffield loſt his life.

As this inſurrection became rather formidable, the duke of Somerſet found the neceſſity of making it a matter of moment, and therefore detached a conſiderable army to ſuppreſs the rebels, under the command of the earl of Warwick, who having routed ſeveral of their detachments, at laſt attacked their main body, and put them to flight. Two thouſand of them were ſlain in the action and purſuit. Kett, their ringleader, eſcaped from the field, but being taken next day in a barn, was hung in chains on Norwich caſtle; and nine of his accomplices ſuffered on the very tree under which they had ſo importantly ſat in judgment, and which they had preſumptuouſly nominated the Oak of reformation; but might then be called the Oak of execution.

This event, ſo unfortunate for the malecontents, produced a ſurrender of arms; ſo that a general amneſty was ſoon after publiſhed by the protector; but this indulgence confirmed the hatred of the nobility, which he had already incurred. Theſe inſurrections, though now effectually quelled, afforded an opportunity for the revival of foreign oppoſition; for the Scots, availing themſelves of the ſame, inveſted and reduced the fortreſs of Haddington, and the king of France took the ſame advantage to attempt the recovery of Boulogne, and all other places, which Henry VIII. had conquered in that kingdom. He had levied an army under other pretences; and falling ſuddenly into the Boulonnois, reduced ſeveral caſtles, but was vigorouſly repulſed from the fort of Boulenberg, from which, however, the Engliſh withdrew their artillery, after having demoliſhed the fortifications.

The king of France, however, was defeated in his attempt to reduce Boulogne, by an inundation through exceſſive heavy rains on one hand, and an epidemical diſorder which broke out in his camp on the other; ſo that he was under the neceſſity of returning to Paris, leaving the command of his army to Gaſper de Coligny, lord of Chatillon. This enterprizing officer endeavoured to reduce the place, even in the winter ſeaſon, but, after ſome ineffectual attempts, converted the ſiege into a blockade.

The protector, in conſequence of this irruption between France and England, wiſely determined to form an alliance with the emperor, and with that view diſpatched ſecretary Paget to Bruſſels, to confer with Sir Philip Hobbs, the ordinary ambaſſador, in concluding a league. At the ſame time the court of London was diſtracted by faction, which ſeemed ſubverſive of the authority of Somerſet, already ſhaken by his loſs of popularity, from a deſpotic and arbitrary plan of behaviour, in conſequence of his having obtained the patent veſting him with a ſuperior power. His enemies repreſented him as a parricide, a traitor, and a ſacrilegious tyrant, who not only betrayed the intereſt of his country, but, to gratify his pride and ambition, deſtroyed churches and tombs, that he might uſe the materials for building his moſt ſuperb palace in the Strand, which (till very lately converted to the purpoſe of government) for upwards of two centuries bore his name.

They alledged to his charge a variety of accuſations; but effectually to accompliſh their deſigns of taking him off, the lord St. John, preſident of the council, the earls of Warwick, Southampton, and Arundel, with five other counſellors, aſſembled at the biſhop of Ely's palace in Holborn; and aſſuming to themſelves the whole power of the council, began to act independent of the protector, on whom they laid the whole blame of every public grievance and misfortune. They circulated letters among the chief nobility and gentry in England, acquainting them with the meaſures they intended to purſue, and demanding their concurrence; they ſent for the mayor and aldermen of London, together with the lieutenant of the Tower, and laid on them an official injunction to renounce the authority of the protector, which he had forfeited by acting contrary to the general opinion of the council, as well as repugnant to the intereſts of the nation.

Somerſet, alarmed at theſe reſolute and ſpirited proceedings, judged it expedient to remove the king from Hampton-Court, where he then reſided, to the caſtle of Windſor; and, arming his friends and ſervants, affected to ſet his enemies at defiance. But finding that no perſon of conſequence, except Cranmer and Paget, eſpouſed his cauſe, he ſoon relaxed in his operations, and applied to the oppoſing council in terms of acquieſcence and ſubmiſſion; which, inſtead of promoting his deſign of conciliating them, occaſioned the deſertion of many zealous friends, and particularly the lord Ruſſell, who, on this inſtance of his puſillanimity, was induced to join the oppoſite party.

Thus ſtrengthened in influence as in numbers, the council preſented an addreſs to the king, in which, after the warmeſt proteſtations of duty and obedience, they told him they were the council appointed by his father for the government of the realm during his minority; that they had elected the duke of Somerſet with this expreſs proviſo, that he ſhould conduct himſelf entirely by their advice and direction; that he had ſhamefully violated this condition; had engroſſed the ſole adminiſtration of public affairs; had totally neglected and even deſpiſed their advice; and had carried his preſumption to ſuch an intolerable pitch, as to levy forces againſt them, and plant thoſe forces about his majeſty's perſon: they therefore deſired, that they might be admitted into his royal preſence; that he would be graciouſly pleaſed to receive them into his favour and confidence, and that the protector and his remaining adherents might, in future, be denied approaching the royal preſence.

Nor was this addreſs preſented without a due effect, for the king, attentive to, and conſcious of, the importance of the ſeveral articles ſpecified therein, complied with their requeſt. The object of their reſentment was committed to the Tower with ſome of his friends and adherents, among whom was Cecil, who afterwards made ſo conſiderable a figure. An impeachment was immediately preferred ferred againſt him; the beſt founded article of which was, his uſurpation of the government, and engroſſing the adminiſtration of public affairs.

So conſiderable a political revolution was matter of extaſy to the zealous adherents to the popiſh cauſe, who deemed it an happy omen of the revival of their religion. But the earl of Warwick, now preſident of the council, was actuated ſolely by motives of ambition, and therefore could never, conſiſtently with thoſe views, declare for religious tenets to which he knew the king was totally averſe. Nay, an oppoſite conduct immediately appeared, for Bonner was deprived of the ſee of London, and the earl of Southampton treated with ſuch inſtances of diſgrace, that he quitted the royal preſence in diſguſt, which, added to the mortification of this ſudden change of affairs, was ſuppoſed to have haſtened his death.

A. D. 1550. The late protector had rather aggravated the charges laid againſt him, by acknowledging, and even ſigning the particular articles. The paper being laid before the parliament, a vote paſſed, depriving him of all his eſtates, which were forfeited to the king. His ſubmiſſive behaviour ſaved him, however, from any further penalty, and even procured him a mitigation of his intended puniſhment; obtaining the remiſſion of his fine, reſtoration of his liberty, and, in two months after, re-admiſſion to the council-board.

As is frequently the caſe in political revolutions, Warwick and his party, who were particularly inſtrumental in the removal of Somerſet from his exalted ſtation, were under a neceſſity, on their acceſſion to power, of purſuing meaſures leſs conducive to the intereſt of the nation, than thoſe previouſly adopted. After having in vain endeavoured to ſecure the friendſhip of the emperor, they found themſelves conſtrained to attend to the propoſals the French king made them by means of Guidotti, a Florentine, in conſequence of which a treaty was concluded on theſe terms: That Boulogne ſhould be reſtored to the king of France; who, in conſideration of the improvements made in that fortreſs, ſhould pay four hundred thouſand golden crowns to the king of England; and that France and England ſhould mutually give hoſtages for the performance of theſe articles. Scotland was included in the treaty; by which the Engliſh ſtipulated to give up Lauder and Dunglas, and to demoliſh the fortreſſes of Roxburgh and Eymouth.

In this treaty alſo reference was had to articles of marriage between Edward and Elizabeth, a daughter of the French king; but this ſcheme was never carried into execution. Such a deſign, indeed, could not but be extremely diſagreeable to the proteſtant party in England; though, in every other reſpect, the council was very ſteady in promoting the reformation, and in executing the laws againſt the Catholics. In the courſe of this year, Thirley reſigned the ſee of Wincheſter, which was united to that of London, and beſtowed upon Ridley, biſhop of Rocheſter. Polydore Virgil, an adherent to the popiſh religion, was permitted to retire peaceably to the continent, and there live unmoleſted, as a reward for the pains he had taken in ſelecting materials for the compilation of an hiſtory of England.

A. D. 1551-2. A number of eccleſiaſtical changes now took place: amongſt the reſt, the biſhops of Wincheſter, Chiceſter, Worceſter, and Exeter were deprived of their ſees; becauſe, though they had complied with the new doctrines, in ſome particulars, they were ſtill attached to ſeveral popiſh forms and ceremonies. However rigid theſe changes might appear, they were happily productive of a general reformation. The princeſs Mary alone continued to adhere to maſs, and to reject the new liturgy. Her ſiſter Elizabeth, on the contrary, promoted the reformation, which was afterwards perfected in her reign. Mary, indeed, piqued at the many inſults ſhe had received, determined to quit the kingdom; and actually concerted a ſcheme for that purpoſe with the governante of the Low Countries; but as her reſolution was deemed dangerous in its conſequences, it was defeated upon diſcovery by a decree of the council.

Warwick, whoſe ambition was equal to that of the nobleman he had cauſed to be degraded, aſpired to greater honours than he had already acquired, and had raiſed a venal party to ſupport him in all his pretenſions. The late earl of Northumberland died without iſſue; and as Sir Thomas Percy, his brother, had been attainted, the title was extinct, and the eſtate confiſcated to the crown. Warwick now obtained a grant of thoſe ample poſſeſſions, which lay chiefly in the north, and was honoured with the title of duke of Northumberland. William Paulet, lord St. John, was created earl of Wiltſhire, and lord-high-treaſurer; and Sir William Herbert, earl of Pembroke.

Being ſenſible, however, that the late protector, though degraded, ſtood well in the general opinion of the public, and might, therefore, from his influence, prove a barrier to him in the purſuit of his ambitious deſigns, he determined upon the removal of ſuch an obſtacle: to effect this, he tampered with the friends of Somerſet, whom he ſometimes terrified by the appearance of danger, and ſometimes provoked by flagrant inſults. The unwary Somerſet often let fall ſome menacing expreſſions againſt Northumberland, at other times he formed raſh deſigns, which he immediately abandoned: his ſeeming friends treacherouſly informed his enemy of every paſſionate word he uttered; and they diſcovered the projects which they themſelves had firſt ſuggeſted, of which Northumberland availing himſelf, proceeded in a manner more apparently convictive, and ſuborned Sir Thomas Palmer, one of his dependants, to declare, in the hearing of the king, that the duke of Somerſet had plotted not only againſt his life, but the lives of ſeveral noblemen eminent for their loyalty.

Theſe declarations being corroborated by other proofs produced upon the occaſion by the ſame venal meaſures, Somerſet was arraigned before a tribunal of peers, the marquis of Wincheſter having been appointed to preſide upon the occaſion; but as the jury was compoſed of peers profeſſedly innimical to the culprit, they muſt, of courſe, have been biaſſed in their verdict. There were two charges alledged againſt him; the firſt for abetting the deſign of an inſurrection; the laſt for concerting the deaths of ſeveral privy-counſellors. Of the firſt he was acquitted to the general joy of the multitude; but of the laſt he was condemned to their general grief.

This ſentence proving irreverſible, after his enemies had gratified their revenge by immuring him two months within a dreary priſon, to ſatiate their malice, he was brought to the ſcaffold on Tower-hill, amidſt crowds of ſpectators, who ſo affectionately tionately regarded him, that they flattered themſelves to the laſt moment, with the fond hopes of his pardon. Many of them ruſhed in to dip their handkerchiefs in his blood, which they long preſerved as a ſacred relick.

The fate of this nobleman adds to many other inſtances of that jealouſy and reſentment which have even exiſted in courts and amongſt ſtateſmen, where real principle ſeems ever to have been baniſhed; and avarice and ambition ever to have prevailed.

Somerſet having fallen a victim to the reſentment of his opponents, his partizans, of courſe, ſhared the ſame fate through the prevailing influence of the duke of Northumberland; amongſt the reſt, Sir Ralph Vane, a brave old ſoldier, and Sir Miles Partridge, were hanged; and Sir Michael Stanhope, with Sir Thomas Arundel, beheaded, as the duke's confederates. They aſſerted their innocence in the immediate view of death, which, in the judgment of candour, ſhould have exculpated them from the charges alledged againſt them.

Notwithſtanding this contention for power between the preſent and the former leaders of adminiſtration, the work of reformation was carried on with vigour. The new liturgy was authorized, and ordered to be uſed in all the churches; and ſevere penalties were denounced againſt thoſe who abſented themſelves from public worſhip.

A ſevere penalty was affixed againſt uſury, or taking an exorbitant intereſt for the loan of money. A bill was alſo brought by the members of the adminiſtration into the upper aſſembly reviving the ſtatutes againſt treaſon, which had been repealed in the commencement of this reign; and though theſe laws principally affected the peers, they paſſed the bill, with only one diſſenting voice.

The late proceedings not only tended to the almoſt total ſuppreſſion of popery; but greatly affected the authority and property of eccleſiaſtics in general. Among the reſt, Tonſtall, biſhop of Durham, was remarkably aggrieved, though he was univerſally eſteemed as a prelate of ſound learning and known probity. Northumberland, having formed a deſign of ſeizing the revenues of the ſee of Durham, firſt deprived Tonſtall of his biſhopric, and then preferred a bill of attainder againſt him; but the commons rejected the bill, and Northumberland finding the intereſt of Somerſet's friends ſtill prevalent in parliament, cauſed it to be diſſolved, in order to convene another more conformable to his views of ambition.

A. D. 1553. Nor was Northumberland remiſs in his exertions upon this occaſion: on the contrary he ſo effectually applied the corrupt methods of bribery, that he procured a parliament obſequious to his utmoſt wiſhes.

The biſhop of Durham's ſee was now divided by an act of parliament, into two biſhoprics, and the regalities comprehending the juriſdiction of a county-palatine, were beſtowed by the king on Northumberland. After he had rendered this very pliant and obſequious parliament ſubſervient to his moſt ambitious views, during the ſhort ſeſſion of only one month, he cauſed them to be diſſolved, to open the way for other meaſures for the ſtill further gratification of his exceſſive pride and vanity, which had arrived to ſo enormous a degree, that a report prevailed he had influenced the phyſicians to tamper with the conſtitution of the king, as himſelf aimed at the acquiſition of the crown. Edward being attacked with a cough which terminated in confirmed phthiſis, or conſumption of the lungs, and being ſenſible of his approaching diſſolution, manifeſted great concern for the ſtate of religion, which he foreſaw would undergo a reverſion in the reign of Mary his ſucceſſor.

The artful Northumberland, availing himſelf of this circumſtance, inſinuated to him the ſcenes of perſecution that would neceſſarily reſult from a popiſh ſucceſſion, in order to pave the way for Edward's annulling the right of Mary, and thereby conduce to his towering views of elevation, with ſuch powerful addreſs as had ſuch viſible effect on his mind, that his health apparently declined every day, and when his phyſicians deſpaired of his life, he was committed to the care of an ignorant woman, who engaged, in a ſhort time, to reſtore him to his former health; but this promiſe ſhe performed with the ſame fidelity, as our modern empyrics.

As the king was now given over, Northumberland determined to finiſh the marriage between his fourth ſon, lord Guildford Dudley, and the lady Jane Gray, eldeſt daughter of the new duke of Suffolk and Frances Brandon, mentioned in the late king's will, as next in ſucceſſion to his own daughters.

Having effected this purpoſe, he took an opportunity of repreſenting to the king, that the only means of preventing the calamities which threatened the nation from a popiſh government, was to exclude the princeſs Mary from the ſucceſſion, and transfer the crown to lady Jane Gray. He inſinuated alſo, that ſhould Elizabeth ſucceed to the throne, murmurs would ariſe from the conſideration of her illegitimacy, as Henry's marriage with her mother had been invalid by act of parliament, as well as that with the mother of Mary.

Theſe evil inſinuations ſo wrought on the mind of the king, that the two princeſſes, Mary and Elizabeth, were, by letters patent, excluded from the ſucceſſion, and the crown was transferred to the heirs of the ducheſs of Suffolk. The judges at firſt objected to this deed; however, urged by the threats and promiſes of the powerful duke, they at length obeyed, and the deed was ſigned by all (except Sir James Hales) as well as the members of the privy council in general.

Having finiſhed this laſt tranſaction of his life, the young king Edward paid the debt of nature, in the ſixteenth year of his age and the ſeventh of his reign.

Edward VI. was endowed with many perfections both mental and perſonal, ſuch as comelineſs and ſymetry of figure, and a mind diſpoſed to piety, humanity, and affability, ſo as to gain the univerſal affection of his ſubjects. His capacity being extenſive, he had attained to a degree of learning both in the claſſics and the ſcience beyond his years; and had he arrived to maturity, would probably have paſſed through a glorious reign. But as he was wholly under the influence of others, he cannot be ſuppoſed to have acquired praiſe or incurred cenſure from any of the tranſactions of public life; though he ſeems to have entertained an innate regard for the common rights of mankind, and an averſion to mental as well as bodily ſlavery. His memory is perpetuated by the foundation of Chriſt's hoſpital; an inſtitution that does equal honour to this young king, and the metropolis of that part of the world, on which it is fixed.

A treaty of marriage proposed between Mary and Philip of Spain. Sir Thomas Wyat's rebellion. The princess Elizabeth committed to the Tower. Lady Jane Gray, and her husband, the lord Guildford, beheaded. Philip of Spain arrives in England, and is soon after married to the Queen. The papal jurisdiction re-established by the parliament. Mary fits out a powerful armament to assist Philip in his wars with France. Calais taken by the French. Death and character of Queen Mary.

A. D. 1553. THE duke of Northumberland, desirous of gratifying his ambition, in advancing the lady Jane Gray to the royal dignity, found means to suppress the rumour of the king's demise. His design, in so doing, was, to apprehend the princess Mary, then coming on a visit, (at the request of the council,) to her brother, whose dissolution, at the time the messengers were dispatched to the princess, was hourly expected.

But the duke's efforts proved as abortive as the pretences of the adherents of lady Jane were absurd and frivolous: for the princess Mary, having advanced within eighteen miles of the metropolis, and receiving intimation from the earl of Arundel of her brother's death, and the designs which were formed against her, retired with the utmost precipitation to Framlingham in Suffolk, where she intended to embark and retire to Flanders, in case she should find it impossible to maintain her right of succession.

During her residence there, she addressed herself, by circular letters, to the nobility and gentry, reminding them of her right, and commanding them to proclaim her without delay; so that the ambitious duke, finding his scheme of seizing the person of Mary totally frustrated, repaired to Sion-house, attended by the duke of Suffolk, and others of the nobility, to intimate to lady Jane Gray her accession to the throne, by virtue of an act of conveyance.

This intimation by no means produced the desired effect on lady Jane, who received it with the greatest concern and astonishment; nay, so averse was she to the idea of succeeding to the crown, that she burst into tears on the occasion. At length her partizans extorted her consent, and she was the next day conveyed to the tower, according to the custom which then prevailed of the English sovereigns passing a few days after their accession in that place. On the 10th of July she was proclaimed in London, and the people were so astonished, that they expressed no joy or exultation.

Northumberland, before detested for his ambition and perfidy, now added to the popular odium he had already incurred, by causing an ignorant boy, who had expressed himself too freely on the subject of the proclamation, to be nailed to the pillory and deprived of his ears; an instance of cruelty that gave a very unfavourable omen of a reign which began with such rigour and severity.

The inhabitants of Suffolk, and parts adjacent, waited on the princess Mary, with assurances of duty and affection; but as they were, in general, attached to the reformed religion, they could not avoid insinuating some apprehensions, amidst their professions of loyalty, for its impending fate, till, on her solemn declaration, that she never intended to alter the laws of her brother Edward, they engaged in her interest with the utmost alacrity, and flocked to her banner in such numbers, from their general detestation of Northumberland, that, in a short time, she had an army amounting to forty thousand men.

To these were joined the earls of Bath and Sussex, with many other persons of the first rank and most extensive influence in those parts, who, together with their tenants and dependents, espoused her cause, and enlisted under her banner. Her interest was also essentially promoted by the vigorous exertions of Arundel and Pembroke, who, having found means to effect their release from the tower, invited all the noblemen about London, who were thought well affected to her, to a conference, in which the former expatiated on the cruelty and injustice of Northumberland, and affirmed, that the only way to retaliate his insolent behaviour was, to compel him to that duty and allegiance, which he owed to his lawful sovereign.

The earl of Pembroke, with singular courage and resolution, asserted the claim of the princess, by laying his hand on his sword, and swearing he was ready to answer any man, who denied her right to the crown. They then sent for the mayor and aldermen of London, and informed them of the resolution which had been taken; after which, mounting their horses, they rode to the cross in Cheapside, where Mary was proclaimed queen of England, amidst the general acclamations of the people.

The confirmation of Mary in the ſucceſſion tended rather to conſole, than depreſs, the lady Jane, who chearfully reſigned a pageant ſceptre, and returned to the uninterrupted enjoyment of a private life with the utmoſt complacency and ſatisfaction. Meſſengers were immediately diſpatched to Northumberland, with orders to diſband his forces, and ſubmit to his lawful ſovereign; but he had already diſmiſſed the ſmall body which remained after an almoſt general deſertion. Mary received the warmeſt expreſſions of loyalty and attachment from the people of all the different counties through which ſhe paſſed in her way to London, and ſhe was met by her ſiſter Elizabeth, at the head of a thouſand horſe, which that princeſs had raiſed to defend their joint titles againſt the uſurper.

Northumberland and his partizans ſoon felt the reſentment of thoſe who had ſuffered from his inſolence and pride when in power. He was arreſted by the earl of Arundel, at whoſe feet he fell on his knees, and begged his protection in the moſt abject terms. His three ſons, the lord Warwick, Ambroſe and Henry Dudley, his brother the marquis of Northampton, Sir Thomas Palmer, and Sir John Gates, ſhared the ſame fate, and were all committed to the tower.

Soon after the duke of Suffolk, lady Jane Gray, and lord Guildford Dudley, were taken into cuſtody. But the queen, deſirous at leaſt to affect a virtue ſhe never poſſeſſed, and mark the commencement of her reign with an act of ſeeming benevolence, indulged moſt of them with a pardon.

Northumberland, whoſe guilt could not admit of palliation, was brought to trial, when he propoſed two queſtions to the jury; namely, whether a man could be guilty of treaſon for obeying orders given by the council under the great ſeal? and whether thoſe, who were equally culpable, could act as his judges? Being told that the great ſeal of an uſurper was no warrant, and that perſons againſt whom there was nothing upon record were reputed, in law, capable of ſitting on any trial, he acquieſced, and pleaded guilty. He confeſſed on the ſcaffold, that he had always been a Roman Catholic in his heart, and expreſſed great compunction of mind for having plundered the effects of the church, and eſpecially as he was rendered incapable of making reſtitution. Gates and Palmer were executed with him, but the reſt were reprieved, and afterwards pardoned.

If the queen's ſucceſſion to her legal right was the ground of public joy on the one hand, apprehenſions for the Proteſtant intereſt was matter of public anxiety on the other. Nor was this anxiety without foundation; for the princeſs Mary, having been educated with queen Catherine her mother, and conceived the moſt ardent zeal for the Romiſh worſhip, no ſooner conquered the oppoſition that lay in her way to the crown, than ſhe than ſhe threw off the maſk, and openly avowed the Romiſh religion.

As no declaration, however ſolemn or awful, can bind ſuch as are dupes to ſuperſtition, the unconquerable prevalence of thoſe tenets, which ſhe had imbibed, ſoon appeared. In a few days Gardiner, Bonner, Tonſtall, Day, Heath, and Voiſey, were reſtored to their reſpective ſees. Hooper, biſhop of Glouceſter, and Coverdale, biſhop of Exeter, with ſeveral other proteſtant divines, were committed to priſon; and the Romiſh biſhops encouraged to reſtore the maſs, though repugnant to the laws of the kingdom. Judge Hales, who had defended the queen's title with ſo much reſolution, was thrown into priſon, and treated with ſuch rigour and ſeverity, that he was ſeized with a phrenzy, and put a period to his own exiſtence.

The moſt ſtrenuous aſſertors of the proteſtant cauſe, and thoſe who had been moſt active in bringing about the reformation, were now ſelected as victims to popiſh malice and cruelty; particularly, thatvenerable prelate archbiſhop Cranmer, who was reproached by Bonner in the moſt ignominious and contemptible terms. This arch-fiend, to weaken the cauſe of the reformation, ſpread a report, that he had ſubmitted to the queen, and offered publicly to recant his errors.

But the archbiſhop, with an openneſs and ingenuity becoming his character as a divine and a ſcholar, drew up a confeſſion of his faith, which he offered, with the queen's permiſſion, to defend in public. On account of this writing, which was made public without his knowledge, he was ſummoned to the Star-Chamber, where he acknowledged himſelf the author of the paper, and was, for that day, diſmiſſed. Some of the council adviſed the queen to treat him with lenity, as he had been remarkable for his moderation, and as it was to him ſhe was chiefly indebted for that indulgence ſhe enjoyed during the reign of her father. Mary, however, repugnant to the dictates of honour and humanity, declared, ſhe remembered nothing of Cranmer, but his having pronounced her mother's divorce, and promoted the reformation. He was ſummoned to appear before the council, together with old Latimer, the latter of whom was immediately ſent to the tower, and the former was committed to that priſon the next day, on pretence of having publiſhed ſeveral ſeditious libels.

Proteſtants of all orders, ranks and degrees, now began to experience the dire effects of power perverted and bigotted prejudice. Thoſe who thought proper were, indeed, permitted to quit the kingdom in peace, and a conſiderable number of Engliſh, who profeſſed the reformed religion, foreſeeing the perſecution, withdrew into foreign countries. On the firſt of October Mary was crowned by Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, and at the ſame time publiſhed an amneſty, from the benefit of which, however, all thoſe who had been arreſted before the month of September, and many others, were nominally excluded.

Such was the influence of corruption, that the lower houſe of parliament was almoſt filled with papiſts, as the moſt effectual means of accompliſhing their deſigns of eſtabliſhing the papal ſupremacy, and ſacrificing the reaſon, the conſciences, the property, and lives of the ſubjects, to ſuperſtition and arbitrary power. In the upper houſe the queen had a conſiderable majority; for even the greateſt part of thoſe noblemen, who had rejected the papal authority in the late reign, now infamouſly conformed to the doctrines of the court, from motives of intereſt or ambition.

To introduce the popiſh ritual under the ſanction of parliament, maſs was performed in the Latin tongue at the opening of the ſeſſion: a prelate was expelled the upper houſe for refuſing to comply with certain abſurd and ſuperſtitious ceremonies; and further to concur with the deſigns of the then miniſtry, the firſt bill that paſſed was, to aboliſh every kind of treaſon not ſpecified in the ſtatute of Edward III. and every felony which did not ſubſiſt before the firſt of Henry VIII. The following ſeſſions, an act paſſed for reverſing the ſentence of divorce between Henry VIII. and Catherine of

Arragon

Arragon, and for repealing all the ſtatutes, by which that ſentence had been confirmed. By this act the princeſs Elizabeth was again declared illegitimate, and Mary, having no farther occaſion for her aſſiſtance, treated her with indignity and even cruelty.

The ſame parliament likewiſe put in force an act of the late reign, which made it felony for twelve perſons, or any greater number, to aſſemble with a view of changing the eſtabliſhed religion; and repealed the act of attainder which had paſſed againſt the duke of Norfolk.

It is not to be wondered, that the emiſſaries of the papal ſee were, at this juncture, remarkably active in concurring with deſigns already concerted, and partly executed, under the auſpices of Mary, queen of England; not only for the revival, but univerſal diffuſion of thoſe corrupt and pernicious principles which are its baſis and ſupport. Mary had, no doubt, been tampered with, as appears by her requeſt that cardinal Pole might be appointed legate to the pope, to effect the union of herſelf and kingdom to the ſee of Rome; a nomination equally diſagreeable to the emperor and biſhop Gardiner. The former, who, by his tyrannical behaviour, had excited the reſentment of all the proteſtant princes in Germany, being deſirous of ſtrengthening his intereſt by a match he had projected between his ſon Philip and the queen of England, was apprehenſive of the ſcheme miſcarrying by the interpoſition of Pole, whom, it was reported, Mary intended to take for her huſband. Gardiner was fearful that Pole would ſupplant him in his view to the primacy of all England, as well as deſtroy his influence at court. He therefore endeavoured to ruin that cardinal in the opinion of the queen, by inſinuating, that his furious zeal would defeat her intentions, in favour of the Roman Catholic religion.

The emperor, that no time might be loſt in accompliſhing a moſt deſirable end, took immediate occaſion of diſpatching an ambaſſador to explain the purport of his intentions to the queen, who, pleaſed with the ſupport of ſo powerful an alliance, and deſirous of uniting herſelf more intimately with her mother's family, embraced the propoſal with the utmoſt alacrity. This match was ſtrongly recommended by Norfolk, Arundel, Paget and Gardiner; the latter of whom aſſured both the queen and the emperor, that it was abſolutely neceſſary to ſtop all farther innovations in religion, till the marriage ſhould be conſummated.

The wily prelate purſued the plan with the utmoſt cunning, inſomuch that the moſt ſanguine hopes were entertained, by the parties concerned, of its being carried into ſpeedy execution; but the commons, being informed of the intended match, were ſurprized and enraged at her deſire of contracting a foreign alliance, and ſent a committee to remonſtrate, in the ſtrongeſt terms, againſt ſuch a dangerous and imprudent ſtep. Mary, who was naturally obſtinate, perſiſted in her reſolution, and, to prevent any farther addreſſes of the like nature, diſſolved the parliament.

A. D. 1554-5. Nothing could more effectually tend to the total ſuppreſſion of the proteſtant, and confirmation of the popiſh, religion throughout the realm, than this raſh act of the queen in diſſolving the parliament, as, in conſequence thereof, the popiſh ceremonies were univerſally reſtored. But the match with Philip was a point ſtill more alarming, and filled the breaſt of every Engliſhman, who loved his country, with the moſt terrible apprehenſions for the liberty and independence of the nation. To remove, however, if poſſible, theſe jealouſies and ſuſpicions, the contract was concluded on the moſt plauſible terms, which were as follow: That though Philip ſhould enjoy the title of king, the adminiſtration ſhould be lodged in the hands of the queen; that no foreigner ſhould be capable of holding any dignified poſt in the kingdom; that no change ſhould be made in the Engliſh laws, cuſtoms, and privileges; that Philip ſhould not take the queen abroad, without her conſent, or any of her children, without the conſent of the nobility; that her jointure ſhould amount to ſixty thouſand pounds a year; that the male iſſue of this marriage ſhould enjoy England, together with Burgundy and the Low Countries; and that if Don Carlos, Philip's ſon by a former marriage, ſhould die, and his line become extinct, the queen's iſſue, whether male or female, ſhould ſucceed to Spain, Sicily, Milan, and all the other dominions of Philip.

Notwithſtanding theſe ſpecious preliminaries, the people in general diſapproved the match, perſuaded that Philip, from prejudice in favour of thoſe deſpotic principles in which he had been educated, would be deſirous of ſubjugating the Engliſh ſubjects to maxims of Spaniſh policy: in conſequence of which ſome perſons, more factious than the reſt, believing it eaſier to prevent than remedy evils, determined to take up arms, and vigorouſly oppoſe the queen's marriage with Philip. Sir Thomas Wyat engaged to arm the men of Kent; Sir Peter Carew undertook to aſſemble the inhabitants of Devonſhire; and they perſuaded the duke of Suffolk, by the hopes of reſtoring the lady Jane to the throne, to attempt to raiſe the midland counties. Carew, prompted either by his impetuoſity, or apprehenſions, roſe in arms before the day appointed; but his troops were ſoon diſperſed by the earl of Bedford, and himſelf was forced to take refuge in France. Suffolk, informed of the fate of this confederate, and, dreading an arreſt, quitted the town, attended by his brothers the lords Thomas and Leonard, and attempted to raiſe the people in the counties of Warwick and Leiceſter, where his chief intereſt lay; but he was ſo hotly purſued by the earl of Huntingdon, at the head of three hundred horſe, that he was obliged to diſmiſs his followers, and being diſcovered in his retreat, was ſeized and conducted to London.

The queen's partizans were more intimidated at the efforts of Wyat, than thoſe of ſuperior rank; for, having publiſhed a declaration at Maidſtone, in Kent, againſt her unjuſt proceedings, and evil counſellors, together with their danger of being enſlaved by a Spaniard, the people flocked to his ſtandard in prodigious numbers.

This party, however, was oppoſed by the queen's guards, headed by the duke of Norfolk and Sir Henry Jernegan, reinforced with a body of five hundred Londoners, under the command of one Brett. On overtaking the rebels at Rocheſter, the place of general rendezvous, Brett privately concerted a ſcheme with Sir George Harper, one profeſſedly of the malecontent party, for defeating the deſigns of the queen's forces. On the approach of the royal army, Harper pretended to deſert, and, in conjunction with Brett, (whoſe intereſt, he had undoubtedly ſecured,) repreſented the deſigns of the court in ſuch odious colours, that the whole body of Londoners went over to Wyat, declaring they would not aſſiſt in enſlaving their country. Wyat, encouraged by this this reinforcement, and relying on the favour of the people, eſpecially of the Londoners, who were moſtly proteſtants, reſolved to proceed in this enterprize; and accordingly led his troops to Southwark, where he demanded of the queen, that ſhe ſhould put him in poſſeſſion of the tower, deliver four counſellors as hoſtages, and, in order to enſure the liberty of the nation, immediately to eſpouſe an Engliſhman. Finding the bridge barricaded againſt him, and that the city was over-awed by the regular troops, he marched up to Kingſton, where he croſſed the river with four thouſand men, hoping to animate his friends, who had promiſed to declare in his favour.

But ſuch was his delay in the execution of the ſcheme, that the favourable opportunity was loſt, ſo that his popularity began to decline, and though he entered Weſtminſter without oppoſition, his followers, finding that no perſon of importance eſpouſed his cauſe, gradually diſperſed, and he was at length ſeized near Temple-bar by Sir Maurice Berkley.

The event proved fatal to his adherents, of whom near ſeventy were executed; four hundred appeared before the queen with halters about their necks, and, falling on their knees, ſued for forgiveneſs, which they obtained, and were diſmiſſed. Wyat, the ringleader, was condemned and executed; and as it had been reported, that, at his trial, he had impeached the lady Elizabeth, and the earl of Devonſhire, he ſolemnly declared before the whole people, that they had no concern in the rebellion; a circumſtance that reflects ſome honour on his character.

Mary, inflexibly attached to thoſe principles, which invariably lead to acts of ambition and cruelty, and viewing her ſiſter Elizabeth with an eye of jealouſy, from a perſuaſion of her being as much a friend to the reformation as ſhe was herſelf to popery, gave orders for conducting her priſoner to the tower, in order that ſhe might paſs the examination of council.

Nothing, however, appearing againſt her, Mary, in order to obviate any oppoſition from her ſiſter, and to remove her out of the kingdom, a marriage was propoſed between her and the duke of Savoy, and on her refuſing to agree to the match, ſhe was confined, under a ſtrong guard, at Woodſtock. The earl of Devonſhire, without any ground or pretence, was committed priſoner to Fotheringay-caſtle. A meſſage was then ſent to the lady Jane, deſiring her to prepare for immediate death; a doom ſhe had long expected, and therefore heard it without much perturbation. The bigotted Mary ſent two prieſts to her, to aſſiſt her in making the neceſſary preparations for futurity; but lady Jane could receive no conſolation from thoſe whoſe horrid principles, amongſt others, had inſtigated the queen to the moſt enormous acts of cruelty and barbarity, under the ſacred maſk of religion.

Lady Jane, notwithſtanding the oppreſſion under which ſhe laboured, was ſo calm and deliberate, as to be able not only to defend her religion with great learning and eloquence, but alſo to write a letter to her ſiſter Catherine in the Greek language, in which, beſides ſending her a copy of the New Teſtament in that tongue, ſhe exhorted her to maintain an unſhaken perſeverance in the profeſſion ſhe had avowed. It had been propoſed to execute the lady Jane and lord Guilford (her huſband) together, on the ſame ſcaffold; but the council, to prevent any clamours that ſuch a ſcene might excite among the people, gave orders that lord Guildford ſhould be beheaded within the verge of the tower.

The compoſure and reſignation of lady Jane to the fate of her huſband was beyond conception: ſhe even ſaw his headleſs body brought back in a cart, and found herſelf more encouraged by the account ſhe received of his perſeverance, than melted by ſo moving and melancholy a ſight.

When ſhe mounted the ſcaffold, ſhe addreſſed the ſpectators, who were diſſolved in tears at ſo mournful a ſpectacle, and obſerved, in particular, that innocence was no excuſe for acts that tended to the prejudice of the public. Having ſpent ſome time in devotion, ſhe cauſed herſelf to be diſrobed by her female attendants, and, with great compoſure, ſubmitted to the fatal ſtroke. Thus fell a victim, at the early period of ſeventeen years, an illuſtrious lady, adding to many other inſtances of the dire effects of ambition, reſentment and cruelty. The duke of Suffolk ſoon ſubmitted to the ſame fate, by ſuffering decapitation on Tower-hill.

Having thus removed ſeveral barriers to her barbarous projects, the queen buſily employed herſelf in making preparations for the reception of Don Philip, whoſe arrival ſhe hourly expected, with the utmoſt impatience. At length, the much deſired moment arrived, when ſhe received the joyful news that Philip was landed at Southampton. In a few days after his arrival the nuptials were ſolemnized at Weſtminſter, and the queen, with her new ſpouſe, made a pompous entry into London. Philip poſſeſſed a diſſimulation, and maintained a reſerve, very diſguſting to the Engliſh; but as he brought with him an immenſe ſum of money, many perſons were reconciled to the marriage.

The ſolemnization of the nuptials between Philip and Mary having paved the way for the accompliſhment of their deſign, cardinal Pole arrived in England, fully commiſſioned by his holineſs to put a finiſhing ſtroke to the union of the queen and realm to the ſee of Rome. He was received at court with all the reſpect due to his exalted character, and, on the firſt occaſion that offered, earneſtly exhorted the parliament to reconcile themſelves and the kingdom to the holy ſee, from which they had been ſo long unhappily divided.

The legate's doctrine proving very agreeable to this packed and corrupt parliament, both houſes preſented an addreſs to Philip and Mary, declaring their reſolution inviolably to adhere to the church of Rome. The legate, then, in the name of his holineſs, abſolved them from all the cenſures that had been paſſed againſt them, and admitted them into the boſom of the church. The parliament, in conſequence of this indulgence, enacted a ſtatute, re-eſtabliſhing the papal juriſdiction in England; but under this reſtriction, that alienation of church-lands ſhould be authorized; and that the poſſeſſions of them ſhould not be ſubject to any cenſure or proſecution on that account.

Having ſerved their private purpoſes, they were wholly regardleſs of the intereſt and liberties of their fellow-ſubjects; inſomuch that they revived the old ſanguinary laws againſt heretics, and enacted ſeveral new ſtatutes, pronouncing it treaſon to imagine the death of Philip, during his marriage with the queen.

An ambitious, avaricious and barbarous junto being thus completely formed, conſequences enſued which will ever reflect the higheſt diſgrace on human nature, as well as odium on that religious profeſſion, which could not only enjoin, but ſanctify acts repugnant to the univerſal law of God, and of reaſon.

The firſt perſon who now fell a victim to religious fury was one Rogers, a prebendary of St. Paul's, and a man equally diſtinguiſhed for his piety and learning. Dr. Hooper, biſhop of Glouceſter, had been condemned at the ſame time with Rogers, but was ſent down to his dioceſe, and after having rejected a pardon on terms of recantation, brought to the ſtake, where he reſigned himſelf to his cruel fate with amazing fortitude. Dr. Taylor, vicar of Hadley, an old divine, was burned in that place, amidſt his friends and pariſhioners. When he was brought to the ſtake, and began to harangue the bye-ſtanders, a ruffian ſtruck him on the head. He was then placed in a barrel of pitch, and one of the ſpectators, throwing a faggot at the venerable old man, wounded him ſo ſeverely, that his whole viſage was beſmeared with blood; but his only reply was, "O friend! I have harm enough, why doeſt "thou encreaſe it?" When he had repeated a pſalm in Engliſh, one of the guards ſtruck him on the mouth, bidding him ſpeak Latin; and while he was employed in pious ejaculations, another cleft his head in ſuch a manner that his brains came out, and he expired.

As enthuſiaſm is, in general, the offspring of ignorance, their main object was, to compel the people to believe the abſurd and ridiculous doctrine of tranſubſtantiation. Gardiner, however, finding the eſtabliſhment of popery attended with ſuch cruel circumſtances, devolved the odious taſk on Bonner, whoſe ſavage diſpoſition delighted in tormenting the unhappy ſufferers. He ſometimes whipped the priſoners with his own hands, till he was tired with the violence of the exerciſe: he tore out the beard of a poor mechanic, who refuſed to change his religion; and in in order to give him a ſpecimen of burning, tortured him with the flame of a taper, until the veins burſt, and the ſinews were conſumed.

Cardinal Pole, though a catholic by profeſſion, retained ſome principles of humanity, and would, if his influence had been ſufficient, have averted the ſentence of Ferrar, biſhop of St. David's; but the prelate, notwithſtanding his interpoſition, fell a victim to popiſh ſuperſtition and cruelty, and was brought to the ſtake in his own dioceſe. This religious, or rather demoniacal, maſſacre now became general, and thouſands ſubmitted to the moſt painful deaths, rather than ſubſcribe to the popiſh creed.

The perſecutions and horrid cruelties to which the proteſtants were ſubject were imputed, in a great meaſure, to the influence of the Spaniſh court; ſo that Philip, ſenſible of the odium under which he laboured, endeavoured to vindicate himſelf by a very groſs artifice. He ordered his confeſſor to deliver, in his preſence, a ſermon in favour of toleration; but finding this trick ineffectual, he laid aſide the maſk, the perſecution raged without controul, and attempts were even made to introduce the inquiſition into England.

The queen's adherents could not have pitched on a more effectual tool for perpetrating their deſigns than that haughty and tyrannical prelate biſhop Bonner. Several perſons ſuffered at Canterbury, and other places; and, among the reſt, Margaret Polly, the firſt female martyr in Mary's reign. In the month of October Ridley, formerly biſhop of London, and Latimer, of Worceſter, two prelates eminent for their piety and learning, periſhed together in the flames at Oxford, and encouraged each other by their mutual exhortations.

In the midſt of theſe enormous proceedings, Mary pleaſed herſelf with the hopes of pregnancy; but the flattering idea ſoon vaniſhed, on her bringing forth a ſubſtance called by phyſicians Mola, to her unſpeakable grief, the aſtoniſhment of the court, and confuſion of Philip, who entertained the proſpect of uniting England and Spain, by the iſſue of this marriage. Chagrined at this diſappointment, he retired to Flanders, leaving his conſort in great perplexity. Soon after Philip's departure, Mary received a bull for erecting Ireland into a kingdom, and towards the cloſe of the year the emperor Charles V. reſigned his dominions to his ſon Philip.

A. D. 1556. The rage of perſecution prevailed with unremitting fury, and it was now reſolved to maſſacre the venerable archbiſhop, in terror to the inferior clergy, as well as the laity in general, who adhered to the proteſtant faith. Accordingly, Bonner, biſhop of London, and Thirley of Ely, were ſent to Oxford to degrade Cranmer, and the former performed that melancholy office, with all the ſavage joy and triumph, that might be expected from his brutal diſpoſition. After the archbiſhop's condemnation, perſons were employed to aſſail him in different ſhapes, in order to make him a proſelyte to their opinions. They accordingly repreſented to him the dignities and honours to which his character ſtill gave him a claim, if he would deſerve them by a recantation, and flattered him with the hopes of long enjoying thoſe powerful friends, whom his humanity and beneficence had procured him, during the courſe of his proſperity.

After much importunity, and that dread of the excruciating torments with which the death he was conſigned to muſt be inevitably attended, he ſuffered the feelings of nature to overpower his reſolution, and agreed to ſign a paper, acknowledging the doctrine of the papal ſupremacy, and of the real preſence in the euchariſt. But this condeſcenſion did not, in any degree, ſooth the fury of his bigotted and relentleſs ſovereign, who, ſo far from admitting it as any plea to her favourable regard, ſent orders that he ſhould be commanded to own his errors in church, before the whole people, and that he ſhould from thence be immediately conducted to execution.

Far from being intimidated at the awful mandate, Cranmer reſumed his former reſolution, and, to the aſtoniſhment of the ſurrounding multitude abjured the whole of the papal creed, and was led to the place of execution, with the reſolution of a martyr to the moſt glorious cauſe. When fixed to the ſtake, he ſtretched out his right hand, and, without diſcovering the leaſt ſign of feeling, held it in the flames until it dropped off, exclaiming, ſeveral times, "this hand has offended." This eminent martyr to the proteſtant cauſe exemplified the moſt ſhining virtues of real religion: he died revered and lamented by all good men, and his name muſt be reſpected to the lateſt poſterity. Cardinal Pole ſucceeded to the archiepiſcopal ſee, through the interpoſition of the queen with his holineſs in behalf of that prelate.

The pillar of the reformation being thus removed by the maſſacre of Cranmer, the relentleſs Mary practiſed every ſpecies of cruelty. Within the compaſs of this year no leſs than eighty-five perſons, men, women and children, the lame, the blind and the ignorant, were put to death, for denying the the doctrines of purgatory, tranſubſtantiation, and other tenets, exploded by the then church of England.

Such inſtances of more than ſavage barbarity, committed under the ſanction of zeal for religion, rouſed the indignation of all moderate people, and the ſurpriſing reſolution of the martyrs enhanced the merit of the religion they profeſſed; while the frantic zeal of the perſecutors tended to the eſtabliſhment of the ſubſequent reformation.

A. D. 1557. The perſecuting queen was now interrupted in her career of ſlaughter by turning her attention to the war, which had broke out between France and Spain. Though her council were, in general, averſe to ſuch a proceeding, through the inſtigation of Philip, ſhe levied a conſiderable ſum, equipped a powerful armament, which embarked in June, under the command of the earl of Pembroke, in order to join the Spaniſh forces headed by the duke of Savoy.

The onſet proved unſucceſsful to the French, whoſe army was routed in the firſt engagement, and many officers of diſtinction taken priſoners. About the latter end of the year Philip ſent information to Mary, that the court of France had projected a plan for the reduction of Calais, and offered to ſupply her with troops for the defence of that fortreſs. The council, conſidering this intimation as a ſtratagem of Philip to gain poſſeſſion of Calais, the queen not only declined the offer, but neglected to put the place in a poſture of defence, in oppoſition to the opinion and advice of the governor of that fortreſs.

A. D. 1588. The truth of Philip's intimation, and the foundation of the advice given by lord Wentworth, the governor, too ſoon and too evidently appeared; for Calais was not only inveſted by the duke of Guiſe, but the fortreſs reduced in ſeven days, notwithſtanding an oppoſition was made as vigorous as the ſtrength of the place would admit. The duke no ſooner took poſſeſſion, than he expelled all the Engliſh inhabitants, and then inveſted Guiſnes, where the lord Gray had commanded; but the garriſon, conſiſting of eleven hundred men, were ſo diſcouraged at the loſs of Calais, that, at the firſt attack, they retired to the citadel, and ſoon after ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war. The caſtle of Hames, ſituated in a moraſs almoſt inacceſſible, might have made a vigorous reſiſtance; but the garriſon fled at the approach of the enemy. Thus in the ſpace of fifteen days, and in the winter ſeaſon, all that had remained of the Engliſh conqueſts in France, was loſt by the ignorance and neglect of the queen and her council.

Mary began to apprehended the ſeaſon of retaliation was near at hand, a murmuring people, a weak adminiſtration, loſſes ſuſtained in her firſt military attempts reflected univerſal diſgrace on her government. To her mental diſquietude was added bodily indiſpoſition, for, having, miſtaken a dropſy for a pregnancy, ſhe had purſued an improper regimen, and her diſtemper became every day more inveterate. Her malady was ſtill farther inflamed by the anxiety of her mind through the moſt painful reflections, and at length brought on a lingering fever, of which ſhe died, after a ſhort and inglorious reign of five years, four months, and eleven days.

Exalted characters, whether exemplary, or infamous, ſhould be held forth in their true colours, to excite either the imitation or averſion of thoſe of inferior rank. The moſt faithful picture of this queen is only to be drawn from a peruſal of her reign, which blots the page of hiſtory with the fouleſt deeds that ever diſgraced humanity. Her characteriſtics were, bigotry, reſentment, jealouſy, perfidy and cruelty; for which laſt vice ſhe was ſo notorious as to be branded with the appellation of "Bloody Mary." She ſtands upon record as a deteſtable inſtance of the accurſed prevalence of thoſe principles, which, under the ſanction of religion, lead to the moſt diabolical actions, and, though ranked among monarchs, ſhe appears to have been one of the baſeſt of mortals.

1558 Wheat was this year ſold for 2l. 13s. the quarter before the harveſt; and for 5s. the quarter ſoon after.

This year there happened a moſt violent ſtorm of thunder and lightning, by which two villages near Nottingham were totally deſtroyed; and many of the hail-ſtones that fell were fifteen inches in circumference.

In the ſame year there was a malignant fever, which, in a ſhort time, carried off great numbers of the inhabitants.

A law was paſſed this year, by which the women of London (not being the wives of aldermen, nor gentlewomen by deſcent) were obliged to wear minover caps, being made of white woolen knit, three cornered, with the peaks projecting three or four inches beyond their foreheads. Aldermens wives had them of the ſame form, but they were diſtinguiſhed by being made of velvet.

Forms a rebellious confederacy, for which he is apprehended, tried, condemned and executed. Montjoy ſuppreſſes a rebellion raiſed in Ireland. The queen, greatly affected at divers incidents, falls into an incurable melancholy. Her death and character.

A. D. 1558. ON the demiſe of a ſovereign ſo obnoxious to her ſubjects as the late queen, the public could not but rejoice at that event, as well as the reſolution of the privy council to place her ſiſter Elizabeth, whoſe prudence and moderation, during the commotions of the late reign, had conciliated univerſal eſteem, on a throne left by a tyrant and aſſaſſin.

The death of queen Mary was notified to the princeſs Elizabeth, who then reſided at Hatfield, from whence ſhe immediately repaired to London, and after receiving the compliments of the nobility, ſent ambaſſadors to the different powers of Europe, to notify her acceſſion to the throne of England.

As nothing can ſo well qualify for the moſt dignified and important offices of life, as a true knowledge of the ſprings of human action, this princeſs gave a moſt ſignal diſplay of prudence and policy at her acceſſion to the throne; for in appointing her privy council, ſhe retained thirteen of her ſiſter's counſellors to prevent an alarm on the ſcore of religion; but in order to balance their authority, ſhe joined eight more to them, who were ſtrongly attached to the proteſtant cauſe. Philip of Spain could not but be alarmed at the conſequences in which the death of queen Mary had involved him; yet hoping ſtill to retain his influence over England, he diſpatched orders to the duke of Ferra, his ambaſſador at London, to propoſe a match between him and Elizabeth, the latter of whom, declined the propoſal; but in ſuch polite and evaſive terms, that the Spaniſh monarch could not juſtly take offence at her refuſal.

The queen, perſuaded of the difficulty of eradicating principles of bigotry and ſuperſtition, proceeded at firſt in the revival of the proteſtant doctrines and worſhip, with much caution and deliberation. To pave the way, however, for this great and laudable deſign, ſhe gave viſible tokens of her attachment to the cauſe by recalling all the exiles, releaſing thoſe confined for their religious tenets, and reſtoring thoſe, who had been attainted, to their former honours.

Purſuant to this purpoſe, thoſe noblemen and perſons of eminence who had ſuffered in the cauſe of the reformation through the tyranny and oppreſſion of her ſiſter, were amply compenſated for their zeal and fidelity. Amongſt others the marquis of Northampton, who had been condemned in the late reign, was releaſed, and reſtored to his eſtate and dignities.

Theſe intimations of a future deſign raiſed apprehenſions in the minds of the popiſh prelates for the fate of their religion, as they ſeemed to forbode a reformation. Hence the ceremony of Elizabeth's coronation was rather retarded; but it was at length indeed performed with much reluctance by the biſhop of Carliſle.

At the opening of the ſeſſion of parliament, Sir Nicholas Bacon, keeper of the great ſeal, eminent both as an able lawyer and perſuaſive orator, diſplayed his talents on the auſpicious event of the new queen's acceſſion to the throne, inveighed with great ſeverity againſt the proceedings of the late adminiſtration, and after urging the expediency of turning their attention to religious matters, exhorted them to obſerve a due medium between the extremes of ſuperſtition and real religion, as the moſt effectual means of uniting both the Roman Catholics and Proteſtants in one mode of worſhip. He concluded with ſoliciting that ſupply in behalf of her majeſty, which the exigencies of the ſtate required.

The commons, though they had been harraſſed by impoſitions in the late reign, chearfully granted the tonnage and poundage, together with a large ſubſidy on lands and moveables, and at the inſtance of ſome powerful friends attached to revolution principles, brought in and paſſed a bill for ſuppreſſing the monaſteries lately erected, and reſtoring the tenths and firſt fruits to the crown, which had been ſurrendered by Mary.

To add to the dignity and influence of the queen, her legal right to the crown was recognized by virtue of an act of the thirty-ſixth of Henry VIII. and to promote the moſt deſired reformation, the following bills were paſſed, viz. that the ſervice ſhould be performed in the vulgar tongue; that the ſupremacy of the church of England ſhould be veſted in the ſovereign; that all acts relative to religion, which had paſſed in the reign of Edward VI. ſhould be renewed and confirmed; that the nomination to biſhoprics ſhould be veſted in the queen, who might exerciſe her ſupremacy by any perſon ſhe ſhould appoint for that purpoſe; that that all perſons in office ſhould take the oath of ſupremacy, and that no perſon, under ſevere penalties, ſhould, by word or writing, ſupport any foreign authority in this kingdom; that there ſhould be an uniformity of worſhip; and that, on the vacancy of any biſhopric, the queen might reſume its manors and temporal poſſeſſions, making a juſt recompence to the ſee of perſonages impropriate.

The queen, thus confirmed in her ſucceſſion, as well as royal prerogative, by parliamentary ſanction, revived a tribunal called the High Commiſſion Court, which was compoſed of commiſſioners, veſted with the authority of the vicegerent appointed in the reign of Henry VIII. Of nine thouſand four hundred eccleſiaſtics, who held benefices in England, thoſe who choſe rather to renounce their livings than the Romiſh religion, amounted to fourteen biſhops, twelve archdeacons, fifty canons, and about four-ſcore of the inferior clergy; a circumſtance, that, by giving way for the induction of proteſtant divines, greatly promoted the work of the reformation.

Nor was leſs attention paid to the foreign than domeſtic concerns of the nation; which having ſuſtained conſiderable loſs, as well as diſgrace, from the war, a treaty was concluded by the Engliſh ambaſſador with France on the following terms; that Henry ſhould retain Calais, and all the towns he had wreſted from the Engliſh, for eight years, at the expiration of which they ſhould be reſtored to the queen of England; that he ſhould give ample ſecurity for paying to Elizabeth, or her ſucceſſors, the ſum of five hundred thouſand golden crowns, in default of reſtoring the places at the time appointed; that the French ſhould give hoſtages for the performance of this article; that neither he, the king or queen of Scotland, nor Elizabeth, ſhould attempt any thing againſt each other, directly or indirectly, to the prejudice of this treaty; and that they ſhould not encourage or protect the rebellious ſubjects of each other.

This political ſtroke could not fail to enſure a final adjuſtment of all differences with Scotland; ſo that a general tranquillity afforded leiſure for promoting the internal welfare and happineſs of the kingdom. But the proſperity of England, under a proteſtant queen and government, could not but raiſe the jealouſy of their popiſh neighbours; inſomuch that the dauphin and his conſort Mary, at the inſtigation of the pope, and monarchs of France and Spain, who were incenſed at the acceſſion of a proteſtant princeſs on the throne of England, aſſumed the title of king and queen of Scotland, England and Ireland; and arrogated to themſelves the arms of England. Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, the queen's ambaſſador at Paris, remonſtrated on this inſult offered to his miſtreſs, and receiving a very frivolous anſwer, repeated his complaint; but was told by the French miniſtry, that the queen of Scots was as much intitled to the arms of England, as Elizabeth was to the appellation of queen of France.

This circumſtance could not fail of adding to the apprehenſions of Elizabeth, who conſidered both Mary and the Spaniſh monarch, as highly inimical to her perſon and intereſt, from motives both ambitious and religious. As the only means, therefore, to fruſtrate their moſt vigorous and artful deſigns, ſhe wiſely determined on ſuch meaſures as might conciliate the affections of her ſubjects. Having from early life ſedulouſly applied herſelf to the ſtudy of men and things, and being, of courſe, capable of diſcerning merit, ſhe appointed men of capacity to the important offices of ſtate; diſpenſed juſtice impartially; evinced a well-judged œconomy; deported herſelf with complacency; and demonſtrated ſo ardent a regard for the welfare of her people, as produced the warmeſt returns of confidence and affection.

A. D. 1559. To form a powerful intereſt in the north, Elizabeth abetted a numerous party, who declared for the reformation, and with ſuch apparent effect, that conferences for a peace were actually opened at Edinburgh. But the progreſs of this important tranſaction was retarded by the premature death of Henry of France, who, being ſlain in a tournament, was ſucceeded by Francis II. a prince of weak intellects, ſolely at the devotion of the houſe of Guiſe, and conſequently averſe to the proteſtant cauſe. But all his efforts were baffled by the ſuperior genius of Elizabeth, who reduced him to the neceſſity of concluding a treaty, by which it was ſtipulated, that the king and queen of France and Scotland, ſhould thenceforth abſtain from bearing the arms of England; that Elizabeth ſhould be farther ſatisfied for the injury already done her in that particular; that commiſſioners ſhould be appointed to ſettle the point; and, on failure of agreement, the matter ſhould be referred to the arbitration of the king of Spain; and that the king and queen of France and Scotland ſhould be obliged to confirm the conceſſions that had been made by the French plenipotentiaries to the Scottiſh confederates.

Notwithſtanding the concluſion of this treaty, and the acceſſion of the parties previouſly in oppoſition, to divers articles in furtherance of the reformation, Francis and Mary peremptorily refuſed that part which referred to Elizabeth, on pretence that ſhe had treated with their rebellious ſubjects; though their real deſign was to wreſt the crown from the then poſſeſſor, and place it on the head of their young neice.
